 The new portions in the present edition are indicated by a star (*), the editorial additions being distinguished by the initials H. and A. Whatever is enclosed in brackets is also, with unimportant exceptions, editorial. This remark, however, does not apply to the cross-references in brackets, most of which belong to the original work, though a large number have been added to this edition.

ABBREVIATIONS.

Ald. The Aldine edition of the Septuagint, 1518.

Alex. The Codex Alexandrinus (5th cent.), edited by Baber, 1816–28.

A. V. The authorized (common) English version of the Bible.

Comp. The Septuagint as printed in the Complutensian Polyglott, 1514–17, published 1522.

FA. The Codex Friderico-Augustanus (4th cent.), published by Tischendorf in 1846.

Rom. The Roman edition of the Septuagint, 1587. The readings of the Septuagint for which no authority is specified are also from this source.

Sin. The Codex Sinaiticus (4th cent.), published by Tischendorf in 1862. This and FA. are parts of the same manuscript.

Vat. The Codex Vaticanus 1209 (4th cent.), according to Mai's edition, published by Vercellone in 1857. "Vat. H." denotes readings of the MS. (differing from Mai), given in Holmes and Parsons's edition of the Septuagint, 1798–1827. "Vat.[1]" distinguishes the primary reading of the MS. from "Vat.[2]" or "2. m.," the alteration of a later reviser.

BIBLICAL ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, GEOGRAPHY, AND NATURAL HISTORY.

GENNES'ARET, SEA OF (λίμνη Γεννησαρέτ, Luke v. 1; ὕδωρ Γεννησάρ, 1 Macc. xi. 67), called in the O. T. "the Sea of Chinnereth," or "Cinneroth," Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xii. 3), from a town of that name which stood on or near its shore (Josh. xix. 35). In the later Hebrew we always find the Greek form גִּנֵּסַר, which may possibly be a corruption of כִּנֶּרֶת, though some derive the word from Gannah, "a garden," and Sharon, the name of a plain between Tabor and this lake (Onom. s. v. Σαρών; Reland, pp. 193, 259). Josephus calls it Γεννησαρῖτιν λίμνην (Ant. xviii. 2, § 1); and this seems to have been its common name at the commencement of our era (Strab. xvi. p. 755; Plin. v. 16; Ptol. v. 15). At its northwestern angle was a beautiful and fertile plain called "Gennesaret" (γῆν Γεννησαρέτ, Matt. xiv. 34), from which the name of the lake was taken (Joseph. B. J. iii. 10, § 7). The lake is also called in the N. T. Θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας, from the province of Galilee which bordered on its western side (Matt. iv. 18; Mark vii. 31; John vi. 1); and Θάλασσα τῆς Τιβεριάδος, from the celebrated city (John vi. 1, [xxi. 1]). Eusebius calls it Λίμνη Τιβεριάς (Onom. s. v. Σαρών; see also Cyr. in Jes. i. 5). It is a curious fact that all the numerous names given to this lake were taken from places on its western side. Its modern name is Bahr Tubariyeh (بحر طبريه).

In Josh. xi. 2 "the plains south of Chinneroth" are mentioned. It is the sea and not the city that is here referred to (comp. Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xii. 3); and "the plains" are those along the banks of the Jordan. Most of our Lord's public life was spent in the environs of the Sea of Gennesaret. On its shores stood Capernaum, "his own city" (Matt. iv. 13); on its shore he called his first disciples from their occupation as fishermen (Luke v. 1–11); and near its shores he spake many of his parables, and performed many of his miracles. This region was then the most densely peopled in all Palestine. No less than nine cities stood on the very shores of the lake; while numerous large villages dotted the plains and hill-sides around (Porter, Handbook, p. 424).

The Sea of Gennesaret is of an oval shape, about thirteen geographical miles long, and six broad. Josephus gives the length at 140 stadia, and the breadth forty (B. J. iii. 10, § 7); and Pliny says it measured xvi. M. P. by vi. (H. N. xiv.). Both these are so near the truth that they could scarcely have been mere estimates. The river Jordan enters it at its northern end, and passes out at its southern end. In fact the bed of the lake is just a lower section of the great Jordan valley. Its most remarkable feature is its deep depression, being no less than 700 feet below the level of the ocean (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i. 613). Like almost all lakes of volcanic origin it occupies the bottom of a great basin, the sides of which shelve down with a uniform slope from the surrounding plateaus. On the east the banks are nearly 2000 feet high, destitute of verdure and of foliage, deeply furrowed by ravines, but quite flat along the summit; forming in fact the supporting wall of the table-land of Bashan. On the north there is a gradual descent from this table-land to the valley of the Jordan; and then a gradual rise again to a plateau of nearly equal elevation skirting the mountains of Upper Galilee. The western banks are less regular, yet they present the same general features — plateaus of different altitudes breaking down abruptly to the shore. The scenery has neither grandeur nor beauty. It wants features, and it wants variety. It is bleak and monotonous, especially so when the sky is cloudless and the sun high. The golden tints and purple shadows of evening help it, but it looks best during a thunder-storm, such as the writer has often witnessed in early spring. The cliffs and rocks along the shores are mostly a hard porous basalt, and the whole basin has a scathed volcanic look. The frequent earthquakes prove that the elements of destruction are still at work beneath the surface. There is a copious warm fountain near the site of Tiberias, and it is said that at the time of the great earthquake of 1837 both the quantity and temperature of the water were much increased.

The great depression makes the climate of the shores almost tropical. This is very sensibly felt by the traveller in going down from the plains of Galilee. In summer the heat is intense, and even in early spring the air has something of an Egyptian balminess. Snow very rarely falls, and though it often whitens the neighboring mountains, it never lies here. The vegetation is almost of a tropical character. The thorny lote-tree grows among the basalt rocks; palms flourish luxuriantly, and indigo is cultivated in the fields (comp. Joseph. B. J. iii. 10, § 6).

The water of the lake is sweet, cool, and transparent; and as the beach is everywhere pebbly it has a beautiful sparkling look. This fact is somewhat strange when we consider that it is exposed to the powerful rays of the sun, that many warm and brackish springs flow into it, and that it is supplied by the Jordan, which rushes into its northern end, a turbid, ruddy torrent. The lake abounds in fish now as in ancient times. Some are of the same species as those got in the Nile, such as the Silurus, the Mugil, and another called by Hasselquist Sparus Galileus (Reise, pp. 181, 412 f.; comp. Joseph. B. J. iii. 10, § 7). The fishery, like the soil of the surrounding country, is sadly neglected. One little crazy boat is the sole representative of the fleets that covered the lake in N. T. times, and even with it there is no deep-water fishing. Two modes are now employed to catch the fish. One is a hand-net, with which a man, usually naked (John xxi. 7), stalks along the shore, and watching his opportunity, throws it round the game with a jerk. The other mode is still more curious. Breadcrumbs are mixed up with bi-chloride of mercury, and sown over the water; the fish swallow the poison and die. The dead bodies float, are picked up, and taken to the market of Tiberias! (Porter, Handbook, p. 432.)

A "mournful and solitary silence" now reigns along the shores of the Sea of Gennesaret, which were in former ages studded with great cities, and resounded with the din of an active and industrious people. Seven out of the nine cities above referred to are now uninhabited ruins; one, Magdala, is occupied by half a dozen mud hovels; and Tiberias alone retains a wretched remnant of its former prosperity. J. L. P.

GENNE'US (Γενναῖος, Alex. Γεννεος: Gennæus), father of Apollonius, who was one of several generals (στρατηγοί) commanding towns in Palestine, who molested the Jews while Lysias was governor for Antiochus Eupator (2 Macc. xii. 2). Luther understands the word as an adjective (γενναῖος = well-born), and has "des edlen Apollonius."

GENTILES. I. Old Testament. — The Hebrew גּוֹי in sing. = a people, nation, body politic; in which sense it is applied to the Jewish nation amongst others. In the plural it acquires an ethnographic, and also an invidious meaning, and is rendered in A. V. by Gentiles and Heathen.

גּוֹיִם, the nations, the surrounding nations, foreigners, as opposed to Israel (Neh. v. 8). In Gen. x. 5 it occurs in its most indefinite sense = the far-distant inhabitants of the Western Isles, without the slightest accessory notion of heathenism, or barbarism. In Lev., Deut., Ps., the term is applied to the various heathen nations with which Israel came into contact; its meaning grows wider in proportion to the wider circle of the national experience, and more or less invidious according to the success or defeat of the national arms. In the prophets it attains at once its most comprehensive and its most hostile view; hostile in presence of victorious rivals, comprehensive with reference to the triumphs of a spiritual future.

Notwithstanding the disagreeable connotation of the term, the Jews were able to use it, even in the plural, in a purely technical, geographical sense. So Gen. x. 5 (see above); Gen. xiv. 1; Josh. xii. 23; Is. ix. 1. In Josh. xii. 23, "the king of the nations of Gilgal," A. V.; better with Gesenius "the king of the Gentiles at Gilgal," where probably, as afterwards in Galilee, foreigners, Gentiles, were settled among the Jews.

For "Galilee of the Gentiles," comp. Matt. iv. 15 with Is. ix. 1, where A. V. "Galilee of the nations." In Heb. גְּלִיל הַגּוֹיִם, the "circle of the Gentiles;" κατ' ἐξοχήν, הַגָּלִיל, ha-Galeel; whence the name Galilee applied to a district which was largely peopled by the Gentiles, especially the Phœnicians.

The Gentiles in Gen. xiv. 1 may either be the inhabitants of the same territory, or, as suggested by Gesenius, "nations of the West" generally.

II. New Testament. — 1. The Greek ἔθνος in sing. means a people or nation (Matt. xxiv. 7; Acts ii. 5, &c.), and even the Jewish people (Luke vii. 5, xxiii. 2, &c.; comp. גּוֹי, supr.). It is only in the pl. that it is used for the Heb. גּוֹיִם, heathen, Gentiles (comp. ἔθνος, heathen, ethnic): in Matt. xxi. 43 ἔθνει alludes to, but does not directly stand for, "the Gentiles." As equivalent to Gentiles it is found in the Epistles of St. Paul, but not always in an invidious sense (e. g. Rom. xi. 13; Eph. iii. 1, 6).

2. "Ελλην, John vii. 35, ἡ διασπορὰ τῶν Ἑλλήνων, "the Jews dispersed among the Gentiles," Rom. iii. 9, Ἰουδαίους καὶ "Ελληνας, Jews and Gentiles.

The A. V. is not consistent in its treatment of this word; sometimes rendering it by Greek (Acts xiv. 1, xvii. 4; Rom. i. 16, x. 12), sometimes by Gentile (Rom. ii. 9, 10, iii. 9; 1 Cor. x. 32), inserting Greek in the margin. The places where "Ελλην is equivalent to Greek simply (as Acts xvi. 1, 3) are much fewer than those where it is equivalent to Gentile. The former may probably be reduced to Acts xvi. 1, 3; Acts xviii. 17; Rom. i. 14. The latter use of the word seems to have arisen from the almost universal adoption of the Greek language. Even in 2 Macc. iv. 13 Ἑλληνισμός appears as synonymous with ἀλλοφυλισμός (comp. vi. 9); and in Is. ix. 12 the LXX. renders פְּלִשְׁתִּים by "Ελληνας; and so the Greek Fathers defended the Christian faith πρὸς "Ελληνας, and καθ' Ἑλλήνων. [GREEK; HEATHEN.]

T. E. B.

GENU'BATH (גְּנֻבַת [theft, Ges.]: Γανηβάθ: Genubath), the son of Hadad, an Edomite of the royal family, by an Egyptian princess, the sister of Tahpenes, the queen of the Pharaoh who governed Egypt in the latter part of the reign of David (1 K. xi. 20; comp. 16). Genubath was born in the palace of Pharaoh, and weaned by the queen herself; after which he became a member of the royal establishment, on the same footing as one of the sons of Pharaoh. The fragment of Edomite chronicle in which this is contained is very remarkable, and may be compared with that in Gen. xxxvi. Genubath is not again mentioned or alluded to.

GE'ON (Γηών: Gehon), i. e. GIHON, one of the four rivers of Eden; introduced, with the Jordan, and probably the Nile, into a figure in the praise of wisdom, Ecclus. xxiv. 27. This is merely the Greek form of the Hebrew name, the same which is used by the LXX. in Gen. ii. 13.

GE'RA (גֵּרָא [grain, little weight, Ges.]: Γηρά; [in 1 Chr. viii. 5, Rom. Vat. Γερά: Gera]), one of the "sons," i. e. descendants, of Benjamin, enumerated in Gen. xlvi. 21, as already living at the time of Jacob's migration into Egypt. He was son of Bela (1 Chr. viii. 3). [BELA.] The text of this last passage is very corrupt; and the different Geras there named seem to reduce themselves into one — the same as the son of Bela. Gera, who is named Judg. iii. 15 as the ancestor of Ehud, and in 2 Sam. xvi. 5 as the ancestor of Shimei who cursed David [BECHER], is probably also the same person. Gera is not mentioned in the list of Benjamite families in Num. xxvi. 38–40; of which a very obvious explanation is that at that time he was not the head of a separate family, but was included among the Belaites; it being a matter of necessity that some of Bela's sons should be so included, otherwise there could be no family of Belaites at all. Dr. Kalisch has some long and rather perplexed observations on the discrepancies in the lists in Gen. xlvi. and Num. xxvi., and specially as regards the sons of Benjamin. But the truth is that the two lists agree very well as far as Benjamin is concerned. For the only discrepance that remains, when the absence of Becher and Gera from the list in Num. is thus explained, is that for the two names אחי and ראש (Ehi and Rosh) in Gen., we have the one name אחירם (Ahiram) in Num. If this last were written ראם, as it might be, the two texts would be almost identical, especially if written in the Samaritan character, in which the shin closely resembles the mem. That Ahiram is right we are quite sure, from the family of the Ahiramites, and from the non-mention elsewhere of Rosh, which in fact is not a proper name. [ROSH.] The conclusion therefore seems certain that אחיראש in Gen. is a mere clerical error, and that there is perfect agreement between the two lists. This view is strengthened by the further fact that in the word which follows Rosh, namely, Muppim, the initial m is an error for sh. It should be Shuppim, as in Num. xxvi. 39; 1 Chr. vii. 12. The final m of Ahiram, and the initial sh of Shuppim, have thus been transposed. To the remarks made under BECHER should be added that the great destruction of the Benjamites recorded in Judg. xx. may account for the introduction of so many new names in the later Benjamite lists of 1 Chr. vii. and viii., of which several seem to be women's names.

GERAH. [MEASURES.]

GE'RAR (גְּרָר [circle, district, Fürst; abode, residence, Sim., Ges.]: Γεραρά [or Γέραρα; in 2 Chr., Γεδώρ: Gerara;] Joseph. Ant. i. 12, § 1, a very ancient city south of Gaza. It occurs chiefly in Genesis (x. 19, xx. 1, xxvi. 1, 6, [17, 20, 26]) also incidentally in 2 Chr. xiv. 13, 14. In Genesis the people are spoken of as Philistines; but their habits appear, in that early stage, more pastoral than they subsequently were. Yet they are even then warlike, since Abimelech was "a captain of the host," who appears from his fixed title, "Phichol," like that of the king, "Abimelech," to be a permanent officer (comp. Gen. xxi. 32, xxvi. 26, and Ps. xxxiv., title). The local description, xx. 1, "between Kadesh and Shur," is probably meant to indicate the limits within which these pastoral Philistines, whose chief seat was then Gerar, ranged, although it would by no means follow that their territory embraced all the interval between those cities. It must have trenched on the "south" or "south country" of later Palestine. From a comparison of xxi. 32 with xxvi. 23, 26,[a] Beer-sheba would seem to be just on the verge of this territory, and perhaps to be its limit towards the N. E. For its southern boundary, though very uncertain, none is more probable than the wadies el-Arish ("River of Egypt" [torrent, נַחַל]) and el-'Ain; south of which the neighboring "wilderness of Paran" (xx. 15, xxi. 22, 34) may be probably reckoned to begin. Isaac was most probably born in Gerar. The great crops which he subsequently raised attest the fertility of the soil, which, lying in the maritime plain, still contains some of the best ground in Palestine (xxvi. 12). It is possible that the wells mentioned by Robinson (i. 190) may represent those digged by Abraham and reopened by Isaac (xxvi. 18–22).[b] Williams (Holy City, i. 46) speaks of a Joorf el-Gerar as now existing, three hours S. S. E. of Gaza, and this may probably indicate the northern limit of the territory, if not the site of the town; but the range of that territory need not be so far narrowed as to make the Wady Ruhaibeh an impossible site, as Robinson thinks it (see his map at end of vol. i. and i. 197), for Rehoboth. There is also a Wady el-Jerâr laid down S. of the wadies above-named, and running into one of them; but this is too far south (Robinson, i. 189, note) to be accepted as a possible site. The valley of Gerar may be almost any important wady within the limits indicated; but if the above-mentioned situation for the wells be not rejected, it would tend to designate the Wady el-'Ain. Robinson (ii. 44) appears to prefer the Wady es-Sheri'ah, running to the sea south of Gaza.[c] Eusebius (de Sit. & Nom. Loc. Heb. s. v.) makes Gerar 25 miles S. from Eleutheropolis, which would be about the latitude of Beer-sheba; but see Jerome, Lib. Quæst. Heb. Gen. xxii. 3. Bered (xvi. 14) may perhaps have lain in this territory. In 1 Chr. iv. 39, the LXX. read Gerar, εἰς τὴν Γέραρα, for Gedor; a substitution which is not without some claims to support. [BERED; BEER-SHEBA; GEDOR.]

 GERAR, VALLEY OF. [GERAR.]

[a] The well where Isaac and Abimelech covenanted is distinguished by the LXX. from the Beer-sheba where Abraham did so. the former being called φρέαρ ὁρκισμοῦ, the latter φρέαρ ὁρκισμοῦ.

[b] The stopping wells is a device still resorted to by the Bedouins, to make a country untenable by a neighbor of whom they wish to be rid.

[c] * In his Phys. Geogr. (p. 123) Robinson says merely that this valley was doubtless "some portion or branch of these valleys south and southeast of Gaza." Van de Velde (ii. 183) heard of "a site called Um el-Gerar, about 3 hours from Gaza, and about the same distance from the sea," though without any ruins to indicate its antiquity. Thomson says (Land and Book, ii. 348) that Gerar has not yet been discovered, but can hardly fail to be brought to light, "just as soon as it is safe to travel in that region." H

GER'ASA (Γέρασα, Ptol.; Γάσσα, Not. Eccles.: Arab. Jerash, جرش). This name does not occur in the O. T., nor in the Received Text of the N. T. But it is now generally admitted that in Matt. viii. 28 "Gergesenes" supersedes "Gadarenes." Gerasa was a celebrated city on the eastern borders of Peræa (Joseph. B. J. iii. 3, § 3), placed by some in the province of Cœlesyria and region of Decapolis (Steph. s. v.), by others in Arabia (Epiph. adv. Hær.; Origen. in Johan.). These various statements do not arise from any doubts as to the locality of the city, but from the ill-defined boundaries of the provinces mentioned. In the Roman age no city of Palestine was better known than Gerasa. It is situated amid the mountains of Gilead, 20 miles east of the Jordan, and 25 north of Philadelphia, the ancient Rabbath-Ammon. Several MSS. read Γερασηνῶν instead of Γεργεσηνῶν, in Matt. viii. 28; but the city of Gerasa lay too far from the Sea of Tiberias to admit the possibility of the miracles having been wrought in its vicinity. If the reading Γερασηνῶν be the true one, the χώρα, "district," must then have been very large, including Gadara and its environs; and Matthew thus uses a broader appellation, where Mark and Luke use a more specific one. This is not improbable; as Jerome (ad Obad.) states that Gilead was in his day called Gerasa; and Origen affirms that Γερασηνῶν was the ancient reading (Opp. iv. p. 140). [GADARA.]

It is not known when or by whom Gerasa was founded. It is first mentioned by Josephus as having been captured by Alexander Jannæus (circ. B. C. 85; Joseph. B. J. i. 4, § 8). It was one of the cities the Jews burned in revenge for the massacre of their countrymen at Cæsarea, at the commencement of their last war with the Romans; and it had scarcely recovered from this calamity when the Emperor Vespasian despatched Annius, his general, to capture it. Annius, having carried the city at the first assault, put to the sword one thousand of the youth who had not effected their escape, enslaved their families, and plundered their dwellings (Joseph. B. J. iv. 9, § 1). It appears to have been nearly a century subsequent to this period that Gerasa attained its greatest prosperity, and was adorned with those monuments which give it a place among the proudest cities of Syria. History tells us nothing of this, but the fragments of inscriptions found among its ruined palaces and temples, show that it is indebted for its architectural splendor to the age and genius of the Antonines (A. D. 138–80). It subsequently became the seat of a bishopric. There is no evidence that the city was ever occupied by the Saracens. There are no traces of their architecture — no mosques, no inscriptions, no reconstruction of old edifices, such as are found in most other great cities in Syria. All here is Roman, or at least ante-Islamic; every structure remains as the hand of the destroyer or the earthquake shock left it — ruinous and deserted.

The ruins of Gerasa are by far the most beautiful and extensive east of the Jordan. They are situated on both sides of a shallow valley that runs from north to south through a high undulating plain, and falls into the Zurka (the ancient Jabbok) at the distance of about 5 miles. A little rivulet, thickly fringed with oleander, winds through the valley, giving life and beauty to the deserted city. The first view of the ruins is very striking; and such as have enjoyed it will not soon forget the impression made upon the mind. The long colonnade running through the centre of the city, terminating at one end in the graceful circle of the forum; the groups of columns clustered here and there round the crumbling walls of the temples; the heavy masses of masonry that distinguish the positions of the great theatres; and the vast field of shapeless ruins rising gradually from the green banks of the rivulet to the battlemented heights on each side — all combine in forming a picture such as is rarely equaled. The form of the city is an irregular square, each side measuring nearly a mile. It was surrounded by a strong wall, a large portion of which, with its flanking towers at intervals, is in a good state of preservation. Three gateways are still nearly perfect; and within the city upwards of two hundred and thirty columns remain on their pedestals. GERGESE'NES, Matt. viii. 28. [GADARA.]

GER'GESITES, THE (οἱ Γεργεσαῖοι: Vulg. omits), Jud. v. 16. [GIRGASHITES.]

GERI'ZIM (always הַר־גְּרִזִים, har-Gerizzim, the mountain of the Gerizzites, from גְּרִזִי, G'rizzi, dwellers in a shorn (i. e. desert) land, from גָּרַז, gâraz, to cut off; possibly the tribe subdued by David, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8: Γαριζίν, [Vat. Alex. -ζειν, exc. Alex. Deut. xi. 29, Γαζιρειν:] Garizim), a mountain designated by Moses, in conjunction with Mount Ebal, to be the scene of a great solemnity upon the entrance of the children of Israel into the promised land. High places had a peculiar charm attached to them in these days of external observance. The law was delivered from Sinai: the blessings and curses affixed to the performance or neglect of it were directed to be pronounced upon Gerizim and Ebal. Six of the tribes — Simeon, Levi (but Joseph being represented by two tribes, Levi's actual place probably was as assigned below), Judah, Issachar, Joseph, and Benjamin were to take their stand upon the former to bless; and six, namely — Reuben, Gad, Asher, Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali — upon the latter to curse (Deut. xxvii. 12–13). Apparently, the Ark halted mid-way between the two mountains, encompassed by the priests and Levites, thus divided by it into two bands, with Joshua for their coryphæus. He read the blessings and cursings successively (Josh. viii. 33, 34), to be re-echoed by the Levites on either side of him, and responded to by the tribes in their double array with a loud Amen (Deut. xxvii. 14). Curiously enough, only the formula for the curses is given (ibid. ver. 14–26); and it was upon Ebal, and not Gerizim, where the altar of whole unwrought stone was to be built, and where the huge plastered stones, with the words of the law (Josh. viii. 32; Joseph. Ant. iv. 8, § 44, limits them to the blessings and curses just pronounced) written upon them, were to be set up (Deut. xxvii. 4–6) — a significant omen for a people entering joyously upon their new inheritance, and yet the song of Moses abounds with forebodings still more sinister and plain-spoken (Deut. xxxii. 5, 6, and 15–28).

The next question is, Has Moses defined the losalities of Ebal and Gerizim? Standing on the eastern side of the Jordan, in the land of Moab (Deut. i. 5), he asks: "Are they not on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down (i. e. at some distance to the W.), in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal (i. e. whose territory — not these mountains — commenced over against Gilgal — see Patrick on Deut. xi. 30), beside the plains of Moreh?" . . . These closing words would seem to mark their site with unusual precision: for in Gen. xii. 6 "the plain (LXX. 'oak') of Moreh" is expressly connected with "the place of Sichem or Shechem" (N. T. "Sychem" or "Sychar," which last form is thought to convey a reproach. Reland, Dissert. on Gerizim, in Ugol. Thesaur. p. dcxxv., in Josephus the form is "Sicima"), and accordingly Judg. ix. 7, Jotham is made to address his celebrated parable to the men of Shechem from "the top of Mount Gerizim." The "hill of Moreh," mentioned in the history of Gideon his father, may have been a mountain overhanging the same plain, but certainly could not have been further south (comp. c. vi. 33, and vii. 1). Was it therefore prejudice, or neglect of the true import of these passages, that made Eusebius and Epiphanius, both natives of Palestine, concur in placing Ebal and Gerizim near Jericho, the former charging the Samaritans with grave error for affirming them to be near Neapolis? (Reland. Dissert., as above, p. dcxx.). Of one thing we may be assured, namely, that their Scriptural site must have been, in the fourth century, lost to all but the Samaritans; otherwise these two fathers would have spoken very differently. It is true that they consider the Samaritan hypothesis irreconcilable with Deut. xi. 30, which it has already been shown not to be. A more formidable objection would have been that Joshua could not have marched from Ai to Shechem, through a hostile country, to perform the above solemnity, and retraced his steps so soon afterwards to Gilgal, as to have been found there by the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 6; comp. viii. 30–35). Yet the distance between Ai and Shechem is not so long (under two days' journey). Neither can the interval implied in the context of the former passage have been so short, as even to warrant the modern supposition that the latter passage has been misplaced. The remaining objection, namely, "the wide interval between the two mountains at Shechem" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 238, note), is still more easily disposed of, if we consider the blessings and curses to have been pronounced by the Levites, standing in the midst of the valley — thus abridging the distance by one half — and not by the six tribes on either hill, who only responded. How indeed could 600,000 men and upwards, besides women and children (comp. Num. ii. 32 with Judg. xx. 2 and 17), have been accommodated in a smaller space? Besides in those days of assemblies "sub dio," the sense of hearing must have been necessarily more acute, just as, before the aids of writing and printing, memories were much more retentive. We may conclude, therefore, that there is no room for doubting the Scriptural position of Ebal and Gerizim to have been — where they are now placed — in the territory of the tribe of Ephraim; the latter of them overhanging the city of Shechem or Sicima, as Josephus, following the Scriptural narrative, asserts. Even Eusebius, in another work of his (Præp. Evang. ix. 22), quotes some lines from Theodotus, in which the true position of Ebal and Gerizim is described with great force and accuracy and St. Jerome, while following Eusebius in th Onomasticon, in his ordinary correspondence does not hesitate to connect Sichem or Neapolis, the well of Jacob, and Mount Gerizim (Ep. cviii. c. 13, ed. Migne). Procopius of Gaza does nothing more than follow Eusebius, and that clumsily (Reland, Palest. lib. ii. c. 13, p. 503); but his more accurate namesake of Cæsarea expressly asserts that Gerizim rose over Neapolis (De Ædif. v. 7) — that Ebal was not a peak of Gerizim (v. Quaresm. Elucid. T. S. lib. vii. Per. i. c. 8), but a distinct mountain to the N. of it, and separated from it by the valley in which Shechem stood, we are not called upon here to prove; nor again, that Ebal was entirely barren, which it can scarce be called now; while Gerizim was the same proverb for verdure and gushing rills formerly, that it is now, at least where it descends towards Nablûs. It is a far more important question whether Gerizim was the mountain on which Abraham was directed to offer his son Isaac (Gen. xxii. 2 ff.). First, then, let it be observed that it is not the mountain, but the district which is there called Moriah (of the same root with Moreh: see Corn. a Lapid. on Gen. xii. 6), and that antecedently to the occurrence which took place "upon one of the mountains" in its vicinity — a consideration which of itself would naturally point to the locality, already known to Abraham, as the plain or plains of Moreh, "the land of vision," "the high land;" and therefore consistently "the land of adoration," or "religious worship," as it is variously explained. That all these interpretations are incomparably more applicable to the natural features of Gerizim and its neighborhood, than to the hillock (in comparison) upon which Solomon built his temple, none can for a moment doubt who have seen both. Jerusalem unquestionably stands upon high ground: but owing to the hills "round about" it cannot be seen on any side from any great distance; nor, for the same reason, could it ever have been a land of vision, or extensive views. Even from Mount Olivet, which must always have towered over the small eminences at its base to the S. W., the view cannot be named in the same breath with that from Gerizim, which is one of the finest in Palestine, commanding, as it does, from an elevation of nearly 2,500 feet (Arrowsmith, Geograph. Dict. of the H. S. p. 145), "the Mediterranean Sea on the W., the snowy heights of Hermon on the N., on the E. the wall of the trans-Jordanic mountains, broken by the deep cleft of the Jabbok" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 235), and the lovely and tortuous expanse of plain (the Mukhna) stretched as a carpet of many colors beneath its feet.[a] Neither is the appearance, which it would "present to a traveller advancing up the Philistine plain" (ibid. p. 252) — the direction from which Abraham came — to be overlooked. It is by no means necessary, as Mr. Porter thinks (Handbook of S. & P. i. 339), that he should have started from Beer-sheba (see Gen. xxi. 34 — "the whole land being before him," c. xx. 15). Then, "on the morning of the third day, he would arrive in the plain of Sharon, exactly where the massive height of Gerizim is visible afar off" (ibid p. 251), and from thence, with the mount always a * From the top of Gerizim the traveller enjoys "a prospect unique in the Holy Land." See it well described in Tristram's Land of Israel p. 151, 1st ed. H.

in view, he would proceed to the exact "place which God had told him of" in all solemnity — for again, it is not necessary that he should have arrived on the actual spot during the third day. All that is said in the narrative, is that, from the time that it hove in sight, he and Isaac parted from the young men, and went on together alone. The Samaritans, therefore, through whom the tradition of the true site of Gerizim has been preserved, are probably not wrong when they point out still — as they have done from time immemorial — Gerizim as the hill upon which Abraham's "faith was made perfect;" and it is observable that no such spot is attempted to be shown on the rival hill of Jerusalem, as distinct from Calvary. Different reasons in all probability caused these two localities to be so named: the first, not a mountain, but a land, district, or plain (for it is not intended to be asserted that Gerizim itself ever bore the name of Moriah; though a certain spot upon it was ever afterwards to Abraham personally "Jehovah-jireh"), called Moreh, or Moriah, from the noble vision of nature, and therefore of natural religion, that met the eye; the second, a small hill deriving its name from a special revelation or vision, as the express words of Scripture say, which took place "by the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite" (2 Chr. iii. 1; comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 16). If it be thought strange that a place once called by the "Father of the faithful" Jehovah-jireh, should have been merged by Moses, and ever afterwards, in a general name so different from it in sense and origin as Gerizim; it would be still more strange, that, if Mount Moriah of the book of Chronicles and Jehovah-jireh were one and the same place, no sort of allusion should have been made by the inspired historian to the prime event which had caused it to be so called. True it is that Josephus, in more than one place, asserts that where Abraham offered, there the temple was afterwards built (Ant. i. 13, § 2, and vii. 13, § 9). Yet the same Josephus makes God bid Abraham go to the mountain — not the land — of Moriah; having omitted all mention of the plains of Moreh in his account of the preceding narrative. Besides, in more than one place he shows that he bore no love to the Samaritans (ibid. xi. 8, § 6, and xii. 5, § 5). St. Jerome follows Josephus (Quæst. in Gen. xxii. 5, ed. Migne), but with his uncertainty about the site of Gerizim, what else could he have done? Besides it appears from the Onomasticon (s. v.) that he considered the hill of Moreh (Judg. vii. 1) to be the same with Moriah. And who that is aware of the extravagance of the Rabbinical traditions respecting Mount Moriah can attach weight to any one of them? (Cunæus, De Republ. Heb. lib. ii. 12). Finally, the Christian tradition, which makes the site of Abraham's sacrifice to have been on Calvary, will derive countenance from neither Josephus nor St. Jerome, unless the sites of the Temple and of the Crucifixion are admitted to have been the same.

Another tradition of the Samaritans is far less trustworthy; namely, that Mount Gerizim was the spot where Melchisedech met Abraham — though there certainly was a Salem or Shalem in that neighborhood (Gen. xxxiii. 18; Stanley, S. & P. p. 247 ff.). The first altar erected in the land of Abraham, and the first appearance of Jehovah to him in it, was in the plain of Moreh near Sichem (Gen. xii. 6); but the mountain overhanging that city (assuming our view to be correct) had not yet been hallowed to him for the rest of his life by the decisive trial of his faith, which was made there subsequently. He can hardly therefore be supposed to have deviated from his road so far, which lay through the plain of the Jordan; nor again is it likely that he would have found the king of Sodom so far away from his own territory (Gen. xiv. 17 ff.). Lastly, the altar which Jacob built was not on Gerizim, as the Samaritans contend, though probably about its base, at the head of the plain between it and Ebal, "in the parcel of a field" which that patriarch purchased from the children of Hamor, and where he spread his tent (Gen. xxxiii. 18–20). Here was likewise his well (John iv. 6); and the tomb of his son Joseph (Josh. xxiv. 32), both of which are still shown; the former surmounted by the remains of a vaulted chamber, and with the ruins of a church hard by (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 283) the latter, with "a fruitful vine" trailing over its white-washed inclosure, and before it two dwarf pillars, hollowed out at the top to receive lamps, which are lighted every Friday or Mohammedan sabbath. There is, however, another Mohammedan monument claiming to be the said tomb (Stanley, S. & P. p. 241, note). The tradition (Robinson, ii. 283, note) that the twelve patriarchs were buried there likewise (it should have made them eleven without Joseph, or thirteen, including his two sons), probably depends upon Acts vii. 16, where, unless we are to suppose confusion in the narrative, αὐτός should be read for Ἀβραάμ, which may well have been suggested to the copyist from its recurrence, v. 17; while αὐτός, from having already occurred, v. 15, might have been thought suspicious.

We now enter upon the second phase in the history of Gerizim. According to Josephus, a marriage contracted between Manasseh, brother of Jaddus, the then high-priest, and the daughter of Sanballat the Cuthæan (comp. 2 K. xvii. 24), having created a great stir amongst the Jews, who had been strictly forbidden to contract alien marriages (Ezr. ix. 2; Neh. xiii. 23) — Sanballat, in order to reconcile his son-in-law to this unpopular affinity, obtained leave from Alexander the Great to build a temple upon Mount Gerizim, and to inaugurate a rival priesthood and altar there to those of Jerusalem (Ant. xi. 8, §§ 2–4, and for the harmonizing of the names and dates, Prideaux, Connect. i. 396 ff., M'Caul's ed.). "Samaria thenceforth," says Prideaux, "became the common refuge and asylum of the refractory Jews" (ibid.; see also Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, § 7), and for a time, at least, their temple seems to have been called by the name of a Greek deity (Ant. xii. 5, § 5). Hence one of the first acts of Hyrcanus, when the death of Antiochus Sidetes had set his hands free, was to seize Shechem, and destroy the temple upon Gerizim, after it had stood there 200 years (Ant. xiii. 9, § 1). But the destruction of their temple by no means crushed the rancor of the Samaritans. The road from Galilee to Judæa lay then, as now, through Samaria, skirting the foot of Gerizim (John iv. 4). Here was a constant occasion for religious controversy and for outrage. "How is it that Thou, being a Jew, askest to drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" said the female to our Lord at the well of Jacob, where both parties would always be sure to meet. "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, and ye say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship?" . . . Subsequently we read of the depredations committed on that road upon a party of Galilæans (Ant. xx. 6, § 1). The liberal attitude, first of the Saviour, and then of his disciples (Acts viii. 14), was thrown away upon all those who would not abandon their creed. And Gerizim continued to be the focus of outbreaks through successive centuries. One, under Pilate, while it led to their severe chastisement, procured the disgrace of that ill-starred magistrate, who had crucified "Jesus, the king of the Jews," with impunity (Ant. xviii. 4, § 1). Another hostile gathering on the same spot caused a slaughter of 10,600 of them under Vespasian. It is remarkable that, in this instance, want of water is said to have made them easy victims; so that the deliciously cold and pure spring on the summit of Gerizim must have failed before so great a multitude (B. J. iii. 7, § 32). At length their aggressions were directed against the Christians inhabiting Neapolis — now powerful, and under a bishop — in the reign of Zeno. Terebinthus at once carried the news of this outrage to Byzantium: the Samaritans were forcibly ejected from Gerizim, which was handed over to the Christians, and adorned with a church in honor of the Virgin; to some extent fortified, and even guarded. This not proving sufficient to repel the foe, Justinian built a second wall round the church, which his historian says defied all attacks (Procop. De Ædif. v. 7). It is probably the ruins of these buildings which meet the eye of the modern traveller (Handb. of S. & P. ii. 339). Previously to this time, the Samaritans had been a numerous and important sect — sufficiently so, indeed, to be carefully distinguished from the Jews and Cælicolists in the Theodosian code. This last outrage led to their comparative disappearance from history. Travellers of the 12th, 14th, and 17th centuries take notice of their existence, but extreme paucity (Early Travels, by Wright, pp. 81, 181, and 432), and their number now, as in those days, is said to be below 200 (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 282, 2d ed.). We are confined by our subject to Gerizim, and therefore can only touch upon the Samaritans, or their city Neapolis, so far as their history connects directly with that of the mountain. And yet we may observe that as it was undoubtedly this mountain of which our Lord had said, "Woman, believe me. the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem (i. e. exclusively), worship the Father" (John iv. 21) — so likewise it is a singular historical fact, that the Samaritans have continued on this self-same mountain century after century, with the briefest interruptions, to worship according to their ancient custom ever since to the present day. While the Jews — expelled from Jerusalem, and therefore no longer able to offer up bloody sacrifices according to the law of Moses — have been obliged to adapt their ceremonial to the circumstances of their destiny: here the Paschal Lamb has been offered up in all ages of the Christian era by a small but united nationality (the spot is accurately marked out by Dr. Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 277).[a] Their copy of the Law, probably the work of Manasseh, and known to the fathers of the 2d and 3d centuries (Prideaux, Connect. i. 600; and Robinson, ii. 297-301), was, in the 17th, vindicated from oblivion by Scaliger, Usher, Morinus, and others; and no traveller now visits Palestine without making a sight of it one of his prime objects. Gerizim is likewise still to the Samaritans what Jerusalem is to the Jews, and Mecca to the Mohammedans. Their prostrations are directed towards it wherever they are; its holiest spot in their estimation being the traditional site of the tabernacle, near that on which they believe Abraham to have offered his son. Both these spots are on the summit; and near them is still to be seen a mound of ashes, similar to the larger and more celebrated one N. of Jerusalem; collected, it is said, from the sacrifices of each successive age (Dr. Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 202 and 299, evidently did not see this on Gerizim). Into their more legendary traditions respecting Gerizim, and the story of their alleged worship of a dove, — due to the Jews, their enemies (Reland, Diss. ap. Ugolin. Thesaur. vii. pp. dccxxix.-xxxiii.), — it is needless to enter.

E. S. Ff.

* The theory that Gerizim is "the mountain on which Abraham was directed to offer his son Isaac," advocated by Dean Stanley (S. & P. p. 248) and controverted by Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 212), is brought forward by the writer of the above, on grounds which appear to us wholly unsubstantial.

(1.) The assumed identity of Moreh and Moriah cannot be admitted. There is a radical difference in their roots (Robinson's Gesen. Heb. Lex. s. vv.), which is conceded by Stanley; and the reasoning about "the plains of Moreh, the land of vision," "called Moreh, or Moriah, from the noble vision of nature," etc., is irrelevant. Murphy (Comm. in loc.), justly observes: "As the two names occur in the same document, and differ in form, they naturally denote different things."

(2.) The distance of Gerizim from Beer-sheba is fatal to this hypothesis. The suggestion that Abraham need not have "started from Beer-sheba," is gratuitous — the narrative fairly conveying the impression that he started from his residence, which was then at that place. [BEER-SHEBA.] From this point Jerusalem is three days, and Gerizim two days still further, north. The journey could not have been completed, with a loaded ass, "on the third day;" and the route by which this writer, following Stanley, sends the party to Gerizim, is an unknown and improbable route.

(3.) The suggestion of Mr. Ffoulkes above, and of Mr. Grove [MORIAH], that the patriarch only came in sight of the mountain on the third day, and had an indefinite time for the rest of the journey, and the similar suggestion of Dr. Stanley, that after coming in sight of the mountain he had "half a day" for reaching it, are inadmissible. Acknowledging "that from the time it hove in sight, he and Isaac parted from the young men and went on together alone," these writers all overlook the fact that from this point the wood for the burnt-offering was laid upon Isaac. Thus far the needed materials had been carried by the servants and the ass. That the young man could bear the burden for a short distance alone, does not warrant the supposition that he could have borne it for a day's journey, or a half-day's — in which case it would seem that the donkey and servants might have a * The reader will find under PASSOVER (Amer. ed.) particular account of the manner in which the Samaritans celebrate that great festival on Gerizim. been left at home. The company halted, apparently, not very far from the spot of the intended sacrifice.

(4.) The commanding position of Gerizim, with the wide prospect from its summit, is not a necessary, nor probable, element in the decision of the question. It was to the land of Moriah that the patriarch was directed, some one of the eminences of which, apparently not yet named, the Lord was to designate as his destination. In favor of Gerizim as an elevated site, Stanley lays stress upon the phrase, "lifted up his eyes," forgetting that this identical phrase had been applied (Gen. xiii. 10) to Lot's survey of the plain of the Jordan below him.

(5.) The Samaritan tradition is unreliable. From the time that a rival temple to that on Moriah was erected on Gerizim, the Samaritans felt a natural desire to invest the spot with some of the sanctities of the earlier Jewish history. Their substitution of Moreh for Moriah (Gen. xxii. 2) in their version, is of the same character with this claim. Had this been the traditionary site of the scene in question, Josephus would hardly have ventured to advance the claim for Jerusalem; and though sharing the prejudices of his countrymen, his general fairness as a historian forbids the intimation that he was capable of robbing this community of a cherished site, and transferring it to another. Moreover, the improbable theory that Gerizim, and not Jerusalem, was the scene of the meeting between Abraham and Melchisedec, which, though held by Prof. Stanley, Mr. Foulkes is compelled to reject, has the same authority of Samaritan tradition.

The objections to the Moriah of Jerusalem as the site in question, need not be considered here. The theory which claims that locality for this sacrificial scene, has its difficulties, which will be examined in their place. [MORIAH, Amer. ed.] Whether that theory be accepted or rejected, the claims of Gerizim appear to us too slightly supported to entitle them to any weight in the discussion. S. W.

GERIZITES, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. [GERZITES.]

GERRHE'NIANS, THE (ἕως τῶν Γερρηνῶν; Alex. Γεννηρων: ad Gerrenos), named in 2 Macc. xiii. 24 only, as one limit of the district committed by Antiochus Eupator to the government of Judas Maccabæus, the other limit being Ptolemais (Accho). To judge by the similar expression in defining the extent of Simon's government in 1 Macc. xi. 59, the specification has reference to the sea-coast of Palestine, and, from the nature of the case, the Gerrhenians, wherever they were, must have been south of Ptolemais. Grotius seems to have been the first to suggest that the town Gerrhon or Gerrha was intended, which lay between Pelusium and Rhinocolura (Wady el-Arish). But it has been pointed out by Ewald (Geschichte, iv. 365, note) that the coast as far north as the latter place was at that time in possession of Egypt, and he thereon conjectures that the inhabitants of the ancient city of GERAR, S. E. of Gaza, the residence of Abraham and Isaac, are meant. In support of this Grimm (Kurzg. Handb. ad loc.) mentions that at least one MS. reads Γεραρηνῶν, which would without difficulty be corrupted to Γερρηνῶν.

It seems to have been overlooked that the Syriac version (early, and entitled to much respect) has Gozor (גֶּזֶר). By this may be intended either (a) the ancient GEZER, which was near the sea, somewhere about Joppa; or (b) Gaza, which appears sometimes to take that form in these books. In the former case the government of Judas would contain half, in the latter the whole, of the coast of Palestine. The latter is most probably correct, as otherwise the important district of Idumæa, with the great fortress of BETHSURA, would have been left unprovided for. G.

GER'SHOM (in the earlier books גֵּרְשֹׁם, in Chr. generally גֵּרְשׁוֹם). 1. (Γηρσάμ: in Judg. Γηρσών, [Vat. M. Γηρσομ, Vat. 11.] and Alex. Γηρσωμ; Joseph. Γῆρσος: Gersum, Gersom.) The first-born son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex. ii. 22; xviii. 3). The name is explained in these passages as if גֵּר שָׁם (Ger sham) = a stranger there, in allusion to Moses' being a foreigner in Midian — "For he said, I have been a stranger (Ger) in a foreign land." This signification is adopted by Josephus (Ant. ii. 13, § 1), and also by the LXX. in the form of the name which they give — Γηρσάμ; but according to Gesenius (Thes. p. 306 b), its true meaning, taking it as a Hebrew word, is "expulsion," from a root גָּרַשׁ, being only another form of GERSHON (see also Fürst, Handwb.). The circumcision of Gershom is probably related in Ex. iv. 25. He does not appear again in the history in his own person, but he was the founder of a family of which more than one of the members are mentioned later. (a.) One of these was a remarkable person — "Jonathan the son of Gershom," the "young man the Levite," whom we first encounter on his way from Bethlehem-Judah to Micah's house at Mount Ephraim (Judg. xvii. 7), and who subsequently became the first priest to the irregular worship of the tribe of Dan (xviii. 30). The change of the name "Moses" in this passage, as it originally stood in the Hebrew text, to "Manasseh," as it now stands both in the text and the A. V., is explained under MANASSEH. (b.) But at least one of the other branches of the family preserved its allegiance to Jehovah, for when the courses of the Levites were settled by king David, the "sons of Moses the man of God" received honorable prominence, and SHEBUEL chief of the sons of Gershom was appointed ruler (נָגִיד) of the treasures. (1 Chr. xxiii. 15–17; xxvi. 24–28.)

2. The form under which the name GERSHON — the eldest son of Levi — is given in several passages of Chronicles, namely, 1 Chr. vi. 16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71; xv. 7. The Hebrew is almost alternately גֵּרְשֹׁם, and גֵּרְשׁוֹם; the LXX. adhere to their ordinary rendering of Gershon; [Rom.] Vat. Γεδσών, Alex. Γηρσων, [exc. vi. 43, Vat. Γεεδσων, and xv. 7, Alex. Βηρσων, Vat. FA. Γηρσαμ:] Vulg. Gerson and Gersom.

3. (גֵּרְשֹׁם: Γηρσών, [Vat.] Alex. Γηρσωμ: Gersom), the representative of the priestly family of Phinehas, among those who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 2). In Esdras the name is GERSON. G.

GER'SHON (גֵּרְשׁוֹן: in Gen. Γηρσών, in other books uniformly Γεδσών; and so also Alex. with three exceptions; Joseph. Ant. ii. 7, § 4 Γηρσόμης: [Gersom]), the eldest of the three sons of Levi, born before the descent of Jacobs' family into Egypt (Gen. xlvi. 11; Ex. vi. 16). But though the eldest born, the families of Gershon were outstripped in fame by their younger brethren of Kohath, from whom sprang Moses and the priestly line of Aaron.[a] Gershon's sons were LIBNI and SHIMI (Ex. vi. 17; Num. iii. 18, 21; 1 Chr. vi. 17), and their families were duly recognized in the reign of David, when the permanent arrangements for the service of Jehovah were made (1 Chr. xxiii. 7–11). At this time Gershon was represented by the famous Asaph "the seer," whose genealogy is given in 1 Chr. vi. 39–43, and also in part, 20, 21. The family is mentioned once again as taking part in the reforms of king Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12, where it should be observed that the sons of Asaph are reckoned as distinct from the Gershonites). At the census in the wilderness of Sinai the whole number of the males of the Bene-Gershon was 7,500 (Num. iii. 22), midway between the Kohathites and the Merarites. At the same date the efficient men were 2,630 (iv. 40). On the occasion of the second census the numbers of the Levites are given only in gross (Num. xxvi. 62). The sons of Gershon had charge of the fabrics of the Tabernacle — the coverings, curtains, hangings, and cords (Num. iii. 25, 26; iv. 25, 26); for the transport of these they had two covered wagons and four oxen (vii. 3, 7). In the encampment their station was behind (אַחֲרֵי) the Tabernacle, on the west side (Num. iii. 23). When on the march they went with the Merarites in the rear of the first body of three tribes, — Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, — with Reuben behind them. In the apportionment of the Levitical cities, thirteen fell to the lot of the Gershonites. These were in the northern tribes — two in Manasseh beyond Jordan; four in Issachar; four in Asher; and three in Naphtali. All of these are said to have possessed "suburbs," and two were cities of refuge (Josh. xxi. 27–33; 1 Chr. vi. 62, 71–76). It is not easy to see what special duties fell to the lot of the Gershonites in the service of the Tabernacle after its erection at Jerusalem, or in the Temple. The sons of Jeduthun "prophesied with a harp," and the sons of Heman "lifted up the horn," but for the sons of Asaph no instrument is mentioned (1 Chr. xxv. 1–5). They were appointed to "prophesy" (that is, probably, to utter, or sing, inspired words, נָבָא), perhaps after the special prompting of David himself (xxv. 2). Others of the Gershonites, sons of Laadan, had charge of the "treasures of the house of God, and over the treasures of the holy things" (xxvi. 20–22), among which precious stones are specially named (xxix. 8).

In Chronicles the name is, with two exceptions (1 Chr. vi. 1; xxiii. 6), given in the slightly different form of Gershom. [GERSHOM, 2.] See also GERSHONITES. G.

GER'SHONITES, THE (הַגֵּרְשֻׁנִּי, i. e. the Gershunnite: ὁ Γεδσών, ὁ Γεδσωνί [Vat. -νει]; υἱοὶ Γεδσωνί [Vat. -νει]; Alex. [in Josh. and 1 Chr.,] Γηρσων: [Gersonitæ, Gerson, filii Gerson or Gersom]), the family descended from GERSHON or GERSHOM, the son of Levi (Num. iii. 21, 23, 24 iv. 24, 27, xxvi. 57; Josh. xxi. 33; 1 Chr. xxiii 7; 2 Chr. xxix. 12).

"THE GERSHONITE" [Γηρσωνι, Γεδσωνι; Vat Γηρσωνει, Γηρσομνει; Alex. Γηρσωνει, Γηρσωνι Gersonni, Gersonites], as applied to individuals, occurs in 1 Chr. xxvi. 21 (Laadan), xxix. 8 (Jehiel). G.

GER'SON (Γηρσών; [Vat. corrupt:] Gersonus), 1 Esdr. viii. 29. [GERSHOM, 3.]

GER'ZITES, THE (הַגִּרְזִי, or הַגִּזְרִי — (Ges. Thes. p. 301) — the Girzite, or the Gerizzite: Vat. omits, Alex. τον Γεζραιον: Gerzi and Gezri [?], but in his Quæst. Hebr. Jerome has Getri: Syr. and Arab. Godola), a tribe who with the Geshurites and the Amalekites occupied the land between the south of Palestine[b] and Egypt in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii. 8). They were rich in Bedouin treasures — "sheep, oxen, asses, camels, and apparel" (ver. 9; comp. xv. 3; 1 Chr. v. 21). The name is not found in the text of the A. V. but only in the margin. This arises from its having been corrected by the Masorets (Keri) into GIZRITES, which form [or rather GEZRITES] our translators have adopted in the text. The change is supported by the Targum, and by the Alex. MS. of the LXX. as above. There is not, however, any apparent reason for relinquishing the older form of the name, the interest of which lies in its connection with that of Mount Gerizim. In the name of that ancient mountain we have the only remaining trace of the presence of this old tribe of Bedouins in central Palestine. They appear to have occupied it at a very early period, and to have relinquished it in company with the Amalekites, who also left their name attached to a mountain in the same locality (Judg. xii. 15), when they abandoned that rich district for the less fertile but freer South. Other tribes, as the Avvim and the Zemarites, also left traces of their presence in the names of towns of the central district (see pp. 201 a, 277, note b).

The connection between the Gerizites and Mount Gerizim appears to have been first suggested by Gesenius. [Fürst accepts the same view.] It has been since adopted by Stanley (S. & P. p. 237, note). Gesenius interprets the name as "dwellers in the dry, barren country." G.

GE'SEM, THE LAND OF (γῆ Γεσέμ; terra Jesse), the Greek form of the Hebrew name GOSHEN (Jud. i. 9).

GE'SHAM (גֶּשָׁן, i. e. Geshan [filthy, Ges.]: Σωγάρ, Alex. Γηρσωμ: Gesan), one of the sons of JAHDAI, in the genealogy of Judah and family of Caleb (1 Chr. ii. 47). Nothing further concerning him has been yet traced. The name, as it stands in our present Bibles, is a corruption of the A. V. of 1611, which has, accurately, GESHAN. Burrington, usually very careful, has Geshur (Table xi. 1, 280), but without giving any authority.

[a] See an instance of this in 1 Chr. vi. 2–15, where the line of Kohath is given, to the exclusion of the other two families.

[b] The LXX. has rendered the passage referred to as follows: — καὶ ἰδοὺ ἡ γῆ κατῳκεῖτο ἀπὸ ἀνηκόντων ἡ ἀπὸ Γελαμψούρ (Alex. Γελαμσούρ) τετειχισμένων καὶ ἕως γῆς Αἰγύπτου. The word Gelamsour may be a corruption of the Hebrew mcolam . . Shurah (A. V "of old . . to Shur"), or it may contain a mention of the name Telem or Telaim, a place in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 24), which bore a prominent part in a former attack on the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 4). In the latter case Γ has been read for Τ. (See Lengerke; Fürst's Handwb. &c.)

* GE'SHAN (1 Chr. ii. 47), the correct form of a name for which GESHAM has been improperly substituted in modern editions of the A. V.

GE'SHEM, and GASH'MU (גֶּשֶׁם, גָּשְׁמוּ [corporeality, firmness, Fürst]: Γησάμ: [Gosem,] Gossem), an Arabian, mentioned in Neh. ii. 19, and vi. 1, 2, 6, who, with "Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah, the servant, the Ammonite," opposed Nehemiah in the repairing of Jerusalem. Geshem, we may conclude, was an inhabitant of Arabia Petræa, or of the Arabian Desert, and probably the chief of a tribe which, like most of the tribes on the eastern frontier of Palestine, was, in the time of the Captivity and the subsequent period, allied with the Persians or with any peoples threatening the Jewish nation. Geshem, like Sanballat and Tobiah, seems to have been one of the "governors beyond the river," to whom Nehemiah came, and whose mission "grieved them exceedingly, that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel" (Neh. ii. 10); for the wandering inhabitants of the frontier doubtless availed themselves largely, in their predatory excursions, of the distracted state of Palestine, and dreaded the re-establishment of the kingdom; and the Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites, are recorded as having "conspired to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder" the repairing. The endeavors of these confederates and their failure are recorded in chapters ii., iv., and vi. The Arabic name corresponding to Geshem cannot easily be identified. Jásim (or Gásim, جاسم) is one of very remote antiquity; and Jashum (جشم) is the name of an historical tribe of Arabia Proper; the latter may more probably be compared with it. E. S. P.

GE'SHUR (גְּשׁוּר and גְּשׁוּרָה, a bridge: [Γεδσούρ, exc. 2 Sam. iii. 3, Γεσσίρ, Vat. Γεσειρ; 1 Chr. ii. 23, Alex. Γεσσουρ, iii. 2, Γεσουρ: Gessur:] Arab. جسر, Jessur), a little principality in the northeastern corner of Bashan, adjoining the province of Argob (Deut. iii. 14), and the kingdom of Aram (Syria in the A. V.; 2 Sam. xv. 8; comp. 1 Chr. ii. 23). It was within the boundary of the allotted territory of Manasseh, but its inhabitants were never expelled (Josh. xiii. 13; comp. 1 Chr. ii. 23). King David married "the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur" (2 Sam. iii. 3); and her son Absalom sought refuge among his maternal relatives after the murder of his brother. The wild acts of Absalom's life may have been to some extent results of maternal training; they were at least characteristic of the stock from which he sprung. He remained in "Geshur of Aram" until he was taken back to Jerusalem by Joab (2 Sam. xiii. 37, xv. 8). It is highly probable that Geshur was a section of the wild and rugged region, now called el-Lejah, among whose rocky fastnesses the Geshurites might dwell in security while the whole surrounding plains were occupied by the Israelites. On the north the Lejah borders on the territory of Damascus, the ancient Aram; and in Scripture the name is so intimately connected with Bashan and Argob, that one is led to suppose it formed part of them (Deut. iii. 13, 14; 1 Chr. ii. 23; Josh. xiii. 12, 13). [ARGOB.] J. L. P.

* The bridge over the Jordan above the sea of Galilee no doubt stands where one must have stood in ancient times. [BRIDGE, Amer. ed.] It may be, says Robinson (Phys. Geogr. p. 155), "that the adjacent district on the east of the Jordan took the name of Geshur (גְּשׁוּר), as if 'Bridge-land'; at any rate Geshur and the Geshurites were in this vicinity." H.

GESH'URI and GESH'URITES (גְּשׁוּרִי: [in Deut., Γαργασι, Vat. Alex. -σει; Comp. Γεσσουρί; in Josh., Alex. Γεσουρι; xii. 5, Γεργεσί, Vat. -σει; xiii. 2, 11, 13, Γεσιρί, Vat. Γεσειρει; 1 Sam., Γεσιρι, Vat. -σει-; Alex. Γεσερει: Gessuri.] 1. The inhabitants of Geshur, which see (Deut. iii. 14; Jos. xii. 5, xiii. 11).

2. An ancient tribe which dwelt in the desert between Arabia and Philistia (Josh. xiii. 2; 1 Sam. xxvii. 8); they are mentioned in connection with the Gezrites and Amalekites. [GEZER, p. 909.] J. L. P.

GETHER (גֶּתֶר: Γατέρ; [Alex. Γαθερ:] Gether), the third, in order, of the sons of Aram (Gen. x. 23). No satisfactory trace of the people sprung from this stock has been found. The theories of Bochart and others, which rest on improbable etymologies, are without support; while the suggestions of Carians (Hieron.), Bactrians (Joseph. Ant.), and جرامقة (Saad.), are not better founded. (See Bochart, Phaleg, ii. 10, and Winer, s. v.). Kalisch proposes GESHUR; but he does not adduce any argument in its favor, except the similarity of sound, and the permutation of Aramæan and Hebrew letters.

The Arabs write the name غاثر (Ghâthir); and, in the mythical history of their country, it is said that the probably aboriginal tribes of Thamood, Tasur, Jadees, and 'Ad (the last, in the second generation, through 'Ood), were descended from Ghâthir (Caussin [de Perceval], Essai, i. 8, 9, 23; Abul-Fidâ, Hist. Anteisl. 16). These traditions are in the highest degree untrustworthy; and, as we have stated in ARABIA, the tribes referred to were, almost demonstrably, not of Semitic origin. See ARABIA, ARAM, and NABATHÆANS.

GETHSEM'ANE (גַּת, gath, a "wine-press," and שֶׁמֶן, shemen, "oil;" Γεθσημανεί [so Tisch.; Lachm. Treg. -νεῖ], or more generally Γεθσημανῆ), a small "farm," as the French would say, "un bien aux champs" (χωρίον = ager, prædium; or as the Vulgate, villa; A. V. "place;" Matt. xxvi. 36; Mark xiv. 32), situated across the brook Kedron (John xviii. 1), probably at the foot of Mount Olivet (Luke xxii. 39), to the N. W., and about ½ or ¾ of a mile English from the walls of Jerusalem. There was a "garden," or rather orchard (κῆπος), attached to it, to which the olive, fig, and pomegranate doubtless invited resort by their "hospitable shade." And we know from the Evangelists SS. Luke (xxii. 39) and John (xviii. 2) that our Lord oftimes resorted thither with his disciples. "It was on the road to Bethany," says Mr. Greswell (Harm. Diss. xlii.), "and the family of Lazarus might have possessions there;" but, if so, it should have been rather on the S. E. side of the mountain where Bethany lies: part of which, it may be remarked, being the property of the village still, as it may well have been then, is even now called Bethany (el-Azariyeh) by the natives.[a] Hence the expressions in S. Luke xxiv. 50 and Acts i. 12 are quite consistent. According to Josephus, the suburbs of Jerusalem abounded with gardens and pleasure-grounds (παραδείσοις, B. J. vi. 1, § 1; comp. v. 3, § 2): now, with the exception of those belonging to the Greek and Latin convents, hardly the vestige of a garden is to be seen. There is indeed a favorite paddock or close, half-a-mile or more to the north, on the same side of the continuation of the valley of the Kedron, the property of a wealthy Turk, where the Mohammedan ladies pass the day with their families, their bright flowing costume forming a picturesque contrast to the stiff sombre foliage of the olive-grove beneath which they cluster. But Gethsemane has not come down to us as a scene of mirth; its inexhaustible associations are the offspring of a single event — the Agony of the Son of God on the evening preceding His Passion. Here emphatically, as Isaiah had foretold, and as the name imports, were fulfilled those dark words, "I have trodden the wine-press alone" (lxiii. 3; comp. Rev. xiv. 20, "the wine-press . . . without the city"). "The period of the year," proceeds Mr. Greswell, "was the Vernal Equinox: the day of the month about two days before the full of the moon — in which case the moon would not be now very far past her meridian; and the night would be enlightened until a late hour towards the morning" — the day of the week Thursday, or rather, according to the Jews, Friday — for the sun had set. The time, according to Mr. Greswell, would be the last watch of the night, between our 11 and 12 o'clock. Any recapitulation of the circumstances of that ineffable event would be unnecessary; any comments upon it unseasonable. A modern garden, in which are eight venerable olive-trees, and a grotto to the north, detached from it, and in closer connection with the Church of the Sepulchre of the Virgin — in fact with the road to the summit of the mountain running between them, as it did also in the days of the Crusaders (Sanuti Secret. Fidel. Cruc. lib. iii. p. xiv. c. 9) — both securely inclosed, and under lock and key, are pointed out as making up the true Gethsemane. These may, or may not, be the spots which Eusebius, St. Jerome (Liber de Situ et Nominibus, s. v.), and Adamnanus mention as such; but from the 4th century downwards some such localities are spoken of as known, frequented, and even built upon. Every generation dwells most upon what accords most with its instincts and predilections. Accordingly the pilgrims of antiquity say nothing about those time-honored olive-trees, whose age the poetic minds of a Lamartine or a Stanley shrink from criticising — they were doubtless not so imposing in the 6th century; still, had they been noticed, they would have afforded undying witness to the locality — while, on the other hand, few modern travellers would inquire for, and adore, with Antoninus, the three precise spots where our Lord is said to have fallen upon His face. Against the contemporary antiquity of the olive trees, it has been urged that Titus cut down all the trees round about Jerusalem; and certainly this is no more than Josephus states in express terms (see particularly B. J. vi. 1, § 1, a passage which must have escaped Mr. Williams, Holy City, vol. ii. p. 437, 2d ed., who only cites v. 3, § 2, and vi. 8, § 1). Besides, the 10th legion, arriving from Jericho, were posted about the Mount of Olives (v. 2, § 3; and comp. vi. 2, § 8), and, in the course of the siege, a wall was carried along the valley of the Kedron to the fountain of Siloam (v. 10, § 2). The probability, therefore, would seem to be, that they were planted by Christian hands to mark the spot: unless, like the sacred olive of the Acropolis (Rühr ad Herod. viii. 55), they may have reproduced themselves. Maundrell (Early Travels in Pal. by Wright, p. 471) and Quaresmius (Elucid. T. S. lib. iv. per. v. ch. 7) appear to have been the first to notice them, not more than three centuries ago: the former arguing against, and the latter in favor of, their reputed antiquity; but nobody reading their accounts would imagine that there were then no more than eight, the locality of Gethsemane being supposed the same. Parallel claims, to be sure, are not wanting in the cedars of Lebanon, which are still visited with so much enthusiasm: in the terebinth, or oak of Mamre, which was standing in the days of Constantine the Great, and even worshipped (Vales. ad Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 53), and the fig-tree (Ficus elastica) near Nerbudda in India, which native historians assert to be 2,500 years old (Patterson's Journal of a Tour in Egypt, &c., p. 202, note). Still more appositely there were olive-trees near Linternum 250 years old, according to Pliny, in his time, which are recorded to have survived to the middle of the tenth century (Nouveau Dict. d'Hist. Nat. Paris, 1846, vol. xxix. p. 61).

[a] * El-Azariyeh is the Arabic name, derived from Lazarus. Bethany is current only among foreigners, or those of foreign origin. In this instance the native language adopts the more distinctive Christian appellation. H.

E. S. Ff.

* Gethsemane, which means "olive-press" (see above) is found according to the narrative in the proper place; for Olivet, as the name imports, was famous for its olive-trees, still sufficiently numerous there to justify its being so called, though little cultivation of any sort appears now on that mount. The place is called also "a garden" (κῆπος), but we are not by any means to transfer to that term our ideas of its meaning. It is to be remembered, as Stanley remarks (S. & P. p. 187, 1st ed.), that "Eastern gardens are not flower-gardens nor private gardens, but the orchards, vineyards, and fig-enclosures" near the towns. The low wall, covered with white stucco, which incloses the reputed Gethsemane, is comparatively modern. A series of rude pictures (utterly out of place there, where the memory and the heart are the only prompters required) are hung up along the face of the wall, representing different scenes in the history of Christ's passion, such as the scourging, the mockery of the soldiers, the sinking beneath the cross, and the like. The eight olive-trees here, though still verdant and productive, are so decayed as to require to be propped up with heaps of stones against their trunks in order to prevent their being blown down by the wind. Trees of this class are proverbially long-lived. Schubert, the celebrated naturalist, decides that those in Gethsemane are old enough to have flourished amid a race of contemporaries that perished long centuries ago (Reise in das Morgenland, ii. 521).[a] Stanley also speaks of them "as the most venerable of their race on the face of the earth . . . the most affecting of the sacred memorials in or about Jerusalem." (S. & P. p. 450, 1st ed.)

There are two or three indications in the Gospel history which may guide us as to the general situation of this ever memorable spot to which the Saviour repaired on the night of his betrayal. It is quite certain that Gethsemane was on the western slope of Olivet, and near the base of that mountain where it sinks down into the valley of the Kedron. When it is said that "Jesus went forth with his disciples beyond the brook Kedron, where was a garden" (John xviii. 1), it is implied that he did not go far up the Mount of Olives, but reached the place which he had in view soon after crossing the bed of that stream. The garden, it will be observed, is named in that passage with reference to the brook, and not the mountain. This result agrees also with the presumption from the Saviour's abrupt summons to his disciples recorded in Matt. xxvi. 46: "Arise, let us be going; see, he is at hand that doth betray me." The best explanation of this language is that his watchful eye, at that moment, caught sight of Judas and his accomplices, as they issued from one of the eastern gates, or turned round the northern or southern corner of the walls, in order to descend into the valley. The night, with the moon then near its full, and about the beginning of April, must have been clear, or if exceptionally dark, the torches (John xviii. 13) would have left no doubt as to the object of such a movement at that unseasonable hour. It may be added that in this neighborhood also are still to be seen caverns and deserted tombs into which his pursuers may have thought that he would endeavor to escape and conceal himself, and so came prepared with lights to follow him into these lurking-places.

The present inclosure known as Gethsemane fulfills all these conditions; and so also, it may be claimed, would any other spot similarly situated across the brook, and along the western declivity in front of Jerusalem. Tischendorf (Reise in den Orient, i. 312) finds the traditionary locality "in perfect harmony with all that we learn from the Evangelists." Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 284) thinks it should be sought "rather in a secluded vale several hundred yards to the northeast of the present Gethsemane." Robinson alleges no positive reasons against the common identification. "The authenticity of the sacred garden," says Williams (Holy City, ii. 437), "I choose rather to believe than to defend." But such differences of opinion as these involve an essential agreement. The original garden may have been more or less extensive than the present site, or have stood a few hundred rods further to the north or the south; but far, certainly, from that spot it need not be supposed to have been. We may sit down there, and read the narrative of what the Saviour endured for our redemption, and feel assured that we are near the place where he prayed, "Saying, Father, not my will, but thine be done;" and where, "being in an agony, he sweat as it were great drops of blood, falling down to the ground." It is altogether probable that the disciples in going back to Jerusalem from Bethany after having seen the Lord taken up into heaven passed Gethsemane on the way. What new thoughts must have arisen in their minds, what deeper insight into the mystery of the agony must have flashed upon them, as they looked once more upon that scene of the sufferings and humiliation of the crucified and ascended One. H.

[a] * An argument for the great age of these trees has been drawn from the fact that a medino (an old Turkish coin) is the governmental tax paid on each one of this group, which was the tax on trees at the time of the Saracenic conquest of Jerusalem, A. D. 636. Since that period the Sultan receives half of the fruits of every tree as his tribute. (See Raumer, Palastina, p. 309, 4te Aufl.)

GEU'EL (גְּאוּאֵל, Sam. גּוֹאֵל [God's exaltation, Ges.]: Γουδιηλ; [Vat. Τουδιηλ:] Guel), son of Machi: ruler of the tribe of Gad, and its representative among the spies sent from the wilderness of Paran to explore the Promised Land (Num. xiii. 15).

GE'ZER (גֶּזֶר, in pause גָּזֵר [steep place, precipice, Fürst, Ges.]: Γαζέρ, Γεζερ [Alex. 1 K. ix. 15, 16], Γάζαρα, [Γαζηρά; Josh. x. 33. Vat. Γαζης; 1 Chr. xiv. 16, FA. Γαζαραν:] Gazer, [Gezer, Gazera]), an ancient city of Canaan, whose king, Horam, or Elam, coming to the assistance of Lachish, was killed with all his people by Joshua (Josh. x. 33; xii. 12). The town, however, is not said to have been destroyed; it formed one of the landmarks on the south boundary of Ephraim,[a] between the lower Beth-horon and the Mediterranean (xvi. 3), the western limit of the tribe (1 Chr. vii. 28). It was allotted with its suburbs to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Chr. vi. 67); but the original inhabitants were not dispossessed (Judg. i. 29); and even down to the reign of Solomon the Canaanites, or (according to the LXX. addition to Josh. xvi. 10) the Canaanites and Perizzites, were still dwelling there, and paying tribute to Israel (1 K. ix. 16). At this time it must in fact have been independent of Israelite rule, for Pharaoh had burnt it to the ground and killed its inhabitants, and then presented the site to his daughter, Solomon's queen. But it was immediately rebuilt by the king; and though not heard of again till after the Captivity, yet it played a somewhat prominent part in the later struggles of the nation. [GAZERA.]

Ewald (Gesch. iii. 280; comp. ii. 427) takes Gezer and Geshur to be the same, and sees in the destruction of the former by Pharaoh, and the simultaneous expedition of Solomon to Hamath-zobah in the neighborhood of the latter, indications of a revolt of the Canaanites, of whom the Geshurites formed the most powerful remnant, and whose attempt against the new monarch was thus frustrated. But this can hardly be supported.

In one place Gob is given as identical with Gezer (1 Chr. xx. 4, comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 18). The exact site of Gezer has not been discovered; but its general position is not difficult to infer. It must have been between the lower Beth-horon and the sea (Josh. xvi. 3; 1 K. ix. 17); therefore on the great maritime plain which lies beneath the hills of which Beit'ûr et-tahta is the last outpost, and forms the regular coast road of communication with Egypt (1 K. ix. 16). It is therefore appropriately named as the last point to which David's pursuit of the Philistines extended (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chr. xiv. 16 [b]); and as the scene of at least one sharp encounter (1 Chr. xx. 4), this plain being their own peculiar territory (comp. Jos. Ant. viii. 6, § 1, Γαζαρά, τὴν τῆς Παλαιστίνων χώρας ὑπάρχουσαν) and as commanding the communication between Egypt and the new capital, Jerusalem, it was an important point for Solomon to fortify. By Eusebius it is mentioned as four miles north of Nicopolis (Amwâs); a position exactly occupied by the important town Jimzu, the ancient Gimzo, and corresponding well with the requirements of Joshua. But this hardly agrees with the indications of the 1st book of Maccabees, which speak of it as between Emmaus (Amwâs) and Azotus and Jamnia; and again as on the confines of Azotus. In the neighborhood of the latter there is more than one site bearing the name Yasûr; but whether this Arabic name can be derived from the Hebrew Gezer, and also whether so important a town as Gazara was in the time of the Maccabees can be represented by such insignificant villages as these, are questions to be determined by future investigation. If it can, then perhaps the strongest claims for identity with Gezer are put forward by a village called Yasûr, 4 or 5 miles east of Joppa, on the road to Ramleh and Lydd.

From the occasional occurrence of the form Gazer, and from the LXX. version being almost uniformly Gazera or Gazer, Ewald infers that this was really the original name. G.

GEZ'RITES, THE (הַגִּזְרִי, accur. the Gizrite: [Vat. omits; Alex.] τον Γεζραιον: Gezri). The word which the Jewish critics have substituted in the margin of the Bible for the ancient reading, "the Gerizzite" (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), and which has thus become incorporated in the text of the A. V. If it mean anything — at least that we know — it must signify the dwellers in Gezer. But GEZER was not less than 50 miles distant from the "south of Judah, the south of the Jerahmeelites, and the south of the Kenites," the scene of David's inroad; a fact which stands greatly in the way of our receiving the change. [GERZITES, THE.]

GI'AH (גִּיחַ [water-fall, Fürst; fountain, Ges.]: Γαί; [Comp. Γιέ:] vallis), a place named only in 2 Sam. ii. 24, to designate the position of the hill Ammah — "which faces Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon." No trace of the situation of either has yet been found. By the LXX. the name is read as if גַּיְא, i. e. a ravine or glen; a view also taken in the Vulgate.

GIANTS. The frequent allusion to giants in Scripture, and the numerous theories and disputes which have arisen in consequence, render it necessary to give a brief view of some of the main opinions and curious inferences to which the mention of them leads.

1. They are first spoken of in Gen. vi. 4, under the name Nephilim (נְפִלִים: LXX. γίγαντες Aquil. ἐπιπίπτοντες; Symm. βιαῖοι: Vulg. gigan-

[a] If Lachish be where Van de Velde and Porter would place it, at Um Lâkis, near Gaza, at least 40 miles from the southern boundary of Ephraim, there is some ground for suspecting the existence of two Gezers, and this is confirmed by the order in which it is mentioned in the list of Josh. xii. with Hebron, Eglon, and Debir. There is not, however, any means of determining this.

[b] In these two places the word, being at the end of a period, has, according to Hebrew custom, its first vowel lengthened, and stands in the text as Gazer and in these two places only the name is so transferred to the A. V. But, to be consistent, the same change should have been made in several other passages, where it occurs in the Hebrew: e. g. Judg. i. 29, Josh. xvi. 3, 10; 1 K. ix. 15, &c. It would seem better to render [represent] the Hebrew name always by the same English one, when the difference arises from nothing but an emphatic accent.

ies: Onk. גַּבְרַיָּא: Luther, Tyrannen). The word is derived either from גָּבַל, or אָלָא (= "marvelous"), or, as is generally believed, from נָפַל, either in the sense to throw down, or to fall (=fallen angels, Jarchi, cf. Is. xiv. 12; Luke x. 18); or meaning "ῥῆγες irruentes" (Gesen.), or collapsi (by euphemism, Boettcher, de Inferis, p. 92); but certainly not "because men fell from terror of them" (as R. Kimchi). That the word means "giant" is clear from Num. xiii. 32, 33, and is confirmed by נְפִלָא, the Chaldee name for "the aery giant" Orion (Job. ix. 9, xxxviii. 31; Is. xiii. 10; Targ.), unless this name arise from the obliquity of the constellation (Gen. of Earth, p. 35).

But we now come to the remarkable conjectures about the origin of these Nephilim in Gen. vi. 1–4. (An immense amount has been written on this passage. See Kurtz, Die Ehen der Söhne Gottes, &c., Berlin, 1857; Ewald, Jahrb. 1854, p. 126; Govett's Isaiah Unfulfilled; Faber's Many Mansions, in the Journal of Sac. Lit., Oct. 1858, &c.) We are told that "there were Nephilim in the earth," and that "afterwards (καὶ μετ' ἐκεῖνο, LXX.) the "sons of God" mingling with the beautiful "daughters of men" produced a race of violent and insolent Gibborim (גִּבֹּרִים). This latter word is also rendered by the LXX. γίγαντες, but we shall see hereafter that the meaning is more general. It is clear however that no statement is made that the Nephilim themselves sprang from this unhallowed union. Who then were they? Taking the usual derivation (נָפַל), and explaining it to mean "fallen spirits," the Nephilim seem to be identical with the "sons of God:" but the verse before us militates against this notion as much as against that which makes the Nephilim the same as the Gibborim, namely, the offspring of wicked marriages. This latter supposition can only be accepted if we admit either (1) that there were two kinds of Nephilim, — those who existed before the unequal intercourse, and those produced by it (Heidegger, Hist Patr. xi.), or (2) by following the Vulgate rendering, postquam enim ingressi sunt, etc. But the common rendering seems to be correct, nor is there much probability in Aben Ezra's explanation, that אַחֲרֵי־כֵן ("after that") means אחר המבול (i. e. "after the deluge"), and is an allusion to the Anakims.

The genealogy of the Nephilim then, or at any rate of the earliest Nephilim, is not recorded in Scripture, and the name itself is so mysterious that we are lost in conjecture respecting them.

2. The sons of the marriages mentioned in Gen. vi. 1–4, are called Gibborim (גִּבֹּרִים, from גָּבַר, to be strong), a general name meaning powerful (ὑβρισταὶ καὶ παντὸς ὑπερφέρονται καλοῦ, Joseph. Ant. i. 3, § 1; γῆς παῖδες τὸν νοῦν ἐκβιβάσαντες τοῦ λογίζεσθαι κ.τ.λ., Philo de Gigant., p. 270; comp. Is. iii. 2, xlix. 24; Ez. xxxii. 21). They were not necessarily giants in our sense of the word Theodoret, Quæst. 48). Yet, as was natural, these powerful chiefs were almost universally represented as men of extraordinary stature. The LXX. render the word γίγαντες, and call Nimrod a γίγας ευνηγὸς (1 Chr. i. 10); Augustine calls them Stuprosi (de Civ. Dei, xv. 4); Chrysostom ἡρωε. εὐμηκεῖς, Theodoret παμμεγέθεις (comp. Bar. iii 26, εὐμεγέθεις, ἐπιστάμενοι πόλεμον).

But who were the parents of these giants; who are "the sons of God" (בְּנֵי הָאֱלֹהִים)? The opinions are various: (1.) Men of power (υἱοὶ δυνασευόντων, Symm., Hieron. Quæst. Heb. ad loc.; בְּנֵי רַבְרְבַיָּא, Onk.; בני שלמניה, Samar.; so too Selden, Vorst. &c.), (comp. Ps. ii. 7, lxxxii. 6, lxxxix. 27; Mic. v. 5, &c.). The expression will then exactly resemble Homer's Διογενεῖς βασιλῆες, and the Chinese Tiân-tseù, "son of heaven," as a title of the Emperor (Gesen. s. v. בֵּן). But why should the union of the high-born and low-born produce offspring unusual for their size and strength? (2.) Men with great gifts, "in the image of God" (Ritter, Schumann); (3.) Cainites arrogantly assuming the title (Paulus); or (4.) the pious Sethites (comp. Gen. iv. 26; Maimon. Mor. Neboch. i. 14; Suid. s. vv. Σήθ and μιαιγαμίας; Cedren. Hist. Comp. p. 10; Aug. de Civ. Dei, xv. 23; Chrysost. Hom. 22, in Gen.; Theod. in Gen. Quæst. 47; Cyril, c. Jul. ix., &c.). A host of modern commentators catch at this explanation, but Gen. iv. 26 has probably no connection with the subject. Other texts quoted in favor of the view are Deut. xiv. 1, 2; Ps. lxxiii. 15; Prov. xiv. 26; Hos. i. 10; Rom. viii. 14, &c. Still the mere antithesis in the verse, as well as other considerations, tend strongly against this gloss, which indeed is built on a foregone conclusion. Compare however the Indian notion of the two races of men Suras and Asuras (children of the sun and of the moon, Nork, Bram. und Rabb. p. 204 ff.), and the Persian belief in the marriage of Djemshid with the sister of a dev, whence sprang black and impious men (Kalisch, Gen. p. 175). (5.) Worshippers of false gods (παῖδες τῶν θεῶν, Aqu.) making בְּנֵי = "servants" (comp. Deut. xiv. 1; Prov. xiv. 26; Ex. xxxii. 1; Deut. iv. 28, &c.). This view is ably supported in Genesis of Earth and Man, p. 39 f. (6.) Devils, such as the Incubi and Succubi. Such was the belief of the Cabbalists (Valesius, de S. Philosoph. cap. 8). That these beings can have intercourse with women St. Augustine declares it would be folly to doubt, and it was the universal belief in the East. Mohammed makes one of the ancestors of Balkis Queen of Sheba a demon, and Damir says he had heard a Mohammedan doctor openly boast of having married in succession four demon wives (Bochart, Hieroz. i. p. 747). Indeed the belief still exists (Lane's Mod. Egypt. i. ch. x. ad in.) (7.) Closely allied to this is the oldest opinion, that they were angels (ἄγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, LXX., for such was the old reading, not υἱοί, Aug. de Civ. Dei, xv. 23; so too Joseph. Ant. i. 3, § 1; Phil. de Gig. ii. 358; Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 7, § 69; Sulp. Sever. Hist. Script. in Orthod. l. i. &c.; comp. Job i. 6, ii. 1; Ps. xxix. 1. Job iv. 18). The rare expression "sons of God" certainly means angels in Job xxxviii. 7, i. 6, ii. 1, and that such is the meaning in Gen. vi. 4 also, was the most prevalent opinion both in the Jewish and early Christian Church.

It was probably this very ancient view which gave rise to the spurious book of Enoch, and the notion quoted from it by St. Jude (6), and alluded to by St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 4; comp. 1 Cor. xi. 10 Tert. de Virg. Vel. 7). According to this book certain angels, sent by God to guard the earth (Ἐγρήγοροι, φύλακες), were perverted by the beauty of women, "went after strange flesh," taught sorcery, finery (lunâna lapillorum, circulos ex aure, Tert., etc.), and being banished from heaven had sons 3,000 cubits high, thus originating a celestial and terrestrial race of demons — "Unde modo vagi subvertunt corpora multa" (Commodiani Instruct. III., Cultus Dæmonum) i. e. they are still the source of epilepsy, etc. Various names were given at a later time to these monsters. Their chief was Leuixas, and of their number were Machsael, Aza, Shemchozai, and (the wickedest of them) a goat-like demon Azael (comp. Azazel, Lev. xvi. 8, and for the very curious questions connected with this name, see Bochart, Hieroz. i. p. 652 ff.; Rab. Eliezer, cap. 22; Bereshith Rab. ad Gen. vi. 2; Sennert, de Gigantibus, iii.).

Against this notion (which Hävernick calls "the silliest whim of the Alexandrian Gnostics and Cabalistic Rabbis") Heidegger (Hist. Patr. l. c.) quotes Matt. xxii. 30; Luke xxiv. 39, and similar testimonies. Philastrius (Adv. Hæres. cap. 108) characterizes it as a heresy, and Chrysostom (Hom. 22) even calls it τὸ βλάσφημα ἐκεῖνο. Yet Jude is explicit, and the question is not so much what can be, as what was believed. The fathers almost unanimously accepted these fables, and Tertullian argues warmly (partly on expedient grounds!) for the genuineness of the book of Enoch. The angels were called Ἐγρήγοροι, a word used by Aquil. and Symm. to render the Chaldee עִיר (Dan. iv. 13 ff.: Vulg. Vigil: LXX. εἴρ; Lex. Cyrilli, ἄγγελοι ἢ ἄγρυπνοι; Fabric. Cod. Pseudepigr. V. T. p. 180), and therefore used, as in the Zend-Avesta, of good guardian angels, and applied especially to archangels in the Syriac liturgies (cf. יְעִירִין, Is. xxi. 11), but more often of evil angels (Castelli Lex. Syr. p. 649; Scalig. ad Euseb. Chron. p. 403; Gesen. s. v. עִיר). The story of the Egregori is given at length in Tert. de Cult. Fem. i. 2, ii. 10; Commodianus, Instruct. iii.; Lactant. Div. Inst. ii. 14; Testam. Patriarch. [Ruben,] c. v., etc. Every one will remember the allusions to the same interpretation in Milton, Par. Reg. ii. 179 —

> "Before the Flood, thou with thy lusty crew, > False-titled sons of God, roaming the earth,
> Cast wanton eyes on the daughters of men,
> And coupled with them, and begat a race."

The use made of the legend in some modern poems cannot sufficiently be reprobated.

We need hardly say how closely allied this is to the Greek legends which connected the ἄγρια φῦλα γιγάντων with the gods (Hom. Od. vii. 205; Pausan. viii. 29), and made δαίμονες sons of the gods (Plat. Apolog. ἡμίθεοι; Cratyl. § 32). Indeed the whole heathen tradition resembles the one before us (Cumberland's Sanchoniatho, p. 24; Hom. Od. xi. 306 ff.; Hes. Theog. 185, Opp. et D. 144; Plat. Rep. ii. § 17, p. 604 E; de Legg. iii. § 16, p. 805 A; Ov. Metam. i. 151; Luc. iv. 593; Lucian, de Deâ Syr., &c.; cf. Grot. de Ver. i. 6); and the Greek translators of the Bible make the resemblance still more close by introducing such words as θεομάχοι, γηγενεῖς, and even Τιτᾶνες, to which last Josephus (l. c.) expressly compares the giants of Genesis (LXX. Prov. ii. 18; Ps. xlviii. 2 [xlix. 2]; 2 Sam. v. 18; Judith xvi. 7). The fate too of these demon-chiefs is identical with that of heathen story (Job xxvi. 5; Ecclus. xvi. 7; Bar. iii 26-28 Wisd. xiv. 6; 3 Macc. ii. 4; 1 Pet. iii. 19).

These legends may therefore be regarded as distortions of the Biblical narrative, handed down by tradition, and embellished by the fancy and imagination of eastern nations. The belief of the Jews in later times is remarkably illustrated by the story of Asmodeus in the book of Tobit. It is deeply instructive to observe how wide and marked a contrast there is between the incidental allusion of the sacred narrative (Gen. vi. 4), and the minute frivolities or prurient follies which degrade the heathen mythology, and repeatedly appear in the groundless imaginings of the Rabbinic interpreters. If there were fallen angels whose lawless desires gave birth to a monstrous progeny, both they and their intolerable offspring were destroyed by the deluge, which was the retribution on their wickedness, and they have no existence in the baptized and renovated earth.

Before passing to the other giant-races we may observe that all nations have had a dim fancy that the aborigines who preceded them, and the earliest men generally, were of immense stature. Berosus says that the ten antediluvian kings of Chaldea were giants, and we find in all monkish historians a similar statement about the earliest possessors of Britain (comp. Hom. Od. x. 119; Aug. de Civ. Dei, xv. 9; Plin. vii. 16; Varr. ap. Aul. Gell. iii. 10; Jer. on Matt. xxvii.). The great size decreased gradually after the deluge (2 Esdr. v. 52–55). That we are dwarfs compared to our ancestors was a common belief among the Latin and Greek poets (Il. v. 302 ff.; Lucret. ii. 1151; Virg. Æn. xii. 900; Juv. xv. 69), although it is now a matter of absolute certainty from the remains of antiquity, reaching back to the very earliest times, that in old days men were no taller than ourselves. On the origin of the mistaken supposition there are curious passages in Natalis Comes (Mythology. vi. 21), and Macrobius (Saturn. i. 20).

The next race of giants which we find mentioned in Scripture is —

3. The Rephaim, a name which frequently occurs, and in some remarkable passages. The earliest mention of them is the record of their defeat by Chedorlaomer and some allied kings at Ashteroth Karnaim (Gen. xiv. 5). They are again mentioned (Gen. xv. 20), their dispersion recorded (Deut. ii. 10, 20), and Og the giant king of Bashan said to be "the only remnant of them" (Deut. iii. 11; Jos. xii. 4, xiii. 12, xvii. 15). Extirpated, however, from the east of Palestine, they long found a home in the west, and in connection with the Philistines, under whose protection the small remnant of them may have lived, they still employed their arms against the Hebrews (2 Sam. xxi. 18 ff.; 1 Chr. xx. 4). In the latter passage there seems however to be some confusion between the Rephaim and the sons of a particular giant of Gath, named Rapha. Such a name may have been conjectured as that of a founder of the race, like the names Ion, Dorus, Teut, etc. (Boettcher, de Inferis, p. 96, n.; Rapha occurs also as a proper name, 1 Chr. vii. 25, viii. 2, 37). It is probable that they had possessed districts west of the Jordan in early times, since the "Valley of Rephaim" (κοιλὰς τῶν Τιτάνων, 2 Sam. v. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 15; Is. xvii. 5; κ. τῶν γιγάντων, Joseph. Ant. vii. 4, § 1), a rich valley S. W. of Jerusalem, derived its name from them.

That they were not Canaanites is clear from there being no allusion to them in Gen. x. 15–19. They were probably one of those aboriginal people to whose existence the traditions of many nations testify, and of whose genealogy the Bible gives us no information. The few names recorded have, as Ewald remarks, a Semitic aspect (Geschich. des Volkes Isr. i. 311), but from the hatred existing between them and both the Canaanites and Hebrews, some suppose them to be Japhethites, "who comprised especially the inhabitants of the coasts and islands" (Kalisch on Gen. p. 351).

רְפָאִים is rendered by the Greek versions very variously (Ῥαφαείμ, γίγαντες, γηγενεῖς, θεομάχοι, Τιτᾶνες, and ἰατροί, Vulg. medici; LXX. Ps. lxxxvii. 10; Is. xxvi. 14, where it is confused with רְפָאִים; cf. Gen. l. 2, and sometimes νεκροί, τεθνηκότες, especially in the later versions). In A. V. the words used for it are "Rephaim," "giants," and "the dead." That it has the latter meaning in many passages is certain (Ps. lxxxviii. 10; Prov. ii. 18, ix. 18, xxi. 16; Is. xxvi. 19, 14). [Dead, The, Amer. ed.] The question arises, how are these meanings to be reconciled? Gesenius gives no derivation for the national name, and derives ר = mortui, from רָפָא, sanavit, and the proper name Rapha from an Arabic root signifying "tall," thus seeming to sever all connection between the meanings of the word, which is surely most unlikely. Masius, Simonis, &c., suppose the second meaning to come from the fact that both spectres and giants strike terror (accepting the derivation from רָפָה, remisit, "unstrung with fear," R. Bechai on Deut. ii.); Vitringa and Hiller from the notion of length involved in stretching out a corpse, or from the fancy that spirits appear in more than human size (Hiller, Syntagm. Hermen. p. 205; Virg. Æn. ii. 772, &c.). J. D. Michaelis (ad Lowth s. Poes. p. 466) endeavored to prove that the Rephaim, &c., were Troglodytes, and that hence they came to be identified with the dead. Passing over other conjectures, Boettcher sees in רָפָא and רָפָה a double root, and thinks that the giants were called רְפָאִים (languefacti) by an euphemism; and that the dead were so called by a title which will thus exactly parallel the Greek καμόντες, κεκμηκότες (comp. Buttmann, Lexil. ii. 237 ff.). His arguments are too elaborate to quote, but see Boettcher, pp. 94–100. An attentive consideration seems to leave little room for doubt that the dead were called Rephaim (as Gesenius also hints) from some notion of Sheol being the residence of the fallen spirits or buried giants. The passages which seem most strongly to prove this are Prov. xxi. 16 (where obviously something more than mere physical death is meant, since that is the common lot of all); Is. xxvi. 14, 19, which are difficult to explain without some such supposition; Is. xiv. 9, where the word עַתּוּדֵי (οἱ ἄρξαντες τῆς γῆς, LXX.) if taken in its literal meaning of goats, may mean evil spirits represented in that form (cf. Lev. xvii. 7); and especially Job xxvi. 5, 6. "Behold the gyantes (A. V. 'dead things') grown under the waters" (Douay version), where there seems to be clear allusion to some subaqueous prison of rebellious spirits like that in which (according to the Hindoo legend) Vishnu the water-god confines a race of giants (cf. πυλάοχος, as a title of Neptune, Hes. Theog. 732; Nork, Bram. und Rabb. p. 312 ff.). [Og; Goliath.]

Branches of this great unknown people were called Emim, Anakim, and Zuzim.

* In Prov. xxi. 16, it is said of the man who wanders from the ways of wisdom, that "he shall remain in the congregation of the dead" (properly, of the shades, that is, disembodied spirits; see art. Dead). The meaning is, — that shall be the end of his wanderings; there he shall find his abode, though not the one he seeks. But, as is said in the preceding paragraph, "something more than physical death is meant, since that is the lot of all." This is well illustrated in Ps. xlix. 14, 15, 19. Of the wicked it is there said: "Like sheep they are laid in the grave;" like brute beasts, having no hope beyond it. "But God," says the righteous, "will redeem my soul from the power of the grave" (certainly, not from subjection to physical death, for no one could make so absurd a claim); while of the wicked it is said (v. 19), "they shall never see light."

In Is. xxvi. 14, it is affirmed of the tyrannical oppressors, whom God had cut off, that they "shall live no more," "shall not rise again," to continue their work of devastation and oppression on the earth; while in ver. 19 is expressed the confident hope of God's people, on behalf of its own slain.

Job xxvi. 5 should be translated thus: —

> The shades tremble,
> Beneath the waters and their inhabitants.

It is here affirmed, that God's dominion, with the dread it inspires, extends even to the abodes of departed spirits, beneath the earth, and lower than the ocean depths, which are no barrier to the exercise of his power.

We need not, therefore, resort to fabulous legends, for the explanation of these passages.

4. Emim (אֵימִים: LXX. Ὀμμίν, Ἰμμαῖοι), smitten by Chedorlaomer at Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen. xiv. 5), and occupying the country afterwards held by the Moabites (Deut. ii. 10), who gave them the name אֵימִים, "terrors." The word rendered "tall" may perhaps be merely "haughty" (ἰσχύοντες). [Emim.]

5. Anakim (עֲנָקִים). The imbecile terror of the spies exaggerated their proportions into something superhuman (Num. xiii. 28, 33), and their name became proverbial (Deut. ii. 10, ix. 2). [Anakim.]

6. Zuzim (זוּזִים), whose principal town was Ham (Gen. xiv. 5), and who lived between the Arnon and the Jabbok, being a northern tribe of Rephaim. The Ammonites, who defeated them, called them זַמְזֻמִּים (Deut. ii. 20 ff. which is, however, probably an early gloss).

We have now examined the main names applied to giant-races in the Bible, but except in the case of the two first (Nephilim and Gibborim) there is no necessity to suppose that there was anything very remarkable in the size of these nations, beyond the general fact of their being finely proportioned. Nothing can be built on the exaggeration of the spies (Num. xiii. 33), and Og, Goliath, Ishbi-benob, etc. (see under the names themselves) are obviously mentioned as exceptional cases. The Jews however (misled by supposed relics) thought otherwise (Joseph. Ant. v. 2, § 3).

No one has yet proved by experience the possibility of giant races, materially exceeding in size the average height of man. There is no great variation in the ordinary standard. The most stunted tribes of Esquimaux are at least four feet high, and the tallest races of America (e. g. the Guayaquilists and people of Paraguay) do not exceed six feet and a half. It was long thought that the Patagonians were men of enormous stature, and the assertions of the old voyagers on the point were positive. For instance Pigafetta (Voyage Round the World, Pinkerton, xi. 314) mentions an individual Patagonian so tall, that they "hardly reached to his waist." Similar exaggerations are found in the Voyages of Byron, Wallis, Carteret, Cook, and Forster; but it is now a matter of certainty from the recent visits to Patagonia (by Winter, Capt. Snow, and others), that there is nothing at all extraordinary in their size.

The general belief (until very recent times) in the existence of fabulously enormous men, arose from fancied giant-graves (see De la Valle's Travels in Persia, ii. 89), and above all from the discovery of huge bones, which were taken for those of men, in days when comparative anatomy was unknown. Even the ancient Jews were thus misled (Joseph. Ant. v. 2, § 3). Augustin appeals triumphantly to this argument, and mentions a molar tooth which he had seen at Utica a hundred times larger than ordinary teeth (De Civ. Dei, xv. 9). No doubt it once belonged to an elephant. Vives, in his commentary on the place, mentions a tooth as big as a fist, which was shown at St. Christopher's. In fact this source of delusion has only very recently been dispelled (Sennert, De Gigant. passim; Martin's West. Islands, in Pinkerton, ii. 691). Most bones, which have been exhibited, have turned out to belong to whales or elephants, as was the case with the vertebra of a supposed giant, examined by Sir Hans Sloane in Oxfordshire.

On the other hand, isolated instances of monstrosity are sufficiently attested to prove that beings like Goliath and his kinsmen may have existed. Columella (R. R. iii. 8, § 2) mentions Navius Pollio as one, and Pliny says that in the time of Claudius Cæsar there was an Arab named Gabbaras nearly ten feet high, and that even he was not so tall as Pusio and Secundilla in the reign of Augustus, whose bodies were preserved (vii. 16). Josephus tells us that, among other hostages, Artabanus sent to Tiberius a certain Eleazar, a Jew, surnamed "the Giant," seven cubits in height (Ant. xviii. 4, § 5). Nor are well-authenticated instances wanting in modern times. O'Brien, whose skeleton is preserved in the Museum of the College of Surgeons, must have been 8 feet high, but his unnatural height made him weakly. On the other hand the blacksmith Parsons, in Charles II.'s reign, was 7 feet 2 inches high, and also remarkable for his strength (Fuller's Worthies, Staffordshire).

GIB'BAR (גִּבָּר [hero, or high, gigantic]: Γαβέρ; [Vat. Ταβερ:] Gebbar). Bene-Gibbar, to the number of ninety-five, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 20). In the parallel list of Neh. vii. the name is given as GIBEON.

GIB'BETHON (גִּבְּתוֹן [eminence, hill: in Josh.,] Βεγεθών, Γεθεδάν, Alex. Γαβαθων, Γαβεθων; [in 1 K., Γαβαθών, Vat. 1 K. xv. 27, Γαβαων: Gebbethon,] Gabathon), a town allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), and afterwards given with its "suburbs" to the Kohathite Levites (xxi. 23). Being, like most of the towns of Dan, either in or close to the Philistines' country, it was no doubt soon taken possession of by them; at any rate they held it in the early days of the monarchy of Israel, when king Nadab "and all Israel," and after him Omri, besieged it (1 K. xv. 27; xvi. 17). What were the special advantages of situation or otherwise which rendered it so desirable as a possession for Israel are not apparent. In the Onomasticon (Gabathon) it is quoted as a small village (πολίχνη) called Gabe, in the 17th mile from Cæsarea. This would place it nearly due west of Samaria, and about the same distance therefrom. No name at all resembling it has, however, been discovered in that direction.

GIB'EA (גִּבְעָא [hill-inhabitant, Fürst; hill, Gesen.]: Γαιβάλ; Alex. Γαιβαα: Gabaa). Sheva "the father of Macbenah," and "father of Gibea," is mentioned with other names unmistakably those of places and not persons, among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 49, comp. 42). [FATHER.] This would seem to point out Gibea (which in some Hebrew MSS. is Gibeah; see Burrington, i. 216) as the city GIBEAH in Judah. The mention of Madmannah (49, comp. Josh. xv. 31), as well as of Ziph (42) and Maon (45), seems to carry us to a locality considerably south of Hebron. [GIBEAH, 1.] On the other hand Madmannah recalls Madmenah, a town named in connection with Gibeah of Benjamin (Is. x. 31), and therefore lying somewhere north of Jerusalem.

GIB'EAH (גִּבְעָה, derived, according to Gesenius (Thes. pp. 259, 260), from a root, גָּבַע, signifying to be round or humped; comp. the Latin gibbus, English gibbous; the Arabic جبل, jebel, a mountain, and the German gipfel). A word employed in the Bible to denote a "hill" — that is, an eminence of less considerable height and extent than a "mountain," the term for which is הָר, har. For the distinction between the two terms, see Ps. cxlviii. 9; Prov. viii. 25; Is. ii. 2, xl. 4, &c. In the historical books gibeah is commonly applied to the bald rounded hills of central Palestine, especially in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (Stanley, App. § 25). Like most words of this kind it gave its name to several towns and places in Palestine which would doubtless be generally on or near a hill. They are —

1. Gib'eah (Γαβαδ: Gabaa), a city in the mountain-district of Judah, named with Maon and the southern Carmel (Josh. xv. 57; and comp. 1 Chr. ii. 49, &c.). In the Onomasticon a village named Gabatha is mentioned as containing the monument of Habakkuk the prophet, and lying twelve miles from Eleutheropolis. The direction, however, is not stated. Possibly it was identical with Keilah, which is given as eastward from Eleutheropolis (Eusebius says seventeen, Jerome eight miles) on the road to Hebron, and is also mentioned as containing the monument of Habakkuk. But neither of these can be the place intended in Joshua, since that would appear to have been to the S. E. of Hebron, near where Carmel and Maon are still existing. For the same reason this Gibeah cannot be that discovered by Robinson as Jeba'h in the Wady Musûrr, not far west of Bethlehem, and ten miles north of Hebron (Rob. ii. 6, 16). Its site is therefore yet to seek.

2. Gib'eath (גִּבְעָת: Γαβαώθ; Alex. Γαβααθ: Gabaath). This is enumerated among the last group of the towns of Benjamin, next to Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 28). It is generally taken to be the place which afterwards became so notorious as "Gibeah-of-Benjamin" or "of-Saul." But this, as we shall presently see, was five or six miles north of Jerusalem, close to Gibeon and Ramah, with which, in that case, it would have been mentioned in ver. 25. The name being in the "construct state," — Gibeath and not Gibeah, — may it not belong to the following name, Kirjath (i. e. Kirjath-jearim, as some MSS. actually read), and denote the hill adjoining that town (see below, No. 3)? The obvious objection to this proposal is the statement of the number of this group of towns as fourteen, but this is not a serious objection, as in these catalogues discrepancies not unfrequently occur between the numbers of the towns, and that stated as the sum of the enumeration (comp. Josh. xv. 32, 36; xix. 6, &c.). In this very list there is reason to believe that Zelah and ha-Eleph are not separate names, but one. The lists of Joshua, though in the main coeval with the division of the country, must have been often added to and altered before they became finally fixed as we now possess them,[a] and the sanctity conferred on the "hill of Kirjath" by the temporary sojourn of the Ark there in the time of Saul would have secured its insertion among the lists of the towns of the tribe.

3. (הַגִּבְעָה: ἐν τῷ βουνῷ; [Alex. ἐν βουνω:] in Gabaa), the place in which the Ark remained from the time of its return by the Philistines till its removal by David (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; comp. 1 Sam. vii. 1, 2). The name has the definite article, and in 1 Sam. vii. 1 [as here in the margin of the A V.] it is translated "the hill." (See No. 2 above.)

4. Gib'eah-of-Ben'jamin. This town does not appear in the lists of the cities of Benjamin in Josh. xviii. (1.) We first encounter it in the tragical story of the Levite and his concubine, when it brought all but extermination on the tribe (Judg xix., xx.). It was then a "city" (עִיר) with the usual open street (רְחוֹב) or square (Judg. xix. 15 17, 20), and containing 700 "chosen men" (xx. 15), probably the same whose skill as slingers is preserved in the next verse. Thanks to the precision of the narrative, we can gather some general knowledge of the position of Gibeah. The Levite and his party left Bethlehem in the "afternoon" — when the day was coming near the time at which the tents would be pitched for evening. It was probably between two and three o'clock. At the ordinary speed of eastern travellers they would come "over against Jebus" in two hours, say by five o'clock, and the same length of time would take them an equal distance, or about four miles, to the north of the city on the Nablûs road, in the direction of Mount Ephraim (xix. 13, comp. 1). Ramah and Gibeah both lay in sight of the road, Gibeah apparently the nearest; and when the sudden sunset of that climate, unaccompanied by more than a very brief twilight, made further progress impossible, they "turned aside" from the beaten track to the town where one of the party was to meet a dreadful death (Judg. xix. 9–15). Later indications of the story seem to show that a little north of the town the main track divided into two — one, the present Nablûs road, leading up to Bethel, the "house of God," and the other taking to Gibeah-in-the-field (xx. 31), possibly the present Jeba. Below the city, probably, —about the base of the hill which gave its name to the town, — was the "cave[b] of Gibeah," in which the liers in wait concealed themselves until the signal was given[c] (xx. 33).

During this narrative the name is given simply as "Gibeah," with a few exceptions; at its introduction it is called "Gibeah which belongeth to Benjamin" (xix. 14, and so in xx. 4). In xx. 10 we have the expression "Gibeah of Benjamin," but here the Hebrew is not Gibeah, but Geba — גֶּבַע. The same form of the word is found in xx. 33, where the meadows, or cave, "of Gibeah," should be "of Geba."

In many of the above particulars Gibeah agrees very closely with Tuleil el-Fûl ["hill of beans"], a conspicuous eminence just four miles north of

[a] For instance, Beth-marcaboth, "house of charlots," and Hazar-susah, "village of horses" (Josh. xix. 5), would seem to date from the time of Solomon, when the traffic in these articles began with Egypt.

[b] מְעָרָה, A. V. "meadows of Gibeah," taking the word [after the Targum and R. Kimchi] as Mearah, an open field (Stanley, App. § 19); the LXX. [Rom. Vat.] transfers the Hebrew word literally, Μαραγαβέ; [6 MSS. read Μααρὰ Γαβαὰ or τῆς Γ.; but Comp. Ald., with Alex. and about 15 other MSS., ἀπὸ δυσμῶν τῆς Γαβαά;] the Syriac has ܡܥܪܬܐ = cave. The Hebrew word for cave, Me'arah, differs from that adopted in the A V. only in the vowel-points; and there seems a certain consistency in an ambush concealing themselves in a cave, which in an open field would be impossible.

[c] Bertheau (Buch der Richter u. Rut, p. 224) objects to the meaning "cave" that the liers-in-wait are said (ver. 29) to have been set "round about Gibeah." He understands the last part of ver. 33 to mean that the men of Israel came forth from their ambush wegen der Entblössung von Geba', "on account of the complete exposure of Geba" by the withdrawal of the Benjamites (vv. 31, 32). Buxtorf, Tremellius and others give nearly the same interpretation, rendering the last clause of the verse "post denudationem Gibeæ." A

Jerusalem to the right of the road. Two miles beyond it and full in view is er-Ram, in all probability the ancient Ramah, and between the two the main road divides, one branch going off to the right to the village of Jeba, while the other continues its course upwards to Beitin, the modern representative of Bethel. (See No. 5 below.)

(2.) We next meet with Gibeah of Benjamin during the Philistine wars of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. xiii., xiv.). It now bears its full title. The position of matters seems to have been this: The Philistines were in possession of the village of Geba, the present Jeba on the south side of the Wady Suweinit. In their front, across the wady, which is here about a mile wide, and divided by several swells lower than the side eminences, was Saul in the town of Michmash, the modern Mukhmâs, and holding also "Mount Bethel," that is, the heights on the north of the great wady — Deir Diwân, Burka, Tell el-Hajar, as far as Beitin itself. South of the Philistine camp, and about three miles in its rear, was Jonathan, in Gibeah-of-Benjamin, with a thousand chosen warriors (xiii. 2). The first step was taken by Jonathan, who drove out the Philistines from Geba, by a feat of arms which at once procured him an immense reputation. But in the meantime it increased the difficulties of Israel, for the Philistines (hearing of their reverse) gathered in prodigious strength, and advancing with an enormous armament, pushed Saul's little force before them out of Bethel and Michmash, and down the eastern passes, to Gilgal, near Jericho in the Jordan valley (xiii. 4, 7). They then established themselves at Michmash, formerly the headquarters of Saul, and from thence sent out their bands of plunderers, north, west, and east (vv. 17, 18). But nothing could dislodge Jonathan from his main stronghold in the south. As far as we can disentangle the complexities of the story, he soon relinquished Geba, and consolidated his little force in Gibeah, where he was joined by his father, with Samuel the prophet, and Ahiah the priest, who, perhaps remembering the former fate of the Ark, had brought down the sacred Ephod[a] from Shiloh. These three had made their way up from Gilgal, with a force sorely diminished by desertion to the Philistine camp (xiv. 21), and flight (xiii. 7) — a mere remnant (κατάλειμμα) of the people following in the rear of the little band (LXX.). Then occurred the feat of the hero and his armor-bearer. In the stillness and darkness of the night they descended the hill of Gibeah, crossed the intervening country to the steep terraced slope of Jeba, and threading the mazes of the ravine below, climbed the opposite hill, and discovered themselves to the garrison of the Philistines just as the day was breaking.[b]

No one had been aware of their departure, but it was not long unknown. Saul's watchmen at Tuleil el-Fûl were straining their eyes to catch a glimpse in the early morning of the position of the foe; and as the first rays of the rising sun on their right broke over the mountains of Gilead, and glittered on the rocky summit of Michmash, their practiced eyes quickly discovered the unusual stir in the camp: they could see "the multitude melting away, and beating down one another." Through the clear air, too, came, even to that distance, the unmistakable sounds of the conflict. The muster-roll was hastily called to discover the absentees. The oracle of God was consulted, but so rapidly did the tumult increase that Saul's impatience would not permit the rites to be completed, and soon he and Ahiah (xiv. 36) were rushing down from Gibeah at the head of their hungry warriors, joined at every step by some of the wretched Hebrews from their hiding places in the clefts and holes of the Benjamite hills, eager for revenge, and for the recovery of the "sheep, and oxen, and calves" (xiv. 32), equally with the arms, of which they had been lately plundered. So quickly did the news run through the district that — if we may accept the statements of the LXX. — by the time Saul reached the Philistine camp his following amounted to 10,000 men. On every one of the heights of the country (βαμώθ) the people rose against the hated invaders, and before the day was out there was not a city, even of Mount Ephraim, to which the struggle had not spread. [JONATHAN.]

(3.) As "Gibeah of Benjamin" this place is referred to in 2 Sam. xxiii. 29 [LXX. Γαβαέθ: Vulg. Gabaath] (comp. 1 Chr. xi. 31 [βουνός: Gabaath]), and as "Gibeah" it is mentioned by Hosea (v. 8, ix. 9, x. 9 [LXX. οἱ βουνοί, ὁ βουνός]), but it does not again appear in the history. It is, however, almost without doubt identical with —

5. GIB'EAH-OF-SAUL (גִּבְעַת שָׁאוּל: the LXX. do not recognize this name except in 2 Sam. xxi. 6, where they have Γαβαὼν Σαούλ, and Is. x. 30, πόλις Σαούλ [Vulg. Gabaath Saulis], elsewhere simply Γαβαά or [Alex.] Γαβααθά). This is not mentioned as Saul's city till after his anointing (1 Sam. x. 26), when he is said to have gone "home" (Hebr. "to his house," as in xv. 34) to Gibeah, "to which," adds Josephus (Ant. vi. 4, § 6), "he belonged." In the subsequent narrative the town bears its full name (xi. 4), and the king is living there, still following the avocations of a simple farmer, when his relations[c] of Jabesh-Gilead beseech his help in their danger. His Ammonite expedition is followed by the first Philistine war, and by various other conflicts, amongst others an expedition against Amalek in the extreme south of Palestine. But he returns, as before, "to his house" at Gibeah-of-Saul (1 Sam. xv. 34). Again we encounter it, when the seven sons of the king were hung there as a sacrifice to turn away the anger of Jehovah (2 Sam. xxi. 6[d]). The name of Saul has not been found in connection with any place of modern Palestine, but it existed as late as the days of Josephus, and an allusion of his has fortunately given the clew to the identification of the town with the spot which now bears the name of Tuleil el-Fûl. Josephus (B. J. v. 2, § 1), describing Titus's march from Cæsarea to Jerusalem,

[a] 1 Sam. xiv. 3. In ver. 18 the ark is said to have been at Gibeah; but this is in direct contradiction to the statement of vii. 1, compared with 2 Sam. vi. 3, 4, and 1 Chr. xiii. 3; and also to those of the LXX. and Josephus at this place. The Hebrew words for ark and ephod — אָרוֹן and אֵפוֹד — are very similar, and may have been mistaken for one another (Ewald, Gesch. iii 46. note; Stanley, p. 205).

[b] We owe this touch to Josephus: ὑποφαινούσης ἤδη τῆς ἡμέρας (Ant. vi. 6, § 2).

[c] This is a fair inference from the fact that the wives of 400 out of the 600 Benjamites who escaped the massacre at Gibeah came from Jabesh-Gilead (Judg. xxi. 12).

[d] The word in this verse rendered "hill" is not gibeah but har, i. e. "mountain," a singular change and not quite intelligible.

gives his route as though Samaria to Gophna, thence a day's march to a valley "called by the Jews the Valley of Thorns, near a certain village called Gabathsaoule, distant from Jerusalem about thirty stadia," i. e. just the distance of Tuleil el-Fûl. Here he was joined by a part of his army from Emmaus (Nicopolis), who would naturally come up the road by Beth-horon and Gibeon, the same which still falls into the northern road close to Tuleil el-Fûl. In both these respects therefore the agreement is complete, and Gibeah of Benjamin must be taken as identical with Gibeah of Saul. The discovery is due to Dr. Robinson (i. 577–79), though it was partly suggested by a writer in Stud. und Kritiken.

This identification of Gibeah, as also that of Geba with Jeba, is fully supported by Is. x. 28–32, where we have a specification of the route of Sennacherib from the north through the villages of the Benjamite district to Jerusalem. Commencing with Ai, to the east of the present Beitin, the route proceeds by Mukhmâs, across the "passages" of the Wady Suweinit to Jeba on the opposite side; and then by er-Ram and Tuleil el-Fûl, villages actually on the present road, to the heights north of Jerusalem, from which the city is visible. Gallim, Madmenah, and Gebim, none of which have been yet identified, must have been, like Anathoth (Anata), villages on one side or the other of the direct line of march. The only break in the chain is Migron, which is here placed between Ai and Michmash, while in 1 Sam. xiv. 2 it appears to have been five or six miles south, at Gibeah. One explanation that presents itself is, that in that uneven and rocky district the name "Migron," "precipice," would very probably, like "Gibeah," be borne by more than one town.

In 1 Sam. xxii. 6, xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1, "Gibeah" [LXX. βουνός: Vulg. Gabaa] doubtless stands for G. of Saul.

6. Gib'eah-in-the Field (גִּבְעָה בַּשָּׂדֶה: Γαβαὰ ἐν ἀγρῷ; [Alex. Γ. εν τω αγρω:] Gabaa), named only in Judg. xx. 31, as the place to which one of the "highways" (מְסִלּוֹת) led from Gibeah-of-Benjamin, — "of which one goeth up to Bethel, and one to Gibeah-in-the-field." Sâdeh, the word here rendered "field," is applied specially to cultivated ground, "as distinguished from town, desert, or garden" (Stanley, App. § 15). Cultivation was so general throughout this district, that the term affords no clew to the situation of the place. It is, however, remarkable that the north road from Jerusalem, shortly after passing Tuleil el-Fûl, separates into two branches, one running on to Beitin (Bethel), and the other diverging to the right to Jeba (Geba). The attack on Gibeah came from the north (comp. xx. 18, 19, and 26, in which "the house of God" is really Bethel), and therefore the divergence of the roads was north of the town. In the case of Gibeah-of-Benjamin we have seen that the two forms "Geba" and "Gibeah" appear to be convertible, the former for the latter. If the identification now proposed for Gibeah-in-the-field be correct, the case is here reversed, and 'Gibeah" is put for "Geba."

The "meadows of Gaba" (גָּבַע: A. V. Gibeah; Judg. xx. 33) have no connection with the "field," the Hebrew words being entirely different. As stated above, the word rendered "meadows" is probably accurately "cave." [Geba, p. 877 a.]

7. There are several other names compounded of Gibeah, which are given in a translated form in the A. V., probably from their appearing not to belong to towns. These are: —

(1.) The "hill of the foreskins" (Josh. v. 3) between the Jordan and Jericho; it derives its name from the circumcision which took place there, and seems afterwards to have received the name of Gilgal.

(2.) [Γαβαὰρ Φενεές (Vat. Φεε-); Alex. Ald. Γαβαὰθ Φ.: Gabaath Phinees.] The "hill of Phinehas" in Mount Ephraim (Josh. xxiv. 33). This may be the Jibia on the left of the Nablûs road, half-way between Bethel and Shiloh; or the Jeba north of Nablûs (Rob. ii. 265 note, 312). Both would be "in Mount Ephraim," but there is nothing in the text to fix the position of the place, while there is no lack of the name among the villages of Central Palestine.

(3.) The "hill of Moreh" (Judg. vii. 1).

(4.) The "hill of God" — Gibeath-ha-Elohim (1 Sam. x. 5); one of the places in the route of Saul, which is so difficult to trace. In verses 10 and 13, it is apparently called "the hill," and "the high place."

(5.) [Vulg. 1 Sam. xxvi. 3, Gabaa Hachila.] The "hill of Hachilah" (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1, [3]).

(6.) The "hill of Ammah" (2 Sam. ii. 24).

(7.) The "hill Gareb" (Jer. xxxi. 39).

GIB'EATH, Josh. xviii. 28. [Gibeah, 2.]

GIB'EATHITE, THE (הַגִּבְעָתִי: ὁ Γαβαθίτης; [Vat. FA. Γεβωθειτης: Alex. Γαβαδιτης:] Gabathites), i. e. the native of Gibeah (1 Chr. xii. 3); in this case Shemaah, or "the Shemaah," father of two Benjamites, "Saul's brethren," who joined David.

GIB'EON (גִּבְעוֹן), i. e. belonging to a hill: Γαβαών; [Vat. 1 K. ix. 2, Γαβαωθ, Jer. xli. 12, Γαβαω:] Joseph. Γαβαώ: Gabaon), one of the four[a] cities of the Hivites, the inhabitants of which made a league with Joshua (ix. 3–15), and thus escaped the fate of Jericho and Ai (comp. xi. 19). It appears, as might be inferred from its taking the initiative in this matter, to have been the largest of the four — "a great city, like one of the royal cities" — larger than Ai (x. 2). Its men too were all practiced warriors (Gibborim, גִּבֹּרִים). Gibeon lay within the territory of Benjamin (xviii. 25), and with its "suburbs" was allotted to the priests (xxi. 17), of whom it became afterwards a principal station. Occasional notices of its existence occur in the historical books, which are examined more at length below; and after the Captivity we find the "men of Gibeon" returning with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 25: in the list of Ezra the name is altered to Gibbar), and assisting Nehemiah in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 7). In the post-biblical times it was the scene of a victory by the Jews over the Roman troops under Cestius Gallus, which offers in many respects a close parallel to that of Joshua over the Canaanites (Jos. B. J. ii. 19, § 7; Stanley, S. & P. p. 212).

The situation of Gibeon has fortunately been recovered with as great certainty as any ancient site in Palestine. The traveller who pursues the northern camel-road from Jerusalem, turning off to the left at Tuleil el-Fûl (Gibeah) on that branch of it which leads westward to Jaffa, finds himself, after crossing one or two stony and barren ridges, in a district of a more open character. The hills are rounder and more isolated than those through which he has been passing, and rise in well-defined mamelons from broad undulating valleys of tolerable extent and fertile soil. This is the central plateau of the country, the "land of Benjamin;" and these round hills are the Gibeahs, Gebas, Gibeons, and Ramahs, whose names occur so frequently in the records of this district. Retaining its ancient name almost intact, el-Jîb stands on the northernmost of a couple of these mamelons, just at the place where the road to the sea parts into two branches, the one by the lower level of the Wady Suleimân, the other by the heights of the Beth-horons, to Ginizo, Lydda, and Joppa. The road passes at a short distance to the north of the base of the hill of el-Jîb. The strata of the hills in this district lie much more horizontally than those further south. With the hills of Gibeon this is peculiarly the case, and it imparts a remarkable precision to their appearance, especially when viewed from a height such as the neighboring eminence of Neby Samwîl. The natural terraces are carried round the hill like contour lines; they are all dotted thick with olives and vines, and the ancient-looking houses are scattered over the flattish summit of the mound. On the east side of the hill is a copious spring which issues in a cave excavated in the limestone rock, so as to form a large reservoir. In the trees further down are the remains of a pool or tank of considerable size, probably, says Dr. Robinson, 120 feet by 100, i. e. of rather smaller dimensions than the lower pool at Hebron. This is doubtless the "pool of Gibeon" at which Abner and Joab met together with the troops of Ish-bosheth and David, and where that sharp conflict took place which ended in the death of Asahel, and led at a later period to the treacherous murder of Abner himself. Here or at the spring were the "great waters (or the many waters, מַיִם רַבִּים) of Gibeon," [a] at which Johanan the son of Kareah found the traitor Ishmael (Jer. xli. 12). Round this water also, according to the notice of Josephus (ἐπί τινι πηγῇ τῆς πόλεως οὐκ ἄπωθεν, Ant. v. 1, § 17), the five kings of the Amorites were encamped when Joshua burst upon them from Gilgal. The "wilderness of Gibeon" (2 Sam. ii. 24 — the Midbar, i. e. rather the waste pasture-grounds — must have been to the east, beyond the circle or suburb of cultivated fields, and towards the neighboring swells, which bear the names of Jedîreh and Bir Neballah. Such is the situation of Gibeon, fulfilling in position every requirement of the notices of the Bible, Josephus Eusebius, and Jerome. Its distance from Jerusalem by the main road is as nearly as possible 6¼ miles; but there is a more direct road reducing it to 5 miles.

The name of Gibeon is most familiar to us in connection with the artifice by which its inhabitants obtained their safety at the hands of Joshua, and with the memorable battle which ultimately resulted therefrom. This transaction is elsewhere examined, and therefore requires no further reference here. [JOSHUA; BETH-HORON.]

We next hear of it at the encounter between the men of David and of Ish-bosheth under their respective leaders Joab and Abner (2 Sam. ii. 12-17). The meeting has all the air of having been premeditated by both parties, unless we suppose that Joab had heard of the intention of the Benjamites to revisit from the distant Mahanaim their native villages, and had seized the opportunity to try his strength with Abner. The details of this disastrous encounter are elsewhere given. [JOAB.] The place where the struggle began received a name from the circumstance, and seems to have been long afterwards known as the "field of the strong men." [HELKATH-HAZZURIM.]

[a] Both here and in 1 K. iii. 4, Josephus substitutes Hebron for Gibeon (Ant. x. 9, § 5, viii 2, § 1).

We again meet with Gibeon in connection with Joab; this time as the scene of the cruel and revolting death of Amasa by his hand (2 Sam. xx. 5–10). Joab was in pursuit of the rebellious Sheba the son of Bichri, and his being so far out of the direct north road as Gibeon may be accounted for by supposing that he was making a search for this Benjamite among the towns of his tribe. The two rivals met at "the great stone[a] which is in Gibeon" — some old landmark now no longer recognizable, at least not recognized — and then Joab repeated the treachery by which he had murdered Abner, but with circumstances of a still more revolting character. [JOAB; ARMS, p. 159.]

It is remarkable that the retribution for this crowning act of perfidy should have overtaken Joab close to the very spot on which it had been committed. For it was to the tabernacle at Gibeon (1 K. ii. 28, 29; comp. 1 Chr. xvi. 39) that Joab fled for sanctuary when his death was pronounced by Solomon, and it was while clinging to the horns of the brazen altar there that he received his death-blow from Benaiah the son of Jehoiada (1 K. ii. 28, 30, 34; and LXX. 29).

Familiar as these events in connection with the history of Gibeon are to us, its reputation in Israel was due to a very different circumstance — the fact that the tabernacle of the congregation and the brazen altar of burnt-offering were for some time located on the "high place" attached to or near the town. We are not informed whether this "high place" had any fame for sanctity before the tabernacle came there; but if not, it would have probably been erected elsewhere. We only hear of it in connection with the tabernacle, nor is there any indication of its situation in regard to the town. Professor Stanley has suggested that it was the remarkable hill of Neby Samwil, the most prominent and individual eminence in that part of the country, and to which the special appellation of "the great high-place" (1 K. iii. 4; הַבָּמָה הַגְּדוֹלָה) would perfectly apply. And certainly, if "great" is to be understood as referring to height or size, there is no other hill which can so justly claim the distinction (Sinai and Pal. p. 216). But the word has not always that meaning, and may equally imply eminence in other respects, e. g. superior sanctity to the numerous other high places — Bethel, Ramah, Mizpeh, Gibeah — which surrounded it on every side. The main objection to this identification is the distance of Neby Samwil from Gibeon — more than a mile — and the absence of any closer connection therewith than with any other of the neighboring places. The most natural position for the high place of Gibeon is the twin mount immediately south of el-Jib — so close as to be all but a part of the town, and yet quite separate and distinct. The testimony of Epiphanius, by which Mr. Stanley supports his conjecture, namely, that the "Mount of Gabaon" was the highest round Jerusalem (Adv. Hæreses, i. 394), should be received with caution, standing as it does quite alone, and belonging to an age which, though early, was marked by ignorance, and by the most improbable conclusions.

To this high place, wherever situated, the "tabernacle of the congregation" — the sacred tent which had accompanied the children of Israel through the whole of their wanderings — had been transferred from its last station at Nob.[b] The exact date of the transfer is left in uncertainty. It was either before or at the time when David brought up the ark from Kirjath-jearim, to the new tent which he had pitched for it on Mount Zion, that the original tent was spread for the last time at Gibeon. The expression in 2 Chr. i. 5, "the brazen altar he put before the tabernacle of Jehovah," at first sight appears to refer to David. But the text of the passage is disputed, and the authorities are divided between שָׂם = "he put," and יָשַׁם = "was there." Whether king David transferred the tabernacle to Gibeon or not, he certainly appointed the staff of priests to offer the daily sacrifices there on the brazen altar of Moses, and to fulfill the other requirements of the law (1 Chr. xvi. 40), with no less a person at their head than Zadok the priest (39), assisted by the famous musicians Heman and Jeduthun (41).

One of the earliest acts of Solomon's reign — it must have been while the remembrance of the execution of Joab was still fresh — was to visit Gibeon. The ceremonial was truly magnificent: he went up with all the congregation, the great officers of the state — the captains of hundreds and thousands, the judges, the governors, and the chief of the fathers — and the sacrifice consisted of a thousand burnt-offerings[c] (1 K. iii. 4). And this glimpse of Gibeon in all the splendor of its greatest prosperity — the smoke of the thousand animals rising from the venerable altar on the commanding height of "the great high place" — the clang of "trumpets and cymbals and musical instruments of God" (1 Chr. xvi. 42) resounding through the valleys far and near — is virtually the last we have of it. In a few years the temple at Jerusalem was completed, and then the tabernacle was once more taken down and removed. Again "all the men of Israel assembled themselves" to king Solomon, with the "elders of Israel," and the priests and the Levites brought up both the tabernacle and the

[a] The Hebrew preposition (עִם) almost implies that they were on or touching the stone.

[b] The various stations of the Tabernacle and the Ark, from their entry on the Promised Land to their final deposition in the Temple at Jerusalem, will be examined under TABERNACLE. Meantime, with reference to the above, it may be said that though not expressly stated to have been at Nob, it may be conclusively inferred from the mention of the "shew bread" (1 Sam xxi. 6). The "ephod" (9) and the expression "before Jehovah" (6) prove nothing either way. Josephus throws no light on it.

[c] It would be very satisfactory to believe, with Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 547), that the present Wady Suleiman, i. e. "Solomon's valley," which commences on the west side of Gibeon, and leads down to the Plain of Sharon, derived its name from this visit. But the modern names of places in Palestine often spring from very modern persons or circumstances and, without confirmation or investigation, this cannot be received ark, and "all the holy vessels that were in the tabernacle" (1 K. viii. 3; Joseph. Ant. viii. 4, § 1), and placed the venerable relics in their new home, there to remain until the plunder of the city by Nebuchadnezzar. The introduction of the name of Gibeon in 1 Chr. ix. 35, which seems so abrupt, is probably due to the fact that the preceding verses of the chapter contain, as they appear to do, a list of the staff attached to the "Tabernacle of the congregation" which was erected there; or if these persons should prove to be the attendants on the "new tent" which David had pitched for the ark on its arrival in the city of David, the transition to the place where the old tent was still standing is both natural and easy. G.

GIB'EONITES, THE (הַגִּבְעֹנִים: οἱ ἐ αβαωνῖται [Vat. -νει-]: Gabaonitæ), the people of Gibeon, and perhaps also of the three cities associated with Gibeon (Josh. ix. 17) — Hivites; and who, on the discovery of the stratagem by which they had obtained the protection of the Israelites, were condemned to be perpetual bondmen, hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the house of God and altar of Jehovah (Josh. ix. 23, 27). Saul appears to have broken this covenant, and in a fit of enthusiasm or patriotism to have killed some and devised a general massacre of the rest (2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 5). This was expiated many years after by giving up seven men of Saul's descendants to the Gibeonites, who hung them or crucified them "before Jehovah" — as a kind of sacrifice — in Gibeah, Saul's own town (4, 6, 9).[a] At this time, or at any rate at the time of the composition of the narrative, the Gibeonites were so identified with Israel, that the historian is obliged to insert a note explaining their origin and their non-Israelite extraction (xxi. 2). The actual name "Gibeonites" appears only in this passage of 2 Sam. [NETHINIM.]

Individual Gibeonites named are (1) ISMAIAH, one of the Benjamites who joined David in his difficulties (1 Chr. xii. 4); (2) MELATIAH, one of those who assisted Nehemiah in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 7); (3) HANANIAH, the son of Azur, a false prophet from Gibeon, who opposed Jeremiah, and shortly afterwards died (Jer. xxviii. 1, 10, 13, 17). G.

GIB'LITES, THE (הַגִּבְלִי, i. e. singular, the Giblite: Γαλιὰθ Φυλιστιείμ; Alex. Γαβλι [Φ.:] confinia). The "land of the Giblite" is mentioned in connection with Lebanon in the enumeration of the portions of the Promised Land remaining to be conquered by Joshua (Josh. xiii. 5). The ancient versions, as will be seen above, give no help, but there is no reason to doubt that the allusion is to the inhabitants of the city GEBAL, which was on the sea-coast at the foot of the northern slopes of Lebanon. The one name is a regular derivative from the other (see Gesenius, Thes. p. 258 b). We have here a confirmation of the identity of the Aphek mentioned in this passage with Afka, which was overlooked by the writer when examining the latter name [APHEK, 2]; and the whole passage is instructive, as showing how very far the limits of the country designed for the Israelites exceeded those which they actually occupied.

The Giblites are again named (though not in the A. V. [except in the margin]) in 1 K. v. 18 (הַגִּבְלִים: [Rom. Vat. omit;] Alex. οἱ Βιβλιοι Giblii) as assisting Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders to prepare the trees and the stones for building the Temple. That they were clever artificers is evident from this passage (and comp. Ez. xxvii. 9); but why our translators should have so far improved on this as to render the word by "stone-squarers" [so the Bishops' Bible; the Genevan version has "masons"] is not obvious. Possibly they followed the Targum, which has a word of similar import in this place. G.

GIDDAL'TI (גִּדַּלְתִּי: [I have praised]. Γοδολλαθί; [Vat. Γοδολλαθει, Γοδομαθει;] Alex. Γεδολλαθι, Γεδδεαθι: Geddelthi, Gedelthi]), one of the sons of Heman, the king's seer, and therefore a Kohathite Levite (1 Chr. xxv. 4; comp. vi. 33): his office was with thirteen of his brothers to sound the horn in the service of the tabernacle (5, 7). He had also charge of the 22d division or course (29).

GID'DEL (גִּדֵּל [very great, gigantic]: Γεδδήλ, [Γαδήλ; in Ezr., Vat. Κεδεδ; in Neh., Alex. Σαδηλ:] Gaddel, [Geddel]). 1. Children of Giddel (Bene-Giddel) were among the Nethinim who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 47; Neh. vii. 49). In the parallel lists of 1 Esdras the name is corrupted to CATHUA.

2. [Γεδήλ, Γαδαήλ; Vat. Γεδηα, Γαδηλ (so FA. in Neh.); Alex. Γεδδηλ, Γαδδηλ: Geddel, Jeddel.] Bene-Giddel were also among the "servants of Solomon" who returned to Judæa in the same caravan (Ezr. ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58). In 1 Esdras this is given as ISDAEL.

GID'EON (גִּדְעוֹן, from גָּדַע, a sucker, or better = a hewer, i. e. a brave warrior; comp. Is. x. 33; Γεδεών: Gedeon), a Manassite, youngest son of Joash of the Abiezrites, an undistinguished family, who lived at Ophrah, a town probably on this side Jordan (Judg. vi. 15), although its exact position is unknown. He was the fifth recorded Judge of Israel, and for many reasons the greatest of them all. When we first hear of him he was grown up and had sons (Judg. vi. 11, viii. 20), and from the apostrophe of the angel (vi. 12) we may conclude that he had already distinguished himself in war against the roving bands of nomadic robbers who had oppressed Israel for seven years, and whose countless multitudes (compared to locusts from their terrible devastations, vi. 5) annually destroyed all the produce of Canaan, except such as could be concealed in mountain-fastnesses (vi. 2). It was probably during this disastrous period that the emigration of Elimelech took place (Ruth i. 1, 2; Jahn's Hebr. Comm. § xxi.). Some have identified the angel who appeared to Gideon (φάντασμα νεανίσκου μορφῇ, Jos. Ant. v. 6) with the prophet mentioned in vi. 8, which will remind the reader of the legends about Malachi in Origen and other commentators. Paulus (Exeg. Conserv. ii. 190 ff.) endeavors to give the narrative a subjective coloring, but rationalism is of little value in accounts like this. When the angel appeared, Gideon was thrashing wheat with a flail (ἔκοπτε, LXX.) in the winepress, to conceal it from the predatory tyrants. After a natural hesitation he accepted the commission of a deliverer, and learned the true character of his visitant from a miraculous sign (vi. 12–23); and being reassured from the fear which first seized him (Ex. xx. 19; Judg. xiii. 22), built the altar Jehovah-shalom, which existed when the book of Judges was written (vi. 24). In a dream the same night he was ordered to throw down the altar of Baal and cut down the Asherah (A. V. "grove") upon it [ASHERAH], with the wood of which he was to offer in sacrifice his father's "second bullock of seven years old," an expression in which some see an allusion to the seven years of servitude (vi. 26, 1). Perhaps that particular bullock is specified because it had been reserved by his father to sacrifice to Baal (Rosenmüller, Schol. ad loc.), for Joash seems to have been a priest of that worship. Bertheau can hardly be right in supposing that Gideon was to offer two bullocks (Richt. p. 115). At any rate the minute touch is valuable as an indication of truth in the story (see Ewald, Gesch. ii. 498, and note). Gideon, assisted by ten faithful servants, obeyed the vision, and next morning ran the risk of being stoned: but Joash appeased the popular indignation by using the common argument that Baal was capable of defending his own majesty (comp. 1 K. xviii. 27). This circumstance gave to Gideon the surname of יְרֻבַּעַל ("Let Baal plead," vi. 32; LXX. Ἱεροβάαλ), a standing instance of national irony, expressive of Baal's impotence. Winer thinks that this irony was increased by the fact that ירבעל was a surname of the Phœnician Hercules (comp. Movers, Phönic. i. 434). We have similar cases of contempt in the names Sychar, Baal-zebul, etc. (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. xii. 24). In consequence of this name some have identified Gideon with a certain priest Ἱερόμβαλος, mentioned in Eusebius (Præp. Evang. i. 10) as having given much accurate information to Sanchoniatho the Berytian (Bochart, Phaleg, p. 776; Huetius, Dem. Evang. p. 84, &c.), but this opinion cannot be maintained (Ewald, Gesch. ii. 494; Gesen. s. v.). We also find the name in the form Jerubbesheth (2 Sam. xi. 21; comp. Esh-baal, 1 Chr. viii. 33 with Ish-bosheth 2 Sam. ii. ff.). Ewald (p. 495, n.) brings forward several arguments against the supposed origin of the name.

2. After this begins the second act of Gideon's life. "Clothed" by the Spirit of God (Judg. vi. 34; comp. 1 Chr. xii. 18; Luke xxiv. 49), he blew a trumpet; and, joined by "Zebulun, Naphtali, and even the reluctant Asher" (which tribes were chiefly endangered by the Midianites), and possibly also by some of the original inhabitants, who would suffer from these predatory "sons of the East" no less than the Israelites themselves, he encamped on the slopes of Gilboa, from which he overlooked the plains of Esdraelon covered by the tents of Midian (Stanley, S. & P. p. 343). Strengthened by a double sign from God (to which Ewald gives a strange figurative meaning, Gesch. ii. 500), he reduced his army of 32,000 by the usual proclamation (Deut. xx. 8; comp. 1 Macc. iii. 56). The expression "let him depart from Mount Gilead" is perplexing; Dathe would render it "to Mount Gilead" – on the other side of Jordan; and Clericus reads גִּלְבֹּעַ, Gilboa; but Ewald is probably right in regarding the name as a sort of war-cry and general designation of the Manassites. (See, too, Gesen. Thes. p. 804, n.) By a second test at "the spring of trembling" (now probably 'Ain Jâlûd, on which see Stanley, S. & P. p. 342), he again reduced the number of his followers to 300 (Judg. vii. 5 f.), whom Josephus explains to have been the most cowardly in the army (Ant. v. 6, § 3). Finally, being encouraged by words fortuitously overheard (what the later Jews termed the Bath Kol; comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 9, 10, Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. iii. 14) in the relation of a significant dream, he framed his plans, which were admirably adapted to strike a panic terror into the huge and undisciplined nomad host (Judg. viii. 15–18). We know from history that large and irregular oriental armies are especially liable to sudden outbursts of uncontrollable terror, and when the stillness and darkness of the night were suddenly disturbed in three different directions by the flash of torches and by the reverberating echoes which the trumpets and the shouting woke among the hills, we cannot be astonished at the complete rout into which the enemy were thrown. It must be remembered, too, that the sound of 300 trumpets would make them suppose that a corresponding number of companies were attacking them.[a] For specimens of similar stratagems see Liv. xxii. 16; Polyæn. Strateg. ii. 37; Frontin. ii. 4; Sall. Jug. 99; Niebuhr, Descr. de l'Arabie, p. 304; Journ. As 1841, ii. 516 (quoted by Ewald, Rosenmüller, and Winer). The custom of dividing an army into three seems to have been common (1 Sam. xi. 11; Gen. xiv. 15), and Gideon's war-cry is not unlike that adopted by Cyrus (Xenoph. Cyr. iii. 28). He adds his own name to the war-cry,[b] as suited both to inspire confidence in his followers and strike terror in the enemy. His stratagem was eminently successful, and the Midianites, breaking into their wild peculiar cries, fled headlong "down the descent to the Jordan," to the "house of the Acacia" (Beth-shittah) and the "meadow of the dance" (Abel-meholah), but were intercepted by the Ephraimites (to whom notice had been sent, vii. 24) at the fords of Bethbarah, where, after a second fight, the princes Oreb and Zeeb ("the Raven" and "the Wolf") were detected and slain — the former at a rock, and the latter concealed in a wine-press, to which their names were afterwards given. Meanwhile the "higher sheykhs Zebah and Zalmunna had already escaped," and Gideon (after pacifying — by a soft answer, which became proverbial — the haughty tribe of Ephraim, viii. 1–3) pursued them into eastern Manasseh, and, bursting upon them in their fancied security among the tents of their Bedouin countrymen (see KARKOR), won his third victory, and avenged on the Midianitish emirs the massacre of

[a] It is curious to find "lamps and pitchers" in use for a similar purpose at this very day in the streets of Cairo. The Zabit or Agha of the police carries with him at night "a torch which burns, soon after it is lighted, without a flame, excepting when it is waved through the air, when it suddenly blazes forth: it therefore answers the same purpose as our dark lantern. The burning end is sometimes concealed in a small pot or jar, or covered with something else, when not required to give light" (Lane's Mod. Egypt. i. ch iv.).

[b] * The war-cry was properly, "For Jehovah and for Gideon." The A. V. inserts "the sword," but that has no warrant, and restricts too much the idea. H his kingly brethren whom they had slain at Tabor (viii. 18 f.). In these three battles only 15 000 out of 120,000 Midianites escaped alive. It is indeed stated in Judg. viii. 10, that 120,000 Midianites had already fallen; but here as elsewhere, it may merely be intended that such was the original number of the routed host. During his triumphal return Gideon took signal and appropriate vengeance on the coward and apostate towns of Succoth and Peniel. The memory of this splendid deliverance took deep root in the national traditions (1 Sam. xii. 11; Ps. lxxxiii. 11; Is. ix. 4, x. 26; Heb. xi. 32).

3. After this there was a peace of 40 years, and we see Gideon in peaceful possession of his well-earned honors, and surrounded by the dignity of a numerous household (viii. 29–31). It is not improbable that, like Saul, he had owed a part of his popularity to his princely appearance (Judg. viii. 18). In this third stage of his life occur alike his most noble and his most questionable acts, namely, the refusal of the monarchy on theocratic grounds, and the irregular consecration of a jeweled ephod, formed out of the rich spoils of Midian, which proved to the Israelites a temptation to idolatry, although it was doubtless intended for use in the worship of Jehovah. Gesenius and others (Thes. p. 135; Bertheau, p. 133 f.) follow the Peshito in making the word Ephod here mean an idol, chiefly on account of the vast amount of gold (1,700 shekels) and other rich material appropriated to it. But it is simpler to understand it as a significant symbol of an unauthorized worship.

Respecting the chronology of this period little certainty can be obtained. Making full allowance for the use of round numbers, and even admitting the improbable assertion of some of the Rabbis that the period of oppression is counted in the years of rest (vide Rosenmüller, On Judg. iii. 11), insuperable difficulties remain. If, however, as has been suggested by Lord A. Hervey, several of the judgeships really synchronize instead of being successive, much of the confusion vanishes. For instance, he supposes (from a comparison of Judg. iii., viii., and xii.) that there was a combined movement under three great chiefs, Ehud, Gideon and Jephthah, by which the Israelites emancipated themselves from the dominion of the Moabites, Ammonites, and Midianites (who for some years had occupied their land), and enjoyed a long term of peace through all their coasts. "If," he says, "we string together the different accounts of the different parts of Israel which are given us in that miscellaneous collection of ancient records called the book of Judges, and treat them as connected and successive history, we shall fall into as great a chronographical error as if we treated in the same manner the histories of Mercia, Kent, Essex, Wessex, and Northumberland, before England became one kingdom" (Genealog. of our Lord, p. 238). It is now well known that a similar source of error has long existed in the chronology of Egypt. F. W. F.

GIDEONI (גִּדְעֹנִי or once גִּדְעֹנִ֑י [a prostrator, warrior]: Γαδεωνί; [Vat. Γεδεωνει, Γαδεωνει, etc.:] Gedeonis [gen.]). Abidan, son of Gideoni, was the chief man of the tribe of Benjamin at the time of the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 11; ii. 22; vii. 60, 65; x. 24).

GIDOM (גִּדְעֹם [a cutting down, desolating]: Γεδώμ; Alex. Γαλααδ: [Comp. Ald. Γαδαάμ]), a place named only in Judg. xx. 45, as the limit to which the pursuit of Benjamin extended after the final battle of Gibeah. It would appear to have been situated between Gibeah (Tuleil el-Fûl) and the cliff Rimmon (probably Rămmon, about three miles E. of Bethel); but no trace of the name, nor yet of that of Menucah, if indeed that was a place (Judg. xx. 43; A. V. "with ease" — but see margin), has yet been met with. [Menucah, Amer. ed.] The reading of the Alex. LXX., "Gilead," can hardly be taken as well founded. In the Vulgate the word does not seem to be represented. G.

GIER-EAGLE (רָחָם, râchâm; רָחָמָה, râchâmâh: κύκνος, πορφυρίων: porphyrio), an unclean bird mentioned in Lev. xi. 18 and Deut. xiv. 17. There is no reason to doubt that the râchâm of the Hebrew Scriptures is identical in reality as in name with the racham (רָחָם) of the Arabs, namely, the Egyptian vulture (Neophron percnopterus); see Gesner, De Arib. p. 176; Bochart, Hieroz. iii. 56; Hasselquist, Trav. p. 195, and Russell's Natural Hist. of Aleppo, ii. 195, 2d ed. The LXX. in Lev. l. c. renders the Hebrew term by "swan" (κύκνος), while in Deut. l. c. the "purple water-hen" (Porphyrio hyacinthinus) is given as its representative. There is too much discrepancy in the LXX. translations of the various birds mentioned in the Levitical law to allow us to attach much weight to its authority. The Hebrew term etymologically signifies "a bird which is very affectionate to its young," which is perfectly true of the Egyptian vulture, but not more so than of other birds. The Arabian writers relate many fables of the Racham, some of which the reader may see in the Hierozoicon of Bochart (iii. p. 56). The Egyptian vulture, according to Bruce, is called by the Europeans in Egypt "Pharaoh's Hen." It is generally distributed throughout Egypt, and Mr Tristram says it is common in Palestine, and breeds in great numbers in the valley of the Cedron (Ibis, i. 23). Though a bird of decidedly unprepossessing appearance and of disgusting habits, the Egyptians, like all other Orientals, wisely protect so efficient a scavenger, which rids them of putrefying carcases that would otherwise breed a pestilence in their towns. Near Cairo, says Shaw (Trav. p. 388, folio), there are several flocks of the Ach Bobba, "white father." — a name given it by the Turks partly out of the reverence they have for it, partly from the color of its plumage, — "which, like the ravens about our metropolis, feed upon the carrion and nastiness that is thrown without the city." Young birds are of a brown color with a few white feathers; adult specimens are white, except the primary and a portion of the secondary wing-feathers, which are black. Naturalists have referred this vulture to the περκνόπτερος or ὀρειπέλαργος of Aristotle (Hist. Anim. ix. 22, § 2, ed. Schneid.).

* There are two birds known as רָחָם among the Arabs in Egypt. The first is the vulture known as Neophron percnopterus. It is found extensively in all parts of Egypt, and is common in Palestine and Syria. The adult has the front of the head and the upper part of the throat and cere naked, and of a bright lemon yellow. The plumage is a dirty white, with the exception of the quill-feathers, which are a grayish black. The appearance of this bird soaring (in circles) over and around the towns in Egypt, with its bright yellow beak and neck and crop, and white body, and dark wing-feathers, is exceedingly beautiful.

The second is the Pelecanus onocrotalus, found in large numbers in Egypt, and about Lake Hûleh in Palestine. This is probably the bird intended by רָחָם in Lev. xi. 18 and Deut. xiv. 17, while the bird there translated "pelican" should be "cormorant." This seems altogether more natural when we consider the context, and that it is grouped with the large water-fowl. The word שָׁלָךְ, translated "cormorant" in Lev. xi. 17 and Deut. xiv. 17 more properly suits the Diver (Colymbus), of which there is a large species in Egypt.

GIFT. The giving and receiving of presents has in all ages been not only a more frequent, but also a more formal and significant proceeding in the East than among ourselves. It enters largely into the ordinary transactions of life: no negotiation, alliance, or contract of any kind can be entered into between states or sovereigns without a previous interchange of presents: none of the important events of private life, betrothal, marriage, coming of age, birth, take place without presents: even a visit, if of a formal nature, must be prefaced by a present. We cannot adduce a more remarkable proof of the important part which presents play in the social life of the East, than the fact that the Hebrew language possesses no less than fifteen different expressions for the one idea. Many of these expressions have specific meanings: for instance, minchah (מִנְחָה) applies to a present from an inferior to a superior, as from subjects to a king (Judg. iii. 15; 1 K. x. 25; 2 Chr. xvii. 5); maseth (מַשֵּׂאת) expresses the converse idea of a present from a superior to an inferior, as from a king to his subjects (Esth. ii. 18); hence it is used of a portion of food sent by the master of the house to his inferior guests (Gen. xliii. 34; 2 Sam. xi. 8); nisseth (נְשֹׂאת) has very much the same sense (2 Sam. xix. 42); berâcah (בְּרָכָה), literally a "blessing," is used where the present is one of a complimentary nature, either accompanied with good wishes, or given as a token of affection (Gen. xxxiii. 11; Judg. xv. 19; 1 Sam xxv. 27, xxx. 26; 2 K. v. 15); and again, shochad (שֹׁחַד) is a gift for the purpose of escaping punishment, presented either to a judge (Ex. xxiii. 8; Deut. x. 17), or to a conqueror (2 K. xvi. 8). Other terms, as mattân (מַתָּן) were used more generally. The extent to which the custom prevailed admits of some explanation from the peculiar usages of the East; it is clear that the term "gift" is frequently used where we should substitute "tribute," or "fee." The tribute of subject states was paid not in a fixed sum of money, but in kind, each nation presenting its particular product — a custom which is frequently illustrated in the sculptures of Assyria and Egypt; hence the numerous instances in which the present was no voluntary act, but an exaction (Judg. iii. 15–18; 2 Sam. viii. 2, 6; 1 K. iv. 21; 2 K. xvii. 3; 2 Chr. xvii. 11, xxvi. 8); and hence the expression "to bring presents" = to own submission (Ps. lxviii. 29, lxxvi. 11; Is. xviii. 7). Again, the present taken to a prophet was viewed very much in the light of a consulting "fee," and conveyed no idea of bribery (1 Sam. ix. 7, comp. xii. 3; 2 K. v. 5, viii. 9): it was only when false prophets and corrupt judges arose that the present was prostituted, and became, instead of a minchah (as in the instances quoted), a shochad, or bribe (Is. i 23, v. 23; Ez. xxii. 12; Mic. iii. 11). But even allowing for these cases, which are hardly "gifts" in our sense of the term, there is still a large excess remaining in the practice of the East: friends brought presents to friends on any joyful occasion (Esth. ix. 19, 22), those who asked for information or advice to those who gave it (2 K. viii. 8), the needy to the wealthy from whom any assistance was expected (Gen. xliii. 11; 2 K. xv. 19, xvi. 8), rulers to their favorites (Gen. xlv. 22; 2 Sam. xi. 8), especially to their officers (Esth. ii. 18; Joseph. Ant. xii. 2, § 15), or to the people generally on festive occasions (2 Sam. vi. 19); on the occasion of a marriage, the bridegroom not only paid the parents for his bride (A. V. "dowry"), but also gave the bride certain presents (Gen. xxxiv. 12; comp. Gen. xxiv. 22), while the father of the bride gave her a present on sending her away, as is expressed in the term shilluchim (שִׁלֻּחִים) (1 K. ix. 16); and again, the portions of the sons of concubines were paid in the form of presents (Gen. xxv. 6).

The nature of the presents was as various as were the occasions: food (1 Sam. ix. 7, xvi. 20, xxv. 11), sheep and cattle (Gen. xxxii. 13–15; Judg. xv. 8), gold (2 Sam. xviii. 11; Job xlii. 11; Matt. ii. 11), jewels (Gen. xxiv. 53), furniture, and vessels for eating and drinking (2 Sam. xvii. 28), delicacies, such as spices, honey, etc. (Gen. xxiv. 53; 1 K. x. 25, xiv. 3), and robes (1 K. x. 25; 2 K. v. 22), particularly in the case of persons inducted into high office (Esth. vi. 8; Dan. v. 16; comp. Herod. iii. 20). The mode of presentation was with as much parade as possible; the presents were conveyed by the hands of servants (Judg. iii. 18), or still better on the backs of beasts of burden (2 K. viii. 9), even when such a mode of conveyance was unnecessary. The refusal of a present was regarded as a high indignity, and this constituted the aggravated insult noticed in Matt. xxii. 11, the marriage robe having been offered and refused (Trench, Parables). No less an insult was it, not to bring a present when the position of the parties demanded it (1 Sam. x. 27).

GIHON (גִּיחוֹן) [stream]: Γεών; Alex. Γηών: Gehon). 1. The second river of Paradise (Gen. ii. 13). The name does not again occur in the Hebrew text of the O. T.; but in the LXX. it [Γηών] is used in Jer. ii. 18, as an equivalent for the word Shichor or Sihor, i. e. the Nile, and in Ecclus. xxiv. 27 (A. V. "Geon"). All that can be said upon it will be found under EDEN, p. 658 f.

2. גִּיחוֹן, and in Chron. גִּחוֹן: [in 1 K.,] ἡ Γιών, [Vat. Γειων, Alex. ο Γιων; in 2 Chr. xxxii. 30,] Γειών, [Vat. Σειων, Alex. Γιων; in 2 Chr. xxxiii. 14, κατὰ νότον, Comp. τοῦ Γειών:] Gihon.) A place near Jerusalem, memorable as the scene of the anointing and proclamation of Solomon as king (1 K. i. 33, 38, 45). From the terms of this passage, it is evident it was at a lower level than the city — "bring him down (הֹרַדְתֶּם) upon (עַל) Gihon" — "they are come up (עֹלִה) from thence." With this agrees a later mention (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14), where it is called "Gihon-in-the-valley," the word rendered valley being nachal (נַחַל). In this latter place Gihon is named to designate the direction of the wall built by Manasseh — "outside the city of David, from the west of Gihon-in-the-valley to the entrance of the Fish-gate." It is not stated in any of the above passages that Gihon was a spring; but the only remaining place in which it is mentioned suggests this belief, or at least that it had given its name to some water — "Hezekiah also stopped the upper source or issue (מוֹצָא, from יָצָא, to rush forth; incorrectly "watercourse" in A. V.) of the waters of Gihon" (2 Chr. xxxii. 30). If the place to which Solomon was brought down on the king's mule was Gihon-in-the-valley — and from the terms above noticed it seems probable that it was — then the "upper source" would be some distance away, and at a higher level.

The locality of Gihon will be investigated under JERUSALEM; but in the mean time the following facts may be noticed in regard to the occurrences of the word. (1.) Its low level; as above stated. (2.) The expression "Gihon-in-the-valley;" where it will be observed that nachal ("torrent" or "wady") is the word always employed for the valley of the Kedron, east of Jerusalem — the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat; ge ("ravine" or "glen") being as constantly employed for the Valley of Hinnom, south and west of the town. In this connection the mention of Ophel (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14) with Gihon should not be disregarded. In agreement with this is the fact that (3) the Targum of Jonathan, and the Syriac and Arabic Versions, have Shiloha, i. e. Siloam (Arab. Ain-Shiloha) for Gihon in 1 K. i. In Chronicles they agree with the Hebrew text in having Gihon. If Siloam be Gihon, then (4) "from the west of Gihon to the Fish-gate" — which we know from St. Jerome to have been near the present "Jaffa-gate," would answer to the course of a wall inclosing "the city of David" (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14); and (5) the omission of Gihon from the very detailed catalogue of Neh. iv. is explained. GIL'ALAI [3 syl.] (גִּלָּלַי) [perh. weighty powerful, Fürst]: [Rom.] Γελώλ; [Vat. Alex FA.[1] omit: Galalai]), one of the party of priests' sons who played on David's instruments at the consecration of the wall of Jerusalem, in the company at whose head was Ezra (Neh. xii. 36).

GILBO'A (גִּלְבֹּעַ, bubbling fountain, from גַּל and בּוּעַ: Γελβουέ: [Alex. 2 Sam. i. 6, Γελβουε:] Gelboe), a mountain range on the eastern side of the plain of Esdraelon, rising over the city of Jezreel (comp. 1 Sam. xxviii. 4 with xxix. 1). It is only mentioned in Scripture in connection with one event in Israelitish history, the defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 1; 2 Sam. i. 6, xxi. 12; 1 Chr. x. 1, 8). The latter had encamped at Shunem, on the northern side of the valley of Jezreel; the former took up a position round the fountain of Jezreel, on the southern side of the valley, at the base of Gilboa. The result is well known. Saul and Jonathan, with the flower of their army, fell upon the mountain. When the tidings were carried to David, he broke out into this pathetic strain: "Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no rain upon you, neither dew, nor field of offering" (2 Sam. i. 21). Of the identity of Gilboa with the ridge which stretches eastward, from the ruins of Jezreel, no doubt can be entertained. At the northern base, half a mile from the ruins, is a large fountain, called in Scripture both the "Well of Harod" (Judg. vii. 1), and "The fountain of Jezreel" (1 Sam. xxix. 1), and it was probably from it the name Gilboa was derived. Eusebius places Gilboa at the distance of six miles from Scythopolis, and says there is still a village upon the mountain called Gelbus (Onom. s. v. Γελβουέ). The village is now called Jelbún (Robinson, ii. 316), and its position answers to the description of Eusebius: it is situated on the top of the mountain. The range of Gilboa extends in length some ten miles from W. to E. The sides are bleak, white, and barren; they look, in fact, as if the pathetic exclamation of David had proved prophetic. The greatest height is not more than 500 or 600 feet above the plain. Their modern local name is Jebel Fukûah, and the highest point is crowned by a village and wely called Wezar (Porter, Handbook, p. 353). J. L. P.

* The mention of Gilboa, in David's touching elegy on Saul and Jonathan, has given an imperishable name to that mountain. The account of the battle which was so disastrous to the Hebrew king, designates not merely the general scene of the action, but various places connected with the movements of the armies, and introduced in such a way as to be in some measure strategetically related to each other. It is worthy of notice, as a corroboration of the Scripture narrative, that all these places, except possibly one of them, are still found to exist under their ancient names, and to occupy precisely the situation with reference to each other which the requirements of the history imply. We have the name of the ridge Gilboa, on which the battle was fought, transmitted to us in that of Jelbûn, applied to a village on the southern slope of this ridge, known to travellers as Little Hermon,[a] but among a * This name arose from a misapprehension of Ps. lxxxix. 13 (12), as if Hermon and Tabor, being there spoken of together, must have been near each other. This Jebel ed-Dâhy is not mentioned in the Bible, unless it be the Hill of Moreh (Judg. vii 1). Jerome, in the 4th century, is the first who speaks of it as Hermon. (See Rob. Phys. Geogr. p. 27.) H

the natives as Jebel ed-Dâhy. The ridge rises out of the plain of Esdraelon, and, running eastward, sinks down into the valley of the Jordan. The Israelites at first pitched their tents at Jezreel, the present Zer'în on the western declivity of Gilboa, and near a fountain (1 Sam. xxix. 1), undoubtedly the present 'Ain Jâlûd, exactly in the right position, and forming naturally one inducement for selecting that spot. The "high places" on which Saul and Jonathan were slain would be the still higher summits of the ridge up which their forces were driven as the tide of battle turned against them in the progress of the fight. The Philistines encamped at first at Shunem (1 Sam. xxviii. 4), now called Solâm, on the more northern, but parallel, ridge opposite to Jezreel, where they could overlook and watch the enemy, and at the same time were protected against any surprise by the still higher ground behind them. On the other hand, the camp of the Philistines was visible, distant only eight or ten miles, from the camp of Israel. Hence when "Saul saw the host of the Philistines, he was afraid, and his heart greatly trembled." The Philistines, in their proper home, dwelt in the country south of Judah, and having in all probability marched north along the coast as far as Carmel, had then turned across the plain of Esdraelon, and had thus reached this well-chosen camping-ground at Shunem.[a] The Philistines are next mentioned as rallying their forces at Aphek (1 Sam. xxix. 1). No place of this name has yet been discovered in that neighborhood. Some suppose that it was only another name for Shunem; but it is more likely to be the name of a different place, situated nearer Jezreel, perhaps the one from which the Philistines made their direct attack on the Israelites. Further, we read that the conquerors, after the battle, carried the bodies of Saul and his sons to Beth-shean, and hung them up on the walls of that city. Beth-shean was a stronghold of the Philistines which the Israelites had never wrested from them. That place, evidently, reappears in the present Beisân, which is on the eastern slope of the Gilboa range, visible in fact from Jezreel, and still remarkable for its strength of position as well as the remains of ancient fortifications.

The strange episode of Saul's nocturnal visit to the witch of Endor illustrates this same feature of the narrative. It is evident that Saul was absent on that errand but a few hours, and the place must have been near his encampment. This Endor, as no one can doubt, must be the present Endor, with its dreary caverns (Thomson's Land and Book, ii. 161), a fitting abode of such a necromancer, on the north side of Dâhy, at the west end of which was Shunem. Hence Saul, leaving his camp at Jezreel, could steal his way under cover of the night across the intervening valley, and over the moderate summit which he would have to ascend, and then, after consulting the woman with "a familiar spirit" at Endor, could return to his forces without his departure being known to any except those in the secret. All these places, so interwoven in the network of the story, and clearly identified after the apse of so many centuries, lie almost within sight of each other. A person may start from any one of them and make the circuit of them all in a few hours. The date assigned to this battle is B. C. 1055, later but a little than the traditionary age of the siege of Troy. It is seldom that a record of remote events can be subjected to so severe a scrutiny as this.

For other sketches which reproduce more or less fully the occurrences of this battle, the reader may see Van de Velde (Travels in Syr. & Pal. ii. 368 ff.); Stanley (S. & P. p. 339 f., Amer. ed.); Robinson (Bib. Res. iii. 173 ff., 1st ed.); and Porter (Handbook, ii. 355 ff.). Some of the writers differ as to whether the final encounter took place at Jezreel or higher up the mountain. Stanley has drawn out the personal incidents in a striking manner (Jewish Church, ii. 30 ff.). For geographical information respecting this group of places, see especially Rob. Phys. Geogr. pp. 26–28, and Ritter's Geogr. of Palestine, Gage's transl., ii. 321–336.

GIL'EAD (גִּלְעָד [see below]: Γαλαάδ: Galaad), a mountainous region east of the Jordan; bounded on the north by Bashan, on the east by the Arabian plateau, and on the south by Moab and Ammon (Gen. xxxi. 21; Deut. iii. 12–17). It is sometimes called "Mount Gilead" (Gen. xxxi 25, הַר הַגִּלְעָד), sometimes "the land of Gilead" (Num. xxxii. 1, אֶרֶץ גִּלְעָד); and sometimes simply "Gilead" (Ps. lx. 7; Gen. xxxvii 25); but a comparison of the several passages shows that they all mean the same thing. There is no evidence, in fact, that any particular mountain was meant by Mount Gilead more than by Mount Lebanon (Judg. iii. 3) — they both comprehend the whole range, and the range of Gilead embraced the whole province. The name Gilead, as is usual in Palestine, describes the physical aspect of the country. It signifies "a hard, rocky region;" and it may be regarded as standing in contrast to Bashan, the other great trans-Jordanic province, which is, as the name implies, a "level, fertile tract."

The statements in Gen. xxxi. 48 are not opposed to this etymology. The old name of the district was גַּלְעֵד (Gilead), but by a slight change in the pronunciation, the radical letters being retained, the meaning was made beautifully applicable to the "heap of stones" Jacob and Laban had built up—

"and Laban said, this heap (גַּל) is a witness (עֵד) between me and thee this day. Therefore was the name of it called Gal-eed" (גַּלְעֵד), the heap of witness). Those acquainted with the modern Arabs and their literature will see how intensely such a play upon the word would be appreciated by them. It does not appear that the interview between Jacob and his father-in-law took place on any particular mountain peak. Jacob, having passed the Euphrates, "set his face toward Mount Gilead;" he struck across the desert by the great fountain at Palmyra; then traversed the eastern part of the plain of Damascus, and the plateau of Bashan, and entered Gilead from the northeast. "In the Mount Gilead Laban overtook him" — apparently soon after he entered the district; for when they separated again, Jacob went on his way and arrived at Mahanaim, which must have been considerably north of the river Jabbok (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2, 22).

The extent of Gilead we can ascertain with tolerable exactness from incidental notices in the Holy Scriptures. The Jordan was its western border (1

[a] Possibly the Philistines, instead of taking the maritime route, may have crossed the Jordan and marched north on that side of the river. H.

Sam. xiii. 7; 2 K. x. 33). A comparison of a number of passages shows that the river Hieromax, the modern Sheriat el-Mandhûr, separated it from Bashan on the north. "Half Gilead" is said to have been possessed by Sihon king of the Amorites, and the other half by Og king of Bashan; and the river Jabbok was the division between the two kingdoms (Deut. iii. 12; Josh. xii. 1–5). The half of Gilead possessed by Og must, therefore, have been north of the Jabbok. It is also stated that the territory of the tribe of Gad extended along the Jordan valley to the Sea of Galilee (Josh. xiii. 27); and yet "all Bashan" was given to Manasseh (ver. 30). We, therefore, conclude that the deep glen of the Hieromax, which runs eastward, on the parallel of the south end of the Sea of Galilee, was the dividing line between Bashan and Gilead. North of that glen stretches out a flat, fertile plateau, such as the name Bashan (בָּשָׁן, like the Arabic بَثَنَة, signifies "soft and level soil") would suggest; while on the south we have the rough and rugged, yet picturesque hill country, for which Gilead is the fit name. (See Porter in Journal of Sac. Lit. vi. 284 ff.) On the east the mountain range melts away gradually into the high plateau of Arabia. The boundary of Gilead is here not so clearly defined, but it may be regarded as running along the foot of the range. The southern boundary is less certain. The tribe of Reuben occupied the country as far south as the river Arnon, which was the border of Moab (Deut. ii. 36, iii. 12). It seems, however, that the southern section of their territory was not included in Gilead. In Josh. xiii. 9–11 it is intimated that the "plain of Medeba" ("the Mishor" it is called), north of the Arnon, is not in Gilead; and when speaking of the cities of refuge, Moses describes Bezer, which was given out of the tribe of Reuben, as being "in the wilderness, in the plain country (i. e. in the country of the Mishor," אֶרֶץ הַמִּישֹׁר), while Ramoth is said to be in Gilead (Deut. iv. 43). This southern plateau was also called "the land of Jazer" (Num. xxxii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5; compare also Josh. xiii. 16–25). The valley of Heshbon may therefore, in all probability, be the southern boundary of Gilead. Gilead thus extended from the parallel of the south end of the Sea of Galilee to that of the north end of the Dead Sea — about 60 miles; and its average breadth scarcely exceeded 20.

While such were the proper limits of Gilead, the name is used in a wider sense in two or three parts of Scripture. Moses, for example, is said to have seen, from the top of Pisgah, "all the land of Gilead unto Dan" (Deut. xxxiv. 1); and in Judg. xx. 1, and Josh. xxii. 9, the name seems to comprehend the whole territory of the Israelites beyond the Jordan. A little attention shows that this is only a vague way of speaking, in common use everywhere. We, for instance, often say "England" when we mean "England and Wales." The section of Gilead lying between the Jabbok and the Hieromax is now called Jebel Ajlûn; while that to the south of the Jabbok constitutes the modern province of Belka. One of the most conspicuous peaks in the mountain range still retains the ancient name, being called Jebel Jil'âd, "Mount Gilead."[a] It is about 7 miles south of the Jabbok, and commands a magnificent view over the whole Jordan valley, and the mountains of Judah and Ephraim. It is probably the site of Ramath-Mizpeh of Josh. xiii. 26; and the "Mizpeh of Gilead," from which Jephthah "passed over unto the children of Ammon" (Judg. xi. 29). The spot is admirably adapted for a gathering place in time of invasion, or aggressive war. The neighboring village of es-Salt occupies the site of the old "city of refuge" in Gad, Ramoth-Gilead. [RAMOTH-GILEAD.]

We have already alluded to a special descriptive term, which may almost be regarded as a proper name, used to denote the great plateau which borders Gilead on the south and east. The refuge-city Bezer is said to be "in the country of the Mishor" (Deut. iv. 43); and Jeremiah (xlviii. 21) says, "judgment is come upon the country of the Mishor" (see also Josh. xiii. 9, 16, 17, 21, xx. 8). Mishor (מִישׁוֹר and מֵישָׁר) signifies a "level plain," or "table-land;" and no word could be more applicable. This is one among many examples of the minute accuracy of Bible topography.

The mountains of Gilead have a real elevation of from two to three thousand feet; but their apparent elevation on the western side is much greater, owing to the depression of the Jordan valley, which averages about 1,000 feet. Their outline is singularly uniform, resembling a massive wall running along the horizon. From the distant east they seem very low, for on that side they meet the plateau of Arabia, 2,000 ft. or more in height. Though the range appears bleak from the distance, yet on ascending it we find the scenery rich, picturesque, and in places even grand. The summit is broad, almost like table-land "tossed into wild confusion of undulating downs" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 320). It is everywhere covered with luxuriant herbage. In the extreme north and south there are no trees; but as we advance toward the centre they soon begin to appear, at first singly, then in groups, and at length, on each side of the Jabbok, in fine forests chiefly of prickly oak and terebinth. The rich pasture land of Gilead presents a striking contrast to the nakedness of western Palestine. Except among the hills of Galilee, and along the heights of Carmel, there is nothing to be compared with it as "a place for cattle" (Num. xxxii. 1). Gilead anciently abounded in spices and aromatic gums which were exported to Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 25; Jer. viii. 22, xlvi. 11).

The first notice we have of Gilead is in connection with the history of Jacob (Gen. xxxi. 21 ff.); but it is possibly this same region which is referred to under the name Ham, and was inhabited by the giant Zuzims. The kings of the East who came to punish the rebellious "cities of the plain," first attacked the Rephaims in Ashteroth Karnaim, i. e. in the country now called Hauràn; then they advanced southwards against the "Zuzims in Ham;" and next against the Emims in Shaveh-Kiriathaim, which was subsequently possessed by the Moabites (Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 9–19). [See EMIMS; REPHAIM.] We hear nothing more of [a] Mr. Tristram regards the peak called Jebel Osha, as the ancient Mount Gilead, said by the people of the country to contain the tomb of Hosea. For a description of the magnificent view from that summit, see Land of Israel, p. 556, 1st ed.

Gilead till the invasion of the country by the Israelites. One half of it was then in the hands of Sihon king of the Amorites, who had a short time previously driven out the Moabites. Og, king of Bashan, had the other section north of the Jabbok. The Israelites defeated the former at Jahaz, and the latter at Edrei, and took possession of Gilead and Bashan (Num. xxi. 23 ff.). The rich pasture land of Gilead, with its shady forests, and copious streams, attracted the attention of Reuben and Gad, who "had a very great multitude of cattle," and was allotted to them. The future history and habits of the tribes that occupied Gilead were greatly affected by the character of the country. Rich in flocks and herds, and now the lords of a fitting region, they retained, almost unchanged, the nomad pastoral habits of their patriarchal ancestors. Like all Bedawin they lived in a constant state of warfare, just as Jacob had predicted of Gad — "a troop shall plunder him; but he shall plunder at the last" (Gen. xlix. 19). The sons of Ishmael were subdued and plundered in the time of Saul (1 Chr. v. 9 ff.); and the children of Ammon in the days of Jephthah and David (Judg. xi. 32 ff.; 2 Sam. x. 12 ff.). Their wandering tent life, and their almost inaccessible country, made them in ancient times what the Bedawy tribes are now — the protectors of the refugee and the outlaw. In Gilead the sons of Saul found a home while they vainly attempted to reëstablish the authority of their house (2 Sam. ii. 8 ff.). Here, too, David found a sanctuary during the unnatural rebellion of a beloved son; and the surrounding tribes, with a characteristic hospitality, carried presents of the best they possessed to the fallen monarch (2 Sam. xvii. 22 ff.). Elijah the Tishbite was a Gileadite (1 K. xvii. 1); and in his simple garb, wild aspect, abrupt address, wonderfully active habits, and movements so rapid as to evade the search of his watchful and bitter foes, we see all the characteristics of the genuine Bedawy, ennobled by a high prophetic mission. [GAD.]

Gilead was a frontier land, exposed to the first attacks of the Syrian and Assyrian invaders, and to the unceasing raids of the desert tribes — "Because Machir the first-born of Manasseh was a man of war, therefore he had Bashan and Gilead" (Josh. xvii. 1). Under the wild and wayward Jephthah, Mizpeh of Gilead became the gathering place of the trans-Jordanic tribes (Judg. xi. 29); and in subsequent times the neighboring stronghold of Ramoth-Gilead appears to have been considered the key of Palestine on the east (1 K. xxii. 3, 4, 6; 2 K. viii. 28, ix. 1).

The name Galaad (Γαλαάδ) occurs several times in the history of the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 9 ff.); and also in Josephus, but generally with the Greek termination — Γαλααδῖτις or Γαλαδηνή (Ant. xiii. 14, § 2; B. J. i. 4, § 3). Under the Roman dominion the country became more settled and civilized; and the great cities of Gadara, Pella, and Gerasa, with Philadelphia on its southeastern border, speedily rose to opulence and splendor. In one of these (Pella) the Christians of Jerusalem found a sanctuary when the armies of Titus gathered round the devoted city (Euseb. H. E. iii. 5). Under Mohammedan rule the country has again lapsed into semi-barbarism. Some scattered villages amid the fastnesses of Jebel Ajlûn, and a few fierce wandering tribes, constitute the whole population of Gilead. They are nominally subject to the Porte but their allegiance sits lightly upon them.

For the scenery, products, antiquities, and history of Gilead, the following works may be consulted. Burckhardt's Trav. in Syr.; Buckingham's Arab Tribes; Irby and Mangles, Travels; Porter's Handbook, and Five Years in Damascus; Stanley's Sin. and Pal.; Ritter's Pal. and Syria.

2. Possibly the name of a mountain west of the Jordan, near Jezreel (Judg. vii. 3). We are inclined, however, to agree with the suggestion of Clericus and others, that the true reading in this place should be גִּלְבֹּעַ, Gilboa, instead of גִּלְעָד. Gideon was encamped at the "spring of Harod," which is at the base of Mount Gilboa. A copyist would easily make the mistake, and ignorance of geography would prevent it from being afterwards detected. For other explanations, see Ewald, Gesch. ii. 500; Schwarz, p. 164, note; Gesen. Thes. p. 804, note.

* As regards Gilead (2), Bertheau also (Buch der Richter, p. 120), would substitute Gilboa for that name in Judg. vii. 3. Keil and Delitzsch hesitate between that view and the conclusion that there may have been a single mountain or a range so called near Jezreel, just as in Josh. xv. 10, we read of a Mount Seir in the territory of Judah otherwise unknown (Com. on Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, p. 341). Dr. Wordsworth has the following note on this perplexed question: "Probably the western half-tribe of Manasseh expressed its connection with the eastern half-tribe by calling one of its mountains by the same name, Mount Gilead, as the famous mountain bearing that name in the eastern division of their tribe (Gen. xxxi. 21–25, xxxvii. 25; Num. xxxii. 1, 40, &c.). May we not see 'a return of the compliment' (if the expression may be used) in another name which has perplexed the commentators, namely, the Wood of Ephraim on the eastern side of Jordan (2 Sam. xviii. 6)? Ephraim was on the west of Jordan, and yet the Wood of Ephraim was on the east. Perhaps that half-tribe of Manasseh, which was in the east, marked its connection with Ephraim, its brother tribe, by calling a wood in its own neighborhood by that name." (See his Holy Bible with Notes, ii. pt. i. p. 111.) Cassel (Richter, p. 71) thinks that Gilead here may denote in effect character rather than locality: the Mount of Gilead = the community of the warlike Manassites (Josh. xvii. 1), now so fitly represented by Gideon, sprung from that tribe (Judg. vi. 15). The cowardly deserve no place in the home of such heroes, and should separate themselves from them. H.

3. The name of a son of Machir, grandson of Manasseh (Num. xxvi. 29, 30).

4. The father of Jephthah (Judg. xi. 1, 2). It is difficult to understand (comp. ver. 7, 8) whether this Gilead was an individual or a personification of the community.[a]

* 5. One of the posterity of Gad, through whom the genealogy of the Gadites in Bashan is traced (1 Chr. v. 14). H.

GIL'EADITES, THE (הַגִּלְעָדִי Judg. xii.

[a] * Probably a patronymic = גִּלְעָדִי, a Gileadite, as Jephthah is called both when first and last mentioned (Judg. xi. 1, and xii. 7). The personal name of the father being unknown, that of his country stands in place of it. See Cassel, Richter u. Ruth in Lange's Bibelwerk, p. 102. H

ו, ז. הַגִּלְעָדִי: Judg. xii. 4, 5, Γαλαάδ; Num. xxvi. 29, Γαλααδί [Vat. -δει]; Judg. x. 3, ὁ Γαλαάδ; [Judg. xi. 1, 40, xii. 7; 2 Sam. xvii. 27, xix. 31; 1 K. ii. 7; Ezr. ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63,] ὁ Γαλααδίτης [Vat. -δει-. exc. Judg. xi. 40, Vat. Γαλααβ]; Alex. ο Γαλααδιτις, ο Γαλααδειτης, [and Judg. xii. 5, ανδρες Γαλααδ:] Galvaditæ, Galaaditæ, viri Galvad). A branch of the tribe of Manasseh, descended from Gilead. There appears to have been an old standing feud between them and the Ephraimites, who taunted them with being deserters. See Judg. xii. 4, which may be rendered, "And the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they said, Runagates of Ephraim are ye (Gilead is between Ephraim and Manasseh);" the last clause being added parenthetically. In 2 K. xv. 25 for "of the Gileadites" the LXX. have ἀπὸ τῶν τετρακοσίων [Vulg. de filiis Galaaditarum].

GIL'GAL (always with the article but once. הַגִּלְגָּל, [the circuit, the rolling, see below]: Γάλγαλα (plural); [in Deut. xi. 30, Γολγόλ; Josh. xiv. 6, Rom. Vat. Γαλγάλ:] Galgala [sing. and plur.]). By this name were called at least two places in ancient Palestine.

1. The site of the first camp of the Israelites on the west of the Jordan, the place at which they passed the first night after crossing the river, and where the twelve stones were set up which had been taken from the bed of the stream (Josh. iv. 19, 20, comp. 3); where also they kept their first passover in the land of Canaan (v. 10). It was in the "end of the east of Jericho" (בִּקְצֵה מִזְרַח י׳): A. V. "in the east border of Jericho"), apparently on a hillock or rising ground (v. 3, comp. 9) in the Arboth-Jericho (A. V. "the plains"), that is, the hot depressed district of the Ghor which lay between the town and the Jordan (v. 10). Here the Israelites who had been born on the march through the wilderness were circumcised; an occurrence from which the sacred historian derives the name: "'This day I have rolled away (galliothi) the reproach of Egypt from off you.' Therefore the name of the place is called Gilgal[a] to this day." By Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 11) it is said to signify "freedom" (ἐλευθέριον). The camp thus established at Gilgal remained there during the early part of the conquest (ix. 6, x. 6, 7, 9, 15, 43); and we may probably infer from one narrative that Joshua retired thither at the conclusion of his labors (xiv. 6, comp. 15).

We again encounter Gilgal in the time of Saul, when it seems to have exchanged its military associations for those of sanctity. True, Saul, when driven from the highlands by the Philistines, collected his feeble force at the site of the old camp (1 Sam. xiii. 4, 7); but this is the only occurrence at all connecting it with war. It was now one of the "holy cities" (οἱ ἡγιασμένοι) — if we accept the addition of the LXX. — to which Samuel regularly resorted, where he administered justice (1 Sam. vii. 16), and where burnt-offerings and peace-offerings were accustomed to be offered "before Jehovah" (x. 8, xi. 15, xiii. 8, 9–12, xv. 21); and on one occasion a sacrifice of a more terrible description than either (xv. 33). The air of the narrative all through leads to the conclusion that at the time of these occurrences it was the chief sanctuary of the central portion of the nation (see x. 8, xi. 14, xv. 12, 21). But there is no sign of its being a town; no mention of building, or of its being allotted to the priests or Levites, as was the case with other sacred towns, Bethel, Shechem, etc.

We again have a glimpse of it, some sixty years later, in the history of David's return to Jerusalem (2 Sam. xix.). The men of Judah came down to Gilgal to meet the king to conduct him over Jordan, as if it was close to the river (xix. 15), and David arrived there immediately on crossing the stream, after his parting with Barzillai the Gileadite.

How the remarkable sanctity of Gilgal became appropriated to a false worship we are not told, but certainly, as far as the obscure allusions of Hosea and Amos can be understood (provided that they refer to this Gilgal), it was so appropriated by the kingdom of Israel in the middle period of its existence (Hos. iv. 15, ix. 15, xii. 11; Amos iv. 4, v. 5).

Beyond the general statements above quoted, the sacred text contains no indications of the position of Gilgal. Neither in the Apocrypha nor the N. T. is it mentioned. Later authorities are more precise, but unfortunately discordant among themselves. By Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 4) the encampment is given as fifty stadia, rather under six miles, from the river, and ten from Jericho. In the time of Jerome the site of the camp and the twelve memorial stones were still distinguishable, if we are to take literally the expression of the Epit. Paulæ (§ 12). The distance from Jericho was then two miles. The spot was left uncultivated, but regarded with great veneration by the residents, "locus desertus . . . ab illius regionis mortalibus miro cultu habitus" (Onom. Galgala). When Arculf was there at the end of the seventh century the place was shown at five miles from Jericho. A large church covered the site, in which the twelve stones were ranged. The church and stones were seen by Willibald, thirty years later, but he gives the distance as five miles from the Jordan, which again he states correctly as seven from Jericho. The stones are mentioned also by Thietmar,[c] A. D. 1217, and lastly by Ludolf de Suchem a century later. No modern traveller has succeeded in eliciting the name, or in discovering a probable site. In Van de Velde's map (1858) a spot named Mohurfer, a little S. E. of er-Riha, is marked as possible; but no explanation is afforded either in his Syria, or his Memoir.

2. But this was certainly a distinct place from the Gilgal which is connected with the last scene in the life of Elijah, and with one of Elisha's miracles. The chief reason for believing this is the impossibility of making it fit into the notice of Elijah's translation. He and Elisha are said to "go down" (יֵרְדוּ) from Gilgal to Bethel (2 K. ii. 1), in opposition to the repeated expressions of the narratives in Joshua and 1 Samuel, in which the way from Gilgal to the neighborhood of Bethel is always spoken of as an ascent, the fact being that the former is nearly 1,200 feet below the latter. Thus there must have been a second Gilgal at a higher level than Bethel, and it was probably that at which Elisha worked the miracle of healing on the poisonous pottage (2 K. iv. 38). Perhaps the expression of 2 K. ii. 1, coupled with the "came again" of iv. 38, may indicate that Elisha resided there. The mention of Baal-shalisha (iv. 42) gives a clew to its situation, when taken with the notice of Eusebius (Onom. Bethsarisa) that that place was fifteen miles from Diospolis (Lydda) towards the north. In that very position stand now the ruins bearing the name of Jiljilieh, i. e. Gilgal. (See Van de Velde's map, and Rob. iii. 139.)

[a] This derivation of the name cannot apply in the case of the other Gilgals mentioned below. May it not be the adaptation to Hebrew of a name previously existing in the former language of the country?

[b] Such is the real force of the Hebrew text (xix. 40).

[c] According to this pilgrim, it was to these that John the Baptist pointed when he said that God was "able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham" (Thietmar, Peregr. 31).

3. The "KING OF THE NATIONS OF GILGAL," or rather perhaps the "king of Goim-at-Gilgal" (מֶלֶךְ־גּוֹיִם לְגִלְגָּל: [Βασιλεὺς Γεθ τῆς Γαλιλαίας; Alex. β. Γωειμ της Γελγεα (comp. Ald. Γαλγέλ): rex gentium Galgal]), is mentioned in the catalogue of the chiefs overthrown by Joshua (Josh. xii. 23). The name occurs next to DOR in an enumeration apparently proceeding southwards, and therefore the position of the Jiljilieh just named is not wholly inappropriate, though it must be confessed its distance from Dor — more than twenty-five miles — is considerable: still it is nearer than any other place of the name yet known. Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. Gelgel) speak of a "Galgulis" six miles N. of Antipatris. This is slightly more suitable, but has not been identified. What these Goim were has been discussed under HEATHEN. By that word (Judg. iv. 2) or "nations" (Gen. xiv. 1) the name is usually rendered in the A. V. as in the well-known phrase, "Galilee of the nations" (Is. ix. 1; comp. Matt. iv. 15). Possibly they were a tribe of the early inhabitants of the country, who, like the Gerizites, the Avim, the Zemarites, and others, have left only this faint casual trace of their existence there.

A place of the same name has also been discovered nearer the centre of the country, to the left of the main north road, four miles from Shiloh (Seilûn), and rather more than the same distance from Bethel (Beitin). This suits the requirements of the story of Elijah and Elisha even better than the former, being more in the neighborhood of the established holy places of the country, and, as more central, and therefore less liable to attack from the wanderers in the maritime plain, more suited for the residence for the sons of the prophets. In position it appears to be not less than 500 or 600 feet above Bethel (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 179). It may be the Beth-Gilgal of Neh. xii. 29; while the Jiljilieh north of Lydd may be that of Josh. xii. 23. Another Gilgal, under the slightly different form of Kilkilieh, lies about two miles E. of Kefr Saba.

4. [Γαλγάλ; Vat. τα Αγαδ: Galgala.] A Gilgal is spoken of in Josh. xv. 7, in describing the north border of Judah. In the parallel list (Josh. xviii. 17) it is given as GELILOTH, and under that word an attempt is made to show that Gilgal, i. e. the Gilgal near Jericho, is probably correct. G.

GI'LOH (גִּלֹה [exile, Ges.; or, castle, mount, Dietr.]: Γηλώμ, Alex. Γηλων; [Vat. om.; Comp. Γιλώ;] in Sam. Γωλά, [Comp. Γελώ: Gilo]), a town in the mountainous part of Judah, named in the first group, with Debir and Eshtemoh (Josh. xv. 51). Its only interest to us lies in the fact of its having been the native place of the famous Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12), where he was residing when Absalom sent for him to Hebron, and whither he returned to destroy himself after his counsel had been set aside for that of Hushai (xvii. 23). The site has not yet been met with.

GI'LONITE, THE (הַגִּילֹנִי and הַגִּלֹנִי · Θεκωνί [Vat. -νει], Γελωνίτης [Vat. -γει-], Alex Γιλωναιος, [Γειλωνιτης: Gilonites]), i. e. the native of Giloh (as Shilonite, from Shiloh): applied only to Ahithophel the famous counsellor (2 Sam. xv. 12; xxiii. 34).

GIM'ZO (גַּמְזוֹ [place of sycamores]: ἡ Γαμζώ; Alex. Γαμαιζαί: [Gamzo]), a town which with its dependent villages (Hebrew "daughters") was taken possession of by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 18). The name — which occurs nowhere but here — is mentioned with Timnath, Socho, and other towns in the northwest part of Judah, or in Dan. It still remains attached to a large village between two and three miles S. W. of Lydda, south of the road between Jerusalem and Jaffa, just where the hills of the highland finally break down into the maritime plain. Jimzu is a tolerably large village, on an eminence, well surrounded with trees, and standing just beyond the point where the two main roads from Jerusalem (that by the Beth-horons, and that by Wady Suleiman), which parted at Gibeon, again join and run on as one to Jaffa. It is remarkable for nothing but some extensive corn magazines underground, unless it be also for the silence maintained regarding it by all travellers up to Dr. Robinson (ii. 249). G.

GIN, a trap for birds or beasts: it consisted of a net (פַּח), and a stick to act as a springe (מוֹקֵשׁ); the latter word is translated "gin" in the A. V. Am. iii. 5, and the former in Is. viii. 14, the term "snare" being in each case used for the other part of the trap. In Job xl. 24 (marginal translation) the second of these terms is applied to the ring run through the nostrils of an animal. W. L. B.

GI'NATH (גִּינַת [protection, Fürst; or, garden, Gesen.]: Γωνάθ: Gineth), father of TIBNI, who after the death of Zimri disputed the throne of Israel with Omri (1 K. xvi. 21, 22).

GIN'NETHO (גִּנְּתוֹי [gardener], i. e. Ginnethoi: [Rom. Vat. Alex. omit; FA.^{3} Γεννηθοι. Comp. Γεναθὼν: Genthon), one of the "chief' (רָאשֵׁי=heads) of the priests and Levites who returned to Judæa with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 4). He is doubtless the same person as GIN'NETHON (גִּנְּתוֹן [as above]: Γαννα-θών, Γαναθώ; [in x. 6, Vat. Τνατοθ, Alex. Γαανναθων, FA. Ανατωθ; in xii. 16, Vat. Alex. FA.^{1} omit:] Genthon), a priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 6). He was head of a family, and one of his descendants is mentioned in the list of priests and Levites at a later period (xii. 16). He is probably the same person as the preceding.

GIRDLE, an essential article of dress in the East, and worn both by men and women. The corresponding Hebrew words are: (1.) חֲגוֹר or חֲגֹרָה, which is the general term for a girdle of any kind, whether worn by soldiers, as 1 Sam. xviii. 4, 2 Sam. xx. 8, 1 K. ii. 5, 2 K. iii. 21; or by women, Is. iii. 24. (2.) אֵזוֹר, especially used of the girdles worn by men; whether by prophets

2 K. i. 8, Jer. xiii. 1; soldiers, Is. v. 27; Ez. xxiii. 15, or kings in their military capacity, Job xii. 18.

(3.) מְזַח or מְזִיחַ, used of the girdle worn by men alone, Job xii. 21, Ps. cix. 19, Is. xxiii. 10.

(4.) אַבְנֵט, the girdle worn by the priests and state officers. In addition to these, פְּתִיגִיל, Is. iii. 24, is a costly girdle worn by women. The Vulgate renders it fascia pectoralis. It would thus seem to correspond with the Latin strophium, a belt worn by women about the breast. In the LXX. however, it is translated χιτὼν μεσοπόρφυρος, "a tunic shot with purple," and Gesenius [Thes.] has "buntes Feyerkleid" (comp. Schroeder, de Vest. Mul. pp. 137, 138, 404). The קְשׁוּרִים mentioned in Is. iii. 20, Jer. ii. 32, were probably girdles, although both Kimchi and Jarchi consider them as fillets for the hair. In the latter passage the Vulgate has again fascia pectoralis, and the LXX. στηθοδεσμίς, an appropriate bridal ornament.

The common girdle was made of leather (2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4), like that worn by the Bedouins of the present day, whom Curzon describes as "armed with a long crooked knife, and a pistol or two stuck in a red leathern girdle" (Monast. of the Levant, p. 7). In the time of Chardin the nobles of Mingrelia wore girdles of leather, four fingers broad, and embossed with silver. A finer girdle was made of linen (Jer. xiii. 1; Ez. xvi. 10), embroidered with silk, and sometimes with gold and silver thread (Dan. x. 5; Rev. i. 13, xv. 6), and frequently studded with gold and precious stones or pearls (Le Bruyn, Voy. iv. 170; comp. Virg. Æn. ix. 359).[a] Morier (Second Journey, p. 150), describing the dress of the Armenian women, says, "they wear a silver girdle which rests on the hips, and is generally curiously wrought." The manufacture of these girdles formed part of the employment of women (Prov. xxxi. 24).

The girdle was fastened by a clasp of gold or silver, or tied in a knot so that the ends hung down in front, as in the figures on the ruins of Persepolis. It was worn by men about the loins, hence the expressions אֵזוֹר מָתְנַיִם, Is. xi. 5; אֵזוֹר חֲלָצַיִם, Is. v. 27. The girdle of women was generally looser than that of the men, and was worn about the hips, except when they were actively engaged (Prov. xxxi. 17). Curzon (p. 58), describing the dress of the Egyptian women, says, "not round the waist, but round the hips a large and heavy Cashmere shawl is worn over the yelek, and the whole gracefulness of an Egyptian dress consists in the way in which this is put on." The military girdle was worn about the waist, the sword or dagger was suspended from it (Judg. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xlv. 3). In the Nineveh sculptures the soldiers are represented with broad girdles, to which the sword is attached, and through which even two or three daggers in a sheath are passed. Q. Curtius (iii. 3) says of Darius, "zona aurea muliebriter cinctus acinacem suspenderat, cui ex gemma erat vagina." Hence girding up the loins denotes preparation for battle or for active exertion. In times of mourning, girdles of sackcloth were worn as marks of humiliation and sorrow (Is. iii. 24; xxii. 12).

In consequence of the costly materials of which girdles were made, they were frequently given as presents (1 Sam. xviii. 4; 2 Sam. xviii. 11), as is still the custom in Persia (cf. Morier, p. 93). Villages were given to the queens of Persia to supply them with girdles (Xenoph. Anab. i. 4, § 9; Plat. Alc. i. p. 123).

They were used as pockets, as among the Arabs still (Niebuhr, Descr. p. 56), and as purses, one end of the girdle being folded back for the purpose (Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8). Hence "zonam perdere," "to lose one's purse" (Hor. Epist. ii. 2, 40; comp. Juv. xiv. 297). Inkhorns were also carried in the girdle (Ez. ix. 2).

The אַבְנֵט, or girdle worn by the priests about the close-fitting tunic (Ex. xxviii. 39; xxxix. 29), is described by Josephus (Ant. iii. 7, § 2) as made of linen so fine of texture as to look like the slough of a snake, and embroidered with flowers of scarlet, purple, blue, and fine linen. It was about four fingers' broad, and was wrapped several times round the priest's body, the ends hanging down to the feet. When engaged in sacrifice, the priest threw the ends over his left shoulder. According to Maimonides (de Vas. Sanct. c. 8), the girdle worn both by the high-priest and the common priests was of white linen embroidered with wool, but that worn by the high-priest on the day of Atonement was entirely of white linen. The length of it was thirty-two cubits, and the breadth about three fingers. It was worn just below the armpits to avoid perspiration (comp. Ez. xliv. 18). Jerome (Ep. ad Fabiolam, de Vest. Sac.) follows Josephus. With regard to the manner in which the girdle was embroidered, the "needlework" (מַעֲשֵׂה רֹקֵם, Ex. xxviii. 39) is distinguished in the Mishna from the "cunning-work" (מַעֲשֵׂה חֹשֵׁב, Ex. xxvi. 31) as being worked by the needle with figures on one side only, whereas the latter was woven work with figures on both sides (Cod. Joma, c. 8). So also Maimonides (de Vas. Sanct viii. 15). But Jarchi on Ex. xxvi. 31, 36, explains the difference as consisting in this, that in the former case the figures on the two sides are the same, whereas in the latter they are different. [EMBROIDERER.]

In all passages, except Is. xxii. 21, אַבְנֵט is used of the girdle of the priests only, but in that instance it appears to have been worn by Shebna, the treasurer, as part of the insignia of his office; unless it be supposed that he was of priestly rank, and wore it in his priestly capacity. He is called "high-priest" in the Chronicon Paschale, p. 115 a, and in the Jewish tradition quoted by Jarchi in loc.

The "curious girdle" (חֹשֶׁב, Ex. xxviii. 8) was made of the same materials and colors as the ephod, that is of "gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen." Josephus describes it as sewn to the breastplate. After passing once round it was tied in front upon the seam, the ends hanging down (Ant. iii. 7, § 5). According to Maimonides it was of woven work.

"Girdle" is used figuratively in Ps. cix. 19; Is. xi. 5; cf. 1 Sam. ii. 4; Ps. xxx. 11, lxv. 12; Eph. vi. 14. W. A. W.

cording to the Hebrew usage, singular — "the Girgashite;" in which form, however, it occurs in the A. V. but twice, 1 Chr. i. 14, and Gen. x. 16; in the latter THE GIRGASITE; elsewhere uniformly plural, as above: ὁ Γεργεσαῖος, and so also Josephus: Gergesæus [but Deut. vii. 1, Gergezæus]), one of the nations who were in possession of Canaan before the entrance thither of the children of Israel. The name occurs in the following passages: Gen. x. 16, xv. 21; Deut. vii. 1 (and xx. 17 in Samaritan and LXX.); Josh. iii. 10, xxiv. 11; 1 Chr. i. 14; Neh. ix. 8. In the first of these "the Girgasite" is given as the fifth son of Canaan; in the other places the tribe is merely mentioned, and that but occasionally, in the formula expressing the doomed country; and it may truly be said in the words of Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 2) that we possess the name and nothing more; not even the more definite notices of position, or the slight glimpses of character, general or individual, with which we are favored in the case of the Amorites, Jebusites, and some others of these ancient nations. The expression in Josh. xxiv. 11 would seem to indicate that the district of the Girgashites was on the west of Jordan; nor is this invalidated by the mention of "Gergesenes" in Matt. viii. 28 (Γεργεσηνῶν in Rec. Text, and in a few MSS. mentioned by Epiphanius and Origen, Γεργεσαίων), as on the east side of the Sea of Galilee, since that name is now generally recognized as Γερασηνῶν, — "Gerasenes," — and therefore as having no connection with the Girgashites. GIR'GASITE, THE (Gen. x. 16). See the foregoing.

* GIS'CHALA [Γίσχαλα: Rabb. גּוּשׁ חלב, Gush Chalab: Arab. الجش, el-Jish), a village in Galilee on a hill about two hours northwest from Safed. It was fortified by order of Josephus, and was the last fortress in Galilee to surrender to the Roman arms (Joseph. B. J. ii. 20, § 6; iv. 2, §§ 1–5). It has been identified by Dr. Robinson as the modern el-Jish, which was destroyed by an earthquake in 1837 (Bibl. Res. iii. 368 ff., 1st ed.). It must have been one of the towns in the circuit of Christ's labors, and well known to his Galilean disciples. There was a tradition that the parents of Paul emigrated from this place to Tarsus. GIS'PA (גִּשְׁפָּא [hearkening]: [FA.^{3}] Γεσφά; [Comp. Γεσφάς; Rom. Vat. Alex. FA.^{1} omit:] Gaspha), one of the overseers of the Nethinim, in "the Ophel," after the return from Captivity (Neh. xi. 21). By the LXX. the name appears to have been taken as a place.

GITTAH-HE'PHER, Josh. xix. 13. [GATH-HEPHER.]

GITTA'IM (גִּתַּיִם, i. e. two wine-presses: [in 2 Sam.,] Γεθαίμ, [Vat. Γεθαι,] Alex. Γεθθειμ; [in Neh. xi. 33, Rom. Vat. Alex. FA.^{1} omit; FA.^{3} Γεθθιμ:] Gethaim), a place incidentally mentioned in 2 Sam. iv. 3, where the meaning appears to be that the inhabitants of Beeroth, which was allotted to Benjamin, had been compelled to fly from that place, and had taken refuge at Gittaim. Beeroth was one of the towns of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17); and the cause of the flight of its people may have been (though this is but conjecture) Saul's persecution of the Gibeonites alluded to in 2 Sam. xxi. 2. Gittaim is again mentioned [Neh. xi. 33] in the list of places inhabited by the Benjamites after their return from the Captivity, with Ramah, Neballat, Lod, and other known towns of Benjamin to the N. W. of Jerusalem. The two may be the same; though, if the persecution of the Berothites proceeded from Benjamin, as we must infer it did, they would hardly choose as a refuge a place within the limits of that tribe. Gittaim is the dual form of the word Gath, which suggests the Philistine plain as its locality. But there is no evidence for or against this.

Gittaim occurs in the LXX. version of 1 Sam. xiv. 33 — "out of Getthaim roll me a great stone." But this is not supported by any other of the ancient versions, which unanimously adhere to the Hebr. text, and probably proceeds from a mistako or corruption of the Hebrew word בְּגַדְתֶּם: A. V. "ye have transgressed." It further occurs in the LXX. in Gen. xxxvi. 35 and 1 Chr. i. 46, as the representative of AVITH, a change not so intelligible as the other, and equally unsupported by the other old versions. G.

GIT'TITES (גִּתִּים, patron. from גַּת: [Γεθαῖοι, Alex. Γεθθαιοι: Gethæi]), the 600 men who followed David from Gath, under Ittai the Gittite (הַגִּתִּי, 2 Sam. xv. 18, 19), and who probably acted as a kind of body-guard. Obed-edom the Levite, in whose house the Ark was for a time placed (2 Sam. vi. 10), and who afterwards served in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xvi. 38), is called "the Gittite" (הַגִּתִּי). We can scarcely think, however, that he was so named from the royal city of the Philistines. May he not have been from the town of Gittaim in Benjamin (2 Sam. iv. 3; Neh. xi. 33), or from Gath-rimmon, a town of Dan. allotted to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 24), of whom Obed-edom seems to have been one (1 Chr. xxvi. 4)? J. L. P.

GIT'TITH (גִּתִּית) [see infra], a musical instrument, by some supposed to have been used by the people of Gath, and thence to have been introduced by David into Palestine; and by others (who identify גִּתִּית with גַּת, a wine-press, or trough, in which the grapes were trodden with the feet) to have been employed at the festivities of the vintage. The Chaldee paraphrase of עַל הַגִּתִּית, occasionally found in the heading of Psalms, is, "On the instrument כינורא (Cinora), which was brought from Gath." Rashi, whilst he admits Gittith to be a musical instrument, in the manufacture of which the artisans of Gath excelled, quotes a Talmudic authority which would assign to the word a different meaning. "Our sages," says he, "have remarked 'On the nations who are in future to be trodden down like a wine-press.'" (Comp. Is. lxiii. 3.) But neither of the Psalms, viii., lxxxi., or lxxxiv., which have Gittith for a heading, contains any thing that may be connected with such an idea. The interpretation of the LXX. ὑπὲρ τῶν ληνῶν, "for the wine-presses," is condemned by Aben-Ezra and other eminent Jewish scholars. Fürst (Concordance) describes Gittith as a hollow instrument, from גתת, to deepen (synonymous with חלל). D. W. M.

GI'ZONITE, THE: ὁ Γιζωνίτης

[Vat. corrupt.] Alex. ὁ Γωννι: Gezonites). "The sons of Hashem the Gizonite" are named amongst the warriors of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 34). In the parallel list of 2 Sam. xxiii. the word is entirely omitted; and the conclusion of Kennicott, who examines the passage at length, is that the name should be GOUNI [see GUNI], a proper name, and not an appellative (Dissert. pp. 199–203). [No place corresponding to the name is known.]

* GIZ'RITES. [GERZITES.]

GLASS (זְכוּכִית: ὕαλος: vitrum). The word occurs only in Job xxviii. 17, where in the A. V. it is rendered "crystal." It comes from זָכַךְ (to be pure), and according to the best authorities means a kind of glass which in ancient days was held in high esteem (J. D. Michaelis, Hist. Vitri apud Hebr.; and Hamberger, Hist. Vitri ex antiquitate eruta, quoted by Gesen. s. v.). Symmachus renders it κρύσταλλος, but that is rather intended by גָּבִישׁ (Job xxviii. 18, A. V. "pearls," LXX. γάβις, a word which also means "ice;" cf. Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 2), and קָרְחָה (Ez. i. 22). It seems then that Job xxviii. 17 contains the only allusion to glass found in the O. T., and even this reference is disputed. Besides Symmachus, others also render it διαυγῆ κρύσταλλον (Schleusner, Thesaur. s. v. ὕαλος), and it is argued that the word ὕαλος frequently means crystal. Thus the Schol. on Aristoph. Nub. 764, defines ὕαλος (when it occurs in old writers) as διαφανὴς λίθος ἐοικὼς ὑάλῳ, and Hesychius gives as its equivalent λίθος τίμιος. In Herodotus (iii. 24) it is clear that ὕελος must mean crystal, for he says, ἡ δέ σφι πολλὴ καὶ εὔεργος ὀρύσσεται, and Achilles Tatius speaks of crystal as ὕαλος ὀρωρυγμένη (ii. 3; Baehr, On Herod. ii. 44; Heeren, Ideen, ii. 1, 335). Others consider זְכוּכִית to be amber, or electrum, or alabaster (Bochart, Hieroz. ii. vi. 872).

In spite of this absence of specific allusion to glass in the sacred writings, the Hebrews must have been aware of the invention. There has been a violent modern prejudice against the belief that glass was early known to, or extensively used by, the ancients, but both facts are now certain. From paintings representing the process of glassblowing which have been discovered in paintings at Beni-Hassan, and in tombs at other places, we know that the invention is at least as remote as the age of Osirtasen the first (perhaps a contemporary of Joseph), 3,500 years ago. A bead as old as 1500 B. C. was found by Captain Hervey at Thebes, "the specific gravity of which, 25° 30′, is precisely the same as that of the crown glass now made in England." Fragments too of wine-vases as old as the Exodus have been discovered in Egypt. Glass beads known to be ancient have been found in Africa, and also (it is said) in Cornwall and Ireland, which are in all probability the relics of an old Phœnician trade (Wilkinson, in Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 50, i. 475; Anc. Egypt. iii. 88–112). The art was also known to the ancient Assyrians (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 42), and a glass bottle was found in the N. W. palace of Nimroud, which has on it the name of Sargon, and is therefore probably older than B. C. 702 (id. Nin. and Bab. p. 197, 503). This is the earliest known specimen of transparent glass.

The disbelief in the antiquity of glass (in spite of the distinct statements of early writers) is difficult to account for, because the invention must almost naturally arise in making bricks or pottery, during which processes there must be at least a superficial vitrification. There is little doubt that the honor of the discovery belongs to the Egyptians. Pliny gives no date for his celebrated story of the discovery of glass from the solitary accident of some Phœnician sailors using blocks of natron to support their saucepans when they were unable to find stones for the purpose (H. N. xxxvi. 65). But this account is less likely than the supposition that vitreous matter first attracted observation from the custom of lighting fires on the sand, "in a country producing natron or subcarbonate of soda" (Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 82). It has been pointed out that Pliny's story may have originated in the fact that the sand of the Syrian river Belus,[a] at the mouth of which the incident is supposed to have occurred, "was esteemed peculiarly suitable for glass-making, and exported in great quantities to the workshops of Sidon and Alexandria, long the most famous in the ancient world" (Dict. of Ant. art. Vitrum, where everything requisite to the illustration of the classical allusions to glass may be found). Some find a remarkable reference to this little river (respecting which see Plin. H. N. v. 17, xxxvi. 65; Joseph. B. J. ii. 10, § 2; Tac. Hist. v. 7) in the blessing to the tribe of Zebulun, "they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand" (Deut. xxxiii. 19). Both the name Belus (Reland, quoted in Dict. of Geogr. s. v. and the Hebrew word חוֹל, "sand" (Calmet, s. v.) have been suggested as derivations for the Greek ὕαλος, which is however, in all probability, from an Egyptian root.

Glass was not only known to the ancients, but used by them (as Winckelmann thinks) far more extensively than in modern times. Pliny even tells us that it was employed in wainscoting (vitreæ cameræ, H. N. xxxvi. 64; Stat. Sylv. i. v. 42). The Egyptians knew the art of cutting, grinding, and engraving it, and they could even inlay it with gold or enamel, and "permeate opaque glass with designs of various colors." Besides this they could color it with such brilliancy as to be able to imitate precious stones in a manner which often defied detection (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 26, 33, 75). This is probably the explanation of the incredibly large gems which we find mentioned in ancient authors; e. g. Larcher considers that the emerald column alluded to by Herodotus (ii. 44) was "du verre coloré dont l'intérieur était échiré par des lampes." Strabo was told by an Alexandrian glass-maker that this success was partly due to a rare and valuable earth found in Egypt (Beckmann, History of Inventions, "Colored Glass," i. 195 f. Eng. Transl., also iii. 208 f., iv. 54). Yet the perfectly clear and transparent glass was considered the most valuable (Plin. xxxvi. 26).

Some suppose that the proper name מִשְׂרְפוֹת מַיִם (burnings by the waters) contains an allusion to Sidonian glass-factories (Meier on Jos. xi. 8, xiii. 6), but it is much more probable that it was so called from the burning of Jabin's chariots at that place (Lord A. Hervey, On the Genealogies, p. 228), or from hot springs.

In the N. T. glass is alluded to as an emblem of brightness (Rev iv. 6, xv. 2, xxi. 18). The three other places where the word occurs in the A. V. (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 18; Jam. i. 23), as also the word "glasses" (Is. iii. 23), are considered under MIRRORS. For, strange to say, although the ancients were aware of the reflective power of glass, and although the Sidonians used it for mirrors (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 66), yet for some unexplained reason mirrors of glass must have proved unsuccessful, since even under the empire they were universally made of metal, which is at once less perfect, more expensive, and more difficult to preserve (Dict. of Ant. art. Speculum).

GLEANING (עֹלְלוֹת as applied to produce generally, לֶקֶט rather to corn). The remarks under CORNER on the definite character of the rights of the poor, or rather of poor relations and dependants, to a share of the crop, are especially exemplified in the instance of Ruth gleaning in the field of Boaz. Poor young women, recognized as being "his maidens," were gleaning his field, and on her claim upon him by near affinity being made known, she was bidden to join them and not go to any other field; but for this, the reapers it seems would have driven her away (Ruth ii. 6, 8, 9). The gleaning of fruit trees, as well as of cornfields, was reserved for the poor. Hence the proverb of Gideon, Judg. viii. 2. Maimonides indeed lays down the principle (Constitutiones de donis pauperum, cap. ii. 1), that whatever crop or growth is fit for food, is kept, and gathered all at once, and carried into store, is liable to that law. See for further remarks, Maimon. Constitutiones de donis pauperum, cap. iv.

H. H.

GLEDE, the old name for the common kite (Milvus ater), occurs only in Deut. xiv. 13 (הָאָה) among the unclean birds of prey, and if רָאָה be the correct reading, we must suppose the name to have been taken from the bird's acuteness of vision; but as in the parallel passage in Lev. xi. 14 we find הָאָה, vultur, it is probable that we should read הָאָה in Deut. also. The LXX. have γύψ in both places.

W. D.

GNAT (κώνωψ), mentioned only in the proverbial expression used by our Saviour in Matt. xxiii. 24, "Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." "Strain at, in the A. V., seems to be a typographical error, since the translations before the A. V. had "strain out," the Greek word διυλίζω signifying to strain through (a sieve, etc.), to filter (see Trench, On the Auth. Vers., 1st ed. p. 131) [2d ed. p. 172]. The Greek κώνωψ is the generic word for gnat.

GOAD. The equivalent terms in the Hebrew are (1) מַלְמָד (Judg. iii. 31), and (2) דָּרְבָן (1 Sam. xiii. 21; Eccl. xii. 11). The explanation given by Jahn (Archæol. i. 4, § 59) is that the former represents the pole, and the latter the iron spike with which it was shod for the purpose of goading. With regard to the latter, however, it may refer to anything pointed, and the tenor of Eccl. xii. requires rather the sense of a peg or nail, anything in short which can be fastened; while in 1 Sam. xiii. the point of the ploughshare is more probably intended. The former does probably refer to the goad, the long handle of which might be used as a formidable weapon (comp. Hom. Il. vi. 135), though even this was otherwise understood by the LXX. as a ploughshare (ἐν τῷ ἀροτρόποδι): it should also be noted that the etymological force of the word is that of guiding (from לָמַד, to teach) rather than goading (Saalschütz, Archäol. i. 105). There are undoubted references to the use of the goad in driving oxen in Ecclus. xxxviii. 25, and Acts xxvi. 14. The instrument, as still used in the countries of southern Europe and western Asia, consists of a rod about eight feet long, brought to a sharp point and sometimes cased with iron at the head (Harmer's Observations, iii. 348). The expression "to kick against the goads" (Acts ix. 5; A. V. "the pricks"), was proverbially used by the Greeks for unavailing resistance to superior power (comp. Æsch. Agam. 1633, Prom. 323; Eurip. Bacch. 791).

W. L. B.

* The use of the goad in driving animals, which is still common in the East, is implied in 2 K. iv 24, where it explains a slight obscurity in the verse as given in the A. V. Mounted on her donkey – the favorite mode of travelling with oriental ladies — the Shunammite, intent on the utmost dispatch, directs her servant, running by her side, to urge the animal with the goad to its full speed.

The long ox-goad, used in the field, with an iron point at one end, and an iron paddle at the other to clean the plough in the furrows, often was, and still is, a massive implement. In the hands of a strong and valiant man, like Shamgar, as represented in Judg. iii. 31, it would be a destructive weapon. (See Hackett's Illustr. of Scripture, p. 155.) S. W.

GOAT. 1. Of the Hebrew words which are translated goat and she-goat in A. V., the most common is עֵז = Syr. ܥܰܙܳܐ, Arab. عنز, Phœn. ἀζα. The Indo-Germanic languages have a similar word in Sanskr. ag'a = goat, ag'â = she-goat, Germ. geis or gems, Greek αἴξ, αἰγός. The derivation from עָזַז, to be strong, points to he-goat as the original meaning, but it is also specially used for she-goat, as in Gen. xv. 9, xxxi. 38, xxxii. 14; Num. xv. 27. In Judg. vi. 19 גְּדִי עִזִּים is rendered kid, and in Deut. xiv. 4 שֵׂה עִזִּים is rendered the goat, but properly signifies flock of goats. עִזִּים is used elliptically for goats' hair in Ex. xxvi. 7, xxxvi. 14, &c., Num. xxxi. 20, and in 1 Sam. xix. 13.

2. יְעֵלִים are wild or mountain goats, and are rendered wild goats in the three passages of Scripture in which the word occurs, namely, 1 Sam. xxiv. 2, Job xxxix. 1, and Ps. civ. 18. The word is from a root יָעַל, to ascend or climb, and is the Heb. name of the ibex, which abounds in the mountainous parts of the ancient territory of Moab. In Job xxxix. 1, the LXX. have τραγελάφων πέτρας.

3. אַקּוֹ is rendered the wild goat in Deut. xiv. 5, and occurs only in this passage. It is a contracted form of אַנְקוֹה, according to Lee, who renders it gazelle, but it is more properly the tragelaphus or goat-deer (Shaw. Suppl. p. 76).

4. עַתּוּד, a he-goat, as Gesenius thinks, of four months old — strong and vigorous. It occurs only in the plural, and is rendered by A. V. indifferently goats and he-goats (see Ps. l. 9 and 13). In Jer. l. 8 it signifies he-goats, leaders of the flock, and hence its metaphorical use in Is. xiv. 9 for chief ones of the earth, and in Zech. x. 3, where goats = principal men, chiefs. It is derived from the root עָתַד, to set, to place, to prepare.

5 עֻפָּיר occurs in 2 Chr. xxix. 21, and in Dan. viii. 5, 8 — it is followed by הָעִזִּים, and signifies a he-goat of the goats. Gesenius derives it from עָפַר, to leap. It is a word found only in the later books of the O. T. In Ezr. vi. 17 we find the Chald. form of the word, עֻפָּיר.

6. שָׂעִיר is translated goat, and signifies properly a he-goat, being derived from שָׂעַר, to stand on end, to bristle. It occurs frequently in Leviticus and Numbers (שָׂעִיר הַחַטָּאת), and is the goat of the sin-offering, Lev. ix. 3, 15, x. 16. The word is used as an adjective with עֻפָּיר in Dan. viii. 21 "— and the goat, the rough one, is the king of Javan."

7. תַּיִשׁ is from a root תָּיַשׁ, o strike. It is rendered he-goat in Gen. xxx. 35, xxxii. 15, Prov. xxx. 31, and 2 Chr. xvii. 11. It does not occur elsewhere.

8. עֲזָאזֵל, scape-goat in Lev. xvi. 8, 10, 26. On this word see ATONEMENT, DAY OF, p. 197.

In the N. T. the words rendered goats in Matt. xxv. 32, 33, are ἔριφος and ἐρίφιον = a young goat, or kid; and in Heb. ix. 12, 13, 19, and x. 4, τράγος = he-goat. Goat-skins, in Heb. xi. 37, are in the Greek, ἐν αἰγείοις δέρμασιν; and in Judg. ii. 17 αἶγας is rendered goats. W. D.

There appear to be two or three varieties of the common goat (Hircus ægagrus) at present bred in Palestine and Syria, but whether they are identical with those which were reared by the ancient Hebrews it is not possible to say. The most marked varieties are the Syrian goat (Capra Mambrica, Linn.), with long thick pendent ears, which are often, says Russell (Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, ii. 150, 2d ed.), a foot long, and the Angora goat (Capra Angorensis, Linn.), with fine long hair. The Syrian goat is mentioned by Aristotle (Hist. An. ix. 27, § 3). There is also a variety that differs but little from British specimens. Goats have from the earliest ages been considered important animals in rural economy, both on account of the milk they afford, and the excellency of the flesh of the young animals. The goat is figured on the Egyptian monuments (see Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. i. 223). Col. Ham. Smith (Griffith's An. King. iv. 308) describes three Egyptian breeds: one with long hair, depressed horns, ears small and pendent; another with horns very spiral, and ears longer than the head; and a third, which occurs in Upper Egypt, without horns.

Goats were offered as sacrifices (Lev. iii. 12, ix. 15; Ex. xii. 5, etc.); their milk was used as food (Prov. xxvii. 27); their flesh was eaten (Deut. xiv. 4; Gen. xxvii. 9); their hair was used for the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 7, xxxvi. 14), and for stuffing bolsters (1 Sam. xix. 13); their skins were sometimes used as clothing (Heb. xi. 37).

The passage in Cant. iv. 1, which compares the hair of the beloved to "a flock of goats that eat of Mount Gilead," probably alludes to the fine hair of the Angora breed. Some have very plausibly supposed that the prophet Amos (iii. 12), when he speaks of a shepherd "taking out of the mouth of the lion two legs or a piece of an ear," alludes to the long pendulous ears of the Syrian breed (see Harmer's Obser. iv. 162). In Prov. xxx. 31, a he-goat is mentioned as one of the "four things which are comely in going;" in allusion, probably, to the stately march of the leader of the flock, which was always associated in the minds of the Hebrews with the notion of dignity. Hence the metaphor in Is. xiv. 9, "all the chief ones (margin, 'great goats') of the earth." So the Alexandrine version of the LXX. understands the allusion. καὶ τράγος ἡγούμενος αἰπολίου.[a]

As to the ye'élim (יְעֵלִים): τραγέλαφοι, ἐλα-ποι: ibices: "wild goats." A. V.), it is not at all improbable, as the Vulg. interprets the word, that some species of ibex is denoted, perhaps the Capra Sinaitica (Ehrenb.), the Beden or Jaela of Egypt and Arabia. This ibex was noticed at Sinai by Ehrenberg and Hemprich (Sym. Phys. t. 18), and by Burckhardt (Trav. p. 526), who (p. 405) thus speaks of these animals: "In all the valleys south of the Modjeb, and particularly in those of Modjeb and El Ahsa, large herds of mountain goats, called by the Arabs Beden (بدن), are met with. This is the steinbock[a] or bouquetin of the Swiss and Tyrol Alps. They pasture in flocks of forty and fifty together. Great numbers of them are killed by the people of Kerek and Tafyle, who hold their flesh in high estimation. They sell the large knotty horns to the Hebrew merchants, who carry them to Jerusalem, where they are worked into handles for knives and daggers. . . . . . The Arabs told me that it is difficult to get a shot at them, and that the hunters hide themselves among the reeds on the banks of streams where the animals resort in the evening to drink. They also asserted that, when pursued, they will throw themselves from a height of fifty feet and more upon their heads without receiving any injury." Hasselquist (Trav. p. 190) speaks of rock goats (Capra cervicapra, Linn.) which he saw hunted with falcons near Nazareth. But the C. cervicapra of Linnæus is an antelope (Antilope cervicapra, Pall.).

There is considerable difficulty attending the identification of the akkô (אַקּוֹ), which the LXX. render by τραγέλαφος, and the Vulg. tragelaphus. The word, which occurs only in Deut. xiv. 5 as one of the animals that might be eaten, is rendered "wild goat" by the A. V. Some have referred the akkô to the ahu of the Persians, i. e. the Capreolus pygargus, or the "tailless roe" (Shaw, Zoöl. ii. 287), of Central Asia. If we could satisfactorily establish the identity of the Persian word with the Hebrew, the animal in question might represent the akkô of the Pentateuch, which might formerly have inhabited the Lebanon, though it is not found in Palestine now. Perhaps the paseng (Cap. ægagrus, Cuv.) which some have taken to be the parent stock of the common goat, and which at present inhabits the mountains of Persia and Caucasus, may have in Biblical times been found in Palestine and may be the akkô of Scripture. But we allow this is mere conjecture. W. H.

GO'ATH (גֹּעָה [see infra]: the LXX. seem to have had a different text, and read ἐξ ἐκλεκτῶν λίθων: Goatha), a place apparently in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, and named, in connection with the hill Gareb, only in Jer. xxxi. 39. The name (which is accurately GOAH, as above, the th being added to connect the Hebrew particle of motion,—Goathah) is derived by Gesenius from גָּעָה, "to low," as a cow. In accordance with this is the rendering of the Targum, which has for Goah, בְּרֵיכַת עֶגְלָא = the heifer's pool. The Syriac, on the other hand, has ܠܪܘܡܬܐ, leromto, "to the eminence," perhaps reading גֵּאָה (Fürst, Handwb. p. 269 b).[b] Owing to the presence of the letter Ain in Goath, the resemblance between it and Golgotha does not exist in the original to the same degree as in English. In the parallel account — of the first of these only = in 1 Chr. xx. 4, the name is given as GEZER, and this, as well as the omission of any locality for the second event, is supported by Josephus (Ant. vii. 12, § 2). On the other hand the LXX. and Syriac have Gath in the first case, a name which in Hebrew much resembles Gob; and this appears to be borne out by the account of a third and subsequent fight, which all agree happened at Gath (2 Sam. xxi. 20; 1 Chr. xx. 6), and which, from the terms of the narrative, seems to have occurred at the same place as the others. The suggestion of Nob — which Davidson (Hebr. Text) reports as in many MSS. and which is also found in copies of the LXX. — is not admissible on account of the situation of that place. G.

GOBLET (אַגָּן: κρατήρ: crater; joined with כַּהַר to express roundness, Cant. vii. 2; Gesen. Thes. pp. 22, 39; in plur. Ex. xxiv. 6, A. V. "basons;" Is. xxii. 24, LXX. literally ἀγανώθ: crateræ: A. V. "cups"), a circular vessel for wine or other liquid. [BASIN.] H. W. P.

* GODLINESS, MYSTERY OF. [BAPTISM, vii. 5, p. 239.]

* GOD SPEED is the translation of χαίρειν in 2 John 10, 11, the Greek form of salutation. It has been transferred from the Anglo-Saxon gódspédig, but with a different meaning there, namely, "good-speed." H.

GOG. 1. (גּוֹג: Γούγ; [Comp. Ald. Γώγ:] Gog.). A Reubenite (1 Chr. v. 4); according to the Hebrew text son of Shemaiah. The LXX. have a different text throughout the passage.

2. [MAGOG.]

3. In the Samarit. Codex and LXX. of Num. xxiv. 7, Gog is substituted for AGAG.

GO'LAN (גּוֹלָן [a circle, region, Dietr. Fürst; migration, Ges.]: Γαυλών, [in 1 Chr. vi. 71, Γωλάν; Alex. also in Josh. Γωλαν: Gaulon, exc. Deut. Golm]), a city of Bashan (בַּבָּשָׁן גּוֹלָן, Deut. iv. 43) allotted out of the half tribe of Manasseh to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 27), and one of the three cities of refuge east of the Jordan (xx. 8). We find no further notice of it in Scripture; and though Eusebius and Jerome say it was still an important place in their time (Onom. s. v.; Reland, p. 815), its very site is now unknown. Some have supposed that the village of Nawa, on the eastern border of Jaulân, around which are extensive ruins (see Handbook for Syr. and Pal.), is identical with the ancient Golan; but for this there is not a shadow of evidence; and Nawa besides is much too far to the eastward.

The city of Golan is several times referred to by Josephus (Γαυλάνη, B. J. i. 4, § 4, and 8); he, however, more frequently speaks of the province which took its name from it, Gaulanitis (Γαυλανῖτις). When the kingdom of Israel was overthrown by the Assyrians, and the dominion of the Jews in Bashan ceased, it appears that the aboriginal tribes, before kept in subjection, but never annihilated, rose again to some power, and rent the country into provinces. Two of these provinces at least were of ancient origin [TRACHONITIS and HAURAN], and had been distinct principalities previous to the time when Og or his predecessors united them under one sceptre. Before the Babylonish captivity Bashan appears in Jewish history as one kingdom; but subsequent to that period it is spoken of as divided into four provinces — Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Batanea (Joseph. Ant. iv. 5, § 3, and 7, § 4, i. 6, § 4, xvi. 9, § 1; B. J. i. 20, f 4, iii. 3, § 1, iv. 1, § 1). It seems that when the city of Golan rose to power it became the head of a large province, the extent of which is pretty accurately given by Josephus, especially when his statements are compared with the modern divisions of Bashan. It lay east of Galilee, and north of Gadaritis (GADARA, Joseph. B. J. iii. 3, § 1). Gamala, an important town on the eastern bank of the Sea of Galilee, now called El-Husn (see Handbook for Syr. and Pal.), and the province attached to it, were included in Gaulanitis (B. J. iv. 1, § 1). But the boundary of the provinces of Gadara and Gamala must evidently have been the river Hieromax, which may therefore be regarded as the south border of Gaulanitis. The Jordan from the Sea of Galilee to its fountains at Dan and Cæsarea-Philippi, formed the western boundary (B. J. iii. 3, § 5). It is important to observe that the boundaries of the modern province of Jaulân (جولان) is the Arabic form of the Hebrew גּוֹלָן. from which is derived the Greek Γαυλανῖτις) correspond so far with those of Gaulanitis; we may, therefore, safely assume that their northern and eastern boundaries are also identical. Jaulân is bounded on the north by Jedûr (the ancient Ituræa), and on the east by Hauran [HAURAN]. The principal cities of Gaulanitis were Golan, Hippos, Gamala, Julias or Bethsaida (Mark viii. 22), Seleucia, and Sogane (Joseph. B. J. iii. 3, § 1, and 5, iv. 1, § 1). The site of Bethsaida is at a small tell on the left bank of the Jordan [BETHSAIDA]; the ruins of Kul'at el-Husn mark the place of Gamala; but nothing definite is known of the others.

The greater part of Gaulanitis is a flat and fertile table-land, well-watered, and clothed with luxuriant grass. It is probably to this region the name Mishor (מִישׁוֹר) is given in 1 K. xx. 23, 25 — "the plain" in which the Syrians were overthrown by the Israelites, near Aphek, which perhaps stood upon the site of the modern Fik (Stanley, App. § 6; Handbook for S. and P. p. 425). The western side of Gaulanitis, along the Sea of Galilee, is steep, rugged, and bare. It is upwards of 2,500 feet in height, and when seen from the city of Tiberias resembles a mountain range, though in reality it is only the supporting wall of the plateau. It was this remarkable feature which led the ancient geographers to suppose that the mountain range of Gilead was joined to Lebanon (Reland, p. 342). Further north, along the bank of the upper Jordan, the plateau breaks down in a series of terraces, which, though somewhat rocky, are covered with rich soil, and clothed in spring with the most luxuriant herbage, spangled with multitudes of bright and beautiful flowers. A range of low, round-topped, picturesque hills, extends southwards for nearly 20 miles from the base of Hermon along the western edge of the plateau. These are in places covered with noble forests of prickly oak and terebinth. Gaulanitis was once densely populated, but it is now almost completely deserted. The writer has a list of the towns and villages which it once contained; and in it are the names of 127 places, all of which, with the exception of about eleven, are now uninhabited. Only a few patches of its soil are cultivated; and the very best of its pasture is lost — the tender grass of early spring. The flocks of the Turkmâns and el-Fudhl Arabs — the only tribes that remain permanently in this region — are not able to consume it; and the 'Anazeh, those "children of the East" who spread over the land like locusts, and "whose camels are without number" (Judg. vii. 12), only arrive about the beginning of May. At that season the whole country is covered with them — their black tents pitched in circles near the fountains; their cattle thickly dotting the vast plain; and their fierce cavaliers roaming far and wide, "their hand against every man, and every man's hand against them."

GOLD, the most valuable of metals, from its color, lustre, weight, ductility, and other useful properties (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 19). Hence it is used as an emblem of purity (Job xxiii. 10) and nobility (Lam. iv. 1). There are six Hebrew words used to denote it, and four of them occur in Job xxviii. 15, 16, 17. These are:

1. זָהָב, the common name, connected with זָהַב (to be yellow), as geld, from gel, yellow. Various epithets are applied to it: as, "fine" (2 Chr. iii. 5), "refined" (1 Chr. xxviii. 18), "pure" (Ex. xxv. 11). In opposition to these, "beaten" gold (זָהָב שָׁחוּט) is probably mixed gold; LXX. ἐλατός; used of Solomon's shields (1 K. x. 16).

2. כֶּסֶף (κεμήλιον) treasured, i. e. fine gold (1 K. vi. 20, vii. 49, &c.). Many names of precious substances in Hebrew come from roots signifying concealment, as טֶטָמוֹן (Gen. xliii. 23, A. V. "treasure").

3. פָּז, pure or native gold (Job xxviii. 17; Cant. v. 15; probably from פָּזַז, to separate). Rosenmüller (Alterthumsk. iv. p. 49) makes it come from a Syriac root meaning solid or massy; but חָרוּץ (2 Chr. ix. 17) corresponds to מוּפָז (1 K. x. 18). The LXX. render it by λίθος τίμιος, χρύσιον ἄπυρον (Is. xiii. 12; Theodot. ἄπεφθον; comp. Thuc. ii. 13; Plin. xxxiii. 19, obrussa). In Ps. cxix. 127, the LXX. render it τοπάζιον (A. V. "fine gold"); but Schleusner happily conjectures τὸ πάζιον, the Hebrew word being adopted to avoid the repetition of χρύσος (Thes. s. v. τόπαζ; Hesych. s. v. πάζιον).

4. גֶּבֶשׁ, gold earth, or a mass of raw ore (Job xxii. 24, ἄπυρον, A. V. "gold as dust").

The poetical names for gold are:

1. כֶּתֶם (also implying something concealed); LXX. χρύσιον; and in Is. xiii. 12, λίθος πολυτελής. In Job xxxvii. 22, it is rendered in A. V. "fair weather;" LXX. νέφη χρυσαυγοῦντα. (Comp. Zech. iv. 12.)

2. חָרוּץ, = dug out (Prov. viii. 10), a general name, which has become special, Ps. lxviii. 13, where it cannot mean gems, as some suppose (Bochart, Hieroz. tom. ii. p. 9). Michaelis connects the word chârûtz with the Greek χρύσος.

Gold was known from the very earliest times (Gen. ii. 11). Pliny attributes the discovery of it (at Mount Pangæus), and the art of working it, to Cadmus (H. N. vii. 57); and his statement is adopted by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. 363, ed. Pott.). It was at first chiefly used for ornaments, etc. (Gen. xxiv. 22); and although Abraham is said to have been "very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold" (Gen. xiii. 2), yet no mention of it as used in purchases, is made till after his return from Egypt. Coined money was not known to the ancients (e. g. Hom. Il. vii. 473) till a comparatively late period; and on the Egyptian tombs gold is represented as being weighed in rings for commercial purposes. (Comp. Gen. xliii. 21.) No coins are found in the ruins of Egypt or Assyria (Layard's Nin. ii. 418). "Even so late as the time of David gold was not used as a standard of value, but was considered merely as a very precious article of commerce, and was weighed like other articles" (Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 115, 1 Chr. xxi. 25).

Gold was extremely abundant in ancient times (1 Chr. xxii. 14; 2 Chr. i. 15, ix. 9; Nah. ii. 9; Dan. iii. 1); but this did not depreciate its value, because of the enormous quantities consumed by the wealthy in furniture, etc. (1 K. vi. 22, x. passim; Cant. iii. 9, 10; Esth. i. 6; Jer. x. 9; comp. Hom. Od. xix. 55; Herod. ix. 82). Probably too the art of gilding was known extensively, being applied even to the battlements of a city (Herod. i. 98, and other authorities quoted by Layard, ii. 264).

The chief countries mentioned as producing gold are Arabia, Sheba, and Ophir (1 K. ix. 28, x. 1; Job xxviii. 16: in Job xxii. 24, the word Ophir is used for gold). Gold is not found in Arabia now (Niebuhr's Travels, p. 141), but it used to be (Artemidor. ap. Strab. xvi. 3, 18, where he speaks of an Arabian river ψῆγμα χρυσοῦ καταφέρων). Diodorus also says that it was found there native (ἄπυρον) in good-sized nuggets (βωλάρια). Some suppose that Ophir was an Arabian port to which gold was brought (comp. 2 Chr. ii. 7, ix. 10). Other gold-bearing countries were Uphaz (Jer. x. 9; Dan. x. 5) and Parvaim (2 Chr. iii. 6).

Metallurgic processes are mentioned in Ps. lxvi. 10, Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; and in Is. xlvi. 6, the trade of goldsmith (cf. Judg. xvii. 4, צֹרֵף) is alluded to in connection with the overlaying of idols with gold-leaf (Rosenmüller's Minerals of Script. pp. 46–51). [HANDICRAFT.] F. W. F.

* GOLDSMITH. [HANDICRAFT.]

GOL'GOTHA (Γολγοθᾶ [a skull]: Golgotha), the Hebrew name of the spot at which our Lord was crucified (Matt. xxvii. 33; Mark xv. 22; John xix. 17). By these three Evangelists it is interpreted to mean the "place of a skull." St. Luke, in accordance with his practice in other cases (compare Gabbatha, Gethsemane, etc.), omits the Hebrew term and gives only its Greek equivalent, κρανίον. The word Calvary, which in Luke xxiii. 33 is retained in the A. V. from the Vulgate, as the rendering of κρανίον, obscures the statement of St. Luke, whose words are really as follows: "the place which is called 'a skull'" — not, as in the other Gospels, κρανίου, "of a skull;" thus employing the Greek term exactly as they do the Hebrew one. [CALVARY, Amer. ed.]. This Hebrew, or rather Chaldee, term, was doubtless גֻּלְגַּלְתָּא, Gulgolta, in pure Hebrew גֻּלְגֹּלֶת, applied to the skull on account of its round globular form, that being the idea at the root of the word.

Two explanations of the name are given: (1) that it was a spot where executions ordinarily took place, and therefore abounded in skulls; but according to the Jewish law these must have been buried, and therefore were no more likely to confer a name on the spot than any other part of the skeleton. In this case too the Greek should be τόπος κρανίων, "of skulls," instead of κρανίου, "of a skull," still less "a skull" as in the Hebrew, and in the Greek of St. Luke. Or (2) it may come from the look or form of the spot itself, bald, round, and skull-like, and therefore a mound or hillock, in accordance with the common phrase — for which there is no direct authority — "Mount Calvary." Whichever of these is the correct explanation — and there is apparently no means of deciding with certainty — Golgotha seems to have been a known spot. This is to be gathered from the way in which it is mentioned in the Gospels, each except St. Matthew[a] having the definite article — "the place Golgotha" — "the place which is called a skull" — "the place (A. V. omits the article) called of, or after, a skull." It was "outside the gate," ἔξω τῆς πύλης (Heb. xiii. 12) but close to the city, ἐγγὺς τῆς πόλεως (John xix. 20); apparently near a thoroughfare on which there were passers-by. This road or path led out of the "country"[b] (ἀγρός). It was probably the ordinary spot for executions. Why should it have been otherwise? To those at least who carried the sentence into effect, Christ was but an ordinary criminal; and there is not a word to indicate that the soldiers in "leading Him away" went to any other than the usual place for what must have been a common operation. However, in the place (ἐν τῷ τόπῳ) itself — at the very spot — was a garden or orchard (κῆπος).

These are all the indications of the nature and situation of Golgotha which present themselves in the N. T. Its locality in regard to Jerusalem is fully examined in the description of the city. [JERUSALEM.]

A tradition at one time prevailed that Adam was buried on Golgotha, that from his skull it derived its name, and that at the Crucifixion the drops of Christ's blood fell on the skull and raised Adam to life, whereby the ancient prophecy quoted by St. Paul in Eph. v. 14 received its fulfillment — "Awake, thou Adam that sleepest," — so the old versions appear to have run — "and arise from the dead, for Christ shall touch thee" (ἐπιψαύσει for ἐπιφαύσει). See Jerome, Comm. on Matt. xxvii. 33, and the quotation in Reland, Pal. p. 860; also Sæwulf, in Early Travels, p. 39. The skull commonly introduced in early pictures of the Crucifixion refers to this.

A connection has been supposed to exist between GOATH and Golgotha, but at the best this is mere conjecture, and there is not in the original the same similarity between the two names — נעה and גלגלתא — which exists in their English or Latin garb, and which probably occasioned the suggestion. G.

GOLI'ATH (גָּלְיָת [splendor, brilliant, Dietr.; but see below]: Γολιάθ: Goliath), a famous giant of Gath, who "morning and evening for forty days" defied the armies of Israel (1 Sam. xvii.). He was possibly descended from the old Rephaim, of whom a scattered remnant took refuge with the Philistines after their dispersion by the Ammonites (Deut. ii. 20, 21; 2 Sam. xxi. 22). Some trace of this tradition may be preserved in the giant's name, if it be connected with גֹּלָה, an exile. Simonis, however, derives it from an Arabic word meaning "stout" (Gesen. Thes. s. v.). His height was "six cubits and a span," which, taking the cubit at 21 inches, would make him 10½ feet high. But the LXX. and Josephus read "four cubits and a span" (1 Sam. xvii. 4; Joseph. Ant. vi. 9, § 1). This will make him about the same size as the royal champion slain by Antimenidas, brother of Alcæus (ἀπολείποντα μίαν μόνον παχέων ἀπὸ πέμπων, ap. Strab. xiii. p. 617, with Müller's emendation). Even on this computation Goliath would be, as Josephus calls him, ἀνὴρ παμμεγεθέστατος — a truly enormous man.

The circumstances of the combat are in all respects Homeric; free from any of the puerile legends which oriental imagination subsequently introduced into it — as for instance that the stones used by David called out to him from the brook, "By our means you shall slay the giant," etc. (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. i. 3, p. 111 ff.; D'Herbelot, s. v. Gialut). The fancies of the Rabbis are yet more extraordinary. After the victory David cut off Goliath's head (1 Sam. xvii. 51; comp. Herod. iv. 6; Xenoph. Anab. v. 4, § 17; Niebuhr mentions a similar custom among the Arabs, Descr. Winer, s. v.), which he brought to Jerusalem (probably after his accession to the throne, Ewald, Gesch. iii. 94), while he hung the armor in his tent.

The scene of this famous combat was the Valley of the Terebinth, between Shochoh and Azekah, probably among the western passes of Benjamin, although a confused modern tradition has given the name of 'Ain Jâlûd (spring of Goliath) to the spring of Harod, or "trembling" (Stanley, p. 342; Judg. vii. 1). [ELAH, VALLEY OF.]

In 2 Sam. xxi. 19, we find that another Goliath of Gath, of whom it is also said that "the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam," was slain by Elhanan, also a Bethlehemite. St. Jerome (Quæst. Hebr. ad loc.) makes the unlikely conjecture that Elhanan was another name of David. The A. V. here interpolates the words "the brother of," from 1 Chr. xx. 5, where this giant is called "Lahmi." This will be found fully examined under ELHANAN.

In the title of the Psalm added to the Psalter in the LXX. we find τῷ Δαυὶδ πρὸς τὸν Γολιάθ; and although the allusions are vague, it is perhaps possible that this Psalm may have been written after the victory. This Psalm is given at length under DAVID, p. 554 b. It is strange that we find no more definite allusions to this combat in Hebrew poetry; but it is the opinion of some that the song now attributed to Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1–10) was originally written really in commemoration of David's triumph on this occasion (Thenius, die Bücher Sam. p. 8; comp. Bertholdt, Einl. iii. 915; Ewald, Poet. Bücher des A. B. i. 111).

By the Mohammedans Saul and Goliath are called Taluth and Galuth (Jalut in Koran), perhaps for the sake of the homoioteleuton, of which they are so fond (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. i. 3, p. 28). Abulfeda mentions a Canaanite king of the name Jalut (Hist. Anteislam. p. 176, in Winer s. v.); and, according to Ahmed al-Fassi, Gialout was a dynastic name of the old giant-chiefs (D'Herbelot, s. v. Falasthin). [GIANTS.] F. W. F.

[a] St. Matthew too has the article in Codex B.

[b] But the Vulgate has de villa.

GO'MER (גֹּמֶר [completeness]: Γαμέρ; [in Ezek., Γομέρ:] Gomer). 1. The eldest son of Japheth, and the father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gen. x. 2, 3; [1 Chr. i. 5, 6]). His name is subsequently noticed but once (Ez. xxxviii. 6) as an ally or subject of the Scythian king Gog. He is generally recognized as the progenitor of the early Cimmerians, of the later Cimbri and the other branches of the Celtic family, and of the modern Gael and Cymry, the latter preserving with very slight deviation the original name. The Cimmerians, when first known to us, occupied the Tauric Chersonese, where they left traces of their presence in the ancient names, Cimmerian Bosphorus, Cimmerian Isthmus, Mount Cimmerium, the district Cimmeria, and particularly the Cimmerian walls (Her. iv. 12, 45, 100: Æsch. Prom. Vinct. 729), and in the modern name Crimea. They forsook this abode under the pressure of the Scythian tribes, and during the early part of the 7th century B. C. they poured over the western part of Asia Minor, committing immense devastation, and defying for more than half a century the power of the Lydian kings. They were finally expelled by Alyattes, with the exception of a few, who settled at Sinope and Antandrus. It was about the same period that Ezekiel noticed them, as acting in conjunction with Armenia (Togarmah) and Magog (Scythia). The connection between Gomer and Armenia is supported by the tradition, preserved by Moses of Chorene (i. 11), that Gamir was the ancestor of the Haichian kings of the latter country. After the expulsion of the Cimmerians from Asia Minor their name disappears in its original form; but there can be little reasonable doubt that both the name and the people are to be recognized in the Cimbri, whose abodes were fixed during the Roman Empire in the north and west of Europe, particularly in the Cimbric Chersonese (Denmark), on the coast between the Elbe and Rhine, and in Belgium, whence they had crossed to Britain, and occupied at one period the whole of the British isles, but were ultimately driven back to the western and northern districts, which their descendants still occupy in two great divisions, the Gael in Ireland and Scotland, the Cymry in Wales. The latter name preserves a greater similarity to the original Gomer than either of the classical forms, the consonants being identical. The link to connect Cymry with Cimbri is furnished by the forms Cambria and Cumber-land. The whole Celtic race may therefore be regarded as descended from Gomer, and thus the opinion of Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 1), that the Galatians were sprung from him, may be reconciled with the view propounded. Various other conjectures have been hazarded on the subject: Bochart (Phaleg, iii. 81) identifies the name on etymological grounds with Phrygia; Wahl (Asien, i. 274) proposes Cappadocia; and Kalisch (Comm. on Gen.) seeks to identify it with the Chomari, a nation in Bactriana, noticed by Ptolemy (vi. 11, § 6).

2. [Γόμερ.] The daughter of Diblaim, and concubine of Hosea (i. 3). The name is significant of a maiden, ripe for marriage, and connects well with the name DIBLAIM, which is also derived from the subject of fruit. W. L. B.

GOMOR'RAH (עֲמֹרָה, Gh'morah, probably submersion, from עָמַר, an unused root; in Arabic غمر, ghamara, is to "overwhelm with water": Γόμορρα: Gomorrha), one of the five "cities of the plain," or "vale of Siddim," that under their respective kings joined battle there with Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2–8) and his allies, by whom they were discomfited till Abram came to the rescue. Four out of the five were afterwards destroyed by the Lord with fire from heaven (Gen. xix. 23–29). One of them only, Zoar or Bela, which was its original name, was spared at the request of Lot, in order that he might take refuge there. Of these Gomorrah seems to have been only second to Sodom in importance, as well as in the wickedness that led to their overthrow. What that atrocity was may be gathered from Gen. xix. 4–8. Their miserable fate is held up as a warning to the children of Israel (Deut. xxix. 23); as a precedent for the destruction of Babylon (Is. xiii. 19, and Jer. l. 40), of Edom (Jer. xlix. 18), of Moab (Zeph. ii. 9), and even of Israel (Am. iv. 11). By St. Peter in the N. T., and by St. Jude (2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude, vv. 4–7), it is made "an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly," or "deny Christ." Similarly their wickedness rings as a proverb throughout the prophecies (e. g. Deut. xxxii. 32; Is. i. 9, 10; Jer. xxiii. 14). Jerusalem herself is there unequivocally called Sodom, and her people Gomorrah, for their enormities; just in the same way that the corruptions of the Church of Rome have caused her to be called Babylon. On the other hand, according to the N. T., there is a sin which exceeds even that of Sodom and Gomorrah, that, namely, of which Tyre and Sidon, Capernaum, Chorazin, and Bethsaida were guilty, when they "repented not," in spite of "the mighty works" which they had witnessed (Matt. x. 15); and St. Mark has ranged under the same category all those who would not receive the preaching of the Apostles (vi. 11).

To turn to their geographical position, one passage of Scripture seems expressly to assert that the vale of Siddim had become the "salt," or dead, "sea" (Gen. xiv. 3), called elsewhere too the "sea of the plain" (Josh. xii. 3); the expression, however, occurs antecedently to their overthrow.[a] Josephus (Ant. i. 9) says that the lake Asphaltites or Dead Sea, was formed out of what used to be the valley where Sodom stood; but elsewhere he declares that the territory of Sodom was not submerged in the lake (B. J. iv. 8, § 4), but still existed parched and burnt up, as is the appearance of that region still: and certainly nothing in Scripture would lead to the idea that they were destroyed by submersion — though they may have been submerged afterwards when destroyed — for their destruction is expressly attributed to the brimstone and fire rained upon them from heaven (Gen. xix. 24; see also Deut. xxix. 23, and Zeph. ii. 9; also St. Peter and St. Jude before cited). And St. Jerome in the Onomasticon says of Sodom, "civitas

[a] This view, we think, is incorrect. We have no reason to regard the record (Gen. xiv. 3), at least in the form in which we have it, as older than the date of the destruction of the cities. The next remark also in regard to Josephus must be an inadvertence. Josephus does not affirm that Sodom was in the vale of Siddim. He says that it lay near it, and his two testimonies, quoted in the article above, are entirely consistent. S. W.

impiorum divino igne consumpta juxta mare mortuum," and so of the rest (ibid. s. v.). The whole subject is ably handled by Cellarius (ap. Ugol. Thesaur. vii. pp. dcexxxix.–lxxviii.), though it is not always necessary to agree with his conclusions. Among modern travellers, Dr. Robinson shows that the Jordan could not have ever flowed into the gulf of 'Akabah; on the contrary that the rivers of the desert themselves flow northwards into the Dead Sea. [ARABAH.] And this, added to the configuration and deep depression of the valley, serves in his opinion to prove that there must have been always a lake there, into which the Jordan flowed; though he admits it to have been of far less extent than it now is, and even the whole southern part of it to have been added subsequently to the overthrow of the four cities, which stood, according to him, at the original south end of it, Zoar probably being situated in the mouth of Wady Kerak, as it opens upon the isthmus of the peninsula. In the same plain, he remarks, were slime pits, or wells of bitumen (Gen. xiv. 10; "salt-pits" also, Zeph. ii. 9); while the enlargement of the lake he considers to have been caused by some convulsion or catastrophe of nature connected with the miraculous destruction of the cities — volcanic agency, that of earthquakes and the like (Bibl. Res. ii. 187–192, 2d ed.). He might have adduced the great earthquake at Lisbon as a case in point. The great difference of level between the bottoms of the northern and southern ends of the lake, the former 1,300, the latter only 13 feet below the surface, singularly confirms the above view (Stanley, S. & P. p. 287, 2d ed.). Pilgrims of Palestine formerly saw, or fancied that they saw, ruins of towns at the bottom of the sea, not far from the shore (see Maundrell, Early Travels, p. 454). M. de Saulcy was the first to point out ruins along the shores (the Redjom-el-Mezorrhel; and more particularly apropos to our present subject, Goumran on the N. W.). Both perhaps are right. Gomorrah (as its very name implies) may have been more or less submerged with the other three, subsequently to their destruction by fire; while the ruins of Zoar, inasmuch as it did not share their fate, would be found, if found at all, upon the shore. (See generally Mr. Isaac's Dead Sea.) [SODOM, Amer. ed.]

GOMOR'RHA, the manner in which the name GOMORRAH is written in the A. V. of the Apocryphal books and the New Testament, following the Greek form of the word, Γόμορρα (2 Esdr. ii. 8; Matt. x. 15; Mark vi. 11; Rom. ix. 29; Jude 7; 2 Pet. ii. 6).

* GOODMAN OF THE HOUSE (οἰκοδεσπότης), employed in the A. V. of the master of the house (Matt. xx. 11), and simply equivalent to that expression, without any reference to moral character. This was a common usage when the A. V. was made. The Greek term being the same, there was no good reason for saying "goodman of the house" in that verse, and "house holder" at the beginning of the parable (ver. 1). See Trench, Authorized Version, p. 96 (1859). H.

GOPHER WOOD. Only once in Gen. vi. 14. The Hebrew עֲצֵי גֹפֶר, trees of Gopher, does not occur in the cognate dialects. The A. V. has made no attempt at translation: the LXX. (ξύλα τετράγωνα) and Vulgate (ligna levigata), elicited by metathesis of ר and ה (גרה = גפר), the former having reference to square blocks, cut by the axe, the latter to planks smoothed by the plane, have not found much favor with modern commentators.

The conjectures of cedar (Aben Ezra, Onk Jonath. and Rabbins generally), wood most proper to float (Kimchi), the Greek κεδρελάτη (Jun Tremell.; Buxt.), pine (Avenar.; Munst.), turpentine (Castalio), are little better than gratuitous. The rendering cedar has been defended by Pelletier, who refers to the great abundance of this tree in Asia, and the durability of its timber.

The Mohammedan equivalent is sag, by which Herbelot understands the Indian plane-tree. Two principal conjectures, however, have been proposed: (1.) By Is. Vossius (Diss. de LXX. Interp. c. 12) that גֹּפֶר = כֹּפֶר, resin; whence עֲצֵי גֹ, meaning any trees of the resinous kind, such as pine, fir, etc. (2.) By Fuller (Miscell. Sac. iv. 5), Bochart (Phaleg, i. 4), Celsius (Hierobot. pt. i. p. 328), Hasse (Entdeckungen, pt. ii. p. 78), that Gopher is cypress, in favor of which opinion (adopted by Gesen. Lex.) they adduce the similarity in sound of gopher and cypress (κυπαρ = γοφερ); the suitability of the cypress for ship-building; and the fact that this tree abounded in Babylonia, and more particularly in Adiabene, where it supplied Alexander with timber for a whole fleet (Arrian. vii. p. 161, ed. Steph.).

A tradition is mentioned in Eutychius (Annals, p. 34) to the effect that the Ark was made of the wood Sadj, by which is probably meant not the ebony, but the Juniperus Sabina, a species of cypress (Bochart and Cels.; Rosenm. Schol. ad Gen. vi. 14, and Alterthumsk. vol. iv. pt. 1). GOR'GIAS (Γοργίας; [Alex. 1 Macc. iii. 38, 2 Macc. xii. 35, 37, Γοργειας; 1 Macc. iv. 5, Κορ-γιας]), a general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. iii. 38, ἀνὴρ δυνατὸς τῶν φίλων τοῦ βασιλέως; cf. 2 Macc. viii. 9), who was appointed by his regent Lysias to a command in the expedition against Judæa B. C. 166, in which he was defeated by Judas Maccabæus with great loss (1 Macc. iv. 1 ff.). At a later time (B. C. 164) he held a garrison in Jamnia, and defeated the forces of Joseph and Azarias, who attacked him contrary to the orders of Judas (1 Macc. v. 56 ff.; Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 6; 2 Macc. xii. 32). The account of Gorgias in 2 Macc. is very obscure. He is represented there as acting in a military capacity (2 Macc. x. 14, στρατηγὸς τῶν τόπων (?), hardly of Cœle-Syria, as Grimm (l. c.) takes it), apparently in concert with the Idumæans, and afterwards he is described, according to the present text as, "governor of Idumæa" (2 Macc. xii. 32), though it is possible (Grotius, Grimm, l. c.) that the reading is an error for "governor of Jamnia" (Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 6, ὁ τῆς Ἰαμνείας στρατηγός). The hostility of the Jews towards him is described in strong terms (2 Macc. xii. 35. τὸν κατάρατον, A. V. "that cursed man"); and while his success is only noticed in passing, his defeat and flight are given in detail, though confusedly (2 Macc. xii. 34–38; cf. Joseph. l. c.).

The name itself was borne by one of Alexander's generals, and occurs at later times among the eastern Greeks. B. F. W.

GORTY'NA (Γόρτυναι [Γόρτυνα in 1 Macc.], in classical writers, Γόρτυνα or Γορτύν: [Gortyna]), a city of Crete, and in ancient times its most important city, next to Cnossus. The only direct Biblical interest of Gortyna is in the fact that it appears from 1 Macc. xv. 23 to have contained Jewish residents. [CRETE.] The circumstance alluded to in this passage took place in the reign of Ptolemy Physcon; and it is possible that the Jews had increased in Crete during the reign of his predecessor Ptolemy Philometor, who received many of them into Egypt, and who also rebuilt some parts of Gortyna (Strab. x. p. 478). This city was nearly half-way between the eastern and western extremities of the island; and it is worth while to notice that it was near Fair Havens; so that St. Paul may possibly have preached the gospel there, when on his voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 8, 9). Gortyna seems to have been the capital of the island under the Romans. For the remains on the old site and in the neighborhood, see the Museum of Classical Antiquities, ii. 277–286.

GO'SHEN (גֹּשֶׁן: Γεσέμ; [Gen. xlvi. 29, Ἡρώων πόλις; for ver. 28 see below:] Gessen), a word of uncertain etymology, the name of a part of Egypt where the Israelites dwelt for the whole period of their sojourn in that country. It is usually called the "land of Goshen," אֶרֶץ גֹּשֶׁן, but also Goshen simply. It appears to have borne another name, "the land of Rameses," אֶרֶץ רַעַמְסֵס (Gen. xlvii. 11), unless this be the name of a district of Goshen. The first mention of Goshen is in Joseph's message to his father: "Thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me" (Gen. xlv. 10). This shows that the territory was near the usual royal residence or the residence of Joseph's Pharaoh. The dynasty to which we assign this king, the fifteenth [EGYPT; JOSEPH], appears to have resided part of the year at Memphis, and part of the year, at harvest-time, at Avaris on the Bubastite or Pelusiac branch of the Nile: this, Manetho tells us, was the custom of the first king (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 14). In the account of the arrival of Jacob it is said of the patriarch: "He sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to direct his face unto Goshen: and they came into the land of Goshen. And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen" (Gen. xlvi. 28, 29). This land was therefore between Joseph's residence at the time and the frontier of Palestine, and apparently the extreme province towards that frontier. The advice that Joseph gave his brethren as to their conduct to Pharaoh further characterizes the territory: "When Pharaoh shall call you, and shall say, What [is] your occupation? Then ye shall say, Thy servants have been herdsmen of cattle (אַנְשֵׁי מִקְנֶה) from our youth even until now, both we [and] also our fathers: that ye may dwell in the land of Goshen; for every shepherd (רֹעֵה צֹאן) [is] an abomination unto the Egyptians" (xlvi. 33, 34). It is remarkable that in Coptic ϣⲥⲱⲥ signifies both "a shepherd" and "disgrace" and the like (Rosellini, Monumenti Storici, i. 177). This passage shows that Goshen was scarcely regarded as a part of Egypt Proper, and was not peopled by Egyptians — characteristics that would positively indicate a frontier province. But it is not to be inferred that Goshen had no Egyptian inhabitants at this period: at the time of the ten plagues such are distinctly mentioned. That there was, moreover, a foreign population besides the Israelites, seems evident from the account of the calamity of Ephraim's house [BERIAH] and the mention of the עֶרֶב רַב who went out at the Exodus (Ex. xii. 38), notices referring to the earlier and the later period of the sojourn. The name Goshen itself appears to be Hebrew, or Semitic — although we do not venture with Jerome to derive it from גָּשַׁם — for it also occurs as the name of a district and of a town in the south of Palestine (infra, 2), where we could scarcely expect an appellation of Egyptian origin unless given after the Exodus, which in this case does not seem likely. It is also noticeable that some of the names of places in Goshen or its neighborhood, as certainly Migdol and Baal-zephon, are Semitic [BAAL-ZEPHON], the only positive exceptions being the cities Pithom and Rameses, built during the oppression. The next mention of Goshen confirms the previous inference that its position was between Canaan and the Delta (Gen. xlvii. 1). The nature of the country is indicated more clearly than in the passage last quoted in the answer of Pharaoh to the request of Joseph's brethren, and in the account of their settling: "And Pharaoh spake unto Joseph, saying, Thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee: the land of Egypt [is] before thee: in the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell: in the land of Goshen let them dwell: and if thou knowest [any] men of activity among them, then make them rulers over my cattle. . . . And Joseph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharaoh had commanded" (Gen. xlvii. 5, 6, 11). Goshen was thus a pastoral country where some of Pharaoh's cattle were kept. The expression "in the best of the land," בְּמֵיטַב הָאָרֶץ (ἐν τῇ βελτίστῃ γῇ, in optimo loco), must, we think, be relative, the best of the land for a pastoral people (although we do not accept Michaelis' reading "pastures" by comparison with מִרְעֶה, Suppl. p. 1072; see Gesen. Thes. s. v. מיטב), for in the matter of fertility the richest parts of Egypt are those nearest to the Nile, a position which, as will be seen, we cannot assign to Goshen. The sufficiency of this tract for the Israelites, their prosperity there, and their virtual separation, as is evident from the account of the plagues, from the great body of the Egyptians, must also be borne in mind. The clearest indications of the exact position of Goshen are those afforded by the narrative of the Exodus. The Israelites set out from the town of Rameses in the land of Goshen, made two days' journey to "the edge of the wilderness," and in one day more reached the Red Sea. At the starting-point two routes lay before them, "the way of the land of the Philistines . . . that [was] near," and "the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (Ex. xiii. 17, 18). From these indications we infer that the land of Goshen must have in part been near the eastern side of the ancient Delta, Rameses lying within the valley now called the Wâdi-t-Tumeylât, about thirty miles in a direct course from the ancient western shore of the Arabian Gulf [EXODUS, THE].

The results of the foregoing examination of Biblical evidence are that the land of Goshen lay between the eastern part of the ancient Delta and the western border of Palestine, that it was scarcely a part of Egypt Proper, was inhabited by other foreigners besides the Israelites, and was in its geographical names rather Semitic than Egyptian; that it was a pasture-land, especially suited to a shepherd-people, and sufficient for the Israelites, who there prospered, and were separate from the main body of the Egyptians; and lastly, that one of its towns lay near the western extremity of the Wádi-t-Tumeylát. These indications, except only that of sufficiency, to be afterwards considered, seem to us decisively to indicate the Wádi-t-Tumeylát, the valley along which anciently flowed the canal of the Red Sea. Other identifications seem to us to be utterly untenable. If with Lepsius we place Goshen below Heliopolis, near Bubastis and Bilbeys, the distance from the Red Sea of three days' journey of the Israelites, and the separate character of the country, are violently set aside. If we consider it the same as the Bucolia, we have either the same difficulty as to the distance, or we must imagine a route almost wholly through the wilderness, instead of only for the last third or less of its distance.

Having thus concluded that the land of Goshen appears to have corresponded to the Wádi-t-Tumeylát, we have to consider whether the extent of this tract would be sufficient for the sustenance of the Israelites. The superficial extent of the Wádi-t-Tumeylát, if we include the whole cultivable part of the natural valley, which may somewhat exceed that of the tract bearing this appellation, is probably under 60 square geographical miles. If we suppose the entire Israelite population at the time of the Exodus to have been 1,800,000, and the whole population, including Egyptians and foreigners other than the Israelites, about 2,000,000, this would give no less than between 30,000 and 40,000 inhabitants to the square mile, which would be half as dense as the ordinary population of an eastern city. It must be remembered, however, that we need not suppose the Israelites to have been limited to the valley for pasture, but like the Arabs to have led their flocks into fertile tracts of the deserts around, and that we have taken for our estimate an extreme sum, that of the people at the Exodus. For the greater part of the sojourn their numbers must have been far lower, and before the Exodus they seem to have been partly spread about the territory of the oppressor, although collected at Rameses at the time of their departure. One very large place, like the Shepherd-stronghold of Avaris, which Manetho relates to have had at the first a garrison of 240,000 men, would also greatly diminish the disproportion of population to superficies. The very small superficial extent of Egypt in relation to the population necessary to the construction of the vast monuments, and the maintenance of the great armies of the Pharaohs, requires a different proportion to that of other countries — a condition fully explained by the extraordinary fertility of the soil. Even now, when the population is almost at the lowest point it has reached in history, when villages have replaced towns, and hamlets villages, it is still denser than that of our rich and thickly-populated Yorkshire. We do not think, therefore, that the small superficies presents any serious difficulty.

Thus far we have reasoned alone on the evidence of the Hebrew text. The LXX. version, however, presents some curious evidence which must not be passed by unnoticed. The testimony of this version in any Egyptian matter is not to be disregarded, although in this particular case too much stress should not be laid on it, since the tradition of Goshen and its inhabitants must have become very faint among the Egyptians at the time when the Pentateuch was translated, and we have no warrant for attributing to the translator or translators any more than a general and popular knowledge of Egyptian matters. In Gen. xlv. 10, for גֹּשֶׁן the LXX. has Γεσὲμ Ἀραβίας. The explanatory word may be understood either as meaning that Goshen lay in the region of Lower Egypt to the east of the Delta, or else as indicating that the Arabian Nome was partly or wholly the same. In the latter case it must be remembered that the Nomes very anciently were far more extensive than under the Ptolemies. On either supposition the passage is favorable to our identification. In Gen. xlvi. 28, instead of אַרְצָה גֹּשֶׁן, the LXX. has κατ' Ἡρῴων πόλιν, ἐν γῇ Ῥαμεσσῇ (or εἰς γῆν Ῥαμεσσῆ), seemingly identifying Rameses with Heroöpolis. It is scarcely possible to fix the site of the latter town, but there is no doubt that it lay in the valley not far from the ancient head of the Arabian Gulf. Its position is too near the gulf for the Rameses of Scripture, and it was probably chosen merely because at the time when the translation was made it was the chief place of the territory where the Israelites had been. It must be noted, however, that in Ex. i. 11, the LXX., followed by the Coptic, reads, instead of "Pithom and Raamses," τήν τε Πιεθώ, καὶ Ῥαμεσσῆ, καὶ Ὦν, ἥ ἐστιν Ἡλιούπολις. Eusebius identifies Rameses with Avaris, the Shepherd-stronghold on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile (ap. Cramer, Anecd. Paris, ii. p. 174). The evidence of the LXX. version therefore lends a general support to the theory we have advocated. [See EXODUS, THE.] R. S. P.

2. (גֹּשֶׁן: Γοσόμ: [Gosen; Josh. x. 41, in Vulg. ed. 1590,] Gessen, [ed. 1593,] Gozen) the "land" or the "country (both אֶרֶץ) of Goshen," is twice named as a district in Southern Palestine (Josh. x. 41, xi. 16). From the first of these it would seem to have lain between Gaza and Gibeon, and therefore to be some part of the maritime plain of Judah; but in the latter passage, that plain — the Shefelah, is expressly specified in addition to Goshen (here with the article). In this place too the situation of Goshen — if the order of the statement be any indication — would seem to be between the "south" and the Shefelah (A. V. "valley"). If Goshen was any portion of this rich plain, is it not possible that its fertility may have suggested the name to the Israelites? but this is not more than mere conjecture. On the other hand the name may be far older, and may retain a trace of early intercourse between Egypt and the south of the promised land. For such intercourse comp. 1 Chr. vii. 21.

3. [Γοσομ: Gosen.] A town of the same name is once mentioned in company with Debir, Socoh, and others, as in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 51). There is nothing to connect this place with the district last spoken of. It has not yet been identified. G.

GOSPELS. The name Gospel (from god and spell, Ang. Sax. good message or news, which is a translation of the Greek εὐαγγέλιον) is applied to the four inspired histories of the life and teaching of Christ contained in the New Testament, of which separate accounts will be given in their place. [MATTHEW; MARK; LUKE; JOHN.] It may be fairly said that the genuineness of these four narratives rests upon better evidence than that of any other ancient writings. They were all composed during the latter half of the first century: those of St. Matthew and St. Mark some years before the destruction of Jerusalem; that of St. Luke probably about A. D. 64; and that of St. John towards the close of the century. Before the end of the second century, there is abundant evidence that the four Gospels, as one collection, were generally used and accepted. Irenæus, who suffered martyrdom about A. D. 202, the disciple of Polycarp and Papias, who, from having been in Asia, in Gaul, and in Rome, had ample means of knowing the belief of various churches, says that the authority of the four Gospels was so far confirmed that even the heretics of his time could not reject them, but were obliged to attempt to prove their tenets out of one or other of them (Contr. Haer. iii. 11, § 7). Tertullian, in a work written about A. D. 208, mentions the four Gospels, two of them as the work of Apostles, and two as that of the disciples of Apostles (apostolici); and rests their authority on their apostolic origin (Adv. Marcion. lib. iv. c. 2). Origen, who was born about A. D. 185, and died A. D. 253, describes the Gospels in a characteristic strain of metaphor as "the [four] elements of the Church's faith, of which the whole world, reconciled to God in Christ, is composed" (In Johan. [tom. i. § 6]). Elsewhere, in commenting on the opening words of St. Luke, he draws a line between the inspired Gospels and such productions as "the Gospel according to the Egyptians," "the Gospel of the Twelve," and the like (Homil. in Luc., Opp. iii. 932 f.). Although Theophilus, who became sixth (seventh?) bishop of Antioch about A. D. 168, speaks only of "the Evangelists," without adding their names (Ad Autol. iii. pp. 124, 125), we might fairly conclude with Gieseler that he refers to the collection of four, already known in his time.[a] But from Jerome we know that Theophilus arranged the records of the four Evangelists into one work (Epist. ad Algas. iv. p. 197). Tatian, who died about A. D. 170 (?), compiled a Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Gospels. The Muratorian fragment (Muratori, Antiq. It. iii. p. 854; Routh, Rel. Sacr. vol. iv. [vol. i. ed. alt.]), which, even if it be not by Cains and of the second century, is at least a very old monument of the Roman Church, describes the Gospels of Luke and John; but time and carelessness seem to have destroyed the sentences relating to Matthew and Mark.[b] Another source of evidence is open to us, in the citations from the Gospels found in the earliest writers. Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, and Polycarp, quote passages from the Book of Proverbs on the duty of chastity, he says, "But the Evangelic voice teaches purity yet more imperatively," quoting Matt. v. 28, 32 (ibid. iii. 13). Further on, he introduces a quotation from Matthew with the expression, "The Gospel says" (ibid. iii. 14).

Among the writers who bear testimony to the general reception of the Gospels by Christians before the close of the second century, Clement might well have been mentioned, who succeeded Pantænus as president of the celebrated Catechetical School at Alexandria about A. D. 190. and was one of the most learned men of his age. His citations from all the Gospels as authoritative are not only most abundant, but he expressly speaks of "the four Gospels which have been handed down to us," in contrast with an obscure apocryphal book, "The Gospel according to the Egyptians," used by certain heretics (Strom. iii. 13, Opp. p. 553, ed. Potter). A.

a * Theophilus does not use the term "Evangelists," but speaks of "the Prophets" of the Old Testament and "the Gospels" as alike divinely inspired (Ad Autol. lib. iii. c. 12, p. 218, ed. Otto), and expressly names John as among those "moved by the Spirit," quoting John i. 1 (ibid. ii. 22, p. 120). After citing a passage from the Book of Proverbs on the duty of chastity, he says, "But the Evangelic voice teaches purity yet more imperatively," quoting Matt. v. 28, 32 (ibid. iii. 13). Further on, he introduces a quotation from Matthew with the expression, "The Gospel says" (ibid. iii. 14).

b * The Muratorian fragment expressly designates the Gospels of Luke and John as the "third" and "fourth" in order; and the imperfect sentence with which it begins applies to Mark. A note of time in the document itself appears to indicate that it was composed not far from A. D. 170, perhaps earlier; but the question of the date is not wholly free from difficulty. Recent critical editions and discussions of this interesting relic of Christian antiquity may be found in Credner's Gesch. des Neutest. Kanon, herausg. von Volkmar (Berl. 1860), pp. 141–170, 341–364; Hilgenfeld's Der Kanon u. die Kritik des N. T. (Halle, 1863), pp. 39–43; and Westcott's Hist. of the Canon of the N. T., 2d ed. (Lond. 1866), pp. 184–193, 469–480.

The statements that follow in the text in regard to early citations from the Gospels require some modification. The earliest formal quotation from any of the Gospels appears to be found in the epistle ascribed to Barnabas (see BARNABAS), where the saying "Many are called, but few chosen" is introduced by ὡς γέγραπται, "as it is written" (Barnab. c. 4; Matt. xxii. 14). With this exception, there is no express reference to any written Gospel in the remains of the so-called Apostolical Fathers. Clement of Rome (Epist. cc. 13, 46) and Polycarp (Epist. cc. 2, 7), using the expression, "The Lord said," or its equivalent, quote sayings of Christ in a form agreeing in essential meaning, but not verbally, with passages in Matthew and Luke; except that in Polycarp two short sentences, "Judge not, that ye be not judged," and "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak," are given precisely as we have them in Matthew. The epistles attributed to Ignatius have a considerable number of expressions which appear to imply an acquaintance with words of Christ preserved by Matthew and John; but they contain no formal quotation of the Gospels; and the uncertainty respecting both the authorship and the text of these epistles is such as to make it unsafe to rest any argument on them. In regard to the Apostolical Fathers in general, it is obvious that the words of Jesus and the facts in his history which they have recorded may have been derived by them from oral tradition. Their writings serve to confirm the truth of the Gospels, but cannot be appealed to as affording direct proof of their genuineness.

When we come to Justin Martyr, however, we stand on firmer ground. He, indeed, does not name the Evangelists; and it cannot be said that "many of his quotations are found verbatim in the Gospel of John." His quotations, however, from the "Memoirs of the Apostles," or "Memoirs composed by the Apostles, which are called Gospels" (Apol. i. c. 66), or as he describes them in one place more particularly, "Memoirs composed by Apostles of Christ and their companions" (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 103), are such as to leave no reasonable doubt of his use of the first three Gospels; and his use of the fourth Gospel, though contested by most of the critics of the Tübingen school, is now conceded even by Hilgenfeld (Zeitschr. f. wiss. Theol. 1865, p. 336). The subject of Justin Martyr's quotations is discussed in a masterly manner by Mr. Norton in his Genuineness of the Gospels, i. 200–239, and with fuller detail by Semisch, Die apostol. Denkwürdigkeiten des Märtyrers Justinus (Hamb. 1848), and Westcott (History of the Canon of the N. T., 2d ed., pp. 83–145). It must not be forgotten that the "Memoirs of the Apostles" used by Justin Martyr were sacred books ages from them, but not with verbal exactness The testimony of Justin Martyr (born about A. D. 99, martyred A. D. 165) is much fuller; many of his quotations are found verbatim in the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John, and possibly of St Mark also, whose words it is more difficult to separate. The quotations from St. Matthew are the most numerous. In historical references, the mode of quotation is more free, and the narrative occasionally unites those of Matthew and Luke: in a very few cases he alludes to matters not mentioned in the canonical Gospels. Besides these, St. Matthew appears to be quoted by the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, by Hegesippus, Irenæus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus. Eusebius records that Pantænus found in India (? the south of Arabia ?) Christians who used the Gospel of St. Matthew. All this shows that long before the end of the second century the Gospel of St. Matthew was in general use. From the fact that St. Mark's Gospel has few places peculiar to it, it is more difficult to identify citations not expressly assigned to him; but Justin Martyr and Athenagoras appear to quote his Gospel, and Irenæus does so by name. St. Luke is quoted by Justin, Irenæus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus; and St. John by all of these, with the addition of Ignatius, the Epistle to Diognetus, and Polycrates. From these we may conclude that before the end of the second century the Gospel collection was well known and in general use. There is yet another line of evidence. The heretical sects, as well as the Fathers of the Church, knew the Gospels; and as there was the greatest hostility between them, if the Gospels had become known in the Church after the dissension arose, the heretics would never have accepted them as genuine from such a quarter. But the Gnostics and Marcionites arose early in the second century; and therefore it is probable that the Gospels were then accepted, and thus they are traced back almost to the times of the Apostles (Olshausen). Upon a review of all the witnesses, from the Apostolic Fathers down to the Canon of the Laodicean Council in 364, and that of the third Council of Carthage in 397, in both of which the four Gospels are numbered in the Canon of Scripture, there can hardly be room for any candid person to doubt that from the first the four Gospels were recognized as genuine and as inspired; that a sharp line of distinction was drawn between them and the so-called apocryphal Gospels, of which the number was very great; that, from the citations of passages, the Gospels bearing these four names were the same as those which we possess in our Bibles under the same names; that unbelievers, like Celsus, did not deny the genuineness of the Gospels, even when rejecting their contents; and, lastly, that heretics thought it necessary to plead some kind of sanction out of the Gospels for their doctrines: nor could they venture on the easier path of an entire rejection, because the Gospels were everywhere known to be genuine. As a matter of literary history, nothing can be better established than the genuineness of the Gospels; and if in these latest times they have been assailed, it is plain that theological doubts have been concerned in the attack. The authority of the books has been denied from a wish to set aside their contents. Out of a mass of authorities the following may be selected: Norton, On the Genuineness of the Gospels, 2 vols. London, 1847; 2d ed. [3 vols. Cambridge and Boston, 1846–48]; Kirchhofer, Quellensammlung zur Geschichte des N. T. Canons, Zürich, 1844; De Wette, *Lehrbuch der hist.-krit. read in the churches on the Lord's day, in connection with the Prophets of the Old Testament (Justin, Apol. i. c. 67). The supposition that in the interval of 25 or 30 years between the time of Justin and Irenæus these books disappeared, and a wholly different set was silently substituted in their place throughout the Christian world, is utterly incredible. The "Memoirs" therefore of which Justin speaks must have been our present Gospels.

The importance of the subject will justify the insertion of the following remarks of Mr. Norton on the peculiar nature of the evidence for the genuineness of the Gospels. He observes:

"The mode of reasoning by which we may establish the genuineness of the Gospels has been regarded as much more analogous than it is to that by which we prove historically the genuineness of other ancient books; that is to say, through the mention of their titles and authors, and quotations from and notices of them, in individual, unconnected writers. This mode of reasoning is, in its nature, satisfactory; and would be so in its application to the Gospels, if the question of their genuineness did not involve the most momentous of all questions in the history of our race, — whether Christianity be a special manifestation of God's love toward man, or only the most remarkable development of those tendencies to fanaticism which exist in human nature. Reasoning in the manner supposed, we find their genuineness unequivocally asserted by Irenæus; we may satisfy ourselves that they were received as genuine by Justin Martyr; we find the Gospels of Matthew and Mark mentioned in the beginning of the second century by Papias; and to the genuineness of St. Luke's Gospel we have his own attestation in the Acts of the Apostles. Confining ourselves to this narrow mode of proof, we arrive at what in a common case would be a satisfactory conclusion. But when we endeavor to strengthen this evidence by appealing to the writings ascribed to Apostolical Fathers, we in fact weaken its force. At the very extremity of the chain of evidence, where it ought to be strongest, we are attaching defective links which will bear no weight.

But the direct historical evidence for the genuineness of the Gospels . . . is of a very different kind from what we have just been considering. It consists in the indisputable fact, that throughout a community of millions of individuals, scattered over Europe, Asia, and Africa, the Gospels were regarded with the highest reverence, as the works of those to whom they are ascribed, at so early a period that there could be no difficulty in determining whether they were genuine or not, and when every intelligent Christian must have been deeply interested to ascertain the truth. And this fact does not merely involve the testimony of the great body of Christians to the genuineness of the Gospels, it is itself a phenomenon admitting of no explanation, except that the four Gospels had all been handed down as genuine from the Apostolic age, and had every where accompanied our religion as it spread through the world." On comparing these four books one with another, a peculiar difficulty claims attention, which has had much to do with the controversy as to their genuineness. In the fourth Gospel the narrative coincides with that of the other three in a few passages only. Putting aside the account of the Passion, there are only three facts which John relates in common with the other Evangelists. Two of these are, the feeding of the five thousand, and the storm on the Sea of Galilee (ch. vi.), which appear to be introduced in connection with the discourse that arose out of the miracle, related by John alone. The third is the anointing of His feet by Mary; and it is worthy of notice that the narrative of John recalls something of each of the other three: the actions of the woman are drawn from Luke, the ointment and its value are described in Mark, and the admonition to Judas appears in Matthew; and John combines in his narrative all these particulars. Whilst the three present the life of Jesus in Galilee, John follows him into Judæa; nor should we know, but for him, that our Lord had journeyed to Jerusalem at the prescribed feasts. Only one discourse of our Lord that was delivered in Galilee, that in the 6th chapter, is recorded by John. The disciple whom Jesus loved had it put into his mind to write a Gospel which should more expressly than the others set forth Jesus as the Incarnate Word of God: if he also had in view the beginnings of the errors of Cerinthus and others before him at the time, as Irenæus and Jerome assert, the polemical purpose is quite subordinate to the dogmatic. He does not war against a temporary error, but preaches for all time that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, in order that believing we may have life through His name. Now many of the facts omitted by St. John and recorded by the rest are such as would have contributed most directly to this great design; why then are they omitted? The received explanation is the only satisfactory one, namely, that John, writing last, at the close of the first century, had seen the other Gospels, and purposely abstained from writing anew what they had sufficiently recorded. [John.]

In the other three Gospels there is a great amount of agreement. If we suppose the history that they contain to be divided into sections, in 42 of these all the three narratives coincide, 12 more are given by Matthew and Mark only, 5 by Mark and Luke only, and 14 by Matthew and Luke. To these must be added 5 peculiar to Matthew, 2 to Mark, and 9 to Luke; and the enumeration is complete. But this applies only to general coincidence as to the facts narrated: the amount of verbal coincidence, that is, the passages either verbally the same, or coinciding in the use of many of the same words, is much smaller. "By far the larger portion," says Professor Andrews Norton (Genuineness, i. p. 240, 2d ed. [Addit. Notes, p. cvii. f., Amer. ed.]), "of this verbal agreement is found in the recital of the words of others, and particularly of the words of Jesus. Thus, in Matthew's Gospel, the passages verbally coincident with one or both of the other two Gospels amount to less than a sixth part of its contents; and of this about seven eighths occur in the recital of the words of others, and only about one eighth in what, by way of distinction, I may call mere narrative, in which the Evangelist, speaking in his own person, was unrestrained in the choice of his expressions. In Mark, the proportion of coincident passages to the whole contents of the Gospel is about one sixth, of which not one fifth occurs in the narrative. Luke has still less agreement of expression with the other Evangelists. The passages in which it is found amount only to about a tenth part of his Gospel; and but an in considerable portion of it appears in the narrative — less than a twentieth part. These proportions should be further compared with those which the narrative part of each Gospel bears to that in which the words of others are professedly repeated. Matthew's narrative occupies about one fourth of his Gospel; Mark's about one half, and Luke's about one third. It may easily be computed, therefore, that the proportion of verbal coincidence found in the narrative part of each Gospel, compared with what exists in the other part, is about in the following ratios: in Matthew as one to somewhat more than two, in Mark as one to four, and in Luke as one to ten."

Without going minutely into the examination of examples, which would be desirable if space permitted, the leading facts connected with the subject may be thus summed up: The verbal and material agreement of the three first Evangelists is such as does not occur in any other authors who have written independently of one another. The verbal agreement is greater where the spoken words of others are cited than where facts are recorded; and greatest in quotations of the words of our Lord. But in some leading events, as in the call of the four first disciples, that of Matthew, and the Transfiguration, the agreement even in expression is remarkable: there are also narratives where there is no verbal harmony in the outset, but only in the crisis or emphatic part of the story (Matt. viii. 3 = Mark i. 41 = Luke v. 13, and Matt. xiv. 19, 20 = Mark vi. 41–43 = Luke ix. 16, 17). The narratives of our Lord's early life, as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, have little in common; while St. Mark does not include that part of the history in his plan. The agreement in the narrative portions of the Gospels begins with the Baptism of John, and reaches its highest point in the account of the Passion of our Lord and the facts that preceded it; so that a direct ratio might almost be said to exist between the amount of agreement and the nearness of the facts related to the Passion. After this event, in the account of His burial and resurrection, the coincidences are few. The language of all three is Greek, with Hebrew idioms: the Hebraisms are most abundant in St. Mark, and fewest in St. Luke. In quotations from the Old Testament, the Evangelists, or two of them, sometimes exhibit a verbal agreement, although they differ from the Hebrew and from the Septuagint version (Matt. iii. 3 = Mark i. 3 = Luke iii. 4. Matt. iv. 10 = Luke iv. 8. Matt. xi. 10 = Mark i. 2 = Luke vii. 27, &c.). Except as to 24 verses, the Gospel of Mark contains no principal facts which are not found in Matthew and Luke; but he often supplies details omitted by them, and these are often such as would belong to the graphic account of an eye-witness. There are no cases in which Matthew and Luke exactly harmonize, where Mark does not also coincide with them. In several places the words of Mark have something in common with each of the other narratives, so as to form a connecting link between them, where their words slightly differ. The examples of verbal agreement between Mark and Luke are not so long or so numerous as those between Matthew and Luke, and Matthew and Mark; but as to the arrangement of events Mark and Luke frequently coincide, where Matthew differs from them. These are the leading particulars; but they are very far from giving a complete notion of a phenomenon that is well worthy of that attention and reverent study of the sacred text by which alone it can be fully and fairly apprehended.

These facts exhibit the three Gospels as three distinct records of the life and works of the Redeemer, but with a greater amount of agreement than three wholly independent accounts could be expected to exhibit. The agreement would be no difficulty, without the differences; it would only mark the one divine source from which they are all derived — the Holy Spirit, who spake by the prophets. The difference of form and style, without the agreement, would offer no difficulty, since there may be a substantial harmony between accounts that differ greatly in mode of expression, and the very difference might be a guarantee of independence. The harmony and the variety, the agreement and the differences, form together the problem with which Biblical critics have occupied themselves for a century and a half.

The attempts at a solution are so many, that they can be more easily classified than enumerated. The first and most obvious suggestion would be, that the narrators made use of each other's work. Accordingly Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach, and many others, have endeavored to ascertain which Gospel is to be regarded as the first; which is copied from the first; and which is the last, and copied from the other two. It is remarkable that each of the six possible combinations has found advocates; and this of itself proves the uncertainty of the theory (Bp. Marsh's Michaelis, iii. p. 172; De Wette, Handbuch, § 22 ff.) When we are told by men of research that the Gospel of St. Mark is plainly founded upon the other two, as Griesbach, Büsching, and others assure us; and again, that the Gospel of St. Mark is certainly the primitive Gospel, on which the other two are founded, as by Wilke, Bruno Bauer, and others, both sides relying mainly on facts that lie within the compass of the text, we are not disposed to expect much fruit from the discussion. But the theory in its crude form is in itself most improbable; and the wonder is that so much time and learning have been devoted to it. It assumes that an Evangelist has taken up the work of his predecessor, and without substantial alteration has made a few changes in form, a few additions and retrenchments, and has then allowed the whole to go forth under his name. Whatever order of the three is adopted to favor the hypothesis, the omission by the second or third, of matter inserted by the first, offers a great difficulty; since it would indicate a tacit opinion that these passages are either less useful or of less authority than the rest. The nature of the alterations is not such as we should expect to find in an age little given to literary composition, and in writings so simple and unlearned as these are admitted to be. The replacement of a word by a synonym, neither more nor less apt, the omission of a saying in one place and insertion of it in another, the occasional transposition of events; these are not in conformity with the habits of a time in which composition was little studied, and only practiced as a necessity. Besides, such deviations, which in writers wholly independent of each other are only the guarantee of their independence, cannot appear in those who copy from each other, without showing a certain willfulness — an intention to contradict and alter — that seems quite irreconcilable with any view of inspiration. These general objections will be found to take a still more cogent shape against any particular form of this hypothesis: whether it is attempted to show that the Gospel of St. Mark, as the shortest, is also the earliest and primitive Gospel, or that this very Gospel bears evident signs of being the latest, a compilation from the other two; or that the order in the canon of Scripture is also the chronological order — and all these views have found defenders at no distant date — the theory that each Evangelist only copied from his predecessor offers the same general features, a plausible argument from a few facts, which is met by insuperable difficulties as soon as the remaining facts are taken in (Gieseler, pp. 35, 36; Bp. Marsh's Michaelis, vol. iii., part ii. p. 171 ff.).

The supposition of a common original from which the three Gospels were drawn, each with more or less modification, would naturally occur to those who rejected the notion that the Evangelists had copied from each other. A passage of Epiphanius has been often quoted in support of this (Hæres. li. 6), but the ἐξ αὐτῆς τῆς πηγῆς no doubt refers to the inspiring Spirit from which all three drew their authority, and not to any earthly copy, written or oral, of His divine message. The best notion of that class of speculations which would establish a written document as the common original of the three Gospels, will be gained perhaps from Bishop Marsh's (Michaelis, vol. iii. part ii.) account of Eichhorn's hypothesis, and of his own additions to it. It appeared to Eichhorn that the portions which are common to all the three Gospels were contained in a certain common document, from which they all drew. Niemeyer had already assumed that copies of such a document had got into circulation, and had been altered and annotated by different hands. Now Eichhorn tries to show, from an exact comparison of passages, that "the sections, whether great or small, which are common to St. Matthew and St. Mark, but not to St. Luke, and at the same time occupy places in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark which correspond to each other, were additions made in the copies used by St. Matthew and St. Mark, but not in the copy used by St. Luke; and, in like manner, that the sections found in the corresponding places of the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, but not contained in the Gospel of St. Matthew, were additions made in the copies used by St. Mark and St. Luke" (p. 192). Thus Eichhorn considers himself entitled to assume that he can reconstruct the original document, and also that there must have been four other documents to account for the phenomena of the text. Thus he makes —

1. The original document.
2. An altered copy which St. Matthew used.
3. An altered copy which St. Luke used.
4. A third copy, made from the two preceding, used by St. Mark.
5. A fourth altered copy, used by St. Matthew and St. Luke in common.

As there is no external evidence worth considering that this original or any of its numerous copies ever existed, the value of this elaborate hypothesis must depend upon its furnishing the only explanation, and that a sufficient one, of the facts of the text. Bishop Marsh, however, finds it necessary, in order to complete the account of the text, to raise the number of documents to eight, still without producing any external evidence for the existence of any of them; and this, on one side, deprives Eichhorn's theory of the merit of completeness, and, on the other, presents a much broader surface to the obvious objections. He assumes the existence of—

1. A Hebrew original.

2. A Greek translation.

3. A transcript of No. 1, with alterations and additions.

4. Another, with another set of alterations and additions.

5. Another, combining both the preceding, used by St. Mark, who also used No. 2.

6. Another, with the alterations and additions of No. 3, and with further additions, used by St. Matthew.

7. Another, with those of No. 4 and further additions, used by St. Luke, who also used No. 2.

8. A wholly distinct Hebrew document, in which our Lord's precepts, parables, and discourses were recorded, but not in chronological order; used both by St. Matthew and St. Luke.

To this it is added, that "as the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke contain Greek translations of Hebrew materials, which were incorporated into St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, the person who translated St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel into Greek frequently derived assistance from the Gospel of St. Mark, where he had matter in connection with St. Matthew: and in those places, but in those places only, where St. Mark had no matter in connection with St. Matthew, he had frequently recourse to St. Luke's Gospel" (p. 361). One is hardly surprised after this to learn that Eichhorn soon after put forth a revised hypothesis (Einleitung in das N. T. 1804), in which a supposed Greek translation of a supposed Aramaic original took a conspicuous part; nor that Hug was able to point out that even the most liberal assumption of written documents had not provided for one case, that of the verbal agreement of St. Mark and St. Luke, to the exclusion of St. Matthew; and which, though it is of rare occurrence, would require, on Eichhorn's theory, an additional Greek version.

It will be allowed that this elaborate hypothesis, whether in the form given it by Marsh or by Eichhorn, possesses almost every fault that can be charged against an argument of that kind. For every new class of facts a new document must be assumed to have existed; and Hug's objection does not really weaken the theory, since the new class of coincidences he mentions only requires a new version of the "original Gospel," which can be supplied on demand. A theory so prolific in assumptions may still stand, if it can be proved that no other solution is possible; but since this cannot be shown, even as against the modified theory of Gratz (Neuer Versuch, etc., 1812), then we are reminded of the schoolman's caution, entia non sunt multiplicanda præter necessitatem. To assume for every new class of facts the existence of another complete edition and recension of the original work is quite gratuitous; the documents might have been as easily supposed to be fragmentary memorials, wrought in by the Evangelists into the web of the original Gospel; or the coincidences might be, as Gratz supposes, cases where one Gospel has been interpolated by portions of another. Then the "original Gospel" is supposed to have been of such authority as to be circulated everywhere: yet so defective, as to require annotation from any hand; so little reverenced, that no hand spared it. If all the Evangelists agreed to draw from such a work, it must have been widely if not universally accepted in the Church; and yet there is no record of its existence. The force of this dilemma has been felt by the supporters of the theory: if the work was of high authority, it would have been preserved, or at least mentioned; if of lower authority, it could not have become the basis of three canonical Gospels: and various attempts have been made to escape from it. Bertholdt tries to find traces of its existence in the titles of works other than our present Gospels, which were current in the earliest ages; but Gieseler has so diminished the force of his arguments, that only one of them need here be mentioned. Bertholdt ingeniously argues that a Gospel used by St. Paul, and transmitted to the Christians in Pontus, was the basis of Marcion's Gospel; and assumes that it was also the "original Gospel:" so that in the Gospel of Marcion there would be a transcript, though corrupted, of this primitive document. But there is no proof at all that St. Paul used any written Gospel; and as to that of Marcion, if the work of Hahn had not settled the question, the researches of such writers as Volckmar, Zeller, Ritschl, and Hilgenfeld, are held to have proved that the old opinion of Tertullian and Epiphanius is also the true one, and that the so-called Gospel of Marcion was not an independent work, but an abridged version of St. Luke's Gospel, altered by the heretic to suit his peculiar tenets. (See Bertholdt, iii. 1208–1223; Gieseler, p. 57; Weisse, Evangelienfrage, p. 73.) We must conclude then that the work has perished without record. Not only has this fate befallen the Aramaic or Hebrew original, but the translation and the five or six recensions. But it may well be asked whether the state of letters in Palestine at this time was such as to make this constant editing, translating, annotating, and enriching of a history a natural and probable process. With the independence of the Jews their literature had declined; from the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, if a writer here and there arose, his works became known, if at all, in Greek translations through the Alexandrine Jews. That the period of which we are speaking was for the Jews one of very little literary activity, is generally admitted; and if this applies to all classes of the people, it would be true of the humble and uneducated class from which the first converts came (Acts iv. 13; James ii. 5). Even the second law (δευτερώσεις), which grew up after the Captivity, and in which the knowledge of the learned class consisted, was handed down by oral tradition, without being reduced to writing. The theory of Eichhorn is only probable amidst a people given to literary habits, and in a class of that people where education was good and literary activity likely to prevail: the conditions here are the very reverse (see Gieseler's able argument, p. 59 ff.). These are only a few of the objections which may be raised, on critical and historical grounds, against the theory of Eichhorn and Marsh.

But it must not be forgotten that this question reaches beyond history and criticism, and has a deep theological interest. We are offered here an riginal Gospel composed by some unknown person; probably not an apostle, as Eichhorn admits, in his endeavor to account for the loss of the book. This was translated by one equally unknown; and the various persons into whose hands the two documents came, all equally unknown, exercised freely the power of altering and extending the materials thus provided. Out of such unattested materials the three Evangelists composed their Gospels. So far as they allowed their materials to bind and guide them, so far their worth as independent witnesses is lessened. But, according to Eichhorn, they all felt bound to admit the whole of the original document, so that it is possible to recover it from them by a simple process. As to all the passages, then, in which this document is employed, it is not the Evangelist, but an anonymous predecessor to whom we are listening — not Matthew the Apostle, and Mark the companion of apostles, and Luke the beloved of the Apostle Paul, are affording us the strength of their testimony, but one witness whose name no one has thought fit to record. If, indeed, all three Evangelists confined themselves to this document, this of itself would be a guarantee of its fidelity and of the respect in which it was held; but no one seems to have taken it in hand that did not think himself entitled to amend it. Surely serious people would have a right to ask, if the critical objections were less decisive, with what view of inspiration such a hypothesis could be reconciled. The internal evidence of the truth of the Gospel, in the harmonious and self-consistent representation of the Person of Jesus, and in the promises and precepts which meet the innermost needs of a heart stricken with the consciousness of sin, would still remain to us. But the wholesome confidence with which we now rely on the Gospels as pure, true, and genuine histories of the life of Jesus, composed by four independent witnesses inspired for that work, would be taken away. Even the testimony of the writers of the second century to the universal acceptance of these books would be invalidated, from their silence and ignorance about the strange circumstances which are supposed to have affected their composition.

There is another supposition to account for these facts, of which perhaps Gieseler has been the most acute expositor. It is probable that none of the Gospels was written until many years after the day of Pentecost, on which the Holy Spirit descended on the assembled disciples. From that day commenced at Jerusalem the work of preaching the Gospel and converting the world. So sedulous were the Apostles in this work that they divested themselves of the labor of ministering to the poor in order that they might give themselves "continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word" (Acts vi.). Prayer and preaching were the business of their lives. Now their preaching must have been, from the nature of the case, in great part historical; it must have been based upon an account of the life and acts of Jesus of Nazareth. They had been the eye-witnesses of a wondrous life, of acts and sufferings that had an influence over all the world: many of their hearers had never heard of Jesus, many others had received false accounts of one whom it suited the Jewish rulers to stigmatize as an impostor. The ministry of our Lord went on principally in Galilee; the first preaching was addressed to people in Judæa. There was no written record to which the hearers might be referred for historical details, and therefore the preachers must furnish not only inferences from the life of our Lord, but the facts of the life itself. The preaching, then, must have been of such a kind as to be to the hearers what the reading of lessons from the Gospels is to us. So far as the records of apostolic preaching in the Acts of the Apostles go, they confirm this view. Peter at Cæsarea, and Paul at Antioch, preach alike the facts of the Redeemer's life and death. There is no improbability in supposing that in the course of twenty or thirty years' assiduous teaching, without a written Gospel, the matter of the apostolic preaching should have taken a settled form. Not only might the Apostles think it well that their own accounts should agree, as in substance so in form; but the teachers whom they sent forth, or left behind in the churches they visited, would have to be prepared for their mission; and, so long as there was no written Gospel to put into their hands, it might be desirable that the oral instruction should be as far as possible one and the same to all. It is by no means certain that the interval between the mission of the Comforter and his work of directing the writing of the first Gospel was so long as is here supposed: the date of the Hebrew St. Matthew may be earlier. [MATTHEW.] But the argument remains the same: the preaching of the Apostles would probably begin to take one settled form, if at all, during the first years of their ministry. If it were allowed us to ask why God in his providence saw fit to defer the gift of a written Gospel to his people, the answer would be, that for the first few years the powerful working of the Holy Spirit in the living members of the church supplied the place of those records, which, as soon as the brightness of his presence began to be at all withdrawn, became indispensable in order to prevent the corruption of the Gospel history by false teachers. He was promised as one who should "teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever" the Lord had "said unto them" (John xiv. 26). And more than once his aid is spoken of as needful, even for the proclamation of the facts that relate to Christ (Acts i. 8; 1 Pet. i. 12); and he is described as a witness with the Apostles, rather than through them, of the things which they had seen during the course of a ministry which they had shared (John xv. 26, 27; Acts v. 32. Compare Acts xv. 28). The personal authority of the Apostles as eye-witnesses of what they preached is not set aside by this divine aid: again and again they describe themselves as "witnesses" to facts (Acts ii. 32, iii. 15, x. 39, &c.); and when a vacancy occurs in their number through the fall of Judas, it is almost assumed as a thing of course that his successor shall be chosen from those "which had companied with them all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among them" (Acts i. 21). The teachings of the Holy Spirit consisted, not in whispering to them facts which they had not witnessed, but rather in reviving the fading remembrance, and throwing out into their true importance events and sayings that had been esteemed too lightly at the time they took place. But the Apostles could not have spoken of the Spirit as they did (Acts v. 32, xv. 28), unless he were known to be working in and with them and directing them, and manifesting that this was the case by unmistakable signs. Here is the answer, both to the question why was it not the first care of the Apostles to prepare a written Gospel, and also to the scruples of those who fear that the supposition of an oral Gospel would give a precedent for those views of tradition which have been the bane of the Christian church as they were of the Jewish. The guidance of the Holy Spirit supplied for a time such aid as made a written Gospel unnecessary; but the Apostles saw the dangers and errors which a traditional Gospel would be exposed to in the course of time; and, whilst they were still preaching the oral Gospel in the strength of the Holy Ghost, they were admonished by the same divine Person to prepare those written records which were hereafter to be the daily spiritual food of all the church of Christ.[a] Nor is there anything unnatural in the supposition that the Apostles intentionally uttered their witness in the same order, and even, for the most part, in the same form of words. They would thus approach most nearly to the condition in which the church was to be when written books were to be the means of edification. They quote the scriptures of the Old Testament frequently in their discourses; and as their Jewish education had accustomed them to the use of the words of the Bible as well as the matter, they would do no violence to their prejudices in assimilating the new records to the old, and in reducing them to a "form of sound words." They were all Jews of Palestine, of humble origin, all alike chosen, we may suppose, for the loving zeal with which they would observe the works of their Master and afterwards propagate his name; so that the tendency to variance, arising from peculiarities of education, taste, and character, would be reduced to its lowest in such a body. The language of their first preaching was the Syro-Chaldaic, which was a poor and scanty language; and though Greek was now widely spread, and was the language even of several places in Palestine (Josephus, Ant. xvii. 11, § 4; B. J. iii. 9, § 1), though it prevailed in Antioch, whence the first missions to Greeks and Hellenists, or Jews who spoke Greek, proceeded (Acts xi. 20, xiii. 1–3), the Greek tongue, as used by Jews, partook of the poverty of the speech which it replaced; as, indeed, it is impossible to borrow a whole language without borrowing the habits of thought upon which it has built itself. Whilst modern taste aims at a variety of expression, and abhors a repetition of the same phrases as monotonous, the simplicity of the men, and their language, and their education, and the state of literature, would all lead us to expect that the Apostles would have no such feeling. As to this, we have more than mere conjecture to rely on. Occasional repetitions occur in the Gospels (Luke vii. 19, 20; xix. 31, 34), such as a writer in a more copious and cultivated language would perhaps have sought to avoid. In the Acts, the conversion of St. Paul is three times related (Acts ix., xxii., xxvi.), once by the writer and twice by St. Paul himself; and the two first harmonize exactly, except as to a few expressions, and as to one more important circumstance (ix. 7 = xxii. 9), — which, however, admits of an explanation, — whilst the third deviates somewhat more in expression, and has one passage peculiar to itself. The vision of Cornelius is also three times related (Acts x. 3–6, 30–32; xi. 13, 14), where the words of the angel in the two first are almost precisely alike, and the rest very similar, whilst the other is an abridged account of the same facts. The vision of Peter is twice related (Acts x. 10–16; xi. 5–10), and, except in one or two expressions, the agreement is verbally exact. These places from the Acts, which, both as to their resemblance and their difference, may be compared to the narratives of the Evangelists, show the same tendency to a common form of narrative which, according to the present view, may have influenced the preaching of the Apostles. It is supposed, then, that the preaching of the Apostles, and the teaching whereby they prepared others to preach, as they did, would tend to assume a common form, more or less fixed; and that the portions of the three Gospels which harmonize most exactly owe their agreement not to the fact that they were copied from each other, although it is impossible to say that the later writer made no use of the earlier one, nor to the existence of any original document now lost to us, but to the fact that the apostolic preaching had already clothed itself in a settled or usual form of words, to which the writers inclined to conform without feeling bound to do so; and the differences which occur, often in the closest proximity to the harmonies, arise from the feeling of independence with which each wrote what he had seen and heard, or, in the case of Mark and Luke, what apostolic witnesses had told him. The harmonies, as we have seen, begin with the baptism of John; that is, with the consecration of the Lord to his messianic office; and with this event probably the ordinary preaching of the Apostles would begin, for its purport was that Jesus is the Messiah, and that as Messiah he suffered, died, and rose again. They are very frequent as we approach the period of the Passion, because the sufferings of the Lord would be much in the mouth of every one who preached the Gospel, and all would become familiar with the words in which the Apostles described it. But as regards the Resurrection, which differed from the Passion in that it was a fact which the enemies of Christianity felt bound to dispute (Matt. xxviii. 15), it is possible that the divergence arose from the intention of each Evangelist to contribute something towards the weight of evidence for this central truth. Accordingly, all the four, even St. Mark (xvi. 14), who oftener throws a new light upon old ground than opens out new, mention distinct acts and appearances of the Lord to establish that he was risen indeed. The verbal agreement is greater where the words of others are recorded, and greatest of all where they are those of Jesus, because here the apostolic preaching would be especially exact; and where the historical fact is the utterance of certain words, the duty of the historian is narrowed to a bare record of them. (See the works of Gieseler, Norton, Westcott, Weisse, and others already quoted.)

[a] The opening words of St. Luke's Gospel, "Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to set forth in order declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word," appear to mean that many persons who heard the preaching of the Apostles wrote down what they heard, in order to preserve it in a permanent form. The word "many" cannot refer to St. Matthew and St. Mark only; and if the passage implies an intention to supersede the writings alluded to, then these two Evangelists cannot be included under them. Partial and incomplete reports of the preaching of the Apostles, written with a good aim but without authority, are intended; and, if we may argue from St. Luke's sphere of observation, they were probably composed by Greek converts.

That this opinion would explain many of the facts connected with the text is certain. Whether, besides conforming to the words and arrangement of the apostolic preaching, the Evangelists did in any cases make use of each other's work or not, it would require a more careful investigation of details to discuss than space permits. Every reader would probably find on examination some places which could best be explained on this supposition. Nor does this involve a sacrifice of the independence of the narrator. If each of the three drew the substance of his narrative from the one common strain of preaching that everywhere prevailed, to have departed entirely in a written account from the common form of words to which Christian ears were beginning to be familiar, would not have been independence but willfulness. To follow here and there the words and arrangement of another written Gospel already current would not compromise the writer's independent position. If the principal part of the narrative was the voice of the whole church, a few portions might be conformed to another writer without altering the character of the testimony. In the separate articles on the Gospels it will be shown that, however close may be the agreement of the Evangelists, the independent position of each appears from the contents of his book, and has been recognized by writers of all ages. It will appear that St. Matthew describes the kingdom of Messiah, as founded in the Old Testament and fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth; that St. Mark, with so little of narrative peculiar to himself, brings out by many minute circumstances a more vivid delineation of our Lord's completely human life; that St. Luke puts forward the work of Redemption as a universal benefit, and shows Jesus not only as the Messiah of the chosen people but as the Saviour of the world; that St. John, writing last of all, passed over most of what his predecessors had related, in order to set forth more fully all that he had heard from the Master who loved him, of his relation to the Father, and of the relation of the Holy Spirit to both. The independence of the writers is thus established; and if they seem to have here and there used each other's account, which it is perhaps impossible to prove or disprove, such cases will not compromise that claim which alone gives value to a plurality of witnesses.

How does this last theory bear upon our belief in the inspiration of the Gospels? This momentous question admits of a satisfactory reply. Our blessed Lord, on five different occasions, promised to the Apostles the divine guidance, to teach and enlighten them in their dangers (Matt. x. 19; Luke xii. 11 12; Mark xiii. 11; and John xiv., xv., xvi.). He bade them take no thought about defending themselves before judges; he promised them the Spirit of Truth to guide them into all truth, to teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance. That this promise was fully realized to them the history of the Acts sufficiently shows. But if the divine assistance was given them in their discourses and preaching, it would be rendered equally when they were about to put down in writing the same gospel which they preached; and, as this would be their greatest time of need, the aid would be granted then most surely. So that, as to St. Matthew and St. John, we may say that their Gospels are inspired because the writers of them were inspired, according to their Master's promise; for it is impossible to suppose that He who put words into their mouths when they stood before a human tribunal, with no greater fear than that of death before them, would withhold his light and truth when the want of them would mislead the whole Church of Christ and turn the light that was in it into darkness. The case of the other two Evangelists is somewhat different. It has always been held that they were under the guidance of Apostles in what they wrote — St. Mark under that of St. Peter, and St. Luke under that of St. Paul. We are not expressly told, indeed, that these Evangelists themselves were persons to whom Christ's promises of supernatural guidance had been extended, but it certainly was not confined to the twelve to whom it was originally made, as the case of St. Paul himself proves, who was admitted to all the privileges of an apostle, though, as it were, "born out of due time;" and as St. Mark and St. Luke were the companions of apostles — shared their dangers, confronted hostile tribunals, had to teach and preach — there is reason to think that they equally enjoyed what they equally needed. In Acts xv. 28, the Holy Ghost is spoken of as the common guide and light of all the brethren, not of apostles only; nay, to speak it reverently, as one of themselves. So that the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke appear to have been admitted into the canon of Scripture as written by inspired men in free and close communication with inspired apostles. But supposing that the portion of the three first Gospels which is common to all has been derived from the preaching of the Apostles in general, then it is drawn directly from a source which we know from our Lord himself to have been inspired. It comes to us from those Apostles into whose mouths Christ promised to put the words of his Holy Spirit. It is not from an anonymous writing, as Eichhorn thinks — it is not that the three witnesses are really one, as Story and others have suggested in the theory of copying — but that the daily preaching of all apostles and teachers has found three independent transcribers in the three Evangelists. Now the inspiration of an historical writing will consist in its truth, and in its selection of events. Everything narrated must be substantially and exactly true, and the comparison of the Gospels one with another offers us nothing that does not answer to this test. There are differences of arrangement of events; here some details of a narrative or a discourse are supplied which are wanting there; and if the writer had professed to follow a strict chronological order, or had pretended that his record was not only true but complete, then one inversion of order, or one omission of a syllable, would convict him of inaccuracy. But if it is plain — if it is all but avowed — that minute chronological data are not part of the writer's purpose — if it is also plain that nothing but a selection of the facts is intended, or, indeed, possible (John xxi. 25) — then the proper test to apply is, whether each gives us a picture of the life and ministry of Jesus of Nazareth that is self-consistent and consistent with the others, such as would be suitable to the use of those who were to believe on His Name — for this is their evident intention. About the answer there should be no doubt. We have seen that each Gospel has its own features, and that the divine element has controlled the human, but not destroyed it. But the picture which they conspire to draw is one full of harmony. The Saviour they all describe is the same loving, tender guide of his disciples, sympathizing with them in the sorrows and temptations of earthly life, yet ever ready to enlighten that life by rays of truth out of the infinite world where the Father sits upon his throne. It has been said that St. Matthew portrays rather the human side, and St. John the divine; but this holds good only in a limited sense. It is in St. John that we read that "Jesus wept;" and there is nothing, even in the last discourse of Jesus, as reported by St. John, that opens a deeper view of his divine nature than the words in St. Matthew (xi. 25–30) beginning, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes." All reveal the same divine and human Teacher; four copies of the same portrait, perhaps with a difference of expression, yet still the same, are drawn here, and it is a portrait the like of which no one had ever delineated before, or, indeed, could have done, except from having looked on it with observant eyes, and from having had the mind opened by the Holy Spirit to comprehend features of such unspeakable radiance. Not only does this highest "harmony of the Gospels" manifest itself to every pious reader of the Bible, but the lower harmony — the agreement of fact and word in all that relates to the ministry of the Lord, in all that would contribute to a true view of his spotless character — exists also, and cannot be denied. For example, all tell us alike that Jesus was transfigured on the mount; that the shekinah of divine glory shone upon his face; that Moses the lawgiver and Elijah the prophet talked with him; and that the voice from heaven bare witness to him. Is it any imputation upon the truth of the histories that St. Matthew alone tells us that the witnesses fell prostrate to the earth, and that Jesus raised them? or that St. Luke alone tells us that for a part of the time they were heavy with sleep? Again, one Evangelist, in describing our Lord's temptation, follows the order of the occurrences, another arranges according to the degrees of temptation, and the third, passing over all particulars, merely mentions that our Lord was tempted. Is there anything here to shake our faith in the writers as credible historians? Do we treat other histories in this exacting spirit? Is not the very independence of treatment the pledge to us that we have really three witnesses to the fact that Jesus was tempted like as we are? for if the Evangelists were copyists, nothing would have been more easy than to remove such an obvious difference as this. The histories are true according to any test that should be applied to a history; and the events that they select — though we could not presume to say that they were more important than what are omitted, except from the fact of the omission — are at least such as to have given the whole Christian Church a clear conception of the Redeemer's life, so that none has ever complained of insufficient means of knowing him.

There is a perverted form of the theory we are considering which pretends that the facts of the Redeemer's life remained in the state of an oral tradition till the latter part of the second century and that the four Gospels were not written till that time. The difference is not of degree but of kind between the opinion that the Gospels were written during the lifetime of the Apostles, who were eye-witnesses, and the notion that for nearly a century after the oldest of them had passed to his rest the events were only preserved in the changeable and insecure form of an oral account. But for the latter opinion there is not one spark of historical evidence. Heretics of the second century who would gladly have rejected and exposed a new gospel that made against them never hint that the Gospels are spurious; and orthodox writers ascribe without contradiction the authorship of the books to those whose names they bear. The theory was invented to accord with the assumption that miracles are impossible, but upon no evidence whatever; and the argument when exposed runs in this vicious circle: "There are no miracles, therefore the accounts of them must have grown up in the course of a century from popular exaggeration, and as the accounts are not contemporaneous it is not proved that there are miracles!" That the Jewish mind in its lowest decay should have invented the character of Jesus of Nazareth, and the sublime system of morality contained in his teaching — that four writers should have fixed the popular impression in four plain, simple, unadorned narratives, without any outbursts of national prejudice, or any attempt to give a political tone to the events they wrote of — would be in itself a miracle harder to believe than that Lazarus came out at the Lord's call from his four-days' tomb.

It will be an appropriate conclusion to this imperfect sketch to give a conspectus of the harmony of the Gospels, by which the several theories may be examined in their bearing on the gospel accounts in detail. Let it be remembered, however, that a complete harmony, including the chronological arrangement and the exact succession of all events, was not intended by the sacred writers to be constructed; indeed the data for it are pointedly withheld. Here most of the places where there is some special difficulty, and where there has been a question whether the events are parallel or distinct, are marked by figures in different type. The sections might in many cases have been subdivided but for the limits of space, but the reader can supply this defect for himself as cases arise. (The principal works employed in constructing it are, Griesbach, Synopsis Evangeliorum, 1776; De Wette and Lücke, Syn. Evang., [1818,] 1842; Rödiger, Syn. Evang., 1829; Clausen, Quatuor Evang. Tabulæ Synopticæ, 1829; Greswell's Harmony [Harmonia Evangelica, ed. 5ta, Oxon. 1856] and Dissertations [2d ed., 4 vols. in 5, Oxford, 1837], a most important work; the Rev. I. Williams On the Gospels, Theile's Greek Testament; and Tischendorf's Syn. Evang. 1854 [2d ed. 1864]; besides the well-known works of Lightfoot, Macknight, Newcome, and Robinson.) * The theory which bears the name of Strauss could hardly have originated anywhere but in Germany, nor is it easy for an Anglo-Saxon mind to conceive of its being seriously propounded and actually believed. It is far from being clearly defined and self-consistent in the author's own statement; and his Life of Jesus, while a work of great learning in detail, is singularly deficient in comprehensiveness and unity.

The theory, in brief, is this. Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary. In his childhood he manifested unusual intelligence and promise, as compared with his external advantages, and was the object of admiration in the humble family circle in which his lot was cast. He early became a disciple of John the Baptist; and, from strong sympathy with his enthusiastic expectation of the speedy advent of the Messiah (an expectation vividly entertained by all loyal Jews of that day), he conceived the idea of assuming that character himself, and personated it so successfully as to become his own dupe, and thus to pass unconsciously from imposture to self-delusion. He made proselytes, chose disciples, uttered discourses which impressed themselves profoundly upon the popular mind, and drew upon himself the hostility of the chief men of the nation, especially of the Pharisees. They procured his execution as a traitor; but his disciples, believing that the Messiah could not die, maintained that he must have risen alive from the sepulchre, and, as he had not been seen among men after his crucifixion, that he had ascended to heaven. This simple life-story became the basis of a series of myths — narratives not intentionally false or consciously invented, but some of them the growth of popular credulity, others, symbolical forms in which his disciples sought to embody the doctrines and precepts which had been the staple of his discourses. His miraculous birth was imagined and believed, because it seemed impossible that the Messiah should have been born like other men. Supernatural works were ascribed to him, because the Hebrew legends had ascribed such works to the ancient prophets, and it could not be that he who was greater than they, and of whom they were thought to have written glowing predictions, should not have performed more numerous and more marvellous miracles than any of them. His appearances after his resurrection were inferred, defined as to time and place, and incorporated into the faith of his disciples, because it was inconceivable that he should have returned to life without being seen. These myths had their origin chiefly outside of the circle of the Apostles and the persons most closely intimate with Jesus, and were probably due in great part to the constructive imagination of dwellers in portions of Galilee where he had tarried but a little while, or of admirers who had been his companions but for a brief period. The mythical element, once introduced into his history, had a rapid growth for some thirty, forty, or fifty years after his death, and new incidents in accordance with the Messianic ideal were constantly added to the multiform oral Gospel propagated and transmitted by his disciples. Within that period, various persons, none of them apostles or intimate friends of Jesus, compiled such narratives as had come to their ears; and of these narratives there have come down to us our four Gospels, together with other fragmentary stories of equal authority, which bear the popular designation of the Apocryphal Gospels.

Such was the complexion of Strauss's mythica theory, as developed in his Life of Jesus,[a] published in 1835–36, repeatedly republished, and sufficiently well known in this country by a cheap reprint of a moderately good English translation. In his new work, issued in 1864, The Life of Jesus, for the German People,[a] he departs from his former position so far as to charge the propagandists and historians of Christianity with willful and conscious falsifications, and to maintain with the critics of the Tübingen school that the four Gospels were written, in great part, to sanction and promote the dogmatic beliefs of their respective authors, and that they thus represent so many divergent theological tendencies. In assuming this ground, Strauss enlarges the definition of the term myth, which no longer denotes merely the fabulous outgrowth or embodiment of an idea without fraudulent intent, but includes such wanton falsehoods as are designed to express, promulgate, or sanction theological dogmas.

We have said that Strauss admits an historical basis for the mythical structure reared by the Evangelists. How is this basis to be determined? How are we to distinguish between facts and myths? (1.) The usual order of nature cannot in any instance, way, or measure, have been interrupted. Therefore every supernatural incident must be accounted as mythical. (2.) Jesus having been regarded as the Messiah, it was inevitable that representations should have been made of him in accordance with the Messianic notions of his time and people, and with the predictions deemed Messianic in the writings of the Hebrew prophets. Consequently, all such representations, though involving nothing supernatural, such as his descent from David and his flight into Egypt, are at least suspicious, and may be safely set down as myths. (3.) His admirers would have been likely to attribute to him sayings and deeds corresponding with those recorded of various distinguished persons in Jewish history. Therefore, every portion of the narrative which bears any resemblance or analogy to any incident related in the Old Testament, is mythical. But (4), on the other hand, Jesus was a Hebrew, confined within the narrow circle of Jewish ideas, and not under any training or influence which could have enlarged that circle. Consequently every alleged utterance of his, and every idea of his mission and character, that is broader and higher than the narrowest Judaism, is also mythical. Thus we have an historical personage, of whom the critic denies at once everything national and everything extra-national. By parity of reasoning, we might, in the biography of Washington, cast suspicion on everything that he is alleged to have said or done as a loyal American, because he was one, and his biographer would of course ascribe to him the attributes of an American; and on everything that he is alleged to have said or done from the impulse of a larger humanity, because, being an American, it was impossible that he should have been anything more — a style of criticism which, with reference to any but a sacred personage, the world would regard as simply idiotic. But this is not all. (5.) Though among secular historians, even of well-known periods and events, there are discrepancies in minor details, and these are held to be confirmations of the main facts, as evincing the mutual independence of the writers considered as separate authorities, for some unexplained and to us inscrutable reason, this law does not apply to the Gospels. In them, every discrepancy, however minute, casts just suspicion on an alleged fact or a recorded discourse or conversation. This suspicion is extended even to the omission or the varied narration of very slight particulars, without making any allowance for the different points of view which several independent witnesses must of necessity occupy, or for the different portions of a prolonged transaction or discourse which would reach their eyes or ears, according as they were nearer or more remote, earlier or later on the ground, more or less absorbed in what was passing. All, therefore, in which the Evangelists vary from one another, is mythical. But while their variance always indicates a myth (6), their very close agreement demands the same construction; for wherever the several narrators coincide circumstantially and verbally, their coincidence indicates some common legendary source. Thus mutually inconsistent and contradictory are the several tests employed by Strauss to separate myth from fact. Practically, were Strauss's Life of Jesus lost to the world, one might reconstruct it, by classing as a myth, under one or more of the heads that we have specified, every fact in the history of Jesus, and every deed or utterance of his, which indicates either the divinity of his mission, his unparalleled wisdom, or the transcendent loveliness, purity, and excellence of his character.

Yet, while Jesus is represented as in part self-deluded, and in part an impostor, and his biography as in all its distinctive features utterly fictitious, strange to say, Strauss recognizes this biography as symbolical of the spiritual history of mankind. What is false of the individual Jesus is true of the race. Humanity is "God manifest in the flesh," the child of the visible mother, Nature, and the invisible father, Spirit. It works miracles; for it subdues Nature in and around itself by the power of the Spirit. It is sinless; for pollution cleaves to the individual, but does not affect the race or its history. It dies, rises, and ascends to heaven; for the suppression of its personal and earthly life — in other words, the annihilation of individual men by death — is a reunion with the All-Father, Spirit. Faith in this metaphysical farrago is justifying and sanctifying Christian faith. Thus a history, which is the joint product of imposture and credulity, by a strange chance, (for providence there is none,) has become a symbolical representation of true spiritual philosophy.

We will now offer some of the leading considerations, which are fairly urged against the mythical theory.

1. This theory assumes that miracles are impossible. But why are they impossible, if there be a God? The power which established the order of nature includes the power to suspend or modify it, as the greater includes the less. If that order was established with a moral and spiritual purpose, for the benefit of reasoning, accountable, immortal beings, and if that same purpose may be served by the suspension of proximate causes at any one epoch of human history, then we may expect to find authentic vestiges of such an epoch. All that is needed in order to make miracles credible is the discovery of an adequate purpose, a justifying end. Such a purpose, such an end, is the development of the highest forms of goodness in human conduct and character; and whether miracles — real or imagined — have borne an essential part in such development, is an historical question which we are competent to answer. Suppose that we write down the names of all the men who have left a reputation for pre-eminent excellence, — Orientals, Greeks, Romans, ancient, modern, the lights of dark ages, the chosen representatives of every philosophical school, the finished product of the highest civilization of every type, reformers, philanthropists, those who have adorned the loftiest stations, those who have made lowly stations illustrious. Let us then separate the names into two columns, writing the Christians in one column, all the rest in the other. We shall find that we have made a horizontal division, — that the least in the Christian column is greater than the greatest out of it. From Paul, Peter, and John; from Fenelon, Xavier, Boyle, Doddridge, Martyn, Heber, Judson, Channing, men whose genius and culture conspired with their piety to make them greatly good, down to the unlettered Bedford tinker, John Pounds the cobbler, the Dairyman's daughter, with just education enough to read her Bible and to know the will of her Lord, we find traits of character, which in part are not shared in any degree, in part are but remotely approached, by the best men out of the Christian pale. Now when we look into the forming elements and processes of these Christian characters, we shall find that the miracles of the New Testament hold a foremost place, and we shall find it impossible even to conceive of their formation under the mythical theory. It is absurd to think of Paul as compassing sea and land, laying bare his back to the scourge, reaching after the crown of martyrdom, to defend a mythical resurrection and ascension of humanity; of Martyn or Judson as forsaking all the joys of civilized life, and encountering hardships worse than death, to preach Straussianism; of the Gospel according to Strauss as taking the place of Matthew's or John's Gospel in the hands of the tinker or the dairy-maid, developing the saintly spirit, heralding the triumphant deaths, of which we have such frequent record in the annals of the poor. These holy men and women have been guided and sustained in virtue by the authority of a divinely commissioned Lawgiver, whose words they have received because he had been proclaimed and attested as the Son of God by power from on high. They have had a working faith in immortality, — such a faith as no reasoning, or analogy, or instinct has ever given, — because they have stood in thought by the bier at the gates of Nain and by the tomb of Bethany; because they have seen the light that streams from the broken sepulchre of the crucified, and heard the voice of the resurrection-angel. Now if the development of the highest style of human character is a purpose worthy of God, and if in point of fact a belief in miracles has borne an essential part in the development of such characters, then are miracles not only possible, but antecedently probable and intrinsically credible. And this is an argument which cannot be impeached till Straussianism has furnished at least a few finished characters, which we can place by the side of those that have been formed by faith in a miraculously empowered and endowed Teacher and Saviour.

Miracle, lying as it does clearly within the scope of omnipotence, needs only adequate testimony to substantiate it. Human testimony is indeed appealed to in proof of the unbroken order of nature; but, so far as it goes, it proves the opposite. We can trace back no line of testimony which does not reach a miraculous epoch. Nay, if there be any one element of human nature which is universal, with exceptions as rare as idiocy or insanity, it is the appetency for miracle. So strong is this, that at the present day none are so ready to receive the drivellings of hyper-electrified women as utterances from departed spirits, and to accept the absurdities of the newest form of necromancy, as those who set aside the miracles of the New Testament and cast contempt on the risen Saviour Such being the instinctive craving of human nature for that which is above nature, it is intrinsically probable that God has met this craving by authentic voices from the spirit-realm, by authentic glimpses from behind the veil of sense, by authentic forth-reachings of the omnipotent arm from beneath the mantle of proximate causes.

2. Strauss is self-refuted on his own ground. He maintains the uniformity of the law of causation in all time, equally in the material and the intellectual universe, so that no intellectual phenomenon can make its appearance, except from causes and under conditions adapted to bring it into being. Myths, therefore, cannot originate, except from causes and under conditions favorable to their birth and growth. Now, if we examine the undoubted myths connected with the history and religion of the ancient nations, we shall find that they had their origin prior to the era of written literature; that their evident nucleus is to be sought in historical personages and events of a very early date; that they grew into fantastic forms and vast proportions by their transmission from tongue to tongue, whether in story or in song; that their various versions are the result of oral tradition through different channels, as in the separate states of Greece, and among the aboriginal tribes and prehistorical colonists of Italy; and that they received no essential additions or modifications after the age at which authentic history begins. Thus the latest of the gods, demigods and wonder-working heroes of Grecian fable — such of them as ever lived — lived seven centuries before Herodotus, and not less than four centuries before Hesiod and Homer; the various accounts we have of them appear to have been extant in the earliest period of Greek literature; and we have no proof of the origin of any extended fable or of the existence of any personage who became mythical, after that period. The case is similar with the distinctively Roman myths and the mythical portions of Roman history. They are all very considerably anterior to the earliest written history and literature of Rome. The mythical and the historical periods of all nations are entirely distinct, the one from the other. Now the Christian era falls far within the historical period. Single prodigies are indeed related in the history of that age, as they are from time to time in modern and even recent history; but the leading incidents of individual lives and the successive stages of public and national affairs in that age are detailed with the same literalness with which the history of the seventeenth or eighteenth century is written. Yet, had the conditions for the growth of myths existed, there were not wanting, then, personages, whose vast abilities, strange vicissitudes of fortune, and extended fame would have made them mythical. It is hardly possible that there could have been a fuller supply of the material for myths in the life of Hercules, or of Cadmus, or of Medea, than in that of Julius Cæsar, or of Marcus Antonius, or of Cleopatra. Nor can it be maintained that in this respect Judæa was at an earlier and more primitive stage of culture than Rome or Egypt. Josephus, the Jewish historian, was born about the time of the death of Jesus Christ, and wrote very nearly at the period assigned by Strauss for the composition of the earliest of our Gospels In addition to what we believe to have been the miracles of the Old Testament, he records many undoubted myths of the early Hebrew ages; but his history of his own times, with now and then a touch of the marvellous, has no more of the mythical element or tendency than we find in the narratives of the same epoch by Roman historians. In fine, there was nothing in that age more than in this, which could give rise or currency to a mythical history.

3. Myths are vague, dateless, incoherent, dreamy, poetical; while the Gospels are eminently prosaic, circumstantial, abounding in careful descriptions of persons, and designations of places and times. The genealogies given in Matthew and Luke are represented by Strauss as mythical; but nothing could be more thoroughly opposed to our idea of a myth, and to the character of the acknowledged myths of antiquity, than such catalogues of names. We believe both these genealogies to be authentic; for Matthew alone professes to give the natural and actual ancestry of Joseph, while Luke expressly says that he is giving the legal genealogy of Jesus, (as he was legally reckoned being the literal rendering of the words employed by the Evangelist, ὡς ἐνομίζετο,) and it is well known that the legal genealogy of a Jew might diverge very widely from the line of his actual parentage. But even were we to admit the alleged inconsistency of the two, they both bear incontestable marks of having been copied from existing documents, and not imagined or invented. All through the Gospels we find, in close connection with the miracles of Christ, details of common Jewish life, often so minute and trivial, that they would have been wholly beneath the aim of ambitious fiction or tumid fancy, and could have found a place in the narrative only because they actually occurred. The miracles are not in a setting of their own kind, as they would have been in a fictitious narrative. They are imbedded in a singularly natural and lifelike, humble and unpretending history. The style of the Evangelists is not that of men who either wondered themselves, or expected others to wonder, at what they related; but it is the unambitious style of men who expected to be believed, and who were perfectly familiar with the marvellous events they described. Had they related these events from rumor, from a heated imagination, or with a disposition to deceive, they must have written in an inflated style, with a profusion of epithets, with frequent appeals to the sentiment of the marvellous, not unmixed with the show of argument to convince the incredulous. When we find on the current of the Gospel history not a ripple of swollen diction, not a quickening of the rhetorical pulse, not a deviation from the quiet, prosaic, circumstantial flow of narrative, in describing such events as the walking upon the sea, the raising of Lazarus, the ascension of Jesus Christ to heaven, we can account for this unparalleled literary phenomenon only by supposing that the writers had become so conversant with miracle, either in their own experience or through their intimacy with eye-witnesses, that events aside from the ordinary course of nature had ceased to be contemplated with amazement.

4. Another conclusive argument against the mythical theory is derived from the sufferings and the martyrdoms of the primitive Christians. Strauss admits that the earliest of our Gospels assumed its present form within thirty or forty years after the death of Jesus. At that time there were still living great multitudes, who must have been contemporary and coeval with Jesus, and who had the means of ascertaining the truth with regard to his personal history. Mere fable, which involved no serious consequences to those who received it, might have passed unquestioned, and might have been devoured by weak men and superstitious women with easy credulity. But men are not wont to stake their reputation, their property, their lives, on stories which they have the means of testing, without looking carefully into the evidence of their truth. Now no fact in history is more certain than that, within forty years from the death of Christ, large numbers of persons, many of them natives of Judæa, suffered the severest persecution, and incurred painful and ignominious death by fire, by crucifixion, and by exposure to wild beasts, in consequence of their professed belief in the divine mission, the miraculous endowments, and the resurrection of Jesus. Many of these persons were men of intelligence and cultivation. They must have known how far the alleged facts of the life of Jesus were confirmed by eye-witnesses, and how far and on what grounds they were called in question. They lived at a time when they could have tried the witnesses, and they must have been more or less than human if they threw away their lives for mere exaggerations or fables. The genuineness of several of Paul's epistles is admitted by Strauss, and neither he nor any one else doubts the fact of Paul's protracted sacrifices and sufferings, and his ultimate martyrdom as a Christian believer. Paul's epistles show him to have been a man of eminent power and culture, — in the opinion of many, the greatest man that God ever made; in the judgment of all, far above mediocrity. Born a Jew, educated in Jerusalem, familiar with the alleged scenes and witnesses of the miracles of Jesus, at first a persecutor of the infant church, he could have become a believer and a champion of the Christian faith only on strong evidence, and with a full knowledge of the grounds for unbelief and doubt; and we have his own statement of what he believed, and especially of his undoubting belief in the crowning miracle of the resurrection of Jesus. We know of no man whose testimony as to the state of the argument as it stood in the very lifetime of the coevals of Jesus could be worth so much as his; and it is inconceivable that he, of all men, should have suffered or died in attestation of what he supposed or suspected to be myths. But we must multiply his testimony by hundreds, nay, by thousands, in order to represent the full amount and weight of the testimony of martyrdom. Now while we have not the slightest doubt that our Gospels were written, three of them at least at an earlier date than Strauss assigns to the first, and all of them by the men whose names they bear, we should deem them, if possible, more surely authenticated as to their contents, did we suppose them anonymous works of a later date; for in that case they would embody narratives already sealed by the martyr-blood of a cloud of witnesses, and thus would be not the mere story of their authors, but the story of the collective church.

5. The character of the primitive Christians is an impregnable argument for the truth of the Gospel-history, as opposed to the mythical theory. There is no doubt whatever that from the lifetime of Jesus commenced the moral regeneration of humanity. Virtues which had hardly a name before, sprang into being. Vices which had been embalmed in song and cherished in the heart of the highest civilization of the Roman empire, were condemned and denounced. A loftier ethical standard — a standard which has not yet been improved upon — was held forth by the earliest Christian writers, and recognized in all the Christian communities. There were among the early Christians types of character, which have never been surpassed, hardly equalled since. Strauss maintains that there are no uncaused effects, — no effects which have not causes fully commensurate with themselves. A Jewish youth, half-enthusiast, half-impostor, must have been immeasurably inferior to those great philosophers and moralists of classic antiquity, who hardly made an impression on the depravity of their own and succeeding times. Such a youth must have had very vague notions of morality, and have been a very poor example of it He might have founded a sect of fanatics, but not a body of singularly pure, true and holy men. There is a glaring inadequacy, — nay, an entire and irreconcilable discrepancy between the cause and the effect. We can account for the moral reformation that followed the ministry of Jesus, only by supposing him endowed with a higher and calmer wisdom, with a keener sense of truth and right, with a more commanding influence over the human heart and conscience, than has ever belonged to any other being that the world has seen. Outwardly he was a humbly born, illiterate Jew, in a degenerate age, of a corrupt national stock; and there is no way of accounting for his superiority over all other teachers of truth and duty, unless we believe that he held by the gift of God a preëminence, of which his alleged sway over nature and victory over death were but the natural and fitting expression.

6. Strauss bases his theory on the assumption that our Gospels were not written by the men whose names they bear, but were the productions of authors now unknown, at later and uncertain periods: and he admits that the mythical fabric which he supposes the Gospels to be could not have had its origin under the hands, or with the sanction, of apostles or their companions. But the genuineness of no ancient, we might almost say, of no modern work, rests on stronger evidence than does the authorship of our Gospels by the men whose names they bear. In the earlier ages their composition by their now reputed authors was never denied or called in question, — not even by the heretics who on dogmatical grounds rejected some of them, and would have found it convenient to reject all, — not even by Jewish and Gentile opposers of Christianity, who argued vehemently and bitterly against their contents without impugning their genuineness. Justin Martyr, who wrote about the middle of the second century, speaks repeatedly of Memoirs of the Apostles called Gospels, and in his frequent recapitulation of what he professes to have drawn from this source there are numerous coincidences with our Gospels, not only in the facts narrated, but in words and in passages of considerable length. From his extant works we could almost reproduce the gospel history. He was a man of singularly inquisitive mind, of philosophical training, of large and varied erudition; and it is impossible that he should not have known whether these books were received without question, or whether they rested under the suspicion of spurious authorship. Irenæus, who wrote a little later, gives a detailed description of our four Gospels, naming their respective authors, and stating the order in which and the circumstances under which they were composed; and he writes, not only in his own name, but in that of the whole church, saying that these books were not and had not been called in question by any. These are but specimens of very numerous authorities that might be cited. About the same time, Celsus wrote against Christianity, and he drew so largely from our Gospels as the authorized narratives of the life of Christ, that a connected history of that life might almost be made from the extant passages quoted from his writings by his Christian opponents.

In the middle and the latter half of the second century, there were large bodies of Christians in every part of the civilized world, and the copies of the Gospels must have been numbered by many thousands. Their universal reception as the works of the men whose names they now bear can be accounted for only by their genuineness. Suppose that they were spurious, yet written and circulated in the lifetime of the Apostles,—it is impossible that they should not have openly denied their authorship, and that this denial should not have left traces of itself in the days of Justin Martyr and Irenæus. Suppose that they were first put in circulation under the names they now bear, after the death of the Apostles, — it is inconceivable that there should not have been men shrewd enough to ask why they had not appeared while their authors were living, and their late appearance would have given rise to doubts and questions which would not have been quieted for several generations. Suppose that they were first issued and circulated anonymously, — there must have been a time when the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were first attached to them. and it is impossible that the attaching of the names of well-known men as authors to books which had been anonymous should not have been attended by grave doubt.

The statement of Luke in the Introduction of his Gospel, and the very nature of the case render it certain that numerous other accounts, more or less authentic, of the life of Christ were early written, and some such accounts, commonly called the Apocryphal Gospels, are still extant. But we have ample evidence that no such writings were ever received as of authority, read in the churches, or sanctioned by the office-bearers and leading men in the Christian communities; and most of them disappeared at an early date. Now it is impossible to account for the discrediting and suppression of these writings, unless the Church was in the possession of authoritative records. If our Gospels had no higher authority than belonged to those narratives, all the accounts of the life of Jesus would have been received and transmitted with equal credit. But if there were four narratives written by eye-witnesses and their accredited companions, while all the rest were written by persons of inferior means of information and of inferior authority, then may we account, as we can in no other way, for the admitted fact that these four Gospels crowded all others out of the Church, and drove them into discredit, almost into oblivion.

We have then abundant reason to believe, and no reason to doubt, that our present four Gospels were written by the men whose names they bear: and if this be proved, by the confession of Strauss himself the mythical theory is untenable.

Text; Erni, Evangelien-Uebersicht: sämmtliche vier kanon. Evv., auf 7 Blättern . . . wörtlich nach der offiziellen Uebersetzung d. Zürcherischen Landeskirche bearbeitet, u. s. w. Zürich, 1867. A Harmony of the Gospels in Greek (Tischendorf's text), with various readings, notes, tables, etc., by the Rev. Frederic Gardiner, is now in press (New York, 1868).

3. Commentaries. Passing by older works, we may notice Campbell, Four Gospels translated, with Notes, reprinted Andover, 1837, 2 vols. 8vo, valuable for the Preliminary Dissertations; Kuinoel (Kühnöl), Comm. in Libr. N. T. historicos, 4 vols. Lips. (Matt., 4th ed. 1837; Mark and Luke, 4th ed. 1843; John, 3d ed. 1825), often unsound in philology, but still useful; Paulus, Exeg. Handb. üb. die drei ersten Evv., 3 Theile, Heidelb. 1830–33; Baumgarten-Crusius, Exeg. Schriften zum N. T. Bd. i. in 2 Th. (Matt., Mark, Luke), Jena, 1844–45, posthumous; his Theol. Auslegung d. Johan. Schriften (1844–45) is more important; Olshausen, Bibl. Comm. Bde. i. and ii. Abth. 1, 2, 4e Aufl. rev. von Ebrard, Königsb. 1853–62, Eng. trans. revised by A. C. Kendrick, New York, 1856–57; Meyer, Krit. exeg. Komm. üb. das N. T. Abth. i., ii. Gött. (Matt., 5th ed. 1864; Mark and Luke, 5th ed. 1867; John, 4th ed. 1862); De Wette, Kurzgef. exeg. Handb. zum N. T. Bd. i. Th. i.–iii. Leipz. (Matt., 4th ed. by Messner, 1857; Luke and Mark, 3d ed. 1846; John, 5th ed. by Brückner, 1863); Stier, Die Reden des Herrn Jesu, 2e Aufl., 7 Theile, Barmen, 1851–55, Eng. trans. 8 vols. Edin. 1855–61; John Brown, Discourses and Sayings of our Lord Jesus Christ, 3 vols. Edin. 1850, reprinted in 2 vols. New York, 1864; Ewald, Die drei ersten Evv. übers. u. erklärt, Gött. 1850, and Die Johan. Schriften übers. u. erklärt, Gött. 1861–62; Norton, New Translation of the Gospels, with Notes, 2 vols. Boston, 1855, posthumous; Joel Jones (Judge), Notes on Scripture, Philad. 1861; Bleek, Synopt. Erklärung der drei ersten Evangelien, 2 Bde. Leipz. 1862; Bunsen's Bibelwerk, Bd. iv. Th. i. (1862), ed. by Holtzmann, translation with brief notes; and the Greek Testaments of Bloomfield (9th ed. 1855), Alford (5th ed. 1863), Webster and Wilkinson (1855), and Wordsworth (4th ed. 1866). Of Lange's great Bibelwerk, "critical, theological, and homiletical," the vols. on Matthew, Mark, and Luke have been translated and published in this country, with valuable additions, under the general editorship of Dr. Schaff (New York, 1865–66); the volume on John is in press. Nast's Commentary (Matt. and Mark, Cincinnati, 1864) is on a similar plan. This volume has a valuable General Introduction to the Gospels, treating of their genuineness, authenticity, harmony etc., which has also been issued separately. Since the publication of the Rev. Albert Barnes's Notes on the Gospels, 2 vols. New York, 1832, 17th ed. revised, 1847 (when 32,000 copies had already been sold), numerous popular commentaries have appeared in this country, representing more or less the theological views of different religious denominations, as by H. J. Ripley (Baptist), 2 vols. Boston, 1837–38; Jos. Longking (Methodist), 4 vols. 16mo, New York, 1841–44; A. A. Livermore (Unitarian), 2 vols. Boston, 1847–42; L. R. Paige (Universalist), 2 vols. Boston, 1844–45; M. W. Jacobus, 3 vols. New York, 1848–56; C. H. Hall (Episcopalian), 2 vols. New York, 1857; J. J. Owen, 3 vols. New York, 1857–60; D. D. Whedon (Methodist), 2 vols New York, 1860–66; and I. P. Warren, New Test. with Notes, vol. i. Boston, 1867 (Amer. Tr. Soc.). Of works illustrating portions of the Gospels, Abp. Trench's Notes on the Parables (1841, 9th ed. 1864), Notes on the Miracles (1846, 7th ed. 1860), and Studies in the Gospels (1867), of all of which we have American editions, deserve particular mention. Wichelhaus has written an elaborate commentary on the history of the Passion Week (Ausführl. Komm. zu d. Gesch. des Leidens Jesu Christi, Halle, 1855). Of the works named above, the most valuable in a critical and philological point of view are those of Meyer, De Wette, and Bleek. For treatises on the separate Gospels, see their respective names; see also the article JESUS CHRIST. A.

GOTHOLI'AS. Josias, son of Gotholias (Γοθολίου: Gotholiæ), was one of the sons of Elam who returned from Babylon with Esdras (1 Esdr. viii. 33). The name is the same as ATHALIAH, with the common substitution of the Greek G for the Hebrew guttural Ain (comp. Gomorrah, Gaza, etc.). This passage compared with 2 K. xi. 1, &c. shows that Athaliah was both a male and female name.

GOTHO'NIEL (Γοθονιήλ, i. e. Othniel; [Sin.[1] Γοθονιου, gen.:] Gothoniel), father of Chabris, who was one of the governors (ἄρχοντες) of the city of Bethulia (Jud. vi. 15).

GOURD. I. קִיקָיוֹן, only in Jon. iv. 6–10: κολοκύνθη: hedera. A difference of opinion has long existed as to the plant which is intended by this word. The argument is as old as Jerome, whose rendering hedera was impugned by Augustine as a heresy! In reality Jerome's rendering was not intended to be critical, but rather as a kind of pis aller necessitated by the want of a proper Latin word to express the original. Besides he was unwilling to leave it in merely Latinized Hebrew (kikayon), which might have occasioned misapprehensions. Augustine, following the LXX. and Syr. Versions, was in favor of the rendering gourd, which was adopted by Luther, the A. V., etc. In Jerome's description of the plant called in Syr. karo, and Punic el-keroa, Celsius recognizes the Ricinus Palma Christi, or Castor-oil plant (Hierobot. ii. 273 ff.; Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 293, 623). The Ricinus was seen by Niebuhr (Descript. of Arab. p. 148) at Basra, where it was distinguished by the name el-keroa; by Rauwolf (Trav. p. 52) it was noticed in great abundance near Tripoli, where the Arabs called it el-kerua; while both Hasselquist and Robinson observed very large specimens of it in the neighborhood of Jericho ("Ricinus in altitudinem arboris insignis," Hasselq. p. 555; see also Rob. i. 553).

Niebuhr observes that the Jews and Christians at Mosul (Nineveh) maintained that the tree which sheltered Jonah was not "el-keroa," but "el-kerra," a sort of gourd. This revival of the August. rendering has been defended by J. E. Faber (Notes on Harmer's Observations, etc. i. 145). And it must be confessed that the evidently miraculous character of the narrative in Jon. deprives the Palma Christi of any special claim to identification on the ground of its rapid growth and decay, as described by Niebuhr. Much more important, however, is it to observe the tree-like character of this plant, rendering it more suitable for the purpose which it is stated to have fulfilled; also the authority of the Palestine Jews who were contemporaries of Jerome, as compared with that of the Mosul Jews conversed with by Niebuhr. But most decisive of all seems the derivation of the Hebrew word from the Egyptian kiki (Herod. ii. 94; comp. Bähr, ad loc.; and Jablonsky, Opusc. pt. i. p. 110) established by Celsius, with whose arguments Michaelis declares himself entirely satisfied (J. D. Mich. Suppl.); and confirmed by the Talmudical קִיקְיוֹן, kik-oil, prepared from the seeds of the Ricinus (Buxt. Lex. Chald. Talmud. col. 2029), and Dioscorides, iv. 164, where κρότων (= Palma Christi) is described under the name of κίκι, and the oil made from its seeds is called κίκινον ἔλαιον.

II. פַּקָּעוֹת, and פַּקֻּעִים. (1.) In 2 K. iv. 39; a fruit used as food, disagreeable to the taste, and supposed to be poisonous. (2.) In 1 K. vi. 18, vii. 24, as an architectural ornament, where A. V. "knops." In Hebrew the plant is described as גֶּפֶן שָׂדֶה: ἄμπελον ἐν τῷ ἀγρῷ: vitem silvestrem; whence in A. V. "wild vine" [2 K. iv. 39]. The fruit is called in Hebrew as above; τολύπη ἀγρία, LXX. = ἀγρία κολοκύνθη, Suid.: colocynthides agri; "wild gourds," A. V.

The inconsistency of all these renderings is manifest; but the fact is that the Hebrew name of the plant may denote any shrub which grows in tendrils, such as the colocynth, or the cucumber. Rosenmüller and Gesenius pronounce in favor of the wild cucumber, Cucumis agrestis or asininus (Cels. Hierobot. i. 393 ff.). This opinion is confirmed by the derivation from פָּקַע, to burst. The wild cucumber bursts at the touch of the finger, and scatters its seeds, which the colocynth does not (Rosenm. Alterthumsk. iv. pt. 1, &c.).

T. E. B.

There can, we think, be no reasonable doubt that the kikâyôn which afforded shade to the prophet Jonah before Nineveh is the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant, which, formerly a native of Asia, is now naturalized in America, Africa, and the south of Europe. This plant, which varies considerably in size, being in India a tree, but in England seldom attaining a greater height than three or four feet, receives its generic name from the resemblance its fruit was anciently supposed to bear to the acarus ("tick") of that name. See Dioscorides (iv. 161, ed. Sprengel) and Pliny (H. N. xv. 7). The leaves are large and palmate, with serrated lobes, and would form an excellent shelter for the sun-stricken prophet. The seeds contain the oil so well known under the name of "castor-oil," which has for ages been in high repute as a medicine.

With regard to the "wild gourds" (פַּקֻּעוֹת, pakkuôth) of 2 K. iv. 39, which one of "the sons of the prophets" gathered ignorantly, supposing them to be good for food, there can be no doubt that it is a species of the gourd tribe (Cucurbitaceæ), which contain some plants of a very bitter and dangerous character. The leaves and tendrils of this family of plants bear some resemblance to those of the vine. Hence the expression, "a wild vine;"[a] and as several kinds of Cucurbitaceæ, such as melons, pumpkins, etc., are favorite articles of refreshing food amongst the Orientals, we can easily understand the cause of the mistake.

The plants which have been by different writers identified with the pakkuôth are the following: the colocynth, or coloquintida (Citrullus colocynthis); the Cucumis prophetarum, or globe cucumber; and the Ecbalium (Momordica) elaterium; all of which have claims to denote the plant in question.

The etymology of the word from פָּקַע, "to split or burst open," has been thought to favor the identification of the plant with the Ecbalium elaterium,[b] or "squirting cucumber," so called from the elasticity with which the fruit, when ripe, opens and scatters the seeds when touched. This is the ἄγριος σίκυος of Dioscorides (iv. 152) and Theophrastus (vii. 6, § 4, &c.), and the Cucumis sylvestris of Pliny (H. N. xx. 2). Celsius (Hierob. i. 393), Rosenmüller (Bibl. Bot. p. 128), Winer (Bibl. Realw. i. 525), and Gesenius (Thes. p. 1122), are in favor of this explanation, and, it must be confessed, not without some reason. The old versions, however, understand the colocynth, the fruit of which is about the size of an orange. The drastic medicine in such general use is a preparation from this plant. Michaelis (Suppl. Lex. Heb. p. 344) and Oedmann (Verm. Samm. iv. 88) adopt this explanation; and since, according to Kitto (Pict. Bibl. l. c.), the dry gourds of the colocynth, when crushed, burst with a crashing noise, there is much reason for being satisfied with an explanation which has authority, etymology, and general suitableness in its favor. All the above-named plants are found in the East. W. H.

* There is a Letter relating to Jonah's GOURD in the Bibl. Sacra, xii. 396 ff., from the late Rev. H. Lobdell, M. D., missionary at Mosûl in Mesopotamia. He says that "the Mohammedans, Christians, and Jews all agree in referring the plant to the ker'a, a kind of pumpkin peculiar to the East. The leaves are large, and the rapidity of the growth of the plant is astonishing. Its fruit is, for the most part, eaten in a fresh state, and is somewhat like the squash. It has no more than a generic resemblance to the gourd of the United States, though I suppose that both are species of the cucurbita. It is grown in great abundance on the alluvial banks of the Tigris, and on the plain between the river and ruins of Nineveh, which is about a mile wide." He gives reasons for supposing that the LXX. κολοκύνθη was really meant to designate that plant. Dr. Pusey (Jonah, p. 259) follows those who adopt our marginal rendering as correct, namely, palmerist or the castor-oil plant as described above. He remarks concerning this plant (which must be true, perhaps, of any plant with which the kikáyón was identical) that while the rapidity of its growth was supernatural, it was a growth in conformity with the natural character of the product. GOVERNOR. In the A. V. this one English word is the representative of no less than ten Hebrew and four [five] Greek words. To discriminate between them is the object of the following article.

1. אַלּוּף, allúph, the chief of a tribe or family, אֶלֶף, eleph (Judg. vi. 15; Is. lx. 22; Mic. v. 2), and equivalent to the "prince of a thousand" of Ex. xviii. 21, or the "head of a thousand" of Num. i. 16. It is the term applied to the "dukes" of Edom (Gen. xxxiv.). The LXX. have retained the etymological significance of the word in rendering it by χιλίαρχος in Zech. ix. 7; xii. 5, 6 (comp. שָׁלִישׁ, from שָׁלֹשׁ). The usage in other passages seems to imply a more intimate relationship than that which would exist between a chieftain and his fellow-clansmen, and to express the closest friendship. Allûph is then "a guide, director, counsellor" (Ps. lv. 13; Prov. ii. 17; Jer. iii. 4), the object of confidence or trust (Mic. v. 2).

2. חֹלֵק, chôlêk (Judg. v. 9), and 3. מְחֹלֵק, m'chôlêk (Judg. v. 14), denote a ruler in his capacity of lawgiver and dispenser of justice (Gen. xlix. 10; Prov. viii. 15; comp. Judg. v. 14, with Is. x. 1).

4. מֹשֵׁל, môshêl, a ruler considered especially as having power over the property and persons of his subjects; whether his authority were absolute, as in Josh. xii. 2, of Sihon, and in Ps. cv. 20, of Pharaoh; or delegated, as in the case of Abraham's steward (Gen. xxiv. 2), and Joseph as second to Pharaoh (Gen. xlv. 8, 26; Ps. cv. 21). The "governors of the people" in 2 Chr. xxiii. 20 appear to have been the king's body-guard (cf. 2 K. xi. 19).

5. נָגִיד, nâgîd, is connected etymologically with נָגַד and נֶגֶד, and denotes a prominent personage, whatever his capacity. It is applied to a king as the military and civil chief of his people (2 Sam. v. 2, vi. 21; 1 Chr. xxix. 22), to the general of an army (2 Chr. xxxii. 21), and to the head of a tribe (2 Chr. xix. 11). The heir-apparent to the crown was thus designated (2 Chr. xi. 22), as holding a prominent position among the king's sons. The term is also used of persons who fulfilled certain offices in the temple, and is applied equally to the high-priest (2 Chr. xxxi. 10, 13), as to inferior priests (2 Chr. xxxv. 8) to whose charge were committed the treasures and the dedicated things (1 Chr. xxvi. 24), and to Levites appointed for special service (2 Chr. xxxi. 12). It denotes an officer of high rank in the palace, the lord high chamberlain (2 Chr. xxviii. 7), who is also described as "over the household" (1 K. iv. 6), or "over the house" (1 K. xviii. 3). Such was the office held by Shebna, the scribe, or secretary of state (Is. xxii. 15), and in which he was succeeded by Eliakim (2 K. xviii. 18). It is perhaps the equivalent of οἰκονόμος, Rom. xvi. 23, and of ἱεροστάτης, 1 Esdr. vii. 2 (cf. 1 Esdr. i. 8).

6. נָשִׂיא, nâsî. The prevailing idea in this word is that of elevation. It is applied to the chief of the tribe (Gen. xvii. 20; Num. ii. 3, &c.), to the heads of sections of a tribe (Num. iii. 32, vii. 2), and to a powerful sheykh (Gen. xxiii. 6). It appears to be synonymous with allûph in 2 Chr. i. 2, נְשִׂיאֵי אָבוֹת = רָאשֵׁי אָבוֹת (cf. 2 Chr. v. 2). In general it denotes a man of elevated rank. In later times the title was given to the president of the great Sanhedrim (Selden, De Synedriis, ii. 6, § 1).

7. פֶּחָה, pechâh, is probably a word of Assyrian origin. It is applied in 1 K. x. 15 to the petty chieftains who were tributary to Solomon (2 Chr. ix. 14); to the military commander of the Syrians (1 K. xx. 24), the Assyrians (2 K. xviii. 24), the Chaldæans (Jer. li. 23), and the Medes (Jer. li. 28). Under the Persian viceroys, during the Babylonian captivity, the land of the Hebrews appears to have been portioned out among "governors" (פַּחוֹת, pachôth) inferior in rank to the satraps (Ezr. viii. 36), like the other provinces which were under the dominion of the Persian king (Neh. ii. 7, 9). It is impossible to determine the precise limits of their authority, or the functions which they had to perform. They formed a part of the Babylonian system of government, and are expressly distinguished from the סְגָנִים, s'gânim (Jer. li. 23, 28), to whom, as well as to the satraps, they seem to have been inferior (Dan. iii. 2, 3, 27); as also from the שָׂרִים, sârîm (Esth. iii. 12, viii. 9), who, on the other hand, had a subordinate jurisdiction. Sheshbazzar, the "prince" (נָשִׂיא, Ezr. i. 8) of Judah, was appointed by Cyrus "governor" of Jerusalem (Ezr. v. 14), or "governor of the Jews," as he is elsewhere designated (Ezr. vi. 7), an office to which Nehemiah afterwards succeeded (Neh. v. 14) under the title of Tirshatha (Ezr. ii. 63; Neh. viii. 9). Zerubbabel, the representative of the royal family of Judah, is also called the "governor" of Judah (Hag. i. 1), but whether in consequence of his position in the tribe or from his official rank is not quite clear. Tatnai, the "governor" beyond the river, is spoken of by Josephus (Ant. xi. 4, § 4) under the name of Sisines, as ἔπαρχος of Syria and Phœnicia (cf. 1 Esd. vi. 3); the same term being employed to denote the Roman proconsul or proprætor as well as the procurator (Jos. Ant. xx. 8, § 1). It appears from Ezr. vi. 8 that these governors were intrusted with the collection of the king's taxes; and from Neh. v. 18, xii. 26, that they were supported by a contribution levied upon the people, which was technically termed "the bread of the governor" (comp. Ezr. iv. 14). They were probably assisted in discharging their official duties by a council (Ezr. iv. 7, vi. 6). In the Peshito version of Neh. iii. 11, Pahath Moab is not taken as a proper name, but is rendered "chief of Moab;" and a similar translation is given in other passages where the words occur, as in Ezr. ii. 6, Neh. vii. 11, x. 14. The "governor" beyond the river had a judgment-seat at Jerusalem, from which probably he administered justice when making a progress through his province (Neh. iii. 7).

8. פָּקִיד, pâkîd, denotes simply a person appointed to any office. It is used of the officers proposed to be appointed by Joseph (Gen. xli. 34); of Zebul, Abimelech's lieutenant (Judg. ix. 28); of an officer of the high-priest (2 Chr. xxiv. 11), inferior to the nâgîd (2 Chr. xxxi. 12, 13), or pâkîd nâgîd (Jer. xx. 1); and of a priest or Levite of high rank (Neh. xi. 14, 22). The same term is applied to the eunuch who was over the men of war (2 K. xxv. 19; Jer. lii. 25), and to an officer appointed for especial service (Esth. ii. 3). In the passage of Jer. xx. above quoted it probably denotes the captain of the temple guard mentioned in Acts iv. 1, v. 24, and by Josephus (B. J. vi. 5, § 3).

9. שָׁלִיט, shallît, a man of authority. Applied to Joseph as Pharaoh's prime minister (Gen. xlii. 6); to Arioch, the captain of the guard, to the king of Babylon (Dan. ii. 15), and to Daniel as third in rank under Belshazzar (Dan. v. 29).

10. שַׂר, sar, a chief, in any capacity. The term is used equally of the general of an army (Gen. xxi. 22), or the commander of a division (1 K. xvi. 9, xi. 24), as of the governor of Pharaoh's prison (Gen. xxxix. 21), and the chief of his butlers and bakers (Gen. xl. 2), or herdsmen (Gen. xlvii. 6). The chief officer of a city, in his civic capacity, was thus designated (1 K. xxii. 26; 2 K. xxiii. 8). The same dignitary is elsewhere described as "over the city" (Neh. xi. 9). In Judg. ix. 30 sar is synonymous with pâkîd in ver. 28, and with both pâkîd and nâgîd in 1 Chr. xxiv. 5. שָׂרֵי הַמְּדִינוֹת, sârê hamm'dinôth, "the princes of provinces" (1 K. xx. 14), appear to have held a somewhat similar position to the "governors" under the Persian kings.

11. Ἐθνάρχης, 2 Cor. xi. 32 — an officer of rank under Aretas, the Arabian king of Damascus. It is not easy to determine the capacity in which he acted. The term is applied in 1 Macc. xiv. 47, xv. 1 to Simon the high-priest, who was made general and ethnarch of the Jews, as a vassal of Demetrius. From this the office would appear to be distinct from a military command. The jurisdiction of Archelaus, called by Josephus (B. J. ii. 6, § 3) an ethnarchy, extended over Idumæa, Samaria, and all Judæa, the half of his father's kingdom, which he held as the emperor's vassal. But, on the other hand, Strabo (xvii. 13), in enumerating the officers who formed part of the machinery of the Roman government in Egypt, mentions ethnarchs apparently as inferior both to the military commanders and to the nomarchs, or governors of districts. Again, the prefect of the colony of Jews in Alexandria (called by Philo γενάρχης, lib. in Flacc. § 10) is designated by this title in the edict of Claudius given by Josephus (Ant. xix. 5, § 2). According to Strabo (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7, § 2) he exercised the prerogatives of an ordinary independent ruler. It has therefore been conjectured that the ethnarch of Damascus was merely the governor of the resident Jews, and this conjecture receives some support from the parallel narrative in Acts ix. 24, where the Jews alone are said to have taken part in the conspiracy against the Apostle. But it does not seem probable that an officer of such limited jurisdiction would be styled "the ethnarch of Aretas the king;" and as the term is clearly capable of a wide range of meaning, it was most likely intended to denote one who held the city and district of Damascus as the king's vassal or representative.

12. Ἡγεμών, the procurator of Judæa under the Romans (Matt. xxvii. 2, etc.). The verb is employed (Luke ii. 2) to denote the nature of the jurisdiction of Quirinius over the imperial province of Syria.

13. Οἰκονόμος (Gal. iv. 2), a steward; apparently intrusted with the management of a minor's property.

14. Ἀρχιτρίκλινος, John ii. 9, "the governor of the feast." It has been conjectured, but without much show of probability, that this officer corresponded to the συμποσίαρχος of the Greeks, whose duties are described by Plutarch (Sympos. Quæst. 4), and to the arbiter bibendi of the Romans. Lightfoot supposes him to have been a kind of chaplain, who pronounced the blessings upon the wine that was drunk during the seven days of the marriage feast. Again, some have taken him to be equivalent to the τραπεζοποιός, who is defined by Pollux (Onom. vi. 1) as one who had the charge of all the servants at a feast, the carvers, cupbearers, cooks, etc. But there is nothing in the narrative of the marriage feast at Cana which would lead to the supposition that the ἀρχιτρίκλινος held the rank of a servant. He appears rather to have been on intimate terms with the bridegroom, and to have presided at the banquet in his stead. The duties of the master of a feast are given at full length in Ecclus. xxxv. (xxxii.).

In the Apocryphal books, in addition to the common words, ἄρχων, δεσπότης, στρατηγός, which are rendered "governor," we find ἐπιστάτης (1 Esdr. i. 8; Jud. ii. 14), which closely corresponds to פָּקִיד: ἔπαρχος used of Zerubbabel and Tatnai (1 Esdr. vi. 3, 29, vii. 1), and προστάτης, applied to Sheshbazzar (1 Esdr. ii. 12), both of which represent פֶּחָה: ἱεροστάτης (1 Esdr. vii. 2) and προστάτης τοῦ ἱεροῦ (2 Macc. iii. 4), "the governor of the temple" = נָגִיד (cf. 2 Chr. xxxv. 8) and σατράπης (1 Esdr. iii. 2, 21), "a satrap," not always used in its strict sense, but as the equivalent of στρατηγός (Jud. v. 2, vii. 8).

GO'ZAN (גֹּזָן) [perh. quarry, Ges.; pass, ford, Fürst]: Γωζάν; [Vat. 2 K. xvii. 6, Γωζαρ, and 1 Chr., Χωζαρ:] Gozan, [in Is., Gozam]) seems in the A. V. of 1 Chr. v. 26 to be the name of a river; but in Kings (2 K. xvii. 6, and xviii. 11) it is evidently applied not to a river but a country.[a] Where Kings and Chronicles differ, the authority of the latter is weak; and the name Gozan will therefore be taken in the present article for the name of a tract of country.

Gozan was the tract to which the Israelites were carried away captive by Pul, Tiglath-Pileser, and Shalmaneser, or possibly Sargon. It has been variously placed; but it is probably identical with the Gauzanitis of Ptolemy (Geograph. v. 18), and may be regarded as represented by the Mygdonia of other writers (Strab., Polyb., etc.). It was the tract watered by the Habor (Ἀβόρρας, or Χαβώρας), the modern Khabour, the great Mesopotamian affluent of the Euphrates. Mr. Layard describes this region as one of remarkable fertility (Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 269–313). According to the LXX. Halah and Habor were both rivers of Gozan (2 K. xvii. 6); but this is a mistranslation of the Hebrew text, and it is corrected in the following chapter, where we have the term "river" used in the singular of the Habor only. Halah seems to have been a region adjoining Gozan. [Halah.] With respect to the term Mygdonia, which became the recognized name of the region in classic times, and which Strabo (xvi. 1, § 27) and Plutarch (Lucull. c. 32) absurdly connect with the Macedonian Mygdones, it may be observed that it is merely Gozan, with the participial or adjectival מ prefixed. The Greek writers always represent the Semitic z by their own d. Thus Gaza became Cadytis, Achzib became Ecdippa, the river Zab became the Diaba, and M'gozan became Myg*d*on.

The conjunction of Gozan with Haran or Harran in Isaiah (xxxvii. 12) is in entire agreement with [a] * On the contrary, Fürst maintains (Handw. s. v.) that a region and a river bore this name (the latter the Kisil-Ozen, Ritter's Erdk. viii. 590, 615). The district was on the river, and a ford there (see above) may have given name to both.

H.

the position here assigned to the former. As Gozan was the district on the Khabour, so Haran was that upon the Bilik, the next affluent of the Euphrates. [See CHARRAN.] The Assyrian kings, having conquered the one, would naturally go on to the other. G. R.

GRA'BA ('Αγραβά; [so Ald.; Vat.] Alex. [and 10 other MSS.] 'Αγγαβά: Armacha), 1 Esdr. v. 29. [HAGABA.] As is the case with many names in the A. V. of the Apocryphal books, it is not obvious whence our translators got the form they have here employed — without the initial A, which even the corrupt Vulgate retains.

* GRAFT (Rom. xi. 17 ff.). [See OLIVE.]

GRAPE. [VINE.]

GRASS. 1. This is the ordinary rendering of the Heb. word חָצִיר, which signifies properly an inclosed spot, from the root חָצַר, to inclose; but this root also has the second meaning to flourish, and hence the noun frequently signifies "fodder," "food of cattle." In this sense it occurs in 1 K. xviii. 5; Job xl. 15; Ps. civ. 14; Is. xv. 6, &c. As the herbage rapidly fades under the parching heat of the sun of Palestine, it has afforded to the sacred writers an image of the fleeting nature of human fortunes (Job viii. 12; Ps. xxxvii. 2), and also of the brevity of human life (Is. xl. 6, 7; Ps. xc. 5). The LXX. render חָצִיר by βοτάνη and πόα, but most frequently by χόρτος, a word which in Greek has passed through the very same modifications of meaning as its Hebrew representative: χόρτος = gramen, "fodder," is properly a court or inclosed space for cattle to feed in (Hom. Il. xi. 774), and then any feeding-place whether inclosed or not (Eur. Iph. T. 134, χόρτοι εὐδενδροι). Gesenius questions whether חָצִיר, χόρτος, and the Sansk. harit = "green" may not be traceable to the same root.

2. In Jer. l. 11, A. V. renders כְּעֶגְלָה דָּשְׁאָ as the heifer at grass, and the LXX. ὡς βοῦς ἐν βοτάνῃ. It should be "as the heifer treading out corn" (comp. Hos. x. 11). דֶּשֶׁא comes from דּוּשׁ, conterere, triturare, and has been confounded with דֶּשֶׁא, gramen, from root דָּשָׁא, to germinate. This is the word rendered grass in Gen. i. 11, 12, where it is distinguished from עֵשֶׂב, the latter signifying herbs suitable for human food, while the former is herbage for cattle. Gesenius says it is used chiefly concerning grass, which has no seed (at least none obvious to general observers), and the smaller weeds which spring up spontaneously from the soil. The LXX. render it by χλόη, as well as by χόρτος, βοτάνη, and πόα.

3. In Num. xxii. 4, where mention is made of the ox licking up the grass of the field, the Heb. word is יֶרֶק, which elsewhere is rendered green, when followed by דֶּשֶׁא or עֵשֶׂב, as in Gen. i. 30, and Ps. xxxvii. 2. It answers to the German das Grüne, and comes from the root יָרַק, to flourish like grass.

4. עֵשֶׂב is used in Deut., in the Psalms, and in the Prophets, and, as distinguished from דֶּשֶׁא, signifies herbs for human food (Gen. i. 30; Ps. civ 14), but also fodder for cattle (Deut. xi 15; Jer. xiv. 6). It is the grass of the field (Gen. ii. 5 Ex. ix. 22) and of the mountain (Is. xiii. 15 Prov. xxvii. 25).

In the N. T. wherever the word grass occurs it is the representative of the Greek χόρτος.[a]

* GRASS ON THE HOUSE-TOP. [ANATHOTH, Amer. ed.]

GRASSHOPPER. [LOCUST.]

* GRATE. [ALTAR.]

GRAVE. [BURIAL.]

GREAVES (כִּידֹן). This word occurs in the A. V. only in 1 Sam. xvii. 6, in the description of the equipment of Goliath — "he had greaves of brass upon his legs." Its ordinary meaning is a piece of defensive armor which reached from the foot to the knee, and thus protected the shin of the wearer. This was the case with the κνημίς of the Greeks, which derived its name from its covering the κνήμη, i. e. the part of the leg above-named. But the Mitzchah of the above passage can hardly have been armor of this nature. Whatever the armor was, it was not worn on the legs, but on the feet (רַגְלַי) of Goliath. It appears to be derived from a root signifying brightness, as of a star (see Gesenius and Fürst). The word is not in either the dual or plural number, but is singular. It would therefore appear to have been more a kind of shoe or boot than a "greave;" though in our ignorance of the details of the arms of the Hebrews and the Philistines we cannot conjecture more closely as to its nature. At the same time it must be allowed that all the old versions, including Josephus, give it the meaning of a piece of armor for the leg — some even for the thigh. G.

GREECE, GREEKS, GRECIANS. The histories of Greece and Palestine are as little connected as those of any other two nations exercising the same influence on the destinies of mankind could well be.

The Homeric Epos in its widest range does not include the Hebrews, while on the other hand the Mosaic idea of the Western world seems to have been sufficiently indefinite. It is possible that Moses may have derived some geographical outlines from the Egyptians; but he does not use them in Gen. x. 2–5, where he mentions the descendants of Javan as peopling the isles of the Gentiles. This is merely the vaguest possible indication of a geographical locality; and yet it is not improbable that his Egyptian teachers were almost equally in the dark as to the position of a country which had not at that time arrived at a unity sufficiently imposing to arrest the attention of its neighbors. The amount and precision of the information possessed by Moses must be measured by the nature of the relation which we can conceive as existing in his time between Greece and Egypt. Now it appears from Herodotus that prior to the Trojan war the current of tradition, sacred and mythological, set from Egypt towards Greece; and the first quasi-historical event which awakened the curiosity, and stimulated the imagination of the Egyptian priests,

[a] * In Matt. xiii. 26 and Mark iv. 28 χόρτος is rendered "blade," and in 1 Cor. iii. 12 "hay" The other translation occurs 12 times. H was the story of Paris and Helen (Herod. ii. 43, 51, 52, and 112). At the time of the Exodus, therefore, it is not likely that Greece had entered into any definite relation whatever with Egypt. Withdrawn from the sea-coast, and only gradually fighting their way to it during the period of the Judges, the Hebrews can have had no opportunity of forming connections with the Greeks. From the time of Moses to that of Joel, we have no notice of the Greeks in the Hebrew writings, except that which was contained in the word JAVAN (Gen. x. 2); and it does not seem probable that during this period the word had any peculiar significance for a Jew, except in so far as it was associated with the idea of islanders. When, indeed, they came into contact with the Ionians of Asia Minor, and recognized them as the long-lost islanders of the western migration, it was natural that they should mark the similarity of sound between יָוָן = יָוָן and Ions, and the application of that name to the Asiatic Greeks would tend to satisfy in some measure a longing to realize the Mosaic ethnography. Accordingly the O. T. word which is Grecia, in A. V. Greece, Grecks, etc., is in Hebrew יָוָן, Javan (Joel iii. 6; Dan. viii. 21): the Hebrew, however, is sometimes retained (Is. lxvi. 19; Ez. xxvii. 13). In Gen. x. 2, the LXX. have καὶ Ἰώναν καὶ Ἐλισά, with which Rosenmüller compares Herod. i. 56–58, and professes to discover the two elements of the Greek race. From Ἰώναν he gets the Ionian or Pelasgian, from Ἐλισά (for which he supposes the Heb. original אֱלִישָׁה), the Hellenic element. This is excessively fanciful, and the degree of accuracy which it implies upon an ethnological question cannot possibly be attributed to Moses, and is by no means necessarily involved in the fact of his divine inspiration.

The Greeks and Hebrews met for the first time in the slave-market. The medium of communication seems to have been the Tyrian slave-merchant. About B. C. 800 Joel speaks of the Tyrians as selling the children of Judah to the Grecians (Joel iii. 6); and in Ez. xxvii. 13 the Greeks are mentioned as bartering their brazen vessels for slaves. On the other hand, Bochart says that the Greek slaves were highly valued throughout the East (Geogr. Sac. pt. i. lib. iii. c. 3, p. 175); and it is probable that the Tyrians took advantage of the calamities which befell either nation to sell them as slaves to the other. Abundant opportunities would be afforded by the attacks of the Lydian monarchy on the one people, and the Syrian on the other; and it is certain that Tyre would let slip no occasion of replenishing her slave-market.

Prophetical notice of Greece occurs in Dan. viii. 21, etc., where the history of Alexander and his successors is rapidly sketched. Zechariah (ix. 13) foretells the triumphs of the Maccabees against the Græco-Syrian empire, while Isaiah looks forward to the conversion of the Greeks, amongst other Gentiles, through the instrumentality of Jewish missionaries (lxvi. 19). For the connection between the Jews and the quasi-Greek kingdoms which sprang out of the divided empire of Alexander, reference should be made to other articles.

The presence of Alexander himself at Jerusalem, and his respectful demeanor, are described by Josephus (Ant. xi. 8, § 3); and some Jews are even said to have joined him in his expedition against Persia (Hecat. ap. Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 4), as the Samaritans had already done in the siege of Tyre (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, §§ 4–6). In 1 Macc. xii. 5–23 (about B. C. 180), and Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 10, we have an account of an embassy and letter sent by the Lacedæmonians to the Jews. [AREUS; ONIAS.] The most remarkable feature in the transaction is the claim which the Lacedæmonians prefer to kindred with the Jews, and which Areus professes to establish by reference to a book. It is by no means unlikely that two declining nations, the one crouching beneath a Roman, the other beneath a Græco-Syrian invader, should draw together in face of the common calamity. This may have been the case, or we may with Jahn (Heb. Comm. ix. 91, note) regard the affair as a piece of pompous trifling or idle curiosity, at a period when "all nations were curious to ascertain their origin, and their relationship to other nations."

The notices of the Jewish people which occur in Greek writers have been collected by Josephus (c. Apion. i. 22). The chief are Pythagoras, Herodotus, Chœrilus, Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Hecatæus. The main drift of the argument of Josephus is to show that the Greek authors derived their materials from Jewish sources, or with more or less distinctness referred to Jewish history. For Pythagoras, he cites Hermippus's life; for Aristotle, Clearchus; but it should be remembered that the Neo-Platonism of these authorities makes them comparatively worthless; that Hermippus in particular belongs to that Alexandrian school which made it its business to fuse the Hebrew traditions with the philosophy of Greece, and propitiated the genius of Orientalism by denying the merit of originality to the great and independent thinkers of the West. This style of thought was further developed by Iamblichus; and a very good specimen of it may be seen in Le Clerc's notes on Grotius, de Verit. It has been ably and vehemently assailed by Ritter, Hist. Phil. b. i. c. 3.

Herodotus mentions the Syrians of Palestine as confessing that they derived the rite of circumcision from the Egyptians (ii. 104). Bähr, however, does not think it likely that Herodotus visited the interior of Palestine, though he was acquainted with the sea-coast. (On the other hand see Dahlmann, pp. 55, 56, Engl. transl.) It is almost impossible to suppose that Herodotus could have visited Jerusalem without giving us some more detailed account of it than the merely incidental notices in ii. 159 and iii. 5, not to mention that the site of Κάδυτις is still a disputed question.

The victory of Pharoah-Necho over Josiah at Megiddo is recorded by Herodotus (comp. Herod ii. 159 with 2 K. xxiii. 29 ff., 2 Chr. xxxv. 20 ff.). It is singular that Josephus should have omitted these references, and cited Herodotus only as mentioning the rite of circumcision.

The work of Theophrastus cited is not extant; he enumerates amongst other oaths that of Corban.

Chœrilus is supposed by Josephus to describe the Jews in a by no means flattering portrait of a people who accompanied Xerxes in his expedition against Greece. The chief points of identification are, their speaking the Phœnician language, and dwelling in the Solymean mountains, near a broad lake, which according to Josephus was the Dead Sea.

The Hecatæus of Josephus is Hecatæus of Abdera, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, and Ptolemy son of Lagus. The authenticity of the History of the Jews attributed to him by Jose thus has been called in question by Origen and others.

After the complete subjugation of the Greeks by the Romans, and the absorption into the Roman empire of the kingdoms which were formed out of the dominions of Alexander, the political connection between the Greeks and Jews as two independent nations no longer existed.

The name of the country, Greece, occurs once in N. T., Acts xx. 2, Ἑλλας = Greece, i. e. Greece Proper, as opposed to Macedonia.[a] In the A. V. of O. T. the word Greek is not found; either Javan is retained, or, as in Joel iii. 6, the word is rendered by Grecian. In Maccabees Greeks and Grecians seem to be used indifferently (comp. 1 Macc. i. 10, vi. 2; also 2 Macc. iv. 10, Greekish). In N. T., on the other hand, a distinction is observed, Ἑλλην being rendered Greek, and Ἑλληνιστής Grecian. The difference of the English terminations, however, is not sufficient to convey the difference of meanings. Ἑλλην in N. T. is either a Greek by race, as in Acts xvi. 1–3, xviii. 17, Rom. i. 14; or more frequently a Gentile, as opposed to a Jew (Rom. ii. 9, 10, etc.); so fem. Ἑλληνίς, Mark vii. 26, Acts xvii. 12. Ἑλληνιστής (properly "one who speaks Greek") is a foreign Jew; opposed, therefore, not to Ἰουδαῖος, but to Ἑβραῖος, a home-Jew, one who dwelt in Palestine. So Schleusner, etc.: according to Salmasius, however, the Hellenists were Greek proselytes, who had become Christians; so Wolf, Parkhurst, etc., arguing from Acts xi. 20, where Ἑλληνισταί are contrasted with Ἰουδαῖοι in 19. The question resolves itself partly into a textual one, Griesbach having adopted the reading Ἕλληνας, and so also Lachmann.[b] T. E. B.

* GREETING. [SALUTATION.]

GREYHOUND, the translation in the text of the A. V. (Prov. xxx. 31) of the Hebrew words זַרְזִיר מָתְנַיִם (zarzir mothnâyim), i. e. "one girt about the loins." See margin, where it is conjectured that the "horse" is the animal denoted by this expression. The Alexandrine version of the LXX. has the following curious interpretation, ἀλέκτωρ ἐμπεριπατῶν ἐν θηλείαις εὔψυχος, i. e. "a cock as it proudly struts amongst the hens." Somewhat similar is the Vulgate, "gallus succinctus lumbos." Various are the opinions as to what animal "comely in going" is here intended. Some think "a leopard," others "an eagle," or "a man girt with armor," or "a zebra," etc. Gesenius (Thes. p. 435), Schultens (Comment. ad Prov. l. c.), Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 684), Rosenmüller (Schol. ad Prov. l. c., and Not. ad Boch. l. c.), Fuller (Miscell. Sac. v. 12), are in favor of a "war-horse girt with trappings" being the thing signified. But, later, Maurer (Comment. Gram. in Vet. Test. l. c.) decides unhesitatingly in favor of a "wrestler," when girt about the loins for a contest. He refers to Buxtorf (Lex. Chald. Talm. p. 692) to show that zarzir is used in the Talmud to express "a wrestler," and thus concludes: "Sed ne opus quidem est hoc loco quanquam minime contemnendo, quum accinctum esse in neminem magis cadat quam in luctatorem, ita ut hæc significatio certa sit per se." There is certainly great probability that Maurer is correct. The grace and activity of the practiced athlete agrees well with the notion conveyed by the expression, "comely in going;" and the suitableness of the Hebrew words, zarzir mothnayim, is obvious to every reader. * GRINDERS, Eccl. xii. 3. [ALMOND.]

GRINDING. [MILL.]

GROVE. A word used in the A. V., with two exceptions, to translate the mysterious Hebrew term Asherah (אֲשֵׁרָה). This term is examined under its own head (p. 173), where it is observed that almost all modern interpreters agree that an idol or image of some kind must be intended, and not a grove, as our translators render, following the version of the LXX. (ἄλσος) and of the Vulgate (lucus). This is evident from many passages, and especially from 2 K. xxiii. 6, where we find that Josiah "brought out the Asherah" (translated by our version "the grove") "from the house of the

[a] *Ἑλλας stands there for the stricter Ἀχαΐα (see Acts xviii. 12, and xix. 21). Wetstein has shown (Nov. Test. ii. 590) that Luke was justified in that use of the term. H.

[b] * Also, Tischendorf, De Wette, Meyer, and others, adopt Ἕλληνας, partly on external, and partly on internal grounds. It is a question of mixed evidence Without this reading it is impossible to see how the sphere of the preachers in ver. 19 differs from that of those in ver. 20. It would have been nothing new at this time to preach to the Greek-speaking Jews; see, e. g., Acts ii. 9, and ix. 20. H

Lord" (comp. also Judg. iii. 7; 1 K. xiv. 23, xviii. 19). In many passages the "groves" are grouped with molten and graven images in a manner that leaves no doubt that some idol was intended (2 Chr. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 3, 4; Is. xvii. 8). There has been much dispute as to what the Asherah was; but in addition to the views set forth under ASHERAH, we must not omit to notice a probable connection between this symbol or image — whatever it was — and the sacred symbolic tree, the representation of which occurs so frequently on Assyrian sculptures, and is shown in the preceding woodcut. The connection is ingeniously maintained by Mr. Fergusson in his Nineveh and Persepolis restored (pp. 299–304), to which the reader is referred.

2. The two exceptions noticed above are Gen. xxi. 33 and 1 Sam. xxii. 6 (margin), where "grove" is employed to render the word אֶשֶׁל, Eshel, which in the text of the latter passage, and in 1 Sam. xxxi. 13, is translated "tree" Professor Stanley (S. & P. § 77; also p. 21, note) would have Eshel to be a tamarisk; but this is controverted by Bonar (Land of Prom.), on the ground of the thin and shadeless nature of that tree. It is now, however, generally recognized (amongst others, see Gesen. Thes. p. 50 b; Stanley, S. & P. App. § 76, 3, p. 142 note, 220 note, and passim), that the word Elon, אֵלוֹן, which is uniformly rendered by the A. V. "plain," signifies a grove or plantation. Such were the Elon of Mamre (Gen. xiii. 18, xiv. 13, xviii. 1); of Moreh (Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 30); of Zaanaim (Judg. iv. 11), or Zaananim (Josh. xix. 33); of the pillar (Judg. ix. 6); of Meonenim (Judg. ix. 37); and of Tabor (1 Sam. x. 3). In all these cases the LXX. have δρῦς or βάλανος; the Vulgate — which the A. V. probably followed — vallis or convallis, in the last three, however, quercus.

In the religions of the ancient heathen world groves play a prominent part. In old times altars only were erected to the gods. It was thought wrong to shut up the gods within walls, and hence, as Pliny expressly tells us, trees were the first temples (H. N. xii. 2; Tac. Germ. 9; Lucian, de Sacrific. 10; see Carpzov, App. Crit. p. 332), and from the earliest times groves are mentioned in connection with religious worship (Gen. xii. 6, 7, xiii. 18; Deut. xi. 30; A. V. "plain;" see above). Their high antiquity, refreshing shade, solemn silence, and awe-inspiring solitude, as well as the striking illustration they afford of natural life, marked them out as the fit localities, or even the actual objects of worship ("Lucos et in iis silentia ipsa adoramus," Plin. xii. 1; "Secretum luci . . . et admiratio umbræ fidem tibi numinis facit," Sen. Ep. xli.; "Quo posses viso dicere Numen habet," Ov. Fast. iii. 295; "Sacrâ nemus accubet umbrâ," Virg. Georg. iii. 334; Ov. Met. viii. 743; Ez. vi. 13; Is. lvii. 5; Hos. iv. 13). This last passage hints at another and darker reason why groves were opportune for the degraded services of idolatry; their shadow hid the atrocities and obscenities of heathen worship. The groves were generally found connected with temples, and often had the right of affording an asylum (Tac. Germ. 9, 40; Herod. ii. 138; Virg. Æn. i. 441, ii. 512; Sil. Ital. i. 81). Some have supposed that even the Jewish Temple had a τέμενος planted with palm and cedar (Ps. xcii. 12, 13) and olive (Ps. lii. 8) as the mosque which stands on its site now has. This is more than doubtful; but we know that a celebrated oak stood by the sanctuary at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26; Judg. ix. 6; Stanley, S. & P. p. 142). We find repeated mention of groves consecrated with deep superstition to particular gods (Liv. vii. 25, xxiv. 3, xxxv. 51; Tac. Ann. ii. 12, 51, etc., iv. 73, etc.). For this reason they were stringently forbidden to the Jews (Ex. xxxiv. 13; Jer. xvii. 2; Ez. xx. 28), and Maimonides even says that it is forbidden to sit under the shade of any green tree where an idol statue was (Fabric. Bibl. Antiq. p. 230). Yet we find abundant indications that the Hebrews felt the influence of groves on the mind ("the spirit in the woods," Wordsworth), and therefore selected them for solemn purposes, such as great national meetings (Judg. ix. 6, 37) and the burial of the dead (Gen. xxxv. 8; 1 Sam. xxxi. 13). Those connected with patriarchal history were peculiarly liable to superstitious reverence (Am. v. 5, viii. 14), and we find that the groves of Mamre were long a place of worship (Sozomen, H. E. ii. 4; Euseb. Vit. Constant. 81; Reland, Palæst. p. 714). There are in Scripture many memorable trees; e. g. Allonbachuth (Gen. xxxv. 8), the tamarisk (but see above) in Gibeah (1 Sam. xxii. 6), the terebinth in Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26, under which the law was set up), the palm-tree of Deborah (Judg. iv. 5), the terebinth of enchantments (Judg. ix. 37), the terebinth of wanderers (Judg. iv. 11) and others (1 Sam. xiv. 2, x. 3, sometimes "plain" in A. V., Vulg. "convallis").

This observation of particular trees was among the heathen extended to a regular worship of them "Tree-worship may be traced from the interior of Africa, not only into Egypt and Arabia, but also onward uninterruptedly into Palestine and Syria, Assyria, Persia, India, Thibet, Siam, the Philippine Islands, China, Japan, and Siberia; also westward into Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and other countries; and in most of the countries here named it obtains in the present day, combined as it has been in other parts with various forms of idolatry" (Gen. of Earth and Man, p. 139). "The worship of trees even goes back among the Iranians to the rules of Hom, called in the Zend-Avesta the promulgator of the old law. We know from Herodotus the delight which Xerxes took in the great plane-tree in Lydia, on which he bestowed golden ornaments, and appointed for it a sentinel in the person of one of the 'immortal ten thousand.' The early veneration of trees was associated, by the moist and refreshing canopy of foliage, with that of sacred fountains. In similar connection with the early worship of Nature were among the Hellenic nations the fame of the great palm-tree of Delos, and of an aged platanus in Arcadia. The Buddhists of Ceylon venerate the colossal Indian fig-tree of Anurah-depura. . . . As single trees thus became objects of veneration from the beauty of their form, so did also groups of trees, under the name of 'groves of gods.' Pausanias (i. 21, § 9) is full of the praise of a grove belonging to the temple of Apollo at Grynion in Æolis; and the grove of Colone is celebrated in the renowned chorus of Sophocles" (Humboldt, Cosmos, ii. 96, Eng. ed.). The custom of adorning trees "with jewels and mantles" was very ancient and universal (Herod. vii. 31; Ælian, V. H. ii. 14; Theocr. Id. xviii.; Ov. Met. viii. 723, 745; Arnob. adv. Gentes, i. 39), and even still exists in the East.

The oracular trees of antiquity are well known

(Il. xvi. 233; Od. v. 237; Soph. Trach. 754; Virg. Georg. ii. 16; Sil. Ital. iii. 11). Each god had some sacred tree (Virg. Ecl. vii. 61 ff.). The Etrurians are said to have worshipped a palm [a holm-tree, ilex, Plin. H. N. xvi. 44, al. 87]. and the Celts an oak (Max. Tyr. Dissert. viii: 8, in Godwyn's Mos. and Aar. ii. 4). On the Druidic veneration of oak-groves, see Pliny, H. N. xvi. 44 [al. 95]; Tac. Ann. xiv. 30. In the same way, according to the missionary Oldendorp, the Negroes "have sacred groves, the abodes of a deity, which no Negro ventures to enter except the priests" (Prichard, Nat. Hist. of Man, pp. 525–539, 3d ed.; Park's Travels, p. 65). So too the ancient Egyptians (Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 298). Long after the introduction of Christianity it was found necessary to forbid all abuse of trees and groves to the purposes of superstition (Hardouin, Act. Concil. i. 988; see Orelli, ad Tac. Germ. 9).

GUARD. The Hebrew terms commonly used had reference to the special duties which the body-guard of a monarch had to perform.

(1.) Tabbâch (טַבָּח) originally signified a "cook," and as butchering fell to the lot of the cook in Eastern countries, it gained the secondary sense of "executioner," and is applied to the body-guard of the kings of Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 36), and Babylon (2 K. xxv. 8; Jer. xxxix. 9, xl. 1; Dan. ii. 14). [EXECUTIONER.]

(2.) Râtz (רָץ) properly means a "runner," and is the ordinary term employed for the attendants of the Jewish kings, whose office it was to run before the chariot (2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 K. i. 5), like the cursores of the Roman Emperors (Senec. Ep. 87, 126). That the Jewish "runners" superadded the ordinary duties of a military guard, appears from several passages (1 Sam. xxii. 17; 2 K. x. 25, xi. 6; 2 Chr. xii. 10). It was their office also to carry despatches (2 Chr. xxx. 6). They had a guard-room set apart for their use in the king's palace, in which their arms were kept ready for use (1 K. xiv. 28; 2 Chr. xii. 11). [FOOTMAN.]

(3.) The terms mishmereth (מִשְׁמֶרֶת) and mishmâr (מִשְׁמָר) express properly the act of watching, but are occasionally transferred to the persons who kept watch (Neh. iv. 9, 22, vii. 3, xii. 9; Job vii. 12). The A. V. is probably correct in substituting mishmarto (מִשְׁמַרְתּוֹ) for the present reading in 2 Sam. xxiii. 23. Benaiah being appointed "captain of the guard," as Josephus (Ant. vii. 14, § 4) relates, and not privy councillor: the same error has crept into the text in 1 Sam. xxii. 14, where the words "which goeth at thy bidding" may originally have been "captain of the body-guard." For the duties of the captain of the guard, see CAPTAIN, [and CAPTAIN OF THE GUARD, Amer. ed.]

GUEST. [HOSPITALITY.]

 GUEST-CHAMBER. [HOUSE.]

 GUILTY. The phrase "guilty of death" (A. V.) Num. xxxv. 31; Tob. vi. 12; Matt. xxvi. 66, Mark xiv. 64, contrary to the present idiom of our language, signifies "deserving the penalty of death," being perhaps an imitation of the Latin reus mortis. "He is guilty" in Matt. xxiii. 1 (A. V.), is the translation of the same Greek word (ὀφείλει) which in ver. 16 is rendered "he is a debtor." A better translation in both cases would be, "he is bound," i. e. by his oath. A.

GUL'LOTH (גְּלוֹת) [spring, bubblings], plural of גַּלָּה), a Hebrew term of unfrequent occurrence in the Bible, and used only in two passages — and those identical relations of the same occurrence — to denote a natural object, namely, the springs added by the great Caleb to the south land in the neighborhood of Debir, which formed the dowry of his daughter Achsah (Josh. xv. 19; Judg. i. 15). The springs were "upper" and "lower" — possibly one at the top and the other the bottom of a ravine or glen; and they may have derived their unusual name from their appearance being different to [from] that of the ordinary springs of the country. The root (גָּלַל) has the force of rolling or tumbling over, and perhaps this may imply that they welled up in that round or mushroom form which is not uncommon here, though apparently most rare in Palestine. The rendering of the Vat. LXX. is singular. In Josh. it has τὴν Βοτθανίς [so Rom.; Vat. Βοθθανεις], and τὴν Γοναιθλάν, the latter doubtless a mere corruption of the Hebrew. The Alex. MS., as usual, is faithful to the Hebrew text [reading Γωλαθ]. In Judges both have λύτρωσις. An attempt has been lately made by Dr. Rosen to identify these springs with the 'Ain Nunkur near Hebron (see Zeitschrift der D. M. G. 1857),[a] but the identification can hardly be received without fuller confirmation (Stanley, S. & P. App. § 54). [DEBIR.] G.

GU'NI (גּוּנִי [sorrowful, afflicted, Dietr.]: Γωνί [Vat. -νει], ὁ Γαννί [Vat. -νει]; Alex. Γωυνι: Guni). 1. A son of Naphtali (Gen. xlvi. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 13), the founder of the family of the Gunites (Num. xxvi. 48). Like several others of the early Israelite names, Guni is a patronymic — "Gunite;" as if already a family at the time of its first mention (comp. Arodi, Hushim, etc.).

2. [Γουνί.] A descendant of Gad; father of Abdiel, a chief man in his tribe (1 Chr. v. 15).

GU'NITES, THE (הַגּוּנִי [the Gunite]: ὁ Γαννί; [Vat. -νει: Alex. ο Γωυνι:] Gunite), the "family" which sprang from Guni, son of Naphtali (Num. xxvi. 48). There is not in the Hebrew any difference between the two names, of the individual and the family.

GUR, THE GOING UP TO (מַעֲלֵה־גוּר) = the ascent or steep of Gur, or the lion's whelp, Ges. Thes. p. 275: ἐν τῷ ἀναβαίνειν Γαΐ; [Comp. ἐν τῇ ἀναβάσει Γούρ:] ascensus Gaver), an ascent or rising ground, at which Ahaziah received his death-blow while flying from Jehu after the slaughter of Joram (2 K. ix. 27). It is described as at (בְּ) Ibleam, and on the way between Jezreel and Beth-hag-gan (A. V. "the garden-house"). As the latter is identified with tolerable probability with the present Jenin, we may conclude that the ascent of Gur was some place more than usually steep on the difficult road which leads from the plain of Esdraelon to Jenin. By Josephus it is mentioned (Ant. ix. 6, § 4) merely as "a certain ascent" (ἔν τινι προσβάσει). Neither it nor Ibleam have been yet recovered.

[a] * Dr. Robinson thinks that 'Ain Nunkur may have some relation to these springs (Phys. Geogr. p 249). H

For the details of the occurrence see JEHU. For other ascents see ADUMMIM, AKRABBIM, ZIZ.

G.

GUR-BA'AL (גּוּר־בַּעַל [abode of Baal]: πέτρα: Gurbaal), a place or district in which dwelt Arabians, as recorded in 2 Chr. xxvi. 7. It appears from the context to have been in the country lying between Palestine and the Arabian peninsula; but this, although probable, and although the LXX. reading is in favor of the conjecture, cannot be proved, no site having been assigned to it. The Arab geographers mention a place called Baal, on the Syrian road, north of El-Medeeneh (Marâsid, s. v. בַּעַל). The Targum, as Winer (s. v.) remarks, reads ערבאי דיתבין בגרר — "Arabs living in Gerar" — suggesting גרר instead of גּוּר; but there is no further evidence to strengthen this supposition. [See also GERAR.] The ingenious conjectures of Bochart (Phaleg, ii. 22) respecting the Mehunim, who are mentioned together with the "Arabians that dwelt in Gur-Baal," may be considered in reference to the Mehunim, although they are far-fetched. [MEHUNIM.] E. S. P.

* GUTTER. This word occurs in the difficult passage 2 Sam. v. 6–8, translated in the A. V. as follows: "(6.) And the king and his men went to Jerusalem unto the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land; which spake unto David, saying, Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither; thinking, David cannot come in hither. (7.) Nevertheless, David took the stronghold of Zion; the same is the city of David. (8.) And David said on that day, Whosoever getteth up to the gutter, and smiteth the Jebusites, and the lame, and the blind, that are hated of David's soul, he shall be chief and captain. Wherefore they said, The blind and the lame shall not come into the house."

So long ago as 1546, Sebastian Münster (Hebrew Bible, fol. ed., in loc.) said of this passage, "Est locus ille valde obscurus." The lapse of more than 300 years has not much mended the matter, and the passage is still "valde obscurus." Our limits here forbid a full discussion of the points at issue.[a] But without attempting to examine every grammatical difficulty, we may reach a better translation than the above, by attending to the following points: — (1.) The two clauses, "except thou take away the blind and the lame," and "thou shalt not come in hither," are improperly transposed in the above version; and this transposition puts the next following clause out of its proper connection, and makes it meaningless. (2.) The words rendered "except thou take away the blind and the lame," should be translated, "but the blind and the lame will turn thee away."[b] (3.) The apodosis, or after-clause, corresponding to the expression, "any one that smites" (= if any one smites), is not expressed in the Hebrew. This is a favorite Hebrew idiom, where for any reason it is felt to be unnecessary to complete the construction. See, e. g., Ex. xxxii. 32, in the A. V. Here, the object was two-fold: first, to state what David proposed to his warriors as the means of capturing the stronghold; and secondly, to account for the proverbial saying that arose from this occurrence. Neither of these objects required the completion of the sentence, which would readily be understood to be the offer of a reward for the service. A dash should therefore be put (as in the A. V. Ex. xxxii. 32) after the word "soul" (omitting the words in italics), to indicate that the sentence is incomplete.[c] (4.) In ver. 8 there is also, as in ver. 6, an improper transposition of two clauses, "whosoever getteth up to the gutter," "and smiteth the Jebusites." (5.) In ver. 8, instead of "the Jebusites (plural with the def. art.), we should translate, "a Jebusite." (6.) The word translated "gutter," צִנּוֹר, is here properly a water-course. It is derived from a verb which apparently expresses the sound of rushing water. It occurs in only one other passage, Ps. xlii. 8, and is there applied to a mountain torrent, or a cataract (A. V. "waterspouts"). (7.) The words, "the blind and the lame," may be taken in the same construction as "a Jebusite" (even the blind and the lame); or, as the sentence is manifestly left unfinished, they may be regarded as a part of the incomplete construction, having no grammatical relation to the preceding words.

Thus without resorting to the violent method of conjectural emendation of the text, which Maurer, Thenius, Bttcher, and others, think necessary, or to a change of punctuation and an unauthorized sense of the word עִוֵּר, proposed by Ewald and adopted by Keil, we obtain the following grammatically correct rendering:

"(6.) And the king and his men went to Jerusalem, to the Jebusite inhabiting the land. And he spake to David, saying, Thou shalt not come in hither; but the blind and the lame will turn thee away, saying, David shall not come in hither.

(7.) And David took the stronghold of Zion: that is, the city of David. (8.) And David said on that day, Any one that smites a Jebusite, and gets to the water-course, and the lame and the blind hated of David's soul ——. Therefore they say, Blind and lame shall not come into the house."[d]

To the common reader, with nothing but the translation to guide him, they seem to be "clutched out of the air," as the Germans express it. But a reference to 1 Chr. xi. 6 shows that these words, though they have no right here, are not a pure invention of the translator. The reader of the Hebrew text, if those words are necessary to make sense of the passage, was in the same predicament as the English reader of the A. V. would be without them T. J. C.

position, which had successfully resisted repeated attempts to capture it, sneeringly said to David, "the blind and the lame will turn thee away;" needing only to say, "David shall not come in hither." [a]

David took this stronghold (ver. 7); and how this was effected is intimated in ver. 8. If the water-course could be reached, by which water was supplied to the besieged, the reduction of the stronghold must soon follow. On the import of the last clause in ver. 8, compare the suggestion in the article Jerusalem, II., fourth paragraph, foot-note.

A review of the principal interpretations of Jewish and Christian scholars would be interesting and instructive; but there is not space for it here.

HAAHASHTARI (הָאַחַשְׁתָּרִי, with the article, = the Ahashtarite [perh. courier, messenger, Fürst]: τὸν Ἀασθήρ; [Vat. Ασηραν;] Alex. Ασθηρα: Ahasthari), a man, or a family, immediately descended from Ashur, "father of Tekoa" by his second wife Naarah (1 Chr. iv. 6). The name does not appear again, nor is there any trace of a place of similar name.

HABA'IAH [3 syl.] (חֲבַיָּה, in Neh. חֲדַיָּה [but MSS. and editions vary in both places; whom Jehovah protects]: Λαβεία, Ἐβία; Alex. Οβαια, [Εβεία; in Neh., Vat. Εβεια, FA. Αβεΐα:] Hobia, Habia). Bene-Chabaijah were among the sons of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, but whose genealogy being imperfect, were not allowed to serve (Ezr. ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63). It is not clear from the passage whether they were among the descendants of Barzillai the Gileadite. In the lists of 1 Esdras the name is given as Obdia [marg. Hobaiah].

HABAK'KUK or HAB'AKKUK (חֲבַקּוּק [embracing, as a token of love, Ges., Fürst]: Jerome, Prol. in Hab., renders it by the Greek περίληψις; Ἀμβακούμ: Habacuc). Other Greek forms of the name are Ἀββακούμ, which Suidas erroneously renders πατὴρ ἐγέρσεως, Ἀβακούμ (Georg. Cedrenus), Ἀμβακούκ, and Ἀββακούκ (Dorotheus, Doctr. 2). The Latin forms are Ambacum, Ambacuc, and Abacuc.

1. Of the facts of the prophet's life we have no certain information, and with regard to the period of his prophecy there is great division of opinion. The Rabbinical tradition that Habakkuk was the son of the Shunammite woman whom Elisha restored to life is repeated by Abarbanel in his commentary, and has no other foundation than a fanciful etymology of the prophet's name, based on the expression in 2 K. iv. 16. Equally unfounded is the tradition that he was the sentinel set by Isaiah to watch for the destruction of Babylon (comp. Is. xxi. 16 with Hab. ii. 1). In the title of the history of Bel and the Dragon, as found in the LXX. version in Origen's Tetrapla, the author is called "Habakkuk, the son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi." Some have supposed this apocryphal writer to be identical with the prophet (Jerome, Procem. in Dan.). The psalm in ch. 3 and its title are thought to favor the opinion that Habakkuk was a Levite (Delitzsch, Habakuk, p. iii.). Pseudo-Epiphanius (vol. ii. p. 240, de Vitis Prophetarum) and Dorotheus (Chron. Pasch. p. 150) say that he was of Βηθζοκήρ or Βηθιτουχάρ (Bethacat, Isid. Hispal. c. 47), of the tribe of Simeon. This may have been the same as Bethzacharias, where Judas Maccabæus was defeated by Antiochus Eupator (1 Macc. vi. 32, 33). The same authors relate that when Jerusalem was sacked by Nebuchadnezzar, Habakkuk fled to Ostracine, and remained there till after the Chaldæans had left the city, when he returned to his own country and died at his farm two years before the return from Babylon, B. C. 538. It was during his residence in Judæa that he is said to have carried food to Daniel in the den of lions at Babylon. This legend is given in the history of Bel and the Dragon, and is repeated by Eusebius, Bar-Hebræus, and Eutychius. It is quoted from Joseph ben Gorion (B. J. xi. 3) by Abarbanel (Comm. on Hab.), and seriously refuted by him on chronological grounds. The scene of the event was shown to mediæval travellers on the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem (Early Travels in Palestine, p. 23). Habakkuk is said to have been buried at Keilah in the tribe of Judah, eight miles E. of Eleutheropolis (Eusebius, Onomasticon). Rabbinical tradition places his tomb at Chukkok, of the tribe of Naphtali, now called Jakuk. In the days of Zebenus, bishop of Eleutheropolis, according to Nicephorus (H. E. xii. 48) and Sozomen (H. E. vii. 28), the remains of the prophets Habakkuk and Micah were discovered at Keilah.

2. The Rabbinical traditions agree in placing Habakkuk with Joel and Nahum in the reign of Manasseh (cf Seder Olam Rabba and Zuta, and Tsemach David). This date is adopted by Kimchi and Abarbanel among the Rabbis, and by Witsius, Kalinsky, and Jahn among modern writers. The general corruption and lawlessness which prevailed in the reign of Manasseh are supposed to be referred to in Hab. i. 2–4. Both Kalinsky and Jahn conjecture that Habakkuk may have been one of the prophets mentioned in 2 K. xxi. 10. Syncellus (Chronographia, pp. 214, 230, 240) makes him contemporary with Ezekiel, and extends the period of his prophecy from the time of Manasseh to that of Daniel and Joshua the son of Josedech. The Chronicon Paschale places him later, first mentioning him in the beginning of the reign of Josiah (Olymp. 32), as contemporary with Zephaniah and Nahum; and again in the beginning of the reign of Cyrus (Olymp. 42), as contemporary with Daniel and Ezekiel in Persia, with Haggai and Zechariah in Judæa, and with Baruch in Egypt. Davidson (Horne's Intr. ii. 968), following Keil, decides in favor of the early part of the reign of Josiah. Calmet, Jaeger, Ewald, De Wette, Rosenmüller, Knobel, Maurer, Hitzig, and Meier agree in assigning the commencement of Habakkuk's prophecy to the reign of Jehoiakim, though they are divided as to the exact period to which it is to be referred. Knobel (Der Prophetism. d. Hebr.) and Meier (Gesch. d. poet. nat. Liter. d. Hebr.) are in favor of the commencement of the Chaldæan era, after the battle of Carchemish (B. C. 606), when Judæa was first threatened by the victors. But the question of the date of Habakkuk's prophecy has been discussed in the most exhaustive manner by Delitzsch (Der Prophet Habakuk, Einl. § 3), and though his arguments are rather ingenious than convincing, they are well deserving of consideration as based upon internal evidence. The conclusion at which he arrives is that Habakkuk delivered his prophecy about the 12th or 13th year of Josiah (B. C. 630 or 629), for reasons of which the following is a summary. In Hab. i. 5 the expression "in your days" shows that the fulfillment of the prophecy would take place in the lifetime of those to whom it was addressed. The same phrase in Jer. xvi. 9 embraces a period of at most twenty years, while in Ez. xii. 25 it denotes about six years, and therefore, reckoning backwards from the Chaldæan invasion, the date above assigned would involve no violation of probability, though the argument does not amount to a proof. From the similarity of Hab. ii. 20 and Zeph. i. 7, Delitzsch infers that the latter is an imitation, the former being the original. He supports this conclusion by many collateral arguments. Now Zephaniah, according to the superscription of his prophecy, lived in the time of Josiah, and from iii. 5 must have prophesied after the worship of Jehovah was restored, that is, after the twelfth year of that king's reign. It is probable that he wrote about B. C. 624. Between this period therefore and the 12th year of Josiah (B. C. 630) Delitzsch places Habakkuk. But Jeremiah began to prophesy in the 13th year of Josiah, and many passages are borrowed by him from Habakkuk (cf. Hab. ii. 13 with Jer. li. 58, &c.). The latter therefore must have written about 630 or 629 B. C. This view receives some confirmation from the position of his prophecy in the O. T. Canon.

[a] * Recent excavations on the southern slope of Mount Zion show that this vaunting of the Jebusites was not without some foundation. "From the position and appearance of this escarpment [one discovered here] it must have formed part of the defenses of the old city, the wall running along the crest; . . . the steps which lead down the valley of Hinnom could be defended by a couple of men against any force, before the invention of fire-arms. The escarpment was probably carried down to the valley in a succession of terraces; the large amount of rubbish, however, will not allow anything to be seen clearly." (See Ordnance Survey of Jerusalem, p. 61, Lond. 1865.) H.

3. Instead of looking upon the prophecy as an organic whole, Rosenmüller divided it into three parts corresponding to the chapters, and assigned the first chapter to the reign of Jehoiakim, the second to that of Jehoiachin, and the third to that of Zedekiah, when Jerusalem was besieged for the third time by Nebuchadnezzar. Kalinsky (Vatic. Chabac. et Nah.) makes four divisions, and refers the prophecy not to Nebuchadnezzar, but to Esarhaddon. But in such an arbitrary arrangement the true character of the composition as a perfectly developed poem is entirely lost sight of. The prophet commences by announcing his office and important mission (i. 1). He bewails the corruption and social disorganization by which he is surrounded, and cries to Jehovah for help (i. 2–4). Next follows the reply of the Deity, threatening swift vengeance (i. 5–11). The prophet, transferring himself to the near future foreshadowed in the divine threatenings, sees the rapacity and boastful impiety of the Chaldæan hosts, but, confident that God has only employed them as the instruments of correction, assumes (ii. 1) an attitude of hopeful expectancy, and waits to see the issue. He receives the divine command to write in an enduring form the vision of God's retributive justice, as revealed to his prophetic eye (ii. 2, 3). The doom of the Chaldæans is first foretold in general terms (ii. 4–6), and the announcement is followed by a series of denunciations pronounced upon them by the nations who had suffered from their oppression (ii. 6–20). The strophical arrangement of these "woes" is a remarkable feature of the prophecy. They are distributed in strophes of three verses each, characterized by a certain regularity of structure. The first four commence with a "Woe!" and close with a verse beginning with כִּי (for). The first verse of each of these contains the character of the sin, the second the development of the woe, while the third is confirmatory of the woe denounced. The fifth strophe differs from the others in form in having a verse introductory to the woe. The prominent vices of the Chaldæans' character, as delineated in i. 5–11, are made the subjects of separate denunciations: their insatiable ambition (ii. 6–8), their covetousness (ii. 9–11), cruelty (ii. 12–14), drunkenness (ii. 15–17), and idolatry (ii. 18–20). The whole concludes with the magnificent psalm in chap. iii., "Habakkuk's Pindaric ode" (Ewald), a composition unrivaled for boldness of conception, sublimity of thought, and majesty of diction. This constitutes, in Delitzsch's opinion, "the second grand division of the entire prophecy, as the subjective reflex of the two subdivisions of the first, and the lyrical recapitulation of the whole." It is the echo of the feelings aroused in the prophet's mind by the divine answers to his appeals: fear in anticipation of the threatened judgments, and thankfulness and joy at the promised retribution. But, though intimately connected with the former part of the prophecy, it is in itself a perfect whole, as is sufficiently evident from its lyrical character, and the musical arrangement by which it was adapted for use in the temple service.

In other parts of the A. V. the name is given as HABBACUC, and ABACUC. W. A. W.

* Among the few separate commentaries on this prophet we have Der Prophet Habakuk, ausgelegt, by Franz Delitzsch (Leipz. 1843). This author gives a list in that volume (p. xxiv. f.) of other single works of an earlier date, with critical notices of their value. Of these he commends especially that of G. F. L. Bäumlein, Comm. de Hab. Vatic. (1840). For a list of the still older writers, see Keil's Lehrb. der hist.-krit. Einl. in das A. T. p. 302 (2te Aufl.). The commentaries on the Minor Prophets, or the Prophets generally, contain of course Habakkuk: F. Hitzig, Die zwölf kl. Propheten, pp. 253–277 (1838, 3e Aufl. 1863); Ewald, Die Propheten des A. B. i. 373–389 (1840); Maurer, Comm. Gram. Hist. Crit. in Proph. Minores, ii. 528 ff.; Umbreit, Prakt. Comm. üb. d. Proph. Bd. iv. Th. i. (1845); Keil and Delitzsch, Bibl. Comm. üb. d. 12 kl. Proph. (1866); Henderson, Minor Prophets (1845, Amer. ed. 1860); G. R. Noyes, New Trans. of the Heb. Prophets, 3d ed. (1866), vol. i.; Henry Cowles, Minor Prophets, with Notes Critical, Explanatory, and Practical (New York, 1866).

For the personal history of the prophet, see especially Delitzsch's De Habacuci Prophetæ Vita atque Ætate (2d ed. 1844), and Umbreit's Habakuk in Herzog's Real-Encyk. v. 435–438. The latter represents him as "a great prophet among the minor prophets, and one of the greatest among the great prophets." De Wette says of his style and genius: "While in his sphere of prophetic representation he may be compared with the best of the prophets, a Joel, Amos, Nahum, Isaiah, in the lyric passage (ch. iii.) he surpasses every thing which the poetry of the Hebrews has to show in this species of composition. He exhibits the greatest strength and fullness, an imagination capable of the loftiest flights, without ever sacrificing beauty and clearness. His rhythm is at the same time perfectly free, and yet measured. His diction is fresh and pure." (See his Einl. in das A. Test., p. 338, 5te Ausg.) Lowth awards to him the highest sublimity (Lect. xxviii. in his Poetry of the Hebrews). "The anthem" at the close of the book, says Isaac Taylor, "unequaled in majesty and splendor of language and imagery, gives expression in terms the most affecting to an intense spiritual feeling; and, on this ground, it so fully embodies these religious sentiments as to satisfy Christian piety, even of the loftiest order." (See his Spirit of the Hebrew Poets, p. 255, Amer. ed.) The doctrine impersonated in the prophet's experience is that the soul, though stripped of all outward possessions and cut off from every human resource, may still be happy in God alone as the object of its confidence and the bestower of the ample spiritual consolations which that trust secures. (Comp. 2 Cor. iv. 8 ff.) H.

HABAZINI'AH (חֲבַצִּנְיָה [perh. light of Jehovah, Ges.: collection by Jah, Fürst]: Χαβασίν; [Vat. FA. -σειν:] Habsnia), apparently the head of one of the families of the RECHABITES: his descendant Jaazaniah was the chief man among them in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. xxxv. 3).

HAB'BACUC ('Αμβακούμ: Habacuc), the form in which the name of the prophet HABAKKUK is given in the Apocrypha (Bel, 33–39).

HABERGEON, a coat of mail covering the neck and breast. The Hebrew terms are תַּחְרָא, and שִׁרְיוֹן. The first, tachâra, occurs only in Ex. xxviii. 32, xxxix. 23, and is noticed incidentally to illustrate the mode of making the aperture for the head in the sacerdotal meil. It was probably similar to the linen corslet (λινοθώρηξ), worn by the Egyptians (Her. ii. 182, iii. 47), and the Greeks (Il. ii. 529, 830). The second, shiryâh, occurs only in Job xli. 26, and is regarded as another form of shiryân (שִׁרְיָן), a "breastplate" (Is. lix. 17); this sense has been questioned, as the context requires offensive rather than defensive armor; but the objection may be met by the supposition of an extended sense being given to the verb, according to the grammatical usage known as zeugma. The third, shiryôn, occurs as an article of defensive armor in 1 Sam. xvii. 5, 2 Chr. xxvi. 14, and Neh. iv. 16. W. L. B.

HA'BOR (חָבוֹר [perh. rich in vegetation, Dietr.; but see Fürst]: 'Αβώρ, Χαβώρ; [Vat. 2 K. xviii. 11, Αβιωρ:] Habor), the "river of Gozan" (2 K. xvii. 6, and xviii. 11 [also 1 Chr. v. 26]) has been already distinguished from the Chebar or Chobar of Ezekiel. [CHEBAR.] It is identified beyond all reasonable doubt with the famous affluent of the Euphrates, which is called Aborrhas ('Αβόρρας) by Strabo (xvi. 1, § 27) and Procopius (Bell. Pers. ii. 5); Aburas ('Αβούρας) by Isidore of Charax (p. 4), Abora ('Αβώρα) by Zosimus (iii. 12), and Chaboras (Χαβώρας), by Pliny and Ptolemy (v. 18). The stream in question still bears the name of the Khabour. It flows from several sources in the mountain-chain, which in about the 37th parallel closes in the valley of the Tigris upon the south — the Mons Masius of Strabo and Ptolemy, at present the Kharej Dagh. The chief source is said to be "a little to the west of Mardin" (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 309, note); but the upper course of the river is still very imperfectly known. The main stream was seen by Mr. Layard flowing from the northwest as he stood on the conical hill of Koukab (about lat. 36° 20′, long. 41°); and here it was joined by an important tributary, the Jerujer, which flowed down to it from Nisibis. Both streams were here fordable, but the river formed by their union had to be crossed by a raft. It flowed in a tortuous course through rich meads covered with flowers, having a general direction about S. S. W. to its junction with the Euphrates at Karkesia, the ancient Circesium. The country on both sides of the river was covered with mounds, the remains of cities belonging to the Assyrian period.

The Khabour occurs under that name in an Assyrian inscription of the ninth century before our era. G. R.

HACHALI'AH (חֲכַלְיָה [whom Jehovah afflicts, Ges. 6te Aufl.]: Χελκία, 'Αχαλία; [Vat. Χελκεια, Αχελια; Alex. Αχαλια; FA. Αχαλια, Αχελια:] Hechlia, Hahelia), the father of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 1; x. 1).

HACH'ILAH, THE HILL (גִּבְעַת הַחֲכִילָה [hill of darkness, Ges., or of barrenness, Fürst]: ὁ βουνὸς τοῦ (and ὁ [but Alex. του]) Ἐχελᾶ; [in 1 Sam. xxvi. 1, Vat. Χελμαθ, Alex. Αχιλα:] collis, and Gabaa, Hachila), a hill apparently situated in a wood [a] in the wilderness or waste land (בַּיְּשִׁימֹן) in the neighborhood of Ziph; in the fastnesses, or passes, of which David and his six hundred followers were lurking when the Ziphites informed Saul of his whereabouts (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; comp. 14, 15, 18). The special topographical note is added, that it was "on the right (xxiii. 19, A. V. 'south') of the Jeshimon," or, according to what may be a second account of the same transaction (xxvi. 1–3), "facing the Jeshimon" (עַל פְּנֵי, A. V. "before"), that is, the waste barren district. As Saul approached, David drew down from the hill into the lower ground (xxv. 3), still probably remaining concealed by the wood which then covered the country. Saul advanced to the hill, and bivouacked there by the side of the road (בַּדֶּרֶךְ, A. V. "way"), which appears to have run over the hill or close below it. It was during this nocturnal halt that the romantic adventure of the spear and cruse of water took place. In xxiii. 14 and xxvi. 13 this hill would seem (though this is not quite clear) to be dignified by the title of "the mountain" (הָהָר: in the latter, the A. V. has "hill," and in both the article is missed); but, on the other hand, the same eminence appears to be again designated as "the cliff" (xxiii. 25, הַסֶּלַע A. V. "a rock") from [b] which David descended

[a] For the "wood" the LXX. have ἐν τῇ καινῇ, reading חדש for חרש. And so too Josephus.

[b] The Hebrew exactly answers to our expression "descended the cliff": the "into" in the text of the

into the midbar of Maon. Places bearing the names of Ziph and Maon are still found in the south of Judah — in all probability the identical sites of those ancient towns. They are sufficiently close to each other for the district between them to bear indiscriminately the name of both. But the wood has vanished, and no trace of the name Hachilah has yet been discovered, nor has the ground been examined with the view to see if the minute indications of the story can be recognized. By Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon) Echela is named as a village then standing; but the situation — seven miles from Eleutheropolis, i. e. on the N. W. of Hebron — would be too far from Ziph and Maon; and as Reland has pointed out, they probably confounded it with Keilah (comp. Onom. "Ceeilah"; and Reland, p. 745). G.

HACH'MONI, SON OF, and THE HACH'MONITE (1 Chr. xxvii. 32; xi. 11), both renderings — the former the correct one — of the same Hebrew words בֶּן־הַחַכְמֹנִי = son of a Hacmonite: υἱὸς Ἀχαμάν, Ἀχαμί; [Vat. Ἀχαμανει, Αχαμει; Sin. in 1 Chr. xi., Αχαμαννι;] Alex. Αχαμανι: Hachamoni). Two of the Bene-Hacmoni [sons of H.] are named in these passages, JEHIEL in the former, and JASHOBEAM in the latter. Hachmon or Hachmoni was no doubt the founder of a family to which these men belonged: the actual father of Jashobeam was Zabdiel (1 Chr. xxvii. 2), and he is also said to have belonged to the Korhites (1 Chr. xii. 6), possibly the Levites descended from Korah. But the name Hachmon nowhere appears in the genealogies of the Levites. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 the name is altered to the Tachcemonite. [TACHMONITE.] See Kennicott, Diss. pp. 72, 82, who calls attention to the fact that names given in Chronicles with Ben are in Samuel given without the Ben, but with the definite article. G.

HA'DAD (הֲדַד [sharpness, Gesen., powerful, Fürst]: Ἀδάδ, [Ἀδερ,] Χονδάν: Hadad). This name occurs frequently in the history of the Syrian and Edomite dynasties. It was originally the indigenous appellation of the sun among the Syrians (Macrob. Saturnal. i. 23; Plin. xxxvii. 11), and was thence transferred to the king, as the highest of earthly authorities, in the forms Hadad, Ben-hadad ("worshipper of Hadad"), and Hadadezer ("assisted by Hadad," Gesen. Thes. p. 218). The title appears to have been an official one, like Pharaoh; and perhaps it is so used by Nicolaus Damascenus, as quoted by Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, § 2), in reference to the Syrian king who aided Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 5). Josephus appears to have used the name in the same sense, where he substitutes it for Benhadad (Ant. ix. 8, § 7, compared with 2 K. xiii. 24). The name appears occasionally in the altered form Hadar (Gen. xxv. 15, xxxvi. 39, compared with 1 Chr. i. 30, 50).

1. [הֲדַד: Χονδάν, Alex. Χοδδαδ: Hadad.] The first of the name[a] was a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15 [HADAR, 1]; 1 Chr. i. 30). His descendants probably occupied the western coast of the Persian Gulf, where the names Atteri (Ptol. vi. 7, § 15), Attene, and Chateni (Plin. vi. 32) bear affinity to the original name.

2. (הֲדַד [brave, one who throws himself against the enemy, Dietr.: Ἀδάδ: Adad].) The second was a king of Edom, who gained an important victory over the Midianites on the field of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Chr. i. 46): the position of his territory is marked by his capital, Avith. [AVITH.]

3. (הֲדַד [Ἀδάδ: Adad].) The third was also a king of Edom, with Pau for his capital (1 Chr. i. 50). [PAU.] He was the last of the kings: the change to the dukedom is pointedly connected with his death in 1 Chr. i. 51. [HADAR, 2.]

4. (הֲדַד [Ἀδερ: Adad].) The last of the name was a member of the royal house of Edom (1 K. xi. 14 ff.), probably the grandson of the one last noticed. (In ver. 17 it is given in the mutilated form of אַדַד.) In his childhood he escaped the massacre under Joab, in which his father appears to have perished, and fled with a band of followers into Egypt. Some difficulty arises in the account of his flight, from the words, "they arose out of Midian" (ver. 18). Thenius (Comm. in loc.) surmises that the reading has been corrupted from מִדְיָן to מִדְבָּר, and that the place intended is Maon, i. e. the residence for the time being of the royal family. Other explanations are that Midian was the territory of some of the Midianitish tribes in the peninsula of Sinai, or that it is the name of a town, the Μοδιανα of Ptol. vi. 7, § 2: some of the MSS. of the LXX. supply the words τῆς πόλεως before Μαδιάμ. Pharaoh, the predecessor of Solomon's father-in-law, treated him kindly, and gave him his sister-in-law in marriage. After David's death Hadad resolved to attempt the recovery of his dominion: Pharaoh in vain discouraged him, and upon this he left Egypt and returned to his own country (see the addition to ver. 22 in the LXX.: the omission of the clause in the Hebrew probably arose from an error of the transcriber). It does not appear from the text as it now stands, how Hadad became subsequently to this an "adversary unto Solomon" (ver. 14), still less how he gained the sovereignty over Syria (ver. 25). The LXX., however, refers the whole of ver. 25 to him, and substitutes for אֲרָם (Syria), Ἐδώμ (Edom). This reduces the whole to a consistent and intelligible narrative. Hadad, according to this account, succeeded in his attempt, and carried on a border warfare on the Israelites from his own territory. Josephus (Ant. viii. 7, § 6) retains the reading Syria, and represents Hadad as having failed in his attempt on Idumæa, and then having joined Rezon, from whom he received a portion of Syria. If the present text is correct, the concluding words of ver. 25 must be referred to Rezon, and be considered as a repetition in an amplified form of the concluding words of the previous verse.

HADADE'ZER (הֲדַדְעֶזֶר): ὁ Ἀδραζάρ, in both MSS.; [in 1 K., Rom. Ἀδαδέζερ; Vat. Αεραδραζαρ; Alex. Αδαδεξερ: Adarezer]), 2 Sam. viii. 3–12; 1 K. xi. 23. [HADAREZER.]

HA'DAD-RIM'MON (הֲדַד רִמּוֹן [see infra]: κοπετὸς ῥοῶνος: Adadremmon) is, accord-

A. V. is derived from the LXX. εἰς and the Vulgate ad. See Jerome's explanation, "ad petram, id est, ad ultimum locum," in his Quæst. Hebr. ad loc.

a * The initial letter is different from that of the names which follow. The proper distinction would be Chadad and Hadad. H ing to the ordinary interpretation of Zech. xii. 11, a place in the valley of Megiddo, named after two Syrian idols, where a national lamentation was held for the death of king Josiah in the last of the four great battles (see Stanley, S. & P. ix.) which have made the plain of Esdraelon famous in Hebrew history (see 2 K. xxiii. 29; 2 Chr. xxxv. 23; Joseph. Ant. x. 5, § 1). The LXX. translate the word "pomegranate;" and the Greek commentators, using that version, see here no reference to Josiah. Jonathan, the Chaldee interpreter, followed by Jarchi, understands it to be the name of the son of king Tabrimon who was opposed to Ahab at Ramoth-Gilead. But it has been taken for the place at which Josiah died by most interpreters since Jerome, who states (Comm. in Zach.) that it was the name of a city which was called in his time Maximianopolis, and was not far from Jezreel. Van de Velde (i. 355) thinks that he has identified the very site, and that the more ancient name still lingers on the spot. There is a treatise by Wichmanshausen, De planctu Hadadr. in the Nov. Thes. Theol.-phil. i. 101. W. T. B.

HA'DAR (הֲדַר [perh. chamber]: Χοδδάν: Hadar), a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15); written in 1 Chr. i. 30 Hadad (הדד: Χονδάν; [Alex. Χοδδαδ:] Hadad); but Gesenius supposes the former to be the true reading of the name. It has not been identified, in a satisfactory way, with the appellation of any tribe or place in Arabia, or on the Syrian frontier; but names identical with, or very closely resembling it, are not uncommon in those parts, and may contain traces of the Ishmaelite tribe sprung from Hadar. The mountain Hadad, belonging to Teymà [TEMA] on the borders of the Syrian desert, north of El-Medeneh, is perhaps the most likely to be correctly identified with the ancient dwellings of this tribe; it stands among a group of names of the sons of Ishmael, containing Dumah (Doomah), Kedar (Keydàr), and Tema (Teymà). E. S. P.

2. (הֲדַר [perh. ornament, honor], with a different aspirate to [from] the preceding: Ἀράδ υἱὸς Βαράδ, Alex. Αραθ: Adar). One of the kings of Edom, successor of Baal-hanan ben-Achbor (Gen. xxxvi. 39), and, if we may so understand the statement of ver. 31, about contemporary with Saul. The name of his city, and the name and genealogy of his wife, are given. In the parallel list in 1 Chr. i. [50] he appears as HADAD. We know from another source (1 K. xi. 14, &c.) that Hadad was one of the names of the royal family of Edom. Indeed, it occurs in this very list (Gen. xxxvi. 35). But perhaps this fact is in favor of the form Hadar being correct in the present case: its isolation is probably a proof that it is a different name from the others, however similar.

HADARE'ZER (הֲדַרְעֶזֶר [whose help is Hadad, Ges.]: Ἀδρααζάρ; Alex. Αδραζαρ, [and so genr. Ald. FA.; Comp. genr. Ἀδαδεζέρ:] Adarezer), son of Rehob (2 Sam. viii. 3); the king of the Aramite state of Zobah, who, while on his way to "establish his dominion" at the Euphrates, was overtaken by David, defeated with great loss both of chariots, horses, and men (1 Chr. xviii. 3, 4), and driven with the remnant of his force to the other side of the river (xix. 16). The golden weapons captured on this occasion (שֶׁלֶט, A. V. "shields of gold"), a thousand in number, were taken by David to Jerusalem (xviii. 7), and dedicated to Jehovah. The foreign arms were preserved in the Temple, and were long known as king David's (2 Chr. xxiii. 9; Cant. iv. 4). [ARMS; Shelet, p. 162.]

Not daunted by this defeat, Hadarezer seized an early opportunity of attempting to revenge himself; and after the first repulse of the Ammonites and their Syrian allies by Joab, he sent his army to the assistance of his kindred the people of Maachah, Rehob, and Ishtob (1 Chr. xix. 16; 2 Sam. x. 15, comp. 8). The army was a large one, as is evident from the numbers of the slain; and it was especially strong in horse-soldiers (1 Chr. xix. 18). Under the command of Shophach, or Shobach, the captain of the host (שַׂר הַצָּבָא) they crossed the Euphrates, joined the other Syrians, and encamped at a place called HELAM. The moment was a critical one, and David himself came from Jerusalem to take the command of the Israelite army. As on the former occasion, the rout was complete: seven hundred chariots were captured, seven thousand charioteers and forty thousand horse-soldiers killed, the petty sovereigns who had before been subject to Hadarezer submitted themselves to David, and the great Syrian confederacy was, for the time, at an end.

But one of Hadarezer's more immediate retainers, REZON ben-Eliadah, made his escape from the army, and gathering round him some fugitives like himself, formed them into one of those marauding ravaging "bands" (גְּדוּד) which found a congenial refuge in the thinly peopled districts between the Jordan and the Euphrates (2 K. v. 2; 1 Chr. v. 18–22). Making their way to Damascus, they possessed themselves of the city. Rezon became king, and at once began to avenge the loss of his countrymen by the course of "mischief" to Israel which he pursued down to the end of Solomon's reign, and which is summed up in the emphatic words "he was an adversary (a 'Satan') to Israel" . . . "he abhorred Israel" (1 K. xi. 23–25).

In the narrative of David's Syrian campaign in 2 Sam. viii. 3–12 this name is given as Hadad-ezer, and also in 1 K. xi. 23. But in 2 Sam. x., and in all its other occurrences in the Hebrew text as well as in the LXX. (both MSS.), and in Josephus, the form Hadarezer is maintained. G.

HAD'ASHAH (חֲדָשָׁה [new, Ges.]: Ἀδασάν, Alex. Αδασα: Hadassa), one of the towns of Judah, in the Shefelah or maritime low-country, named between Zenan and Migdal-gad, in the second group (Josh. xv. 37 only). By Eusebius it is spoken of as lying near "Taphna," i. e. Gophna. But if by this Eusebius intends the well-known Gophna, there must be some error, as Gophna was several miles north of Jerusalem, near the direct north road to Nablûs. No satisfactory reason presents itself why Hadashah should not be the ADASA of the Maccabæan history. Hitherto it has eluded discovery in modern times. G.

* HADES. [DEAD, THE; DEEP, THE; HELL.]

HADAS'SAH (הֲדַסָּה [myrtle]: LXX. omit: Edissa), a name, probably the earlier name, of Esther (Esth. ii 7). Gesenius (Thes. p. 366) suggests that it is identical with Ἄροσα, the name of the daughter of Cyrus.

HADATTAH (חֲדַתָּה [new]: LXX. omit: nova). According to the A. V., one of the towns of Judah in the extreme south — "Hazor, Hadattah, and Kerioth, and Hezron," etc. (Josh. xv. 25); but the Masoret accents of the Hebrew connect the word with that preceding it, as if it were Hazor-chadattah, i. e. New Hazor, in distinction from the place of the same name in ver. 23. This reading is expressly sanctioned by Eusebius and Jerome, who speak (Onom. "Asor") of "New Hazor" as lying in their day to the east of and near Ascalon. (See also Reland, p. 708.) But Ascalon, as Robinson has pointed out (ii. 34, note), is in the Shefelah, and not in the South, and would, if named in Joshua at all, be included in the second division of the list, beginning at ver. 33, instead of where it is, not far from Kedesh. G.

* Mr. Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 310, 2d ed.) speaks of some ruins in the south of Judah, on a "brow southeast of Wady Zuweirah, which the Arabs said was called Hadâdah." He thinks it possible that the Hadattah of Joshua (xv. 25) may have been there. H.

HA'DID (חָדִיד, sharp, possibly from its situation on some craggy eminence, Ges. Thes. 446: Ἀδίδ [? by comb. with preceding name, in Ezr., Λοδαδι, Vat. Λοδαρωθ, Alex. Λυδδων Λοδαδιδ: in Neh. vii., Λοδαδιδ, Vat. FA. Λοδαδια; in Neh. xi., LXX. omit:] Hadid), a place named, with Lod (Lydda) and Ono, only in the later books of the history (Ezr. ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, xi. 34), but yet so as to imply its earlier existence. In the time of Eusebius (Onom. "Adithaim") a town called Aditha, or Adatha, existed to the east of Diospolis (Lydda). This was probably Hadid. The ADIDA of the Maccabæan history cannot be the same place, as it is distinctly specified as in the maritime or Philistine plain further south — "Adida in Sephela" (1 Macc. xii. 38) — with which agrees the description of Josephus (Ant. xiii. 6, § 5). About three miles east of Ludd stands a village called el-Haditheh, marked in Van de Velde's map. This is described by the old Jewish traveller ha-Parchi as being "on the summit of a round hill," and identified by him, no doubt correctly, with Hadid. See Zunz, in Asher's Benj. of Tudela, ii. 439. G.

HADLAI [2 syl.] (הַדְלַי [resting or keeping holiday]: Ἐλδαΐ; [Vat. Χοαδ;] Alex. Αδδι: Adali), a man of Ephraim; father of Amasa, who was one of the chiefs of the tribe in the reign of Pekah (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).

HADO'RAM (הֲדוֹרָם [possibly fire-worshippers: see Fürst]: Ὁδορράμ; [Alex. Ιαραδ, Κεδουραν; Comp. Ὁδορράμ, Ἰδωράμ:] Aduram, [Adoram]), the fifth son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chr. i. 21). His settlements, unlike those of many of Joktan's sons, have not been identified. Bochart supposed that the Adramitæ represented his descendants; but afterwards believed, as later critics have also, that this people was the same as the Chatramotitæ, or people of Hadramiüwt (Phaleg, ii. c. 17). [HAZARMAVETH.] Fresnel cites an Arab author who identifies Hadoram with Jurhum (4*me* Lettre, Journ. Asiatique, iiie série, vi. 220); but this is highly improbable; nor is the suggestion of Hadhoorà, by Caussin (Essai, i. 30) more likely: the latter being one of the aborigina. tribes of Arabia, such as 'Ad, Thamood, etc. [ARABIA.] E. S. P.

2. (הֲדוֹרָם: Ἀδουράμ: [Vat. Ιδουρααμ; FA. Ιδουραμ:] Alex. Δουραμ: Adoram), son of Tou or Toi king of Hamath; his father's ambassador to congratulate David on his victory over Hadarezer king of Zobah (1 Chr. xviii. 10), and the bearer of valuable presents in the form of articles of antique manufacture (Joseph.), in gold, silver, and brass. In the parallel narrative of 2 Sam. viii. the name is given as Joram; but this being a contraction of Jehoram, which contains the name of Jehovah, is peculiarly an Israelite appellation, and we may therefore conclude that Hadoram is the genuine form of the name. By Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, § 4) it is given as Ἀδώραμος.

3. (הֲדֹרָם: ὁ Ἀδωνιράμ: [Vat. -νει-;] Alex. Αδωραμ: Aduram.) The form assumed in Chronicles by the name of the intendant of taxes under David, Solomon, and Rehoboam, who lost his life in the revolt at Shechem after the coronation of the last-named prince (2 Chr. x. 18). He was sent by Rehoboam to appease the tumult, possibly as being one of the old and moderate party; but the choice of the chief officer of the taxes was not a happy one. His interference was ineffectual, and he himself fell a victim: "all Israel stoned him with stones that he died." In Kings the name is given in the longer form of ADONIRAM, but in Samuel (2 Sam. xx. 24) as ADORAM. By Josephus, in both the first and last case, he is called Ἀδώραμος.

HA'DRACH (חַדְרָךְ [see infra]: Σεδράχ, [Alex. Σεδρακ; Ald. with 13 MSS. Ἀδράχ:] Hadrach), a country of Syria, mentioned once only, by the prophet Zechariah, in the following words: "The burden of the word of Jehovah in the land of Hadrach, and Damascus [shall be] the rest thereof: when the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, shall be toward Jehovah. And Hamath also shall border thereby; Tyrus and Zidon, though it be very wise" (ix. 1, 2).[a] The position of the district, with its borders, is here generally stated, although it does not appear, as is commonly assumed, that it was on the east of Damascus; but the name itself seems to have wholly disappeared; and the ingenuity of critics has been exercised on it without attaining any trustworthy results. It still remains unknown. It is true that R. Jose of Damascus identifies it with the site of an important city east of Damascus; and Joseph Abassi makes mention of a place called Hadrak (حدرك); but, with Gesenius, we may well distrust these writers. The vague statement of Cyril Alex. seems to be founded on no particular facts beyond those contained in the prophecy of Zechariah. Besides these identifications we can point to none that possesses the smallest claim to acceptance. Those of Movers (Phönic.),[b] Bleek, and others are purely hypothetical, and the same must be said of the theory of Alphens [Van Alphen], in his monograph De terra Hadrach et Damasco (Traj. Rh. 1723, referred to by Winer, s. v.). A solution of the difficulties surrounding the name may perhaps be found by supposing that it is derived from HADAR.

[a] * De Wette's translation of these verses (Die Heilige Schrift, 1858), is more literal, and certainly more intelligible: (1) "Utterance of the word of Jehovah against the land Hadrach, and upon Damascus it comes down (for Jehovah has an eye upon men, and all the tribes of Israel); (2) and also against Hamath which borders thereon, Tyre and Sidon; for it is very wise" (comp. Ez. xxviii. 3 ff.). H.

[b] * Movers does not propose any local identification (if that be meant here), but supposes Adark, an Assyrian war-god (Phönic. i. 478), to be intended. For Bleek's theory, see above H.

E. S. P.

* Another conjecture may be mentioned, namely, that Hadrach is the name of some Syrian king otherwise unknown. It was not uncommon for heathen kings to bear the names of their gods. Gesenius (Thesaur. i. 449) favors this opinion after Bleek. (See Theol. Stud. u. Krit. 1852, p. 268.) Vaihinger argues for it, and attempts to show that the king in question may have been the one who reigned between Benhadad III. and Rezin, about the time of Uzziah and Jeroboam II. (See Herz. Real-Encyk. v. 445.) The data are insufficient for so definite a conclusion. Hengstenberg adopts the Jewish symbolic explanation, namely, that Hadrach (derived from חַד and רָךְ = strong-weak) denotes the Persian kingdom as destined, according to prophetic announcement, notwithstanding its power, to be utterly overthrown. Winer (Bibl. Realw. i. 454) speaks of this as not improbably correct. Hengstenberg discusses the question at length under the head of "The Land of Hadrach," in his Christology of the O. T., iii. 371 ff. (trans. Edinb. 1858). H.

HA'GAB (חָגָב [locust]: Ἀγάβ: Hagab). Bene-Hagab [sons of Hagab] were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 46). In the parallel list in Nehemiah, this and the name preceding it are omitted. In the Apocryphal Esdras [v. 30] it is given as AGABA.

HAG'ABA (חֲגָבָא: Ἀγαβά; [Alex. Αγγαβα:] Hagaba). Bene-Hagaba were among the Nethinim who came back from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 48). The name is slightly different in form from —

HAG'ABAH (חֲגָבָה [locust]: Ἀγαβά: Hagaba), under which it is found in the parallel list of Ezr. ii. 45. In Esdras it is given as GRABA.

HA'GAR (הָגָר [flight]: Ἀγαρ: Agar), an Egyptian woman, the handmaid, or slave, of Sarah (Gen. xvi. 1), whom the latter gave as a concubine to Abraham, after he had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan and had no children by Sarah (xvi. 2 and 3). That she was a bondwoman is stated both in the O. T. and in the N. T. (in the latter as part of her typical character); and the condition of a slave was one essential of her position as a legal concubine. It is recorded that "when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was despised in her eyes" (4), and Sarah, with the anger, we may suppose, of a free woman, rather than of a wife, reproached Abraham for the results of her own act: "My wrong be upon thee: I have given my maid into thy bosom; and when she saw that she had conceived, I was despised in her eyes: Jehovah judge between me and thee." Abraham's answer seems to have been forced from him by his love for the wife of many years, who besides was his half-sister; and with the apparent want of purpose that he before displayed in Egypt, and afterwards at the court of Abimelech [a] (in contrast to his firm courage and constancy when directed by God), he said, "Behold, thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee." This permission was necessary in an eastern household, but it is worthy of remark that it is now very rarely given; nor can we think, from the unchangeableness of eastern customs, and the strongly-marked national character of those peoples, that it was usual anciently to allow a wife to deal hardly with a slave in Hagar's position. Yet the truth and individuality of the vivid narrative is enforced by this apparent departure from usage: "And when Sarai dealt hardly with her, she fled from her face," turning her steps towards her native land through the great wilderness traversed by the Egyptian road. By the fountain in the way to Shur, the angel of the Lord found her, charged her to return and submit herself under the hands of her mistress, and delivered the remarkable prophecy respecting her unborn child, recorded in ver. 10–12. [ISHMAEL.] "And she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God art a God of vision; for she said, Have I then seen [i. e. lived] after vision [of God]? Wherefore the well was called BEER-LAHAI-ROI" (13, 14). On her return, Hagar gave birth to Ishmael, and Abraham was then eighty-six years old.

Mention is not again made of Hagar in the history of Abraham until the feast at the weaning of Isaac, when "Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking"; and in exact sequence with the first flight of Hagar, we now read of her expulsion. "Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this bondwoman and her son; for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, [even] with Isaac" (xxi. 9, 10). Abraham, in his grief, and unwillingness thus to act, was comforted by God, with the assurance that in Isaac should his seed be called, and that a nation should also be raised of the bondwoman's son. In his trustful obedience, we read, in the pathetic narrative, "Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave [it] unto Hagar, putting [it] on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away, and she departed and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba. And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. And she went, and sat her down over against [him] a good way off, as it were a bowshot; for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against [him], and lifted up her voice and wept. And God heard the voice of the lad, and the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? Fear not, for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he [is]. Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand, for I will make him a great nation. And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water, and she went and filled the bottle [skin] with water, and gave the lad to drink" (xxi. 14–19). The verisimilitude, oriental exactness, and simple beauty of this story are internal evidences attesting its truth apart from all other evidence; and even Winer says (in alluding to the subterfuge of skepticism that Hagar = flight — would lead to the assumption of its being a myth), "Das Ereigniss ist so einfach und den orientalischen Sitten so angemessen, das wir hier gewiss eine rein historische Sage vor uns haben" (Realwört. s. v. "Hagar").

[a] It seems to be unnecessary to assume (as Kalisch does, Comment. on Genesis) that we have here another proof of Abraham's faith. This explanation of the event is not required, nor does the narrative appear to warrant it, unless Abraham regarded Hagar's son as the heir of the promise: comp. Gen. xvii. 18.

The name of Hagar occurs elsewhere only when she takes a wife to Ishmael (xxi. 21), and in the genealogy (xxv. 12). St. Paul refers to her as the type of the old covenant, likening her to Mount Sinai, the Mount of the Law (Gal. iv. 22 ff.).

In Mohammedan tradition Hagar (هَاجَر, Hájir, or Hágir) is represented as the wife of Abraham, as might be expected when we remember that Ishmael is the head of the Arab nation, and the reputed ancestor of Mohammed. In the same manner she is said to have dwelt and been buried at Mekkeh, and the well Zemzem in the sacred inclosure of the temple of Mekkeh is pointed out by the Muslims as the well which was miraculously formed for Ishmael in the wilderness. E. S. P.

* The truthfulness to nature which is so manifest in the incidents related of Hagar and Ishmael (as suggested above), bears strong testimony to the fidelity of the narrative. See especially Gen. xvi. 6; xxi. 10, 11, and 14 ff. Dean Stanley very properly calls attention to this trait of the patriarchal history as illustrated in this instance, as well as others. (Jewish Church, i. 40 ff.) See also, on this characteristic of these early records, Blunt's Veracity of the Books of Moses. Hess brings out impressively this feature of the Bible in his Geschichte der Patriarchen (2 Bde. Tübing. 1785). It appears from Gal. iv. 24, where Paul speaks of the dissensions in Abraham's family, that the jealousy between Hagar's son and the heir of promise proceeded much further than the O. T. relates. Rüetschi has a brief article on "Hagar" in Herzog's Real-Encyk. v. 469 f. Mr. Williams (Holy City, i. 463–468) inserts an extended account of the supposed discovery by Mr. Rowlands of Beer-labai-roi, the well in the desert, at which, after her expulsion from the house of Abraham, the angel of the Lord appeared to Hagar (Gen. xvi. 7 ff.). It is said to be about 5 hours from Kadesh, on the way from Beer-sheba to Egypt, and is called Moilâhhi (more correctly Muweilih, says Rüetschi), the name being regarded as the same, except in the first syllable the change of Beer, "well," for Moi, "water." Near it is also found an elaborate excavation in the rocks which the Arabs call Beit-Hagar, i. e. "house of Hagar." Keil and Delitzsch (in Gen. xvi. 14) incline to adopt this identification. Knobel (Genesis, p. 147) is less decided. Dr. Robinson's note (Bibl. Res., 2d ed. i. 189) throws some discredit on the accuracy of this report.

Hagar occurs in Gal. iv. 25 (T. R. & A. V.), not as a personal name (ἡ Ἄγαρ), but as a word or local name (τὸ Ἄγαρ) applied to Mount Sinai in Arabia. The Arabic حَجَر, pronounced very much like this name, means a "stone," and may have been in use in the neighborhood of Sinai as one of its local designations. (See Meyer on Gal. iv. 25). There is no testimony that the mount was so called out of this passage; but as Ewald remarks respecting this point (Nachtrag in his Sendschreiben des Apostels, p. 493 ff.), Paul is so much the less to be charged with an error here, inasmuch as he himself had travelled in that part of Arabia, and as an apostle, had remained there a long time." (See Gal. i. 17 f.) Some conjecture that this name was transferred to the mountain from an Arabian town so called, where, according to one account, Hagar is said to have been buried. But, on the other hand, it is not certain that τὸ Ἄγαρ really belongs to the Greek text, though the weight of critical opinion affirms it (see Meyer, in loc.). The questions both as to the origin of the name and the genuineness of the reading are carefully examined in Lightfoot's Commentary on Galatians (pp. 178, 189 ff. 2d ed.), though perhaps he understates the testimony for τὸ Ἄγαρ. H.

HAGARE'NES, HA'GARITES (הַגְרִים, הַגְרִיאִים : Ἀγαρηνοί, Ἀγαραῖοι, [etc.:] Agareni, Agarei), a people dwelling to the east of Palestine, with whom the tribe of Reuben made war in the time of Saul, and "who fell by their hand, and they dwelt in their tents throughout all the east [land] of Gilead" (1 Chr. v. 10); and again, in ver. 18–20, the sons of Reuben, and the Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh "made war with the Hagarites, with Jetur, and Nephish, and Nodab, and they were helped against them, and the Hagarites were delivered into their hand, and all that were with them." The spoil here recorded to have been taken shows the wealth and importance of these tribes; and the conquest, at least of the territory occupied by them, was complete, for the Israelites "dwelt in their steads until the Captivity" (ver. 22). The same people, as confederate against Israel, are mentioned in Ps. lxxxiii.: "The tabernacles of Edom and the Ishmaelites; of Moab and the Hagarenes; Gebal, Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre; Assur also is joined with them; they have holpen the children of Lot" (ver. 6–8).

Who these people were is a question that cannot readily be decided, though it is generally believed that they were named after Hagar. Their geographical position, as inferred from the above passages, was in the "east country," where dwelt the descendants of Ishmael; the occurrence of the names of two of his sons, Jetur and Nephish (1 Chr. v. 19), as before quoted, with that of Nodab, whom Gesenius supposes to be another son (though he is not found in the genealogical lists, and must remain doubtful [NODAB]), seems to indicate that these Hagarenes were named after Hagar; but in the passage in Ps. lxxxiii., the Ishmaelites are apparently distinguished from the Hagarenes (cf. Bar. iii. 23). May they have been thus called after a town or district named after Hagar, and not only because they were her descendants? It is needless to follow the suggestion of some writers, that Hagar may have been the mother of other children after her separation from Abraham (as the Bible and tradition are silent on the question), and it is in itself highly improbable.

It is also uncertain whether the important town and district of Hejer (the inhabitants of which were probably the same as the Agræi of Strabo, xvi. p. 767, Dionys. Perieg. 956, Plin. vi. 32, and Ptol. v. 19, 2) represent the ancient name and a dwelling of the Hagarenes; but it is reasonable to suppose that they do. Hejer, or Hejerà (هَجَر, indeclinable, according to Yâkoot, Mushtarik, s. v. but also, according to Kâmoos. هَجَر, as Gesen and Winer write it), is the capital town, and also a subdivision of the province of northeastern Arabia called El-Bahreyn, or, as some writers say, the name of the province itself (Mushtarak and Marásid, s. v.), on the borders of the Persian Gulf. It is a low and fertile country, frequented for its abundant water and pasturage by the wandering tribes of the neighboring deserts and of the high land of Nejd. For the Agræi, see the Dictionary of Geography. There is another Hejer, a place near El-Medeeneh.

The district of Hajar (), on the borders of Desert Arabia, north of El-Medeeneh, has been thought to possess a trace, in its name, of the Hagarenes. It is, at least, less likely than Hejer to do so, both from situation and etymology. The tract, however, is curious from the caves that it is reported to contain, in which, say the Arabs, dwelt the old tribe of Thamood.

Two Hagarites are mentioned in the O. T.: see MIBHAR and JAZIZ. E. S. P.

HA'GERITE, THE (הַהַגְרִי : ὁ Ἀγαρίτης; [Vat. Γαρειτης:] Agareus). Jaziz the Hagerite, i. e. the descendant of Hagar, had the charge of David's sheep (צֹאן, A. V. "flocks;" 1 Chr. xxvii. 31). The word appears in the other forms of HAGARITES and HAGARENES.

HAG'GAI [2 syl.] (חַגַּי) [festive]: Ἀγγαῖος; [Sin. Αγγεος in Hag., except inscription, and so Alex. in the inscr. of Ps. cxlv.–cxlviii.:] Aggeus), the tenth in order of the minor prophets, and first of those who prophesied after the Captivity. With regard to his tribe and parentage both history and tradition are alike silent. Some, indeed, taking in its literal sense the expression מַלְאַךְ יְהוָה (malac y'hôvâh) in i. 13, have imagined that he was an angel in human shape (Jerome, Comm. in loc.). In the absence of any direct evidence on the point, it is more than probable that he was one of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua; and Ewald (Die Proph. d. Alt. B.) is even tempted to infer from ii. 3 that he may have been one of the few survivors who had seen the first temple in its splendor. The rebuilding of the temple, which was commenced in the reign of Cyrus (B. C. 535), was suspended during the reigns of his successors, Cambyses and Pseudo-Smerdis, in consequence of the determined hostility of the Samaritans. On the accession of Darius Hystaspis (B. C. 521), the prophets Haggai and Zechariah urged the renewal of the undertaking, and obtained the permission and assistance of the king (Ezr. v. 1, vi. 14; Joseph. Ant. xi. 4). Animated by the high courage (magni spiritus, Jerome) of these devoted men, the people prosecuted the work with vigor, and the temple was completed and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius (B. C. 516). According to tradition, Haggai was born in Babylon, was a young man when he came to Jerusalem, and was buried with honor near the sepulchres of the priests (Isidor. Hispal. c. 49; Pseudo-Dorotheus, in Chron. Pasch. 51 d). It has hence been conjectured that he was of priestly rank. Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, according to the Jewish writers, were the men who were with Daniel when he saw the vision related in Dan. x. 7; and were after the Captivity members of the Great Synagogue, which consisted of 120 elders (Cozri, iii. 65). The Seder Olam Zuta places their death in the 52d year of the Medes and Persians; while the extravagance of another tradition makes Haggai survive till the entry of Alexander the Great into Jerusalem, and even till the time of our Saviour (Carpzov, Introd.). In the Roman Martyrology Hosea and Haggai are joined in the catalogue of saints (Acta Sanctor. 4 Julii). The question of Haggai's probable connection with the authorship of the book of Ezra will be found fully discussed in the article under that head, pp. 805, 806.

The names of Haggai and Zechariah are associated in the LXX. in the titles of Ps. 137, 145–148; in the Vulgate in those of Ps. 111, 145; and in the Peshito Syriac in those of Ps. 125, 126, 145, 146, 147, 148. It may be that tradition assigned to these prophets the arrangement of the above-mentioned psalms for use in the temple service, just as Ps. lxiv. is in the Vulgate attributed to Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and the name of the former is inscribed at the head of Ps. cxxxvi. in the LXX. According to Pseudo Epiphanius (de Vitis Proph.), Haggai was the first who chanted the Hallelujah in the second temple: "wherefore," he adds, "we say 'Hallelujah, which is the hymn of Haggai and Zechariah.'" Haggai is mentioned in the Apocrypha as AGGEUS, in 1 Esdr. vi. 1, vii. 3; 2 Esdr. i. 40; and is alluded to in Ecclus. xlix. 11 (cf. Hag. ii. 23) and Heb. xii. 26 (Hag. ii. 6).

The style of his writing is generally tame and prosaic, though at times it rises to the dignity of severe invective, when the prophet rebukes his countrymen for their selfish indolence and neglect of God's house. But the brevity of the prophecies is so great, and the poverty of expression which characterizes them so striking, as to give rise to a conjecture, not without reason, that in their present form they are but the outline or summary of the original discourses. They were delivered in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (B. C. 520), at intervals from the 1st day of the 6th month to the 24th day of the 9th month in the same year.

In his first message to the people the prophet denounced the listlessness of the Jews, who dwelt in their "panelled houses," while the temple of the Lord was roofless and desolate. The displeasure of God was manifest in the failure of all their efforts for their own gratification. The heavens were "stayed from dew," and the earth was "stayed from her fruit." They had neglected that which should have been their first care, and reaped the due wages of their selfishness (i. 4–11). The words of the prophet sank deep into the hearts of the people and their leaders. They acknowledged the voice of God speaking by his servant, and obeyed the command. Their obedience was rewarded with the assurance of God's presence (i. 13), and twenty-four days after the building was resumed. A month had scarcely elapsed when the work seems to have slackened, and the enthusiasm of the people abated. The prophet, ever ready to rekindle their zeal, encouraged the flagging spirits of the chiefs with the renewed assurance of God's presence, and the fresh promise that, stately and magnificent as was the temple of their wisest king, the glory of the latter house should be greater than the glory of the former (ii. 3–9). Yet the people were still inactive, and two months afterwards we find him again censuring their sluggishness, which rendered worthless all their ceremonial observances. But the rebuke was accompanied by a repetition of the promise (ii. 10–19). On the same day, the four-and-twentieth of the ninth month, the prophet delivered his last prophecy, addressed to Zerubbabel, prince of Judah, the representative of the royal family of David, and as such the lineal ancestor of the Messiah. This closing prediction foreshadows the establishment of the Messianic kingdom upon the overthrow of the thrones of the nations (ii. 20–23). W. A. W.

HAG'GERI (הַגְרִי, i. e. Hagri, a Hagarite: Ἀγαρί; [Vat. FA. -ρει;] Alex. Ατaραϊ: Agarai). "MIBHAR son of Haggeri" was one of the mighty men of David's guard, according to the catalogue of 1 Chr. xi. 38. The parallel passage — 2 Sam. xxiii. 36 — has "Bani the Gadite" (הַגָּדִי). This Kennicott decides to have been the original, from which Haggeri has been corrupted (Dissert. p. 214). The Targum has Bar Gedâ (בַּר גְּדָא).

HAG'GI (חַגִּי [festive]: Ἀγγίς, Alex. Αγγεις; [in Num., Ἀγγί, Vat. -γει:] Haggi, Aggi), second son of Gad (Gen. xlvi. 16; Num. xxvi. 15), founder of the Haggites (הַחַגִּי). It will be observed that the name, though given as that of an individual, is really a patronymic, precisely the same as of the family.

HAGGI'AH (חַגִּיָּה [festival of Jehovah]: Ἀγγία; [Vat. Αμα:] Haggia), a Levite, one of the descendants of Merari (1 Chr. vi. 30).

HAG'GITES, THE (הַחַגִּי: ὁ Ἀγγί; [Vat. -γει:] Agitæ), the family sprung from HAGGI, second son of Gad (Num. xxvi. 15).

HAG'GITH (חַגִּית, a dancer: Ἀγγίθ; Alex. Φεγγιθ, Αγιθ, [Αγειθ,] Αγγειθ; [Vat. Φεγγειθ, Αγγειθ;] Joseph. Ἀγγίθη: Haggith, Aggith), one of David's wives, of whom nothing is told us except that she was the mother of Adonijah, who is commonly designated as "the son of Haggith" (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 K. i. 5, 11, ii. 13; 1 Chr. iii. 2). He was, like Absalom, renowned for his handsome presence. In the first and last of the above passages Haggith is fourth in order of mention among the wives, Adonijah being also fourth among the sons. His birth happened at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 2, 5) shortly after that of Absalom (1 K. i. 6; where it will be observed that the words "his mother" are inserted by the translators). G.

HA'GIA (Ἀγιά [Ἀγιά, Bos, Holmes & Parsons]: Aggia), 1 Esdr. v. 34. [HATTIL.]

HA'I (הָעַי [the stone-heap, or ruins]: Ἀγγαί: Hai). The form in which the well-known place AI appears in the A. V. on its first introduction (Gen. xii. 8; xiii. 3). It arises from the translators having in these places, and these only, recognized the definite article with which AI is invariably and emphatically accompanied in the Hebrew. [More probably it comes from the Vulgate. — A.]. In the Samaritan Version of the above two passages, the name is given in the first Ainah, and in the second Cephrah, as if CEPHIRAH. G.

* HAIL. [PLAGUES, THE TEN; SNOW.]

HAIR. The Hebrews were fully alive to the importance of the hair as an element of personal beauty, whether as seen in the "curled locks, black as a raven," of youth (Cant. v. 11), or in the "crown of glory" that encircled the head of old age (Prov. xvi. 31). The customs of ancient nations in regard to the hair varied considerably: the Egyptians allowed the women to wear it long, but kept the heads of men closely shaved from early childhood (Her. ii. 36, iii. 12; Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, ii. 327, 328). The Greeks admired long hair, whether in men or women, as is evidenced in the expression καρηκομόωντες Ἀχαιοί, and in the representations of their divinities, especially Bacchus and Apollo, whose long locks were a symbol of perpetual youth. The Assyrians also wore it long (Her. i. 195), the flowing curls being gathered together in a heavy cluster on the back, as represented in the sculptures of Nineveh. The Hebrews, on the other hand, while they encouraged the growth of hair, observed the natural distinction between the sexes by allowing the women to wear it long (Luke vii. 38; John xi. 2; 1 Cor. xi. 6 ff.), while the men restrained theirs by frequent clippings to a moderate length. This difference between the Hebrews and the surrounding nations, especially the Egyptians, arose no doubt partly from natural taste, but partly also from legal enactments. Clipping the hair in a certain manner and offering the locks, was in early times connected with religious worship. Many of the Arabians practiced a peculiar tonsure in honor of their God Orotal (Her. iii. 8, κείρονται περιτρόχαλα, περιξυροῦντες τοὺς κροτάφους), and hence the Hebrews were forbidden to "round the corners (פֵּאָה, lit. the extremity) of their heads" (Lev. xix. 27), meaning the locks along the forehead and temples, and behind the ears. This tonsure is described in the LXX. by a peculiar expression σισόη (= the classical σκάφιον), probably derived from the Hebrew צִיצִית (comp. Bochart, Can. i. 6, p. 379). That the practice of the Arabians was well known to the Hebrews, appears from the expression קְצוּצֵי פֵאָה, rounded as to the locks, by which they are described (Jer. ix. 26; xxv. 23; xlix. 32; see marginal translation of the A. V.). The prohibition against cutting off the hair on the death of a relative (Deut. xiv. 1) was probably grounded on a similar reason. In addition to these regulations, the Hebrews dreaded baldness, as it was frequently the result of leprosy (Lev. xiii. 40 ff.), and hence formed one of the disqualifications for the priesthood (Lev. xxi. 20, LXX.). [BALDNESS.] The rule imposed upon the priests, and probably followed by the rest of the community, was that the hair should be polled (קָרֳחָה, Ez. xliv. 20), neither being shaved, nor allowed to grow too long (Lev xxi. 5; Ez. l. c.). What was the precise length usually worn, we have no means of ascertaining; but from various expressions, such as פָּרַע רֹאשׁ, lit. to let loose the head or the hair (= solvere crines, Virg. Æn. iii. 65, xi. 35; demissos lugentis more capillos, Ov. Ep. x. 137) by unbinding the head-band and letting it go disheveled (Lev. x. 6, A. V. "uncover your heads"), which was done in mourning (cf. Ez. xxiv. 17); and again גָּלָה אֹזֶן, to uncover the ear, previous to making any communication of importance (1 Sam. xx. 2, 12, xxii. 8, A. V., margin), as though the hair fell over the ear, we may conclude that men wore their hair somewhat longer than is usual with us. The word פֶּרַע, used as = hair (Num. vi. 5; Ez. xliv. 20), is especially indicative of its free growth (cf. Knobel, Comm. in Lev. xxi. 10). Long hair was admired in the case of young men; it is especially noticed in the description of Absalom's person (2 Sam. xiv. 26), the inconceivable weight of whose hair, as given in the text (200 shekels), has led to a variety of explanations (comp. Harmer's Observations, iv. 321), the more probable being that the numeral כ (20) has been turned into ר (200): Josephus (Ant. vii. 8, § 5) adds, that it was cut every eighth day. The hair was also worn long by the body-guard of Solomon, according to the same authority (Ant. viii. 7, § 3, μηκίστας καθειμένοι χαίτας). The care requisite to keep the hair in order in such cases must have been very great, and hence the practice of wearing long hair was unusual, and only resorted to as an act of religious observance, in which case it was a "sign of humiliation and self-denial, and of a certain religious slovenliness" (Lightfoot, Exercit. on 1 Cor. xi. 14), and was practiced by the Nazarites (Num. vi. 5; Judg. xiii. 5, xvi. 17; 1 Sam. i. 11), and occasionally by others in token of special mercies (Acts xviii. 18); it was not unusual among the Egyptians when on a journey (Diod. i. 18). [NAZARITE.] In times of affliction the hair was altogether cut off (Is. iii. 17, 24, xv. 2, xxii. 12; Jer. vii. 29, xlviii. 37; Am. viii. 10; Joseph. B. J. ii. 15, § 1), the practice of the Hebrews being in this respect the reverse of that of the Egyptians, who let their hair grow long in time of mourning (Herod. ii. 36), having their heads when the term was over (Gen. xli. 14); but resembling that of the Greeks, as frequently noticed by classical writers (e. g. Soph. Aj. 1174; Eurip. Electr. 143, 241). Tearing the hair (Ezr. ix. 3) and letting it go disheveled, as already noticed, were similar tokens of grief. [MOURNING.] The practice of the modern Arabs in regard to the length of their hair varies; generally the men allow it to grow its natural length, the tresses hanging down to the breast and sometimes to the waist, affording substantial protection to the head and neck against the violence of the sun's rays (Burckhardt's Notes, i. 49; Wellsted's Travels, i. 33, 53, 73). The modern Egyptians retain the practices of their ancestors, shaving the heads of the men, but suffering the women's hair to grow long (Lane's Mod. Egypt. i. 52, 71). Wigs were commonly used by the latter people (Wilkinson, ii. 324), but not by the Hebrews: Josephus (Vit. § 11) notices an instance of false hair (περιθετὴ κόμη) being used for the purpose of disguise. Whether the ample ringlets of the Assyrian monarchs, as represented in the sculptures of Nineveh, were real or artificial, is doubtful (Layard's Nineveh, ii. 328). Among the Medes the wig was worn by the upper classes (Xen. Cyrop. i. 3, § 2).

Grecian manner of wearing the hair. (Hope's Costumes.)

Egyptian Wigs. (Wilkinson.)

The usual and favorite color of the hair was black (Cant. v. 11), as is indicated in the comparisons to a "flock of goats" and the "tents of Kedar" (Cant. iv. 1, i. 5): a similar hue is probably intended by the purple of Cant. vii. 5, the term being broadly used (as the Greek πορφύρεος in a similar application = μέλας, Anacr. 28). A fictitious hue was occasionally obtained by sprinkling gold-dust on the hair (Joseph. Ant. viii. 7, § 3). It does not appear that dyes were ordinarily used; the "Carmel" of Cant. vii. 5 has been understood as = כַּרְמִיל (A. V. "crimson," margin) without good reason, though the similarity of the words may have suggested the subsequent reference to purple. Herod is said to have dyed his gray hair for the purpose of concealing his age (Ant. xvi. 8, § 1), but the practice may have been borrowed from the Greeks or Romans, among whom it was common (Aristoph. Eccles. 736; Martial, Ep. iii. 43; Propert. ii. 18, 24, 26): from Matt. v. 36, we may infer that it was not usual among the Hebrews The approach of age was marked by a sprinkling (זֶרֶק, Hos. vii. 9; comp. a similar use of spargere, Propert. iii. 4, 24) of gray hairs, which soon overspread the whole head (Gen. xlii. 38, xliv. 29; 1 K. ii. 6, 9; Prov. xvi. 31, xx. 29). The reference to the almond in Eccl. xii. 5, has been explained of the white blossoms of that tree, as emblematic of old age: it may be observed, however, that the color of the flower is pink rather than white, and that the verb in that passage, according to high authorities (Gesen. and Hitzig), does not bear the sense of blossoming at all. Pure white hair was deemed characteristic of the Divine Majesty (Dan. vii. 9; Rev. i. 14).

The chief beauty of the hair consisted in curls, whether of a natural or artificial character. The Hebrew terms are highly expressive: to omit the word צַמָּה, — rendered "locks" in Cant. iv. 1, 3, vi. 7, and Is. xlvii. 2, but more probably meaning a veil, — we have תַּלְתַּלִּים (Cant. v. 11), properly pendulous flexible boughs (according to the LXX., ἐλάται the shoots of the palm-tree), which supplied an image of the coma pendula; עִיצָה (Ez. viii. 3), a similar image borrowed from the curve of a blossom: עֲנָק (Cant. iv. 9), a lock falling over the shoulders like a chain of ear-pendants (in uno crine colli tui, Vulg., which is better than the A. V., "with one chain of thy neck"); רְהָטִים (Cant. vii. 5, A. V. "galleries"), properly the channels by which water was brought to the flocks, which supplied an image either of the coma fluens, or of the regularity in which the locks were arranged; דַּלָּה (Cant. vii. 5), again an expression for coma pendula, borrowed from the threads hanging down from an unfinished woof; and lastly מַעֲשֵׂה מְרוֹקָּה (Is. iii. 24, A. V. "well set hair"), properly plaited work, i. e. gracefully curved locks. With regard to the mode of dressing the hair, we have no very precise information; the terms used are of a general character, as of Jezebel (2 K. ix. 30), תֵּיטַב, i. e. she adorned her head; of Judith (x. 3), διέταξε, i. e. arranged (the A. V. has "braided," and the Vulg. discriminavit, here used in a technical sense in the reference to the discriminale or hair-pin); of Herod (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9, § 4), κεκοσμημένος τῇ συνθέσει τῆς κόμης, and of those who adopted feminine fashions (B. J. iv. 9, § 10), κόμας συνθετιζόμενοι. The terms used in the N. T. (πλέγμασιν, 1 Tim. ii. 9; ἐμπλοκῆς τριχῶν, 1 Pet. iii. 3) are also of a general character; Schleusner (Lex. s. v.) understands them of curling rather than plaiting. The arrangement of Samson's hair into seven locks, or more properly braids (מַחְלָפוֹת, from חָלַף, to inter- change: σειραί, LXX.; Judg. xvi. 13, 19), involves the practice of plaiting, which was also familiar to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii. 335) and Greeks (Hom. Il. xiv. 176). The locks were probably kept in their place by a fillet, as in Egypt (Wilkinson, l. c.).

Ornaments were worked into the hair, as practiced by the modern Egyptians, who "add to each braid three black silk cords with little ornaments of gold" (Lane, i. 71): the LXX. understands the term יְעֵבִים (Is. iii. 18, A. V. "cauls"), as applying to such ornaments (ἐμπλόκια); Schroeder (de Vest. Mul. Heb. cap. 2) approves of this, and conjectures that they were sun-shaped, i. e. circular, as distinct from the "round tires like the moon," i. e. the crescent-shaped ornaments used for necklaces. The Arabian women attach small bells to the tresses of their hair (Niebuhr, Voyage, i. 133). Other terms, sometimes understood as applying to the hair, are of doubtful signification, e. g. חֲרִיטִים (Is. iii. 22: acus: "crisping-pins"), more probably purses, as in 2 K. v. 23; קִשֻּׁרִים (Is. iii. 20, "head-bands"), bridal girdles, according to Schroeder and other authorities; פְּאֵרִים (Is. iii. 20, discriminalia, Vulg. i. e. pins used for keeping the hair parted; cf. Jerome in Rufin. iii. cap. ult.), more probably turbans. Combs and hair-pins are mentioned in the Talmud; the Egyptian combs were made of wood and double, one side having large, and the other small teeth (Wilkinson, ii. 343); from the ornamental devices worked on them we may infer that they were worn in the hair. With regard to other ornaments worn about the head, see HEAD-DRESS. The Hebrews, like other nations of antiquity, anointed the hair profusely with ointments, which were generally compounded of various aromatic ingredients (Ruth iii. 3; 2 Sam. xiv. 2; Ps. xxiii. 5, xlv. 7, xcii. 10; Eccl. ix. 8; Is. iii. 24); more especially on occasion of festivities or hospitality (Matt. vi. 17, xxvi. 7; Luke vii. 46; cf. Joseph. Ant. xix. 4, § 1, χρισάμενος μύροις τὴν κεφαλήν, ὡς ἀπὸ συνουσίας). It is perhaps in reference to the glossy appearance so imparted to it that the hair is described as purple (Cant. vii. 5).

It appears to have been the custom of the Jews in our Saviour's time to swear by the hair (Matt. v. 36), much as the Egyptian women still swear by the side-lock, and the men by their beards (Lane, i. 52, 71, notes).

Hair was employed by the Hebrews as an image of what was least valuable in man's person (1 Sam. xiv. 45; 2 Sam. xiv. 11; 1 K. i. 52; Matt. x. 30; Luke xii. 7, xxi. 18; Acts xxvii. 34); as well as of what was innumerable (Ps. xl. 12, lxix. 4); or particularly fine (Judg. xx. 16). In Is. vii. 20, it represents the various productions of the field, trees, crops, etc.; like ὄρος κεκομημένον ὕλῃ of Callim. Dian. 41, or the humus comans of Stat. Theb. v. 502. Hair "as the hair of women" (Rev. ix. 8), means long and undressed hair, which in later times was regarded as an image of barbaric rudeness (Hengstenberg, Comm. in loc.).

HAK'KATAN (הַקָּטָן) [the small or young]: Ἀκκατάν; [Vat. Ακαταν:] Eccatan). Johanan, son of Hakkatan, was the chief of the Bene-Azgad [sons of A.] who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 12). The name is probably Katan, with the definite article prefixed. In the Apocrypha Esdras it is ACATAN.

HAK'KOZ (הַקּוֹץ) [the thorn]: ὁ Κώς; [Comp.] Alex. Ἀκκώς: Accos), a priest, the chief of the seventh course in the service of the sanctuary, as appointed by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 10). In Ezr. ii. 61 the name occurs again as that of a family of priests; though here the prefix is taken by our translators — and no doubt correctly — as the definite article, and the name appears as KOZ. The same thing also occurs in Neh. iii. 4, 21. In Esdras ACCOZ.

HAKU'PHA (חֲקוּפָא) [bent, crooked, Ges.; incitement, Fürst]: Ἀκουφά, Ἀχιφά; [Vat. Αφεικα, Αχειφα; FA. in Neh., Ακειφα:] Hacupha). Bene-Chakupha [sons of C.] were among the families of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53). In Esdras (1 Esdr. v. 31) the name is given as ACIPHA.

HA'LAH (חָלַח): Αλαέ, Χαάχ; [Alex. Αλλαε, Αλαε, Χαλα:] Hala, [Lahela]) is probably a different place from the Calah of Gen. x. 11. [See CALAH.] It may with some confidence be identified with the Chalcitis (Χαλκῖτις) of Ptolemy (v. 18), which he places between Anthemusia (cf. Strab. xvi. 1, § 27) and Gauzanitis.[a] The name is thought to remain in the modern Gla, a large mound on the upper Khabour, above its junction with the Jerujer (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 312, note; 2 K. [xvii. 6,] xviii. 11; 1 Chr. v. 26). G. R.

HA'LAK, THE MOUNT (with the article, הָהָר הֶחָלָק = the smooth mountain: ὄρος τοῦ Χελχά; [Vat. in Josh. xi., Αλεκ;] Alex. Αλακ, or Αλακ: pars montis), a mountain twice, and twice only, named as the southern limit of Joshua's conquests — "the Mount Halak which goeth up to Seir" (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7), but which has not yet been identified — has not apparently been sought for — by travellers. Keil suggests the line of chalk cliffs which cross the valley of the Ghor at about 6 miles south of the Dead Sea, and form at once the southern limit of the Ghor and the northern limit of the Arabah. [ARABAH, p. 135 a.] And this suggestion would be plausible enough, if there were any example of the word har, "mountain," being applied to such a vertical cliff as this, which rather answers to what we suppose was intended by the term Sela. The word which is at the root of the name (supposing it to be Hebrew), and which has the force of smoothness or baldness, has ramified into other terms, as Helkah, an even plot of ground, like those of Jacob (Gen. xxxiii. 19) or Naboth (2 K. ix. 25), or that which gave its name to Helkath hat-tzurim, the "field of the strong" (Stanley, App. § 20). G.

* HALE (Luke xii. 58; Acts viii. 3) is the original form of "haul," sometimes still used in formal discourse. In both the above passages it means to drag men by force before magistrates. That is the import also of the Greek terms (καταστύρη and σύρων). H.

HAL'HUL (חַלְחוּל) [full of hollows, Fürst]: Αλουά; [Vat. Αλουα;] Alex. Αλουι.: Halhul), a town of Judah in the mountain district, one of the group containing Beth-zur and Gedor (Josh. xv. 58). Jerome, in the Onomasticon (under Elul), reports the existence of a hamlet (villula) named "Alula," near Hebron.[b] The name still remains unaltered, attached to a conspicuous hill a mile to the left of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, between 3 and 4 miles from the latter. Opposite it, on the other side of the road, is Beit-sûr, the modern representative of Beth-zur, and a little further to the north is Jedûr, the ancient Gedor. [BETH-ZUR.] The site is marked by the ruins of walls and foundations, amongst which stands a dilapidated mosk bearing the name of Neby Yunus — the prophet Jonah (Rob. i. 216). In a Jewish tradition quoted by Hottinger (Cippi Hebraici, p. 32) it is said to be the burial-place of Gad, David's seer. See also the citations of Zunz in Asher's Benj. of Tudela (ii. 437, note). G.

HA'LI (חֶלִי) [necklace]: Αλέφ; Alex. Οολει: Chali), a town on the boundary of Asher, named between Helkath and Beten (Josh. xix. 25). Nothing is known of its situation. Schwarz (p. 191) compares the name with Chelmon, the equivalent in the Latin of CYAMON in the Greek of Jud. vii. 3. G.

HALICARNAS'SUS (Ἁλικάρνασσος) in CARIA, a city of great renown, as being the birthplace of Herodotus and of the later historian Dionysius, and as embellished by the Mausoleum erected by Artemisia, but of no Biblical interest except as the residence of a Jewish population in the periods between the Old and New Testament histories. In 1 Macc. xv. 23, this city is specified as containing such a population. The decree in Joseph. Ant. xiv. 10, § 23, where the Romans direct that the Jews of Halicarnassus shall be allowed τὰς προσευχὰς ποιεῖσθαι πρὸς τῇ θαλάσσῃ κατὰ τὸ πάτριον ἔθος, is interesting when compared with Acts xvi. 13. This city was celebrated for its harbor and for the strength of its fortifications; but it never recovered the damage which it suffered after Alexander's siege. A plan of the site is given in Ross, Reisen auf den Griech. Inseln. (See vol. iv. p. 30.) The sculptures of the Mausoleum are the subject of a paper by Mr. Newton in the Classical Museum, and many of them are now in the British Museum. The modern name of the place is Budrûm.

HALLELU'JAH. [ALLELUIA.]

HALL (αὐλή: atrium), used of the court of the high-priest's house (Luke xxii. 55). Αὐλή is in A. V. Matt. xxvi. 69, Mark xiv. 66, John xviii. 15, "palace;" Vulg. atrium; προαύλιον, Mark xiv. 68, "porch;" Vulg. ante atrium. In Matt. xxvii. 27 and Mark xv. 16, αὐλή is syn. with πραιτώριον, which in John xviii. 28 is in A. V. "judgment-hall." Αὐλή is the equivalent for חָצֵר, an inclosed or fortified space (Ges. p. 512), in many places in O. T. where Vulg. and A. V. have respectively villa or viculus, "village," or atrium, "court," chiefly of the tabernacle or temple. The hall or court of a house or palace would probably be an inclosed but uncovered space, impluvium, [a] * Fürst says (Hebr. Lex. s. v.) that the Talmud understands the place to be Holwân, a five days' journey from Bagdad. H.

HALLO'HESH (הַלּוֹחֵשׁ [the whisperer, enchanter]: Ἀλωής; Alex. Ἀδω: Alohes), one of the "chief of the people" who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 24). The name is Lochesh, with the definite article prefixed. That it is the name of a family, and not of an individual, appears probable from another passage in which it is given in the A. V. as HALO'HESH (הַלּוֹחֵשׁ [as above]: Ἀλωής; [Vat. FA. Ηλεια:] Alohes). Shallum, son of Hal-lochesh, was "ruler of the half part of Jerusalem" at the time of the repair of the wall by Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 12). According to the Hebrew spelling, the name is identical with Hallohesh. [The A. V. ed. 1611, following the Genevan version, spells the name falsely Halloesh. — A.]

HAM (חָם [swarthy]: Χάμ: Cham). 1. The name of one of the three sons of Noah, apparently the second in age. It is probably derived from חָמַם, "to be warm," and signifies "warm" or "hot." This meaning seems to be confirmed by that of the Egyptian word Kem (Egypt), which we believe to be the Egyptian equivalent of Ham, and which, as an adjective, signifies "black," probably implying warmth as well as blackness. [Egypt.] If the Hebrew and Egyptian words be the same, Ham must mean the swarthy or sunburnt, like Αἰθίοψ, which has been derived from the Coptic name of Ethiopia, ϵΘΩϢ, but which we should be inclined to trace to ΘΟϢ, "a boundary," unless the Sahidic ϵΘϢϢ may be derived from Keesh (Cush). It is observable that the names of Noah and his sons appear to have had prophetic significations. This is stated in the case of Noah (Gen. v. 29), and implied in that of Japheth (ix. 27), and it can scarcely be doubted that the same must be concluded as to Shem. Ham may therefore have been so named as progenitor of the sunburnt Egyptians and Cushites.

Of the history of Ham nothing is related except his irreverence to his father, and the curse which that patriarch pronounced — the fulfillment of which is evident in the history of the Hamites.

The sons of Ham are stated to have been "Cush and Mizraim and Phut and Canaan" (Gen. x. 6; comp. 1 Chr. i. 8). It is remarkable that a dual form (Mizraim) should occur in the first generation, indicating a country, and not a person or a tribe, and we are therefore inclined to suppose that the gentile noun in the plural מִצְרִים, differing alone in the pointing from מִצְרַיִם, originally stood here, which would be quite consistent with the plural forms of the names of the Mizraite tribes which follow, and analogous to the singular forms of the names of the Canaanite tribes, except the Sidonians, who are mentioned not as a nation, but under the name of their forefather Sidon.

The name of Ham alone, of the three sons of Noah, if our identification be correct, is known to have been given to a country. Egypt is recognized as the "land of Ham" in the Bible (Ps. lxxviii. 51, cv. 23, cvi. 22), and this, though it does not prove the identity of the Egyptian name with that of the patriarch, certainly favors it, and establishes the historical fact that Egypt, settled by the descendants of Ham, was peculiarly his territory. The name Mizraim we believe to confirm this. The restriction of Ham to Egypt, unlike the case, if we may reason inferentially, of his brethren, may be accounted for by the very early civilization of this part of the Hamite territory, while much of the rest was comparatively barbarous. Egypt may also have been the first settlement of the Hamites whence colonies went forth, as we know to have been the case with the Philistines. [Caphtor.]

The settlements of the descendants of Cush have occasioned the greatest difficulty to critics. The main question upon which everything turns is whether there was an eastern and a western Cush, like the eastern and western Ethiopians of the Greeks. This has been usually decided on the Biblical evidence as to the land of Cush and the Cushites, without reference to that as to the several names designating in Gen. x. his progeny, or, except in Nimrod's case, the territories held by it, or both. By a more inductive method we have been led to the conclusion that settlements of Cush extended from Babylonia along the shores of the Indian Ocean to Ethiopia above Egypt, and to the supposition that there was an eastern as well as a western Cush: historically the latter inference must be correct; geographically it may be less certain of the postdiluvian world. The ancient Egyptians applied the name Keesh, or Kesh, which is obviously the same as Cush, to Ethiopia above Egypt. The sons of Cush are stated to have been Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtechah: it is added that the sons of Raamah were Sheba and Dedan, and that "Cush begat Nimrod." Certain of these names recur in the lists of the descendants of Joktan and of Abraham by Keturah, a circumstance which must be explained, in most cases, as historical evidence tends to show, by the settlement of Cushites, Joktanites, and Abrahamites in the same regions. [Arabia.] Seba is generally identified with Meroë, and there seems to be little doubt that at the time of Solomon the chief kingdom of Ethiopia above Egypt was that of Seba. [Seba.] The postdiluvian Havilah seems to be restricted to Arabia. [Havilah.] Sabtah and Sabtechah are probably Arabian names: this is certainly the case with Raamah, Sheba, and Dedan, which are recognized on the Persian Gulf. [Sabtah; Sabtechah; Raamah; Sheba; Dedan.] Nimrod is a descendant of Cush, but it is not certain that he is a son, and his is the only name which is positively personal and not territorial in the list of the descendants of Cush. The account of his first kingdom in Babylonia, and of the extension of his rule into Assyria, and the foundation of Nineveh — for this we take to be the meaning of Gen. x. 11, 12 — indicates a spread of Hamite colonists along the Euphrates and Tigris northwards. [Cush.]

If, as we suppose, Mizraim in the lists of Gen. x and 1 Chr. i. stand for Mizrim, we should take the singular Mazor to be the name of the progenitor of the Egyptian tribes. It is remarkable that Mazor appears to be identical in signification with Ham, so that it may be but another name of the patriarch. [Egypt.] In this case the mention of Mizraim (or Mizrim) would be geographical, and not indicative of a Mazor, son of Ham.

The Mizraites, like the descendants of Ham, occupy a territory wider than that bearing the name of Mizraim. We may, however, suppose that Mizraim included all the first settlements, and that in remote times other tribes besides the Philistines migrated, or extended their territories. This we may infer to have been the case with the Lehabim (Lubim) or Libyans, for Manetho speaks of them as in the remotest period of Egyptian history subject to the Pharaohs. He tells us that under the first king of the Third Dynasty, of Memphites, Necherophes, or Necherochis, "the Libyans revolted from the Egyptians, but, on account of a wonderful increase of the moon, submitted through fear" [a] (Cory's Anc. Frag. 2d ed. pp. 100, 101). It is unlikely that at this very early time the Memphite kingdom ruled far, if at all, beyond the western boundary of Egypt.

The Ludim appear to have been beyond Egypt to the west, so probably the Anamim, and certainly the Lehabim. [LUDIM; ANAMIM; LEHABIM.] The Naphtuhim seem to have been just beyond the western border. [NAPHTUHIM.] The Pathrusim and Caphtorim were in Egypt, and probably the Casluhim also. [PATHROS; CAPHTOR; CASLUHIM.] The Philistim are the only Mizraite tribe that we know to have passed into Asia: their first establishment was in Egypt, for they came out of Caphtor. [CAPHTOR.]

Phut has been always placed in Africa. In the Bible, Phut occurs as an ally or supporter of Egyptian Thebes, mentioned with Cush and Lubim (Nah. iii. 9), with Cush and Ludim (the Mizraite Ludim?), as supplying part of the army of Pharaoh-Necho (Jer. xlvi. 9), as involved in the calamities of Egypt together with Cush, Lud, and Chub [CHUB] (Ez. xxx. 5), as furnishing, with Persia, Lud, and other lands or tribes, mercenaries for the service of Tyre (xxvii. 10), and with Persia and Cush as supplying part of the army of Gog (xxxviii. 5). There can therefore be little doubt that Phut is to be placed in Africa, where we find, in the Egyptian inscriptions, a great nomadic people corresponding to it. [PHUT.]

Respecting the geographical position of the Canaanites there is no dispute, although all the names are not identified. The Hamathites alone of those identified were settled in early times wholly beyond the land of Canaan. Perhaps there was a primeval extension of the Canaanite tribes after their first establishment in the land called after their ancestor, for before the specification of its limits as those of their settlements it is stated "afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad" (Gen. x. 18, 19). One of their most important extensions was to the northeast, where was a great branch of the Hittite nation in the valley of the Orontes, constantly mentioned in the wars of the Pharaohs [EGYPT], and in those of the kings of Assyria. Two passages which have occasioned much controversy may be here noticed. In the account of Abraham's entrance into Palestine it is said, "And the Canaanite [was] then in the land" (xii. 6); and as to a somewhat later time, that of the separation of Abraham and Lot, we read that "the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land" (xiii. 7). These passages have been supposed either to be late glosses, or to indicate that the Pentateuch was written at a late period. A comparison of all the passages referring to the primitive history of Palestine and Idumæa shows that there was an earlier population expelled by the Hamite and Abrahamite settlers. This population was important in the time of the war of Chedorlaomer; but at the Exodus, more than four hundred years afterwards, there was but a remnant of it. It is most natural therefore to infer that the two passages under consideration mean that the Canaanite settlers were already in the land, not that they were still there.

Philologers are not agreed as to a Hamitic class of languages. Recently Bunsen has applied the term "Hamitism," or as he writes it Chamitism, to the Egyptian language, or rather family. He places it at the head of the "Semitic stock," to which he considers it as but partially belonging, and thus describes it: — "Chamitism, or ante-historical Semitism: the Chamitic deposit in Egypt; its daughter, the Demotic Egyptian; and its end the Coptic" (Outlines, vol. i. p. 183). Sir H. Rawlinson has applied the term Cushite to the primitive language of Babylonia, and the same term has been used for the ancient language of the southern coast of Arabia. This terminology depends, in every instance, upon the race of the nation speaking the language, and not upon any theory of a Hamitic class. There is evidence which, at the first view, would incline us to consider that the term Semitic, as applied to the Syro-Arabic class, should be changed to Hamitic; but on a more careful examination it becomes evident that any absolute classification of languages into groups corresponding to the three great Noachian families is not tenable. The Biblical evidence seems, at first sight, in favor of Hebrew being classed as a Hamitic rather than a Semitic form of speech. It is called in the Bible "the language of Canaan," שְׂפַת כְּנַעַן (Is. xix. 18), although those speaking it are elsewhere said to speak יְהוּדִית, Judaicè (2 K. xviii. 26, 28; Is. xxxvi. 11, 13; Neh. xiii. 24). But the one term, as Gesenius remarks (Gram. Introd.), indicates the country where the language was spoken, the other as evidently indicates a people by whom it was spoken: thus the question of its being a Hamitic or Semitic language is not touched; for the circumstance that it was the language of Canaan is agreeable with its being either indigenous (and therefore either Canaanite or Rephaite), or adopted (and therefore perhaps Semitic). The names of Canaanite persons and places, as Gesenius has observed (l. c.), conclusively show that the Canaanites spoke what we call Hebrew. Elsewhere we might find evidence of the use of a so-called Semitic language by nations either partly or wholly of Hamite origin. This evidence would favor the theory that Hebrew was Hamitic; but on the other hand we should be unable to dissociate Semitic languages from Semitic peoples. The Egyptian language would also offer great difficulties, unless it were held to be but partly of Hamitic origin, since it is mainly of an entirely different class to [from] the Semitic. It is mainly Nigritian, but it also contains Semitic elements. We are of opinion that the groundwork is Nigritian, and that the Semitic part is a layer added to a complete Nigritian language. The two elements are mixed, but not fused. This opinion those Semitic scholars who have studied the subject share with us. Some Iranian scholars hold that the two elements are mixed, and that the ancient Egyptian represents the transition from Turanian to Semitic. The only solution of the difficulty seems to be, that what we call Semitic is early Noachian.

[a] It has been supposed that some or all of the notices of events in Manetho's lists were inserted by copyists. This cannot, we think, have been the case with most of those notices that occur in the older dynasties.

An inquiry into the history of the Hamite nations presents considerable difficulties, since it cannot be determined in the cases of the most important of those commonly held to be Hamite that they were purely of that stock. It is certain that the three most illustrious Hamite nations — the Cushites, the Phœnicians, and the Egyptians — were greatly mixed with foreign peoples. In Babylonia the Hamite element seems to have been absorbed by the Shemite, but not in the earliest times. There are some common characteristics, however, which appear to connect the different branches of the Hamite family, and to distinguish them from the children of Japheth and Shem. Their architecture has a solid grandeur that we look for in vain elsewhere. Egypt, Babylonia, and Southern Arabia alike afford proofs of this, and the few remaining monuments of the Phœnicians are of the same class. What is very important as indicating the purely Hamite character of the monuments to which we refer is that the earliest in Egypt are the most characteristic, while the earlier in Babylonia do not yield in this respect to the later. The national mind seems in all these cases to have been [represented in ?] these material forms. The early history of each of the chief Hamite nations shows great power of organizing an extensive kingdom, of acquiring material greatness, and checking the inroads of neighboring nomadic peoples. The Philistines afford a remarkable instance of these qualities. In every case, however, the more energetic sons of Shem or Japheth have at last fallen upon the rich Hamite territories and despoiled them. Egypt, favored by a position fenced round with nearly impassable barriers — on the north an almost havenless coast, on the east and west sterile deserts, held its freedom far longer than the rest; yet even in the days of Solomon the throne was filled by foreigners, who, if Hamites, were Shemite enough in their belief to revolutionize the religion of the country. In Babylonia the Medes had already captured Nimrod's city more than 2000 years before the Christian era. The Hamites of Southern Arabia were so early overthrown by the Joktanites that the scanty remains of their history are alone known to us through tradition. Yet the story of the magnificence of the ancient kings of Yemen is so perfectly in accordance with all we know of the Hamites that it is almost enough of itself to prove what other evidence has so well established. The history of the Canaanites is similar; and if that of the Phœnicians be an exception, it must be recollected that they became a merchant class, as Ezekiel's famous description of Tyre shows (chap. xxvii). In speaking of Hamite characteristics we do not intend it to be inferred that they were necessarily altogether of Hamite origin, and not at least partly borrowed. R. S. P.

2. (חָם [multitude, people, Fürst], Gen. xiv. 5; Sam. חם, Cham) According to the Masoretic text, Chedorlaomer and his allies smote the Zuzim in a place called Ham. If, as seems likely, the Zuzin be the same as the Zamzummim, Ham must be placed in what was afterwards the Ammonite territory. Hence it has been conjectured by Tuch, that Ham is but another form of the name of the chief stronghold of the children of Ammon, Rabbah, now Am-man. The LXX. and Vulg., however, throw some doubt upon the Masoretic reading: the former has, as the rendering of וְאֶת־הַזּוּזִים בְּהָם: καὶ ἔθνη ἰσχυρὰ ἅμα αὐτοῖς; and the latter, et Zuzim cum eis, which shows that they read בָּהֶם: but the Mas. rendering seems the more likely, as each clause mentions a nation, and its capital or stronghold; although it must be allowed that if the Zuzim had gone to the assistance of the Rephaim, a deviation would have been necessary. The Samaritan Version has לישה, Lishah, perhaps intending the LASHA of Gen. x. 19, which by some is identified with Callirhoë on the N. E. quarter of the Dead Sea. The Targums of Onkelos and Pseudojon. have הֲמָתָא, Hemta. Schwarz (217) suggests Humeimath (in Van de Velde's map Hümeitat), one mile above Rabba, the ancient Ar-Moab, on the Roman road. [ZUZIMS.]

3. In the account of a migration of the Simeonites to the valley of Gedor, and their destroying the pastoral inhabitants, the latter, or possibly their predecessors, are said to have been "of Ham" (מִן־חָם: ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν Χάμ: de stirpe Cham, 1 Chr. iv. 40). This may indicate that a Hamite tribe was settled here, or, more precisely, that there was an Egyptian settlement. The connection of Egypt with this part of Palestine will be noticed under ZERAH. Ham may, however, here be in no way connected with the patriarch or with Egypt.

HA'MAN (הָמָן [celebrated (Pers.), or = Mercury (Sansk.), Fürst]: Ἀμάν: Aman), the chief minister or vizier of king Ahasuerus (Esth. iii. 1). After the failure of his attempt to cut off all the Jews in the Persian empire, he was hanged on the gallows which he had erected for Mordecai. Most probably he is the same Aman who is mentioned as the oppressor of Achiacharus (Tob. xiv. 10). The Targum and Josephus (Ant. xi. 6, § 5) interpret the description of him — the Agagite — as signifying that he was of Amalekitish descent; but he is called a Macedonian by the LXX. in Esth. ix. 24 (cf. iii. 1), and a Persian by Sulpicius Severus. Prideaux (Connexion, anno 453) computes the sum which he offered to pay into the royal treasury at more than £2,000,000 sterling. Modern Jews are said to be in the habit of designating any Christian enemy by his name (Eisenmenger, Ent. Jud. i. 721). [See addition under ESTHER, BOOK OF.] W. T. B.

HA'MATH (חֲמָת [fortress, citadel]: Ἡμάθ, Ἡμάθ, Αἰμάθ: Emath) appears to have been the principal city of Upper Syria from the time of the Exodus to that of the prophet Amos. It was situated in the valley of the Orontes, about half-way between its source near Baalbek, and the bend which it makes at Jisr-hadid. It thus naturally commanded the whole of the Orontes valley, from the low screen of hills which forms the watershed between the Orontes and the Litany — the "entrance of Hamath," as it is called in Scripture (Num. xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5, &c.) — to the defile of Daphne below Antioch; and this tract appears to have formed the kingdom of Hamath, during the time of its independence.

The Hamathites were a Hamitic race, and are included among the descendants of Canaan (Gen. x. 18). There is no reason to suppose with Mr. Kenrick (Phœnicia, p. 60), that they were ever in any sense Phœnicians. We must regard them as closely akin to the Hittites on whom they bordered, and with whom they were generally in alliance. Nothing appears of the power of Hamath, beyond the geographical notices which show it to be a well-known place (Num. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5; &c.), until the time of David, when we hear that Toi, king of Hamath, had "had wars" with Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and on the defeat of the latter by David, sent his son to congratulate the Jewish monarch (2 Sam. viii. 10), and (apparently) to put Hamath under his protection. Hamath seems clearly to have been included in the dominions of Solomon (1 K. iv. 21–4); and its king was no doubt one of those many princes over whom that monarch ruled, who "brought presents and served Solomon all the days of his life." The "store-cities," which Solomon "built in Hamath" (2 Chr. viii. 4), were perhaps staples for trade, the importance of the Orontes valley as a line of traffic being always great. On the death of Solomon and the separation of the two kingdoms, Hamath seems to have regained its independence. In the Assyrian inscriptions of the time of Ahab (B. C. 900) it appears as a separate power, in alliance with the Syrians of Damascus, the Hittites, and the Phœnicians. About three-quarters of a century later Jeroboam the second "recovered Hamath" (2 K. xiv. 28); he seems to have dismantled the place, whence the prophet Amos, who wrote in his reign (Am. i. 1), couples "Hamath the great" with Gath, as an instance of desolation (ib. vi. 2). Soon afterwards the Assyrians took it (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13, &c.), and from this time it ceased to be a place of much importance. Antiochus Epiphanes appears to have changed its name to Epiphaneia, an appellation under which it was known to the Greeks and Romans from his time to that of St. Jerome (Comment. in Ezek. xlvii. 16), and possibly later. The natives, however, called it Hamath, even in St. Jerome's time; and its present name, Hamah, is but very slightly altered from the ancient form.

Burckhardt visited Hamah in 1812. He describes it as situated on both sides of the Orontes, partly on the declivity of a hill, partly in the plain, and as divided into four quarters — Hadher, El Djisr, El Aleyat, and El Medine, the last being the quarter of the Christians. The population, according to him, was at that time 30,000. The town possessed few antiquities, and was chiefly remarkable for its huge water-wheels, whereby the gardens and the houses in the upper town were supplied from the Orontes. The neighboring territory he calls "the granary of Northern Syria" (Travels in Syria, pp. 146–147. See also Pococke, Travels in the East, vol. i.; Irby and Mangles, Travels, p. 244; and Stanley, S. & P. pp. 406, 407).

* The "entrance of Hamath" is not as stated, at the water-shed between the Litâny and the Orontes, which would place it too far south, for the following reasons: (1.) The northern boundary of the Israelites was certainly north of Riblah, for the east border descends from Hazar-enan to Shepham, and from Shepham to Riblah. Riblah is still known by its ancient name, and is found south of Hums Lake about six or eight hours. The "entrance" must therefore lie north of this town. (2.) It must lie east of Mount Hor. Now, if Mount Hor be, as it probably is, the range of Lebanon, the question is readily solved by a reference to the physical geography of the region. The ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon terminate opposite Hums Lake by bold and decided declivities. There is then a rolling country for a distance of about ten miles north of the Lebanon chain, after which rises the lower range of the Nusairiyeh mountains. A wider space of plain intervenes between Anti-Lebanon and the low hills which lie eastward of Hamath. The city of Hums lies at the intersection of the arms of the cross thus formed, and toward each of the cardinal points of the compass there is an "entering in" between the hills. Thus northward the pass leads to Hamath; westward to Kulât el-Husn and the Mediterranean; eastward to the great plain of the Syrian desert; and southward toward Baal-gad in Cœle-Syria. This will appear at a glance from the accompanying plan of the country, in which it will be seen that the plain of Hums opens to the four points of the compass. Especially to one journeying from the south or the west would this locality be appropriately described as an entrance. (3.) It is improbable that the lands of Hamath ever extended as far south as the height of land between the Leontes and the Orontes, or in fact into the southern division of Cœle-Syria at all. Hums would have been its natural limit from the sea, to one journeying along the coast from Tripoli to Laodikia. Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh range are seen in profile, with the gap between them. A similar view is presented from the remaining cardinal points G. E. P.

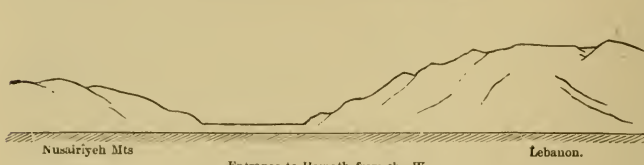
HA'MATHITE, THE (הַחֲמָתִי: ὁ Ἀμαθί: Amathæus, Hamathæus), one of the families descended from Canaan, named last in the list (Gen. x. 18; 1 Chr. i. 16). The place of their settlement was doubtless HAMATH.



Entrance to Hamath from the W.

HA'MATH-ZO'BAH (חֲמַת־צוֹבָה: Βαισωβά; [Alex. Αμαθ Σωβα:] Emath-Suba) is said to have been attacked and conquered by Solomon (2 Chr. viii. 3). It has been conjectured to be the same as Hamath, here regarded as included in Aram-Zobah — a geographical expression which has usually a narrower meaning. But the name Hamath-Zobah would seem rather suited to another Hamath which was distinguished from the "Great Hamath," by the suffix "Zobah." Compare Ramoth-Gilead, which is thus distinguished from Ramah in Benjamin. G. R.

* HAMI'TAL, 2 K. xxiii. 31, is the reading of the A. V. ed. 1611 for HAMUTAL. A.

HAM'MATH (חַמַּת [warm spring]: Ὠμαθαδακέθ — the last two syllables a corruption of the name following; [Alex. Αμάθ; [Ald. Ἀμμάθ:] Emath), one of the fortified cities in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). It is not possible from this list to determine its position, but the notices of the Talmudists, collected by Lightfoot in his Chorographical Century, and Chor. Decad, leave no doubt that it was near Tiberias, one mile distant — in fact that it had its name, Chammath, "hot baths," because it contained those of Tiberias. In accordance with this are the slight notices of Josephus, who mentions it under the name of Emmaus as a "village not far (κώμη . . . οὐκ ἄπωθεν) from Tiberias" (Ant. xviii. 2, § 3), and as where Vespasian had encamped "before (πρό) Tiberias" (B. J. iv. 1, § 3). Remains of the wall of this encampment were recognized by Irby and Mangles (p. 89 b). In both cases Josephus names the hot springs or baths, adding in the latter, that such is the interpretation of the name Ἀμμαοῦς, and that the waters are medicinal. The Hammâm, at present three[a] in number, still send up their hot and sulphureous waters, at a spot rather more than a mile south of the modern town, at the extremity of the ruins of the ancient city (Rob. ii. 383, 384; Van de Velde, ii. 399).

It is difficult, however, to reconcile with this position other observations of the Talmudists, quoted on the same place, by Lightfoot, to the effect that Chammath was called also the "wells of Gadara," from its proximity to that place, and also that half the town was on the east side of the Jordan and half on the west, with a bridge between them — the fact being that the ancient Tiberias was at least 4 miles, and the Hammam 2½, from the present embouchure of the Jordan. The same difficulty besets the account of Parchi (in Zunz's Appendix to Benjamin of Tudela, ii. 403). He places the wells entirely on the east of Jordan.

In the list of Levitical cities given out of Naphtali (Josh. xxi. 32), the name of this place seems to be given as HAMMOTH-DOR, and in 1 Chr. vi. 76 it is further altered to HAMMON. G.

HAMMEDA'THA (הַמְּדָתָא: Ἀμαδάθος; [Alex. Αναμαθαδος, Αμαθδος:] Amadathus), father of the infamous Haman, and commonly designated as "the Agagite" (Esth. iii. 1, 10; viii. 5; ix. 24), though also without that title (ix. 10). By Gesenius (Lex. 1855, p. 539) the name is taken to be Medatha, preceded by the definite article. For other explanations, see Fürst, Handwb. [Zend, = given by Haomo, an Ized], and Simonis, Onomasticon, p. 586. The latter derives it from a Persian word meaning "double." For the termination compare ARIDATHA.

HAMME'LECH (הַמֶּלֶךְ [the king]: τοῦ βασιλέως: Amelech), rendered in the A. V. as a proper name (Jer. xxxvi. 26; xxxviii. 6); but there is no apparent reason for supposing it to be anything but the ordinary Hebrew word for "the king," i. e. in the first case Jehoiakim, and in the latter Zedekiah. If this is so, it enables us to connect with the royal family of Judah two persons, Jerachmeel and Malciah, who do not appear in the A. V. as members thereof. G.

HAMMER. The Hebrew language has several names for this indispensable tool. (1.) Pattish (פַּטִּישׁ, connected etymologically with πατάσσω, to strike), which was used by the gold-beater (Is. xli. 7, A. V. "carpenter") to overlay with silver and "smooth" the surface of the image; as well as by the quarry-man (Jer. xxiii. 29). (2.) Makkâbâh (מַקֶּבֶת [and מַקֻּבֶת]), properly a tool for hollowing, hence a stone-cutter's mallet (1 K. vi. 7), and generally any workman's hammer (Judg. iv. 21; Is. xliv. 12; Jer. x. 4). (3.) Halmûth (הַלְמוּת), used only in Judg. v. 26, and then with the addition of the word "workmen's" by way of explanation. (4.) A kind of hammer, named mappêts (מַפֵּיץ), Jer. li. 20 (A. V. "battle-axe"), or mephîtz (מְפִיץ), Prov. xxv. 18 (A. V.

[a] * Mr. Porter (Handb. for Syr. & Pal. ii. 422) speaks of four springs: one under the old bath-house, and three others a few paces further south (see also Rob. Bibl. Res. iii. 259). H.

"maul",, was used as a weapon of war. "Hammer" is used figuratively for any overwhelming power, whether worldly (Jer. l. 23), or spiritual (Jer. xxiii. 29 [comp. Heb. iv. 12]). W. L. B.

* From מַקָּבָה comes Maccabæus or Maccabee [MACCABEES, THE]. The hammer used by Jael (Judg. v. 26) was not of iron, but a wooden mallet, such as the Arabs use now for driving down their tent-pins. (See Thomson's Land and Book, ii. 149.) In the Hebrew, it is spoken of as "the hammer," as being the one kept for that purpose. The nail driven through Sisera's temples was also one of the wooden tent-pins. This particularity points to a scene drawn from actual life. It is said in 1 K. vi. 7 that no sound of hammer, or axe, or any iron tool, was heard in building the Temple, because it "was built of stone made ready" at the quarry. The immense cavern under Jerusalem, where undoubtedly most of the building material of the ancient city was obtained, furnishes incidental confirmation of this statement. "The heaps of chippings which lie about show that the stone was dressed on the spot. . . . There are no other quarries of any great size near the city, and in the reign of Solomon this quarry, in its whole extent, was without the limits of the city" (Barclay's City of the Great King, p. 468, 1st ed. (1865)). See also the account of this subterranean gallery in the Ordnance Survey of Jerusalem, pp. 63, 64. H.

HAMMOLE'KETH (הַמֹּלֶכֶת, with the article = the Queen: ἡ Μαλεχέθ: Regina), a woman introduced in the genealogies of Manasseh as daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Chr. vii. 17, 18), and as having among her children ABI-EZER, from whose family sprang the great judge Gideon. The Targum translates the name by מַלְכָּא = who reigned. The Jewish tradition, as preserved by Kimchi in his commentary on the passage, is that "she used to reign over a portion of the land which belonged to Gilead," and that for that reason her lineage has been preserved.

HAM'MON (חַמּוֹן) [hot or sunny]: ['Εμμαών:] Alex. Αμων: Hamon). 1. A city in Asher (Josh. xix. 28), apparently not far from Zidon-rabbah, or "Great Zidon." Dr. Schultz suggested its identification with the modern village of Hamul, near the coast, about 10 miles below Tyre (Rob. iii. 66), but this is doubtful both in etymology and position.

2. [Χαμώθ; Alex. Χαμων.] A city allotted out of the tribe of Naphtali to the Levites (1 Chr. vi. 76), and answering to the somewhat similar names HAMMATH and HAMMOTH-DOR in Joshua. G.

HAM'MOTH-DOR' (חַמּוֹת דֹּאר) [warm springs, abode]: Νεμμάθ: Alex. Εμαθδωρ: Ammoth Dor), a city of Naphtali, allotted with its suburbs to the Gershonite Levites, and for a city of refuge (Josh. xxi. 32). Unless there were two places of the same or very similar name in Naphtali, this is identical with HAMMATH. Why the suffix Dor is added it is hard to tell, unless the word refers in some way to the situation of the place on the coast, in which fact only had it (as far as we know) any resemblance to DOR, on the shore of the Mediterranean. In 1 Chr. vi. 76 the name is contracted to HAMMON. G.

HAMO'NAH (הֲמוֹנָה) [tumult, noise of a multitude]: Πολυάνδριον: Amona), the name of a city mentioned in a highly obscure passage of Ezekiel (xxxix. 16); apparently that of the place in or near which the multitudes of Gog should be buried after their great slaughter by God, and which is to derive its name — "multitude" — from that circumstance. G.

HAMON-GOG', THE VALLEY OF (גֵּיא הֲמוֹן גּוֹג = ravine of Gog's multitude: Γαὶ τὸ πολυάνδριον τοῦ Γώγ: vallis multitudinis Gog), the name to be bestowed on a ravine or glen, previously known as "the ravine of the passengers on the east of the sea," after the burial there of "Gog and all his multitude" (Ez. xxxix. 11, 15).

HA'MOR (חֲמוֹר), i. e. in Hebrew a large he-ass, the figure employed by Jacob for Issachar: 'Εμμώρ: Hemor), a Hivite (or according to the Alex. LXX. a Horite), who at the time of the entrance of Jacob on Palestine was prince (Nasi) of the land and city of Shechem, and father of the impetuous young man of the latter name whose ill treatment of Dinah brought destruction on himself, his father, and the whole of their city (Gen. xxxiii. 19; xxxiv. 2, 4, 6, 8, 13, 18, 20, 24, 26). Hamor would seem to have been a person of great influence, because, though alive at the time, the men of his tribe are called after him Bene-Hamor, and he himself, in records narrating events long subsequent to this, is styled Hmmor-Abi Shecem (Josh. xxiv. 32:[a] Judg. ix. 28; Acts vii. 16). In the second of these passages his name is used as a signal of revolt, when the remnant of the ancient Hivites attempted to rise against Abimelech son of Gideon. [SHECHEM.] For the title Abi-Shecem, "father of Shechem," compare "father of Bethlehem," "father of Tekoah," and others in the early lists of 1 Chr. ii., iv. In Acts vii. 16 the name is given in the Greek form of EMMOR, and Abraham is said to have bought his sepulchre from the "sons of Emmor."

HAMU'EL (הַמּוּאֵל [see infra], i. e. Hammûel: 'Αμουήλ: Amuel), a man of Simeon; son of Mishma, of the family of Shaul (1 Chr. iv. 26), from whom, if we follow the records of this passage, it would seem the whole tribe of Simeon located in Palestine were derived. In many Hebrew MSS. the name is given as Chammûel.

* The latter form exchanges the soft guttural for the hard. It signifies "heat" and hence "anger of God" (Gesen.), or "God is a sun" (Fürst). H.

HA'MUL (חָמוּל) [pitied, spared]: Sam. דמואל: 'Ιεμουήλ, 'Ιαμούν; [Alex. in Num., Ιαμουηλ; Comp. 'Αμούλ, Χαμούλ:] Hamul), the younger son of Pharez, Judah's son by Tamar (Gen. xlvi. 12; 1 Chr. ii. 5). Hamul was head of the family of the Hamulites (Num. xxvi. 21), but none of the genealogy of his descendants is preserved in the lists of 1 Chronicles, though those of the descendants of Zerah are fully given.

HA'MULITES, THE (הַחֲמוּלִי [see above]: 'Ιαμουνί, Alex. Ιαμουηλι; [Comp. 'Αμου-λ[:] Hamulitæ), the family (מִשְׁפַּחַת) of the preceding (Num. xxvi. 21).

HAMU'TAL (חֲמוּטַל = perh. kin to the dew: 'Αμιτάλ; [Vat. Αμειται, Μιτατ; Alex. Αμιταλ, -ταθ;] in Jer. 'Αμειτάαλ [Alex. -μι-]: Amital), daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah; one of the wives of king Josiah, and mother of the unfortunate princes Jehoahaz (2 K. xxiii. 31), and Mattaniah or Zedekiah (2 K. xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1). In the two last passages the name is given in the original text as חֲמִיטַל, Chamital, a reading which the LXX. follow throughout.

* Curiously enough, in the first passage, but in neither of the two last, the A. V. ed. 1611 reads Hamital. A.

HANAM'ĔĔL [properly Hanamel, in 3 syl.] (חֲנַמְאֵל [perh. חֲנַנְאֵל whom God has given, Gesen.]: 'Αναμεήλ: Hanameel), son of Shallum, and cousin of Jeremiah. When Judæa was occupied by the Chaldæans, Jerusalem beleaguered, and Jeremiah in prison, the prophet bought a field of Hanameel in token of his assurance that a time was to come when land should be once more a secure possession (Jer. xxxii. 7, 8, 9, 12; and comp 44). The suburban fields belonging to the tribe of Levi could not be sold (Lev. xxv. 34); but possibly Hanameel may have inherited property from his mother. Compare the case of Barnabas, who also was a Levite; and the note of Grotius on Acts iv. 37. Henderson (on Jer. xxxii. 7) supposes that a portion of the Levitical estates might be sold within the tribe.

HA'NAN (חָנָן) (gracious, merciful): 'Ανάν: Hanan). 1. One of the chief people of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 23).

2. The last of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 38; ix. 44).

3. [FA. Αννων.] "Son of Maachah," i. e. possibly a Syrian of Aram-Maachah, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the extended list of 1 Chr. xi. 43.

4. [FA. Γαναν.] Bene-Chanan [sons of C.] were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 46; Neh. vii. 49). In the parallel list, 1 Esdr. v. 30, the name is given as ANAN.

5. (LXX. omits [Rom. and Alex. in Neh. x. 10 read Αναν, but Vat. and FA.[1] omit].) One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in his public exposition of the law (Neh. viii. 7). The same person is probably mentioned in x. 10 as sealing the covenant, since several of the same names occur in both passages.

6. [Vat. omits.] One of the "heads" of the "people," that is of the laymen, who also sealed the covenant (x. 22).

7. (Αἰνάν; [FA. Αινα.]) Another of the chief laymen on the same occasion (x. 26).

8. [FA. Ααναν.] Son of Zaccur, son of Mattaniah, whom Nehemiah made one of the storekeepers of the provisions collected as tithes (Neh. xiii. 13). He was probably a layman, in which case the four storekeepers represented the four chief classes of the people — priests, scribes, Levites, and laymen.

9. Son of Igdaliahu "the man of God" (Jer. xxxv. 4). The sons of Hanan had a chamber in the Temple. The Vat. LXX. gives the name twice — 'Ιωνᾶν υἱοῦ 'Ανανίου [FA. Ανναν υιου Ανανιου].

HANAN'ĔĔL [properly Hananel, in 3 syl.] THE TOWER OF (מִגְדַּל חֲנַנְאֵל: πύργος 'Αναμεήλ: turris Hananeel), a tower which formed part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 1, xii. 39). From these two passages, particularly from the former, it might almost be inferred that Hananeel was but another name for the Tower of Meah (מֵאָה = the hundred): at any rate they were close together, and stood between the sheep-gate and the fish-gate. This tower is further mentioned in Jer. xxxi. 38, where the reference appears to be to an extensive breach in the wall, reaching from that spot to the "gate of the corner" (comp. Neh. iii. 24, 32), and which the prophet is announcing shall be "rebuilt to Jehovah" and "not be thrown down any more for ever." The remaining passage in which it is named (Zech. xiv. 10) also connects this tower with the "corner gate," which lay on the other side of the sheep-gate. This verse is rendered by Ewald with a different punctuation to [from] the A. V. — "from the gate of Benjamin, on to the place of the first (or early) gate, on to the corner-gate and Tower Hananeel, on to the king's wine-presses." [JERUSALEM.]

HANA'NI (חָנָנִי) (gracious]: [Rom. Αναν, Ανανιας: Alex.] Ανανι: Hanani). 1. One of the sons of Heman, David's Seer, who were separated for song in the house of the Lord, and head of the 18th course of the service (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 25).

2. ['Ανανί; Vat. -νει, once -μει; Alex. 1 K. xvi. 7, Ανανια.] A Seer who rebuked (B. C. 941) Asa, king of Judah, for his want of faith in God, which he had showed by buying off the hostility of Benhadad I. king of Syria (2 Chr. xvi. 7). For this he was imprisoned by Asa (10). He (or another Hanani) was the father of Jehu the Seer, who testified against Baasha (1 K. xvi. 1, 7), and Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xix. 2, xx. 34).

3. ['Ανανί; Vat. FA. -νει; Alex. Ανανια.] One of the priests who in the time of Ezra were connected with strange wives (Ezr. x. 20). In Esdras the name is ANANIAS.

4. ['Ανανί, Ανανία; FA. in i. 2, Αναν.] A brother of Nehemiah, who returned B. C. 446 from Jerusalem to Susa (Neh. i. 2); and was afterwards made governor of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (vii. 2.)

5. ['Ανανί; Vat. Alex. FA[1] omit.] A priest mentioned in Neh. xii. 36. W. T. B.

HANANI'AH (חֲנַנְיָה and חֲנַנְיָהוּ [whom Jehovah has given]: 'Ανανία; ['Ανανίας:] Ananias, [Hananias,] and Hananius. In New Test. 'Ανανίας: Ananias).

1. One of the 14 sons of Heman the singer, and chief of the sixteenth out of the 24 courses or wards into which the 288 musicians of the Levites were divided by king David. The sons of Heman were especially employed to blow the horns (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 5, 23).

2. One of the chief captains of the army of king Uzziah (2 Chr. xxvi. 11).

3. Father of Zedekiah, one of the princes in the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah (Jer. xxxvi. 12).

4. Son of Azur, a Benjamite of Gibeon and a false prophet in the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah In the 4th year of his reign, B. C. 595, Hananiah withstood Jeremiah the prophet, and publicly prophesied in the temple that within two years Jeconiah and all his fellow-captives, with the vessels of the Lord's house which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away to Babylon, should be brought back to Jerusalem (Jer. xxviii.): an indication that treacherous negotiations were already secretly opened with Pharaoh-Hophra (who had just succeeded Psammis on the Egyptian throne [a]), and that strong hopes were entertained of the destruction of the Babylonian power by him. The preceding chapter (xxvii. 3) shows further that a league was already in progress between Judah and the neighboring nations of Edom, Ammon, Moab, Tyre, and Zidon, for the purpose of organizing resistance to Nebuchadnezzar, in combination no doubt with the projected movements of Pharaoh-Hophra. Hananiah corroborated his prophecy by taking from off the neck of Jeremiah the yoke which he wore by Divine command (Jer. xxvii., in token of the subjection of Judæa and the neighboring countries to the Babylonian empire), and breaking it, adding, "Thus saith Jehovah, Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations within the space of two full years." But Jeremiah was bid to go and tell Hananiah that for the wooden yokes which he had broken he should make yokes of iron, so firm was the dominion of Babylon destined to be for seventy years. The prophet Jeremiah added this rebuke and prediction of Hananiah's death, the fulfillment of which closes the history of this false prophet. "Hear now, Hananiah; Jehovah hath not sent thee; but thou makest this people to trust in a lie. Therefore thus saith Jehovah, Behold I will cast thee from off the face of the earth: this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught rebellion against Jehovah. So Hananiah the prophet died the same year, in the seventh month" (Jer. xxviii.). The above history of Hananiah is of great interest, as throwing much light upon the Jewish politics of that eventful time, divided as parties were into the partizans of Babylon on one hand, and Egypt on the other. It also exhibits the machinery of false prophecies, by which the irreligious party sought to promote their own policy, in a very distinct form. At the same time too that it explains in general the sort of political calculation on which such false prophecies were hazarded, it supplies an important clew in particular by which to judge of the date of Pharaoh-Hophra's (or Apries') accession to the Egyptian throne, and the commencement of his ineffectual effort to restore the power of Egypt (which had been prostrate since Necho's overthrow, Jer. xlvi. 2) upon the ruins of the Babylonian empire. The leaning to Egypt, indicated by Hananiah's prophecy as having begun in the fourth of Zedekiah, had in the sixth of his reign issued in open defection from Nebuchadnezzar, and in the guilt of perjury, which cost Zedekiah his crown and his life, as we learn from Ez. xvii. 12–20; the date being fixed by a comparison of Ez. viii. 1 with xx. 1. The temporary success of the intrigue which is described in Jer. xxxvii. was speedily followed by the return of the Chaldæans and the destruction of the city, according to the prediction of Jeremiah. This history of Hananiah also illustrates the manner in which the false prophets hindered the mission, and obstructed the beneficent effects of the ministry, of the true prophets, and affords a remarkable example of the way in which they prophesied smooth things, and said peace when there was no peace (comp. 1 K. xxii. 11, 24, 25).

5. Grandfather of Irijah, the captain of the ward at the gate of Benjamin who arrested Jeremiah on a charge of deserting to the Chaldæans (Jer. xxxvii. 13).

6. Head of a Benjamite house (1 Chr. viii. 24).

7. The Hebrew name of Shadrach. [SHADRACH.] He was of the house of David, according to Jewish tradition (Dan. i. 3, 6, 7, 11, 19; ii. 17). [ANANIAS.]

8. Son of Zerubbabel, 1 Chr. iii. 19, from whom CHRIST derived his descent. He is the same person who is by St. Luke called Ἀνανίας, Joanna, and who, when Rhesa is discarded, appears there also as Zerubbabel's son [GENEALOGY OF CHRIST.] The identity of the two names Hananiah and Joanna is apparent immediately we compare them in Hebrew. חֲנַנְיָה (Hananiah) is compounded of חָנַן and the Divine name, which always takes the form יָהּ, or יָהוּ, at the end of compounded names (as in Jerem-iah, Shephet-iah, Nehem-iah, Azar-iah, etc.). It meant gratiosè dedit Dominus. Joanna (יוֹחָנָן) is compounded of the Divine name, which at the beginning of compound names takes the form יוֹ, or יְהוֹ (as in Jeho-shua, Jehoshaphat, Jo-zadak, etc.), and the same word, חָנַן, and means Dominus gratiosè dedit. Examples of a similar transposition of the elements of a compound name in speaking of the same individual, are יְכָנְיָה, Jecon-iah, and יְהוֹיָכִין, Jeho-jachin, of the same king of Judah: Ahaz-iah and Jehoahaz of the same son of Jehoram; Eli-am, and Ammi-el, of the father of Bath-sheba; and El-asah for Asah-el, and Ishma-el, for Eli-shama, in some MSS. of Ezr. x. 15 and 2 K. xxv. 25. This identification is of great importance, as bringing St. Luke's genealogy into harmony with the Old Testament. Nothing more is known of Hananiah.

9. The two names Hananiah and Jehohanan stand side by side, Ezr. x. 28, as sons of Bebai, who returned with Ezra from Babylon.

10. A priest, one of the "apothecaries" (which see) or makers of the sacred ointments and incense (Ex. xxx. 22–38, 1 Chr. ix. 30), who built a portion of the wall of Jerusalem in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 8). He may be the same as is mentioned in ver. 30 as having repaired another portion. If so, he was son of Shelemiah; perhaps the same as is mentioned xii. 41.

11. Head of the priestly course of Jeremiah in the days of Joiakim the high-priest, Neh. xii. 12.

12. Ruler of the palace (שַׂר הַבִּירָה) at Jerusalem under Nehemiah. He is described as "a faithful man, and one who feared God above many." His office seems to have been one of authority and trust, and perhaps the same as that of Eliakim, who was "over the house" in the reign of Hezekiah. [ELIAKIM.] The arrangements for guarding the gates of Jerusalem were intrusted to him with Hanani, the Tirshatha's brother. Prideaux thinks that the appointment of Hanani and Hananiah indicates that at this time Nehemiah returned to Persia, but without sufficient ground. Nehemiah seems to have been continuously at Jerusalem for some time after the completion of the wall (vii. 5, 65, viii. 9, x. 1). If, too, the term (הַבִּירָה) means, as Gesenius supposes, and as the use of it in Neh. ii. 8 makes not improbable, not the palace, but the fortress of the Temple, called by Josephus βάρις — there is still less reason to imagine Nehemiah's absence. In this case Hananiah would be a priest, perhaps of the same family as the preceding. The rendering moreover of Neh. vii. 2, 3, should probably be, "And I enjoined (or gave orders to) Hanani . . and Hananiah the captains of the fortress . . . . concerning Jerusalem, and said, Let not the gates," etc. There is no authority for rendering עַל by "over" — "He gave such an one charge over Jerusalem." The passages quoted by Gesenius are not one of them to the point.

[a] Pharaoh-Hophra succeeded Psammis, B. C. 595. The dates of the Egyptian reigns from Psammetichus are fixed by that of the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses.

13. An Israelite, Neh. x. 23 (Hebr. 24). [ANANIAS.]

14. Other Hananiahs will be found under ANANIAS, the Greek form of the name. A. C. H.

HANDICRAFT (τέχνη, ἐργασία: ars, artificium, Acts xviii. 3, xix. 25; Rev. xviii. 22). Although the extent cannot be ascertained to which those arts were carried on whose invention is ascribed to Tubal-Cain, it is probable that this was proportionate to the nomadic or settled habits of the antediluvian races. Among nomad races, as the Bedouin Arabs, or the tribes of Northern and Central Asia and of America, the wants of life, as well as the arts which supply them, are few; and it is only among the city-dwellers that both of them are multiplied and make progress. This subject cannot, of course, be followed out here; in the present article brief notices can only be given of such handicraft trades as are mentioned in Scripture.

1. The preparation of iron for use either in war, in agriculture, or for domestic purposes, was doubtless one of the earliest applications of labor; and, together with iron, working in brass, or rather copper alloyed with tin, bronze (נְחֹשֶׁת, Gesen. p. 875), is mentioned in the same passage as practiced in antediluvian times (Gen. iv. 22). The use of this last is usually considered as an art of higher antiquity even than that of iron (Hesiod. Works and Days, 150; Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. p. 152, abridg.), and there can be no doubt that metal, whether iron or bronze, must have been largely used, either in material or in tools, for the construction of the Ark (Gen. vi. 14, 16). Whether the weapons for war or chase used by the early warriors of Syria and Assyria, or the arrow-heads of the archer Ishmael were of bronze or iron, cannot be ascertained; but we know that iron was used for warlike purposes by the Assyrians (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 194), and on the other hand that stone-tipped arrows, as was the case also in Mexico, were used in the earlier times by the Egyptians as well as the Persians and Greeks, and that stone or flint knives continued to be used by them, and by the inhabitants of the desert, and also by the Jews, for religious purposes after the introduction of iron into general use (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 353, 354, ii. 163; Prescott, Mexico, i. 118; Ex. iv. 25; Josh. v. 2; 1st Egypt. room, Brit. Mus. case 36, 37). In the construction of the Tabernacle, copper, but no iron, appears to have been used, though the use of iron was at the same period well known to the Jews, both from their own use of it and from their Egyptian education, whilst the Canaanite inhabitants of Palestine and Syria were in full possession of its use both for warlike and domestic purposes (Ex. xx. 25, xxv. 3, xxvii. 19; Num xxxv. 16; Deut. iii. 11, iv. 20, viii. 9; Josh. viii. 31, xvii. 16, 18). After the establishment of the Jews in Canaan, the occupation of a smith (חָרָשׁ) became recognized as a distinct employment (1 Sam. xiii. 19). The designer of a higher order appears to have been called specially חֹשֵׁב (Ges. p. 531; Ex. xxxv. 30, 35; 2 Chr. xxvi. 15; Saalschütz, Arch. Hebr. c. 14, § 16). The smith's work and its results are often mentioned in Scripture (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 K. vi. 7; 2 Chr. xxvi. 14; Is. xliv. 12, liv. 16). Among the captives taken to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar were 1000 "craftsmen" and smiths, who were probably of the superior kind (2 K. xxiv. 16; Jer. xxix. 2).

The worker in gold and silver (צוֹרֵף): ἀργυροκόπος, χωνευτής: argentarius, aurifex) must have found employment both among the Hebrews and the neighboring nations in very early times, as appears from the ornaments sent by Abraham to Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 22, 53, xxxv. 4, xxxviii. 18; Deut. vii. 25). But whatever skill the Hebrews possessed, it is quite clear that they must have learned much from Egypt and its "iron-furnaces," both in metal-work and in the arts of setting and polishing precious stones; arts which were turned to account both in the construction of the Tabernacle and the making of the priests' ornaments, and also in the casting of the golden calf as well as its destruction by Moses, probably, as suggested by Goguet, by a method which he had learnt in Egypt (Gen. xli. 42; Ex. iii. 22, xii. 35, xxxi. 4, 5, xxxii. 2, 4, 20, 24, xxxvii. 17, 24, xxxviii. 4, 8, 24, 25, xxxix. 6, 39; Neh. iii. 8; Is. xliv. 12). Various processes of the goldsmiths' work (No. 1) are illustrated by Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 136, 152, 162).

After the conquest frequent notices are found both of moulded and wrought metal, including soldering, which last had long been known in Egypt; but the Phœnicians appear to have possessed greater skill than the Jews in these arts, at least in Solomon's time (Judg. viii. 24, 27, xvii. 4; 1 K. vii. 13, 45, 46; Is. xli. 7; Wisd. xv. 4; also of setting precious stones in gold (Ex. xxxix. 3, 6, &c.; Beckmann, Hist. of Inv. ii. 414; Ges. p. 1229).

Among the tools of the smith are mentioned — tongs (מֶלְקָחַיִם, λαβίς, forceps, Ges. p. 761, Is. vi. 6), hammer (פַּטִּישׁ, σφυρά, malleus, Ges. p. 1101), anvil (פָּעַם, Ges. p. 1118), bellows (כִּיר, φυσητήρ, sufflatorium, Ges. p. 896; Is.

In N. T. Alexander "the coppersmith" (ὁ χαλκεύς) of Ephesus is mentioned, where also was carried on that trade in "silver shrines" (ναοὶ ἀργυροῖ), which was represented by Demetrius the silversmith (ἀργυροκόπος) as being in danger from the spread of Christianity (Acts xix. 24, 28; 2 Tim. iv. 14). [See also SMITH.]

2. The work of the carpenter (חָרַשׁ עֵצִים, τέκτων, artifex lignarius) is often mentioned in Scripture (e. g. Gen. vi. 14; Ex. xxxvii.; Is. xliv. 13). In the palace built by David for himself the workmen employed were chiefly Phœnicians sent by Hiram (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chr. xiv. 1), as most probably were those, or at least the principal of those who were employed by Solomon in his works (1 K. v. 6). But in the repairs of the Temple, executed under Joash king of Judah, and also in the rebuilding under Zerubbabel, no mention is made of foreign workmen, though in the latter case the timber is expressly said to have been brought by sea to Joppa by Zidonians (2 K. xii. 11; 2 Chr. xxiv. 12; Ezra iii. 7). That the Jewish carpenters must have been able to carve with some skill is evident from Is. xli. 7. xliv. 13, in which last passage some of the implements used in the trade are mentioned: the rule (עֲיָרָד, μέτρον, norma, possibly a chalk pencil, Ges. p. 1337), measuring-line (קָו, Ges. p. 1201), compass (מְחוּגָה, παραγραφίς, circinus, Ges. p. 450), plane, or smoothing instrument (מַקְצוּעָה, κόλλα, runcina, Ges. pp. 1228, 1338), axe (בַּרְזֶן, Ges. p. 302, or קַרְדֹּם, Ges. p. 1236, ἀξίνη, securis).

The process of the work, and the tools used by Egyptian carpenters, and also coopers and wheelwrights, are displayed in Egyptian monuments and relics; the former, including dovetailing, veneering, drilling, glueing, varnishing, and inlaying, may be seen in Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 111–119. Of the latter many specimens, including saws, hatchets, knives, awls, nails, a hone, and a drill, also turned objects in bone, exist in the British Museum, 1st Egyptian room, case 42–43, Nos. 6046–6188. See also Wilkinson, ii. p. 113, fig. 395.

In N. T. the occupation of a carpenter (τέκτων) is mentioned in connection with Joseph the husband of the Virgin Mary, and ascribed to our Lord himself by way of reproach (Mark vi. 3; Matt. xiii. 55; and Just. Mart. Dial. c. Tryph. c. 88).

3. The masons (גֹּדְרִים, wall-builders, Ges. p. 269) employed by David and Solomon, at least the chief of them, were Phœnicians, as is implied also in the word גִּבְלִים, men of Gebal, Jebail, Byblus (Ges. p. 258; 1 K. v. 18; Ez. xxvii. 9; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 179). Among their implements are mentioned the saw (מַגֵּרָה, πρίων), the plumb-line (אֲבָנָה, Ges. p. 125), the measuring-reed (קָנֶה, κάλαμος, calamus, Ges. p. 1221). Some of these, and also the chisel and mallet, are represented on Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 313, 314), or preserved in the British Museum (1st Egyptian room, Nos. 6114, 6038) The large stones used in Solomon's Temple are said by Josephus to have been fitted together exactly without either mortar or cramps, but the foundation stones to have been fastened with lead (Joseph. Ant viii. 3, § 2; xv. 11, § 3). For ordinary building mortar, יְשִׂיד (Ges. p. 1323) was used; sometimes, perhaps, bitumen, as was the case at Babylon (Gen. xi. 3). The lime, clay, and straw of which mortar is generally composed in the East, requires to be very carefully mixed and united so as to resist wet (Lane, Mod. Egypt. i. 27; Shaw, Trav. p. 206). pered mortar" of Ezekiel (xiii 10) was perhaps a sort of coat wall of mud or clay without lime (טָפַל, Ges. p. 1516) which would give way under heavy rain. The use of white-wash on tombs is remarked by our Lord (Matt. xxiii. 27. See also Mishna, Mauser Sheni, v. 1). Houses infected with leprosy were required by the Law to be re-plastered (Lev. xiv. 40–45).

4. Akin to the craft of the carpenter is that of ship and boat-building, which must have been exercised to some extent for the fishing-vessels on the lake of Gennesaret (Matt. viii. 23, ix. 1; John xxi. 3, 8). Solomon built, at Ezion-Geber, ships for his foreign trade, which were manned by Phœnician crews, an experiment which Jehoshaphat endeavored in vain to renew (1 K. ix. 26, 27, xxii. 48; 2 Chr. xx. 36, 37).

5. The perfumes used in the religious services, and in later times in the funeral rites of monarchs, imply knowledge and practice in the art of the "apothecaries" (רֹקְחִים, μυρεψοί, pigmentarii), who appear to have formed a guild or association (Ex. xxx. 25, 35; Neh. iii. 8; 2 Chr. xvi. 14; Eccles. vii. 1, x. 1; Ecclus. xxxviii. 8).

6. The arts of spinning and weaving both wool and linen were carried on in early times, as they are still usually among the Bedouins, by women. The women spun and wove goat's hair and flax for the Tabernacle, as in later times their skill was employed in like manner for idolatrous purposes. One of the excellences attributed to the good house-wife is her skill and industry in these arts (Ex. xxxv. 25, 26; Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11; 2 K. xxiii. 7; Ez. xvi. 16; Prov. xxxi. 13, 24; Burckhardt, Notes on Bed. i. 65; comp. Hom. Il. i. 123; Od. i. 356, ii. 104). The loom, with its beam (מָנוֹר, μεσάντιον, liciatorium, 1 Sam. xvii. 7; Ges. p. 883), pin, (יָתֵד, πάσσαλος, clavus, Judg. xvi. 14; Ges. p. 643), and shuttle (אֶרֶג, δρομεύς, Job vii. 6; Ges. p. 146) was, perhaps, introduced later, but as early as David's time (1 Sam. xvii. 7), and worked by men, as was the case in Egypt, contrary to the practice of other nations. This trade also appears to have been practiced hereditarily (1 Chr. iv. 21; Herod. ii. 35; Soph. Œd. Col. 339).

Together with weaving we read also of embroidery, in which gold and silver threads were interwoven with the body of the stuff, sometimes in figure patterns, or with precious stones set in the needlework (Ex. xxvi. 1, xxviii. 4, xxxix. 6–13).

7. Besides these arts, those of dyeing and of dressing cloth were practiced in Palestine, and those also of tanning and dressing leather (Josh. ii. 15–18; 2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4; Acts ix. 43; Mishn. Megill. iii. 2). Shoe-makers, barbers, and tailors are mentioned in the Mishna (Pesach. iv. 6): the barber (גַּלָּב, κουρεύς, Ges. p. 283), or his occupation, by Ezekiel (v. 1; Lev. xiv. 8; Num. vi. 5; Josephus, Ant. xvi. 11, § 5; B. J. i. 27, § 5; Mishn. Shabb. i. 2), and the tailor (i. 3), plasterers, glaziers, and glass vessels, painters, and goldworkers are mentioned in Mishn. (Chel. viii. 9, xxix. 3, 4, xxx. 1).

Tent-makers (σκηνοποιοί) are noticed in the Acts (xviii. 3), and frequent allusion is made to the trade of the potters.

8. Bakers (אֹפִים, Ges. p. 136) are noticed in Scripture as carrying on their trade (Jer. xxxvii. 21; Hos. vii. 4; Mishn. Chel. xv. 2); and the well-known valley Tyropœon probably derived its name from the occupation of the cheese-makers, its inhabitants (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, 1). Butchers, not Jewish, are spoken of 1 Cor. x. 25.

Trade in all its branches was much developed after the Captivity; and for a father to teach his son a trade was reckoned not only honorable but indispensable (Mishn. Pirke Ab. ii. 2; Kiddush. iv. 14). Some trades, however, were regarded as less honorable (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 84).

Some, if not all trades, had special localities, as was the case formerly in European, and is now in Eastern cities (Jer. xxxvii. 21; 1 Cor. x. 25; Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 1, and 8, § 1; Mishn. Becor. v. 1; Russell, Aleppo, i. 20; Chardin, Voyages, vii. 274, 394; Lane, Mod. Egyp. ii. 145).

One feature, distinguishing Jewish from other workmen, deserves peculiar notice, namely, that they were not slaves, nor were their trades necessarily hereditary, as was and is so often the case among other, especially heathen nations (Jahn, Bibl. Antiq. c. v. § 81–84; Saalschütz, Hebr. Arch. c. 14; Winer, s. v. Handwerke). [Musical Instruments; Pottery; Glass; Leather.]

HANDKERCHIEF, NAPKIN, APRON. The two former of these terms, as used in the A. V. = σουδάριον, the latter = σιμικίνθιον: they are classed together, inasmuch as they refer to objects of a very similar character. Both words are of Latin origin: σουδάριον = sudarium from sudo, "to sweat;" the Lutheran translation preserves the reference to its etymology in its rendering, schweisstuch; σιμικίνθιον = semicinctium, i. e. "a half girdle." Neither is much used by classical writers; the sudarium is referred to as used for wiping the face ("candido frontem sudario tergeret," Quintil. vi. 3), or hands ("sudario manus tergens, quod in collo habebat," Petron. in fragm. Tragur. c. 67); and also as worn over the face for the purpose of concealment (Sueton. in Neron. c. 48); the word was introduced by the Romans into Palestine, where it was adopted by the Jews, in the form סודרא as = מִטְפַּחַת, in Ruth iii. 15. The sudarium is noticed in the N. T. as a wrapper to fold up money (Luke xix. 20) — as a cloth bound about the head of a corpse (John xi. 44, xx. 7), being probably brought from the crown of the head under the chin — and lastly as an article of dress that could be easily removed (Acts xix. 12), probably a handkerchief worn on the head like the keffieh of the Bedouins. The semicinctium is noticed by Martial xiv. Epigr. 153, and by Petron. in Satyr. c. 94. The distinction between the cinctus and the semicinctium consisted in its width (Isidor. Orig. xix. 33): with regard to the character of the σιμικίνθιον, the only inference from the passage in which it occurs (Acts xix. 12) is that it was easily removed from the person, and probably was worn next to the skin. According to Suidas the distinction between the sudarium and the semicinctium was very small, for he explains the latter by the former, σιμικίνθιον· φακιόλιον ἢ σουδάριον, the φακιόλιον being a species of head-dress: Hesychius likewise explains σιμικίνθιον by φακιόλιον. According to the scholiast (in Cod. Steph.), as quoted by Schleusner (Lex. s. v. σουδάριον), the distinction between the two terms is that the sudarium was worn on the head, and the semicinctium used as a handkerchief. The difference was probably not in the shape, but in the use of the article; we may conceive them to have been bands of linen of greater or less size, which might be adapted to many purposes, like the article now called lungi among the Arabs, which is applied sometimes as a girdle, at other times as a turban (Wellsted, Travels, i. 321).

 HAND-STAVE. [Staff.]

HA'NES (חָנֵס: Hanes), a place in Egypt only mentioned in Is. xxx. 4: "For his princes were at Zoan, and his messengers came to Hanes." The LXX. has "Ὅτι εἰσὶν ἐν Τάνει ἀρχηγοὶ ἄγγελοι πονηροί, evidently following an entirely different reading. Hanes has been supposed by Vitringa, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius, to be the same as Heracleopolis Magna in the Heptanomis, Copt. ϩⲛⲉⲥ, ϩⲛⲉⲥ, ϩⲛⲏⲥ. This identification depends wholly upon the similarity of the two names: a consideration of the sense of the passage in which Hanes occurs shows its great improbability. The prophecy is a reproof of the Jews for trusting in Egypt; and according to the Masoretic text, mention is made of an embassy, perhaps from Hoshea, or else from Ahaz, or possibly Hezekiah, to a Pharaoh. As the king whose assistance is asked is called Pharaoh, he is probably not an Ethiopian of the XXVth dynasty, for the kings of that line are mentioned by name — So, Tirhakah — but a sovereign of the XXIIId dynasty, which, according to Manetho, was of Tanite kings. It is supposed that the last king of the latter dynasty, Manetho's Zet, is the Sethos of Herodotus, the king in whose time Sennacherib's army perished, and who appears to have been mentioned under the title of Pharaoh by Rabshakeh (Is. xxxvi. 6; 2 K. xviii. 21), though it is just possible that Tirhakah may have been intended. If the reference be to an embassy to Zet, Zoan was probably his capital, and in any case then the most important city of the eastern part of Lower Egypt. Hanes was most probably in its neighborhood; and are disposed to think that the Chald. Paraphr. is right in identifying it with תַּחְפַּנְחֵס, or תְּחַפְּנְחֵס, once written, if the Kethibh be correct, in the form תַּחְפַּנֵּס, Daphnæ, a fortified town on the eastern frontier. [Tahpanhes.] Gesenius remarks, as a kind of apology for the identification of Hanes with Heracleopolis Magna, that the latter was formerly a royal city. It is true that in Manetho's list the IXth and Xth dynasties are said to have been of Heracleopolite kings; but it has been lately suggested, on strong grounds, by Sir Gardner Wilkinson, that this is a mistake in the case of the IXth dynasty for Hermonthites (Herod. ed. Rawlinson, vol. ii. p. 348). If this supposition be correct as to the IXth dynasty, it must also be so as to the Xth; but the circumstance whether Heracleopolis was a royal city or not, a thousand years before Isaiah's time, is obviously of no consequence here. * HANGING. [Punishment.]

HANGING; HANGINGS. These terms represent both different words in the original, and different articles in the furniture of the Temple.

(1.) The "hanging" (מָסָךְ: ἐπίσπαστρον: tentorium) was a curtain or "covering" (as the word radically means) to close an entrance; one was placed before the door of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 36, 37, xxxix. 38); it was made of variegated stuff wrought with needlework, and was hung on five pillars of acacia wood; another was placed before the entrance of the court (Ex. xxvii. 16, xxxviii. 18; Num. iv. 26); the term is also applied to the vail that concealed the Holy of Holies, in the full expression "vail of the covering" (Ex. xxxv. 12, xxxix. 34, xl. 21; Num. iv. 5). [Curtains, 2.]

(2.) The "hangings" (קְלָעִים: ἱστία: tentoria) were used for covering the walls of the court of the Tabernacle, just as tapestry was in modern times (Ex. xxvii. 9, xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 9; Num. iii. 26, iv. 26). The rendering in the LXX. implies that they were made of the same substance as the sails of a ship, i. e. (as explained by Rashi) "meshy, not woven:" this opinion is, however, incorrect, as the material of which they were constructed was "fine twined linen." The hangings were carried only five cubits high, or half the height of the walls of the court (Ex. xxvii. 18; comp. xxvi. 16). [Tabernacle.]

In 2 K. xxiii. 7, the term bottim, בָּתִּים, strictly "houses," A. V. "hangings," is probably intended to describe tents used as portable sanctuaries. W. L. B.

HAN'IEL (חֲנִיאֵל: Ἀνιήλ: Haniel), i. e. Channiel [grace of God]: Ἀνιήλ [Vat. -νει-]: Haniel), one of the sons of Ulla, a chief prince, and a choice hero in the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 39). [Hanniel.]

HAN'NAH (חַנָּה, grace, or prayer: Ἄννα: Anna), one of the wives of Elkanah, and mother of Samuel (1 Sam. i. ii.); a prophetess of considerable repute, though her claim to that title is based upon one production only, namely, the hymn of thanksgiving for the birth of her son. This hymn is in the highest order of prophetic poetry; its resemblance to that of the Virgin Mary (comp. 1 Sam. ii. 1–10 with Luke i. 46–55; see also Ps. cxiii., has been noticed by the commentators; and it is specially remarkable as containing the first designation of the Messiah under that name. In the Targum it has been subjected to a process of magniloquent dilution, for which it would be difficult to find a parallel even in the pompous vagaries of that paraphrase (Eichhorn, Einl. ii. p. 68) [Samuel.] T. E. B.

HAN'NATHON (חַנָּתֹן [graceful, or graciously disposed]: Ἀμώθ; Alex. Ἐννωθώθ: Hanathon), one of the cities of Zebulun, a point apparently on the northern boundary (Josh. xix. 14) It has not yet been identified. G.

HAN'NIEL (חֲנִיאֵל: Ἀνιήλ: Hanniel), son of Ephod; as prince (Nasi) of Manasseh he assisted in the division of the Promised Land (Num. xxxiv. 23). The name is the same as Haniel.

HA'NOCH (חֲנוֹךְ [see on Enoch]: Ἐνώχ: Henoch). 1. The third in order of the children of Midian, and therefore descended from Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 4). In the parallel list of 1 Chr. i. 33, the name is given in the A. V. as Henoch.

2. (חֲנוֹךְ: Ἐνώχ: Henoch), eldest son of Reuben (Gen. xlvi. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 5; 1 Chr. v. 3), and founder of the family of HA'NOCHITES, THE (הַחֲנֹכִי: δῆμος τοῦ Ἐνώχ: familia Henochitarum), Num. xxvi. 5.

* The Hebrew of Hanoch is the same as that of Enoch, and belongs to two other persons [Enoch]. There is no good reason for this twofold orthography. H.

HA'NUN (חָנוּן [gracious]: Ἀννών, [Ἀνάν, etc.:] Hanon). 1. Son of Nahash (2 Sam. x. 1, 2; 1 Chr. xix. 1, 2), king of Ammon about B. C. 1037, who dishonored the ambassadors of David (2 Sam. x. 4), and involved the Ammonites in a disastrous war (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chr. xix. 6). W. T. B.

2. [Ἀνούν: Hanun.] A man who, with the people of Zanoah, repaired the ravine-gate in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 13).

3. [Ἀνώμ; Vat. FA. Ανουμ; Comp. Ἀνών: Hanun.] A man specified as "the 6th son of Zalaph," who also assisted in the repair of the wall, apparently on the east side (Neh. iii. 30).

* HAPHARA'IM, so A. V. ed. 1611, and other early editions, also the Bishops' Bible; in many later editions, less correctly, HAPHRA'IM (חַפְרַיִם, i. e. Chapharaim: Ἀγίν; [Vat. Αγειν;] Alex. Αφεραειμ: Hapharaim), a city of Issachar, mentioned next to Shunem (Josh. xix. 19). The name possibly signifies "two pits." In the Onomasticon ("Aphraim") it is spoken as still known under the name of Affarea (Eus. Ἀφραίμ), and as standing six miles north of Legio. About that distance northeast of Lejjun, and two miles west of Solam (the ancient Shunem), stands the village of el-'Afûleh (العفولة), which may be the representative of Chapharaim, the guttural Ain having taken the place of the Hebrew Cheth. G.

HA'RA (הָרָא [mountain-land, Ges.]: Ara) which appears only in 1 Chr. v. 26, and even there a omitted by the LXX., is either a place utterly unknown, or it must be regarded as identical with Haran or Charran (חָרָן), the Mesopotamian city to which Abraham came from Ur. The names in Chronicles often vary from those elsewhere used in Scripture, being later forms; and Hara would nearly correspond to Carrhæ, which we know from Strabo and Ptolemy to have been the appellation by which Haran was known to the Greeks. We may assume then the author of Chronicles to mean, that a portion of the Israelites carried off by Pul and Tiglath-Pileser were settled in Harran on the Belik, while the greater number were conveyed to the Chubour. (Compare 1 Chr. v. 26 with 2 K. xvii. 6, xviii. 11, and xix. 12; and see articles on 'HARRAN and HABOR.) G. R.

HAR'ADAH (הַחֲרָדָה, with the article [the trembling]: Χαραδάθ: Arada), a desert station of the Israelites, Num. xxxiii. 24, 25; its position is uncertain. H. H.

HA'RAN. 1. (הָרָן [a strong one, Fürst: prob. montanus, mountaineer, Gesen.]: Ἀρράν; Jos. Ἀράνης: Aran). The third son of Terah, and therefore youngest brother of Abram (Gen. xi. 26). Three children are ascribed to him — Lot (27, 31), and two daughters, namely, Milcah, who married her uncle Nahor (29), and Iscah (29), of whom we merely possess her name, though by some (e. g. Josephus) she is held to be identical with Sarah. Haran was born in Ur of the Chaldees, and he died there while his father was still living (28). His sepulchre was still shown there when Josephus wrote his history (Ant. i. 6, § 5). The ancient Jewish tradition is that Haran was burnt in the furnace of Nimrod for his wavering conduct during the fiery trial of Abraham. (See the Targum Ps. Jonathan; Jerome's Quæst. in Genesim, and the notes thereto in the edit. of Migne.) This tradition seems to have originated in a translation of the word Ur, which in Hebrew signifies "fire." It will be observed that although this name and that of the country appear the same in the A. V., there is in the original a certain difference between them; the latter commencing with the harsh guttural Cheth.

2. (Δάν; Alex. Αραν: Aran.) A Gershonite Levite in the time of David, one of the family of Shimei (1 Chr. xxiii. 9). G.

HA'RAN (חָרָן, i. e. Charan: Ἀράμ; [Vat.] Alex. Αρραν: Haran), a son of the great Caleb by his concubine Ephah (1 Chr. ii. 46). He himself had a son named GAZEZ.

HA'RAN (חָרָן [scorched, arid, Gesen.; a noble, freeman, Fürst]: Χαρράν; Strab., Ptol. Κάρραι: Haran), is the name of the place whither Abraham migrated with his family from Ur of the Chaldees, and where the descendants of his brother Nahor established themselves. Haran is therefore called "the city of Nahor" (comp. Gen. xxiv. 10 with xxvii. 43). It is said to be in Mesopotamia Gen. xxiv. 10), or more definitely, in Padan-Aram (xxv. 20), which is the "cultivated district at the foot of the hills" (Stanley's S. & P., p. 129 note), a name well applying to the beautiful stretch of country which lies below Mount Masius between the Khabour and the Euphrates. [PADAN-ARAM.] Here, about midway in this district, is a town still called Harrân, which really seems never to have changed its appellation, and beyond any reasonable doubt is the Haran or Charran of Scripture (Bochart's Phaleg, i. 14; Ewald's Geschichte, i. 384). It is remarkable that the people of Harrân retained to a late time the Chaldæan language and the worship of Chaldæan deities (Asseman. Bibl. Or. i. 327; Chwolsohn's Ssubier und der Ssabismus, ii. 39). Harrân lies upon the Belik (ancient Bilichus), a small affluent of the Euphrates, which falls into it nearly in long. 39°. It was famous among the Romans for being near the scene of the defeat of Crassus (Plin. H. N. v. 24). About the time of the Christian era it appears to have been included in the kingdom of Edessa (Mos. Chor. ii. 32), which was ruled by Agbarus. Afterwards it passed with that kingdom under the dominion of the Romans, and appears as a Roman city in the wars of Caracalla (Mos. Chor. ii. 72) and Julian (Jo. Malal. p. 329). It is now a small village inhabited by a few families of Arabs.

In the A. V. of the New Test. the name follows the Greek form, and is given as CHARRAN (Acts vii. 2, 4. G. R.

* A controversy has recently sprung up respecting the situation of the patriarchal Haran which requires notice here. Within a few years a little village known as Hârân-el-Awamâd has been discovered, about four hours east of Damascus, on the borders of the lake into which the Barada (Abana) flows. Dr. Beke (Origines Biblicæ, Lond. 1834) had thrown out the idea that the Scripture Haran was not, as generally supposed, in Mesopotamia, but must have been near Damascus. He now maintains that this Hârân, so unexpectedly brought to light between "Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus," must be the identical Haran (or Charran) of the Bible in Aram-naharaim, i. e. Aram of the two rivers. In 1861 Dr. Beke made a journey to Palestine, with special reference to this question. The argument on which he mainly relies is the fact that Laban, in his pursuit of Jacob, appears to have travelled from Haran to Gilead on the east of the Jordan in 7 days (Gen. xxxi. 23), whereas the actual distance of Haran from Gilead is about 300 geographical miles, and would make in that country an ordinary journey of 15 or 20 days. An Arab tribe on its ordinary migrations moves from 12 to 15 miles a day, and a caravan from 20 to 23 miles a day. On the other hand, it is not a little remarkable that Dr. Beke himself went over the ground, step by step, between Hârân-el-Awamâd and Gilead, and found the time to be five days, hence very nearly the time that Laban was on the way before he overtook Jacob in Gilead.

It must be owned that this rapidity of Laban's pursuit of Jacob from Haran is not a slight difficulty. For its removal we can only resort to certain suppositions in the case, which of course we are at liberty to make if the Scripture text does not exclude them, and if they are justified by the known customs of the country and the age.

First, we may assume that Laban, taking with him only some of his sons or other near kinsmen ("his brothers," see Gen. xxxi. 23), was unincumbered with baggage or women and children, and hence moved with all the despatch of which eastern travelling admits. One party was fleeing and the other pursuing. The chase was a close one, as all the language indicates. Jacob complains that Laban had "followed hotly" after him. The swift dromedaries would be brought into requisition if the ordinary camels were not swift enough. The speed of these animals is such, says

Sir Henry Rawlinson (who has seen so much of the East), that they "consume but 8 days in crossing the desert from Damascus to Baghdad, a distance of nearly 500 miles." He thinks it unquestionable that Laban could have "traversed the entire distance from Haran to Gilead in 7 days" (Athenæum, April 19, 1862). For examples of the capacity of such camels for making long and rapid journeys, see the Penny Cyclopædia, vi. 191.

Secondly, the expression (which is entirely correct for the Hebrew) that Laban's journey before coming up with Jacob was a "seven days' journey," is indefinite, and may include 8 or 9 days as well as 7. "Seven," as Gesenius states, "is a round number, and stands in the Hebrew for any number less than 10." A week's time, in this wider sense, would bring the distance still more easily within an expeditious traveller's reach.

But whatever may be thought of the possibility of Laban's making such a journey in such time, the difficulty in the case of Jacob would seem to be still greater; since, accompanied as he was with flocks and herds and women and children, he must have travelled much more slowly. To this it may be replied that the narrative does not restrict us to the three days which passed before Laban became aware of Jacob's departure added to the seven days which passed before he overtook Jacob in Gilead. It is very possible that Laban, on hearing so suddenly that Jacob had fled, was not in a situation to follow at once, but had preparations to make which would consume three or four days more; so as in reality to give Jacob the advantage of five or six days before he finally started in pursuit. It is altogether probable too that the wary Jacob adopted measures before setting out which would greatly accelerate his flight. (See Gen. xxxi. 20.) Mr. Porter, who is so familiar with Eastern life, has drawn out this suggestion in a form that appears not unreasonable. Jacob could quietly move his flocks down to the banks of the Euphrates and send them across the river, without exciting suspicion; since then, as now, the flocks of the great proprietors roamed over a wide region (Gen. xxxi. 1–3). In like manner before starting himself he could have sent his wives and children across the river, and hurried them forward with all the despatch which at this day characterizes an Arab tribe fleeing before an enemy (vers. 17, 18). All this might take place before Laban was aware of Jacob's purpose; and they were then at least 3 days' distant from each other (vers. 19–22). The intervening region between the Euphrates and Gilead, a distance of 250 miles, is a vast plain, with only one ridge of hills; and thus Jacob "could march forward straight as an arrow." If, as supposed, his flocks and family were already in advance, he could travel for the first two or three days at a very rapid pace. "Now, I maintain" (says this writer), "that any of the tribes of the desert would at this moment, under similar circumstances, accomplish the distance in 10 days, which is the shortest period we can, according to the Scripture account, assign to the journey (vers. 22, 23). We must not judge of the capabilities of Arab women and children, flocks and herds, according to our Western ideas and experience." (See Athenæum, May 24, 1862.)

Dr. Beke's other incidental confirmations of his theory are less important. It is urged that unless Abraham was living near Damascus, he could not have had a servant in his household who was called "Eliezer of Damascus" (Gen. xv. 2). The answer to this is that the servant himself may possibly have been born there and have wandered to the further East before Abraham's migration: or more probably, may have sprung from a family that belonged originally to Damascus. Mr. Porter says "I knew well in Damascus two men, one called Ibrahim el-Haleby, 'Abraham of Aleppo'; and the other Elias el-Akkawy, 'Elias of Akka,' neither of whom had ever been in the town whose name he bore. Their ancestors had come from those towns: and that is all such expressions usually signify in the East" (Athenæum, December 7, 1861.)

The coincidence of the name proves nothing as to the identification in question. The name (if it be Arabic) means 'arid,' 'scorched,' and refers no doubt to the Syrian Hârân as being on the immediate confines of the desert. The affix Awamâd, "columns," comes from five Ionic pillars, forty feet high, which appear among the mud-houses of the village. (See Porter's Handb. of Syr. and Pal. ii. 497.)

Again, the inference from Acts vii. 2, that Stephen opposes Charran to Mesopotamia in such a way as to imply that Charran lay outside the latter, is unnecessary, to say the least; for he may mean equally as well that Abraham was called twice in Mesopotamia, i. e. not only in the part of that province where Charran was known to be, but still earlier in the more northern part of it known as "the land of the Chaldees," the original home and seat of the Abrahamic race. Not only so, but the latter must be Stephen's meaning, unless he differed from the Jews of his time, since both Philo (de Abr. ii. pp. 11, 14, ed. Mang.) and Josephus (Ant. i. 7, § 1) relate that Abraham was called thus twice in the land of his nativity and kindred, and in this view they follow the manifest implication of the O. T., as we see from Gen. xv. 7 and Neh. ix. 7 (comp. Gen. xii. 1–4).

Dr. Beke found "flocks of sheep, and maidens drawing water," at Hârân-el-Awamûd, and felt that he saw the Scripture scene of Jacob's arrival, and of the presence of Rachel with "her father's sheep which she kept," reënacted before his eyes. But that is an occurrence so common in eastern villages at the present day, especially along the skirts of the desert, that it can hardly be said to distinguish one place from another.

But the reasons for the traditional opinion entirely outweigh those against it. (1.) The city of Nahor or Haran (Gen. xxiv. 10) is certainly in Aram-naharaim, i. e. "Syria of the two rivers" (in the A. V. "Mesopotamia"). This expression occurs also in Deut. xxiii. 4 and Judg. iii. 8, and implies a historic notoriety which answers perfectly to the Tigris and Euphrates, but not to rivers of such limited local importance as the Abana and Pharpar, streams of Damascus. (2.) Aram-Dammesek (the "Syria Damascena" of Pliny) is the appellation of Southern Syria (see 2 Sam. viii. 6 and Is. vii. 8), and is a different region from Aram-naharaim where Haran was. (3.) Jacob in going to Haran went to "the land of the people of the East" (Gen. xxix. 1), which is not appropriate to so near a region as that of Damascus, and one almost north of Palestine, but is so to that beyond the Euphrates. In accordance with this, Balaam, who came from Aram-naharaim, speaks of himself as having been brought "out of the mountains of the East" (Deut. xxiii. 5; Num. xxiii. 7). (4.) The river which Jacob crossed in his flight from Laban is termed הַנָּהָר, i. e. "the river," as the Euphrates is so often termed by way of eminence (Gen. xxxi. 21; Ex. xxiii. 33; Josh. xxiv. 2, 3, &c.). (5.) The ancient versions (the Targums, the Syriac and the Arabic Pentateuch) actually insert Euphrates in Gen. xxxi. 21, and thus show how familiar the authors were with the peculiar Hebrew mode of designating that river. (6.) The places associated with Haran, as Gozan, Rezeph, Eden (2 Kings xix. 12; Is. xxxvi. 12), and Canneh (Ez. xxvii. 23), point to the region of the Euphrates as the seat of this entire group of cities. (7.) Incidental allusions (as in Gen. xxiv. 4–8; xxviii. 20, 21) show that Haran was very far distant from Canaan, whereas Damascus is upon its very border. So, too, Josephus (Ant. i. 16, § 1) not only places Haran in Mesopotamia, but (referring to Abraham's sending Eliezer to procure a wife for Isaac) sets forth its great distance from Canaan, as making the journey thither formidable and tedious in the highest degree. (8.) The living traditions connect Abraham's life in Haran with Mesopotamia and not with Damascus. Ainsworth, who visited Hárán, says that the people there preserve the memory of the patriarch's history; they tell where he encamped, where he crossed the Euphrates, and how he and his herds found a resting-place at Berœa, now Aleppo (Researches in Assyria, etc., p. 152 f.). HA'RARITE, THE (הַהֲרָרִי, perhaps = the mountaineer, Ges. Thes. p. 392: de Arari, or Orori, Ararites), the designation of three men connected with David's guard.

1. (ὁ Ἀρουχαῖος: [de Arari.]) "AGEE, a Hararite" (there is no article here in the Hebrew), father of Shammah, the third of the three chiefs of the heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 11). In the parallel passage, 1 Chr. xi., the name of this warrior is entirely omitted.

2. (Ἀρωδίτης; [Vat. Alex. -δει-: de Orori.]) "SHAMMAH the Hararite" is named as one of the thirty in 2 Sam. xxiii. 33. In 1 Chr. xi. 34 [Αραρι; Vat.[1] Αραχει, 2. m. Αραρει: Ararites] the name is altered to Shage. Kennicott's conclusion, from a minute investigation, is that the passage should stand in both, "Jonathan son of Shammah the Hararite" — Shammah being identical with Shimei, David's brother.

3. (Σαραυρίτης, ὁ Ἀραρί [Vat. -ρει-, -ρει: Arorites, Ararites.]) "SHARAR (2 Sam. xxiii. 33) or SACAR (1 Chr. xi. 35) the Hararite" was the father of Ahiam, another member of the guard. Kennicott inclines to take Sacar as the correct name.

HARBO'NA (חַרְבוֹנָא [prob. Pers. ass-driver, Ges.]: Θάρρα, Alex. Ὀαρεβωα; [Comp. Χαρβωνά:] Harbona), the third of the seven chamberlains, or eunuchs, who served king Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10), and who suggested Haman's being hung on his own gallows (vii. 9). In the latter passage the name is

HARBO'NAH (חַרְבוֹנָה [see above]: Βουγαθάν; [FA.[1] Βουγαθα: Comp. Χαρβωνά:] Harbona). [Written thus in Esth. vii. 9, but the same name as the foregoing. — H.]

HARE (אַרְנֶבֶת, arnebeth: δασύπους: lepus) occurs only in Lev. xi. 6 and Deut. xiv. 7, amongst the animals disallowed as food by the Mosaic law. There is no doubt at all that arnebeth denotes a "hare," and in all probability the species Lepus Sinaiticus, which Ehrenberg and Hemprich (Symb Phys.) mention as occurring in the valleys of Arabia Petræa and Mount Sinai, and L. Syriacus, which the same authors state is found in the Lebanon, are those which were best known to the ancient Hebrews; though there are other kinds of Leporidæ, as the L. Ægyptius and the L. Æthiopicus, if a distinct species from L. Sinaiticus, which are found in the Bible lands. The hare is at this day called arneb (أَرْنَب) by the Arabs in Palestine and Syria (see Russell's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, ii 154, 2d ed.). The δασύπους, i. e. "rough foot," is identical with λαγώς, and is the term which Aristotle generally applies to the hare: indeed, he only uses the latter word once in his History of Animals (viii. 27, § 4). We are of opinion, as we have elsewhere stated [CONEY], that the rabbit (L. cuniculus) was unknown to the ancient Hebrews, at any rate in its wild state; nor does it appear to be at present known in Syria or Palestine as a native. It is doubtful whether Aristotle was acquainted with the rabbit, as he never alludes to any burrowing λαγώς or δασύπους; but, on the other hand, see the passage in vi. 28, § 3, where the young of the δασύπους are said to be "born blind," which will apply to the rabbit alone. Pliny (N. H. viii. 55), expressly notices rabbits (cuniculi), which occur in such numbers in the Balearic Islands as to destroy the harvests He also notices the practice of ferreting these animals, and thus driving them out of their burrows. In confirmation of Pliny's remarks, we may observe that there is a small island of the Balearic group called Conejera, i. e. in Spanish a "rabbit-warren," which at this day is abundantly stocked with these animals. The hare was erroneously thought by the ancient Jews to have chewed the cud, who were no doubt misled, as in the case of the shâphân (Hyrax), by the habit these animals have of moving the jaw about.

Hare of Mount Sinai.

Hare of Mount Lebanon.

"Hares are so plentiful in the environs of Aleppo," says Dr. Russell (p. 158), "that it was no uncommon thing to see the gentlemen who went out a sporting twice a week return with four or five brace hung in triumph at the girths of the servants' horses." The Turks and the natives, he adds, do not eat the hare; but the Arabs, who have a peculiar mode of dressing it, are fond of its flesh. Hares are hunted in Syria with greyhound and falcon.

HAR'EL (with the def. art. הָאֲרִאֵל: τὸ ἀριήλ: Ariel). In the margin of Ez. xliii. 15 the word rendered "altar" in the text is given "Harel, i. e. the mountain of God." The LXX., Vulg., and Arab. evidently regarded it as the same with "Ariel" in the same verse. Our translators followed the Targum of Jonathan in translating it "altar." Junius explains it of the ἐσχάρα or hearth of the altar of burnt offering, covered by the network on which the sacrifices were placed over the burning wood. This explanation Gesenius adopts, and brings forward as a parallel the Arab. أُرَيْل, ireh, "a hearth or fireplace," akin to the Heb. אוּר, ûr, "light, flame." Fürst (Handw. s. v.) derives it from an unused root הָרָא, hârâ, "to glow, burn," with the termination -el; but the only authority for the root is its presumed existence in the word Harel. Ewald (Die Propheten des A. B. ii. 373) identifies Harel and Ariel, and refers them both to a root אָרָה, ârâh, akin to אוּר, ûr.

HA'REPH (חָרֵף) [plucking off]: Ἀρίμ; [Vat. Αρειμ;] Alex. Αρει; [Comp. Ἀρήφ:] Hariph), a name occurring in the genealogies of Judah, as a son of Caleb, and as "father of Beth-gader" (1 Chr. ii. 51, only). In the lists of Ezr. ii. and Neh. vii. the similar name HARIPH is found; but nothing appears to establish a connection between the two.

HA'RETH, THE FOREST OF (יַעַר חָרֶת: ἐν πόλει[a] in both MSS. — reading עִיר for יַעַר — Σαρίκ; [Vat. Σαρεικ;] Alex. Ἀριάθ; [Comp. Χαρήθ:] in saltum Haret), in which David took refuge, after, at the instigation of the prophet Gad, he had quitted the "hold" or fastness of the cave of Adullam — if indeed it was Adullam and not Mizpeh of Moab, which is not quite clear (1 Sam. xxii. 5). Nothing appears in the narrative by which the position of this forest, which has long since disappeared, can be ascertained, except the very general remark that it was in the "land of Judah," i. e. according to Josephus, the inheritance proper of that tribe, τὴν κληρουχίαν τῆς φυλῆς, as opposed to the "desert," τὴν ἐρημίαν, in which he had before been lurking (Ant. vi. 12, § 4). We might take it to be the "wood" in the "wilderness of Ziph" in which he was subsequently hidden (xxiii. 15, 19), but that the Hebrew term is different (choresh instead of yaar). In the Onomasticon, "Arith" is said to have then existed west of Jerusalem.

HARHA'IAH [3 syl.] (חַרְהָיָה [Jehovah is angry]: Ἀραχίας; [Vat. Alex. FA. omit:] Araïa). Uzziel son of Charhaiah, of the goldsmiths, assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 8). [Some MSS. read חַרְחָיָה = Jehovah is a protection, Fürst.]

HAR'HAS (חַרְחַס: Ἀράς; [Vat. Αραας:] Araas), an ancestor of Shallum the husband of Huldah, the prophetess in the time of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 14). In the parallel passage in Chronicles the name is given as HASRAH.

HAR'HUR (חַרְחוּר [root חָרַר, to burn, shine: hence distinction, Fürst: but Ges., inflammation]: Ἀρούρ; [in Neh., Vat. FA. Αρουμ:] Harhur). Bene-Charchur were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53). In the Apocryphal Esdras the name has become ASSUR, PHARACIM.

HA'RIM (חָרִם [flat-nosed]). 1. (Χαρίβ: [Comp.] Alex. Χαρίμ: Harim), a priest who had charge of the third division in the house of God (1 Chr. xxiv. 8).

2. (Ἡρέμ, Ἡράμ: in Neh. x. 5, Ἰράμ, Vat. Ειραμ:] Alex. Ἡρώμ: [Harim, Harem, Arem.]) Bene-Harim, probably descendants of the above, to the number of 1017, came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 39; Neh. vii. 42). [CARME.] The name, probably as representing the family, is mentioned amongst those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 5); and amongst the priests who had to put away their foreign wives were five of the sons of Harim (Ezr. x. 21). In the parallel to this latter passage in Esdras the name is given ANNAS.

3. (Ἀρέ; [Vat. Alex. FA[1] omit: Haram.]) It further occurs in a list of the families of priests "who went up with Zerubbabel and Jeshua," and of those who were their descendants in the next generation — in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 15). In the former list (xii. 3) the name is changed to REHUM (רחם to חרם) by a not unfrequent transposition of letters. [REHUM.]

4. [Ἡράμ, exc. Ezr. ii. 32, Rom. Ἡλάμ; Neh. x. 27, Ald. Alex. Ῥεούμ: Harim, Herem, Harem, Havan.] Another family of Bene-Harim [sons of H.], three hundred and twenty in number, came from the Captivity in the same caravan (Ezr. ii. 32; Neh. vii. 35). These were laymen, and seem to have taken their name from a place, at least the contiguous names in the list are certainly those of places. These also appear among those who had married foreign wives (Ezr. x. 31), as well as those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 27). [EANES.]

HA'RIPH (חָרִיף [autumnal rain, Ges.; but Fürst, one early-born, strong]: Ἀρίφ; [Vat. Αρει;]

[a] The same reading is found in Josephus (Ant. vi. 13, § 4). This is one of three instances in this chapter alone in which the reading of Josephus departs from the Hebrew text, and agrees with the LXX.

Alex Αρειμ, [Αριφ; FA. Αρειφ, Αρει] Hareph), a hundred and twelve of the Bene-Chariph [sons of C.] returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 24). The name occurs again among the "heads of the people" who sealed the covenant (x. 19 [20 in Hebr.]). In the lists of Ezra and Esdras, Hariph appears as JORAH[a] and AZEPHURITH respectively. An almost identical name, Hareph [חָרֵף, a plucking off], appears in the lists of Judah [1 Chr. ii. 51] as the father of Bethgader [comp. HARUPHITE].

HARLOT (זוֹנָה, אִשָּׁה זְנוּנִים, קְדֵשָׁה). That this condition of persons existed in the earliest states of society is clear from Gen. xxxviii. 15. So Rahab (Josh. ii. 1), who is said by the Chaldee paraph. (ad loc.), to have been an innkeeper,[b] but if there were such persons, considering what we know of Canaanitish morals (Lev. xviii. 27), we may conclude that they would, if women, have been of this class. The law forbids (xix. 29) the father's compelling his daughter to sin, but does not mention it as a voluntary mode of life on her part without his complicity. It could indeed hardly be so. The isolated act which is the subject of Deut. xxii. 28, 29, is not to the purpose. Male relatives[c] were probably allowed a practically unlimited discretion in punishing family dishonor incurred by their women's unchastity (Gen. xxxviii. 24). The provision of Lev. xxi. 9, regarding the priest's daughter, may have arisen from the fact of his home being less guarded owing to his absence when ministering, as well as from the scandal to sanctity so involved. Perhaps such abominations might, if not thus severely marked, lead the way to the excesses of Gentile ritualistic fornication, to which indeed, when so near the sanctuary, they might be viewed as approximating (Michaelis, Laws of Moses, art. 268). Yet it seems to be assumed that the harlot class would exist, and the prohibition of Deut. xxiii. 18, forbidding offerings from the wages of such sin, is perhaps due to the contagion of heathen example, in whose worship practices abounded which the Israelites were taught to abhor. The term קְדֵשָׁה (meaning properly "consecrated") points to one description of persons, and נָכְרִיָּה ("strange woman") to another, of whom this class mostly consisted. The first term refers to the impure worship of the Syrian[d] Astarte (Num. xxv. 1; comp. Herod. i. 199; Justin, xviii. 5; Strabo, viii. p. 378, xii. p. 559; Val. Max. ii. 6, 15; August. de Civ. Dei, iv. 4), whose votaries, as idolatry progressed, would be recruited from the daughters of Israel; hence the common mention of both these sins in the Prophets, the one indeed being a metaphor of the other (Is. i. 21, lvii. 8; Jer. ii. 20; comp. Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16; Jer. iii. 1, 2, 6; Ez. xvi. xxiii.; Hos. i. 2, ii. 4, 5, iv. 11, 13, 14, 15, v. 3). The latter class would grow up with the growth of great cities and of foreign intercourse, and hardly could enter into the view of the Mosaic institutes. As regards the fashions involved in the practice, similar outward marks seem to have attended its earliest forms to those which we trace in the classical writers, e. g. a distinctive dress and a seat by the way-side (Gen. xxxviii. 14; comp. Ez. xvi. 16, 25; Bar. vi. 43 [or Epist. of Jer. 43];[e] Petron. Arb. Sat. xvi.; Juv. vi. 118 foll.; Dougtæi Analect. Sacr. Exc. xxiv.). Public singing in the streets occurs also (Is. xxiii. 16; Ecclus. ix. 4). Those who thus published their infamy were of the worst repute, others had houses of resort, and both classes seem to have been known among the Jews (Prov. vii. 8–12, xxiii. 28; Ecclus. ix. 7, 8); the two women, 1 K. iii. 16, lived as Greek hetærae sometimes did, in a house together (Dict. Gr. and Rom. Ant. s. v. Hetæra). The baneful fascination ascribed to them in Prov. vii. 21–23 may be compared with what Chardin says of similar effects among the young nobility of Persia (Voyages en Perse, i. 163, ed. 1711), as also may Luke xv. 30, for the sums lavished on them (ib. 162). In earlier times the price of a kid is mentioned (Gen. xxxviii.), and great wealth doubtless sometimes accrued to them (Ez. xvi. 33, 39, xxiii. 26). But lust, as distinct from gain, appears as the inducement in Prov. vii. 14, 15 (see Dougtæi Anal. Sacr. ad loc.), where the victim is further allured by a promised sacrificial banquet (comp. Ter. Eun. iii. 3). The "harlots" are classed with "publicans," as those who lay under the ban of society in the N. T. (Matt. xxi. 32). No doubt they multiplied with the increase of polygamy, and consequently lowered the estimate of marriage. The corrupt practices imported by Gentile converts into the Church occasion most of the other passages in which allusions to the subject there occur, 1 Cor. v. 1, 9, 11; 2 Cor. xii. 21; 1 Thess. iv. 3; 1 Tim. i. 10. The decree, Acts xv. 29, has occasioned doubts as to the meaning of πορνεία there, chiefly from its context, which may be seen discussed at length in Deyling's Observ. Sacr. ii. 470, foll.; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. i. 468; Spencer and Hammond, ad loc. The simplest sense however seems the most probable. The children of such persons were held in contempt, and could not exercise privileges nor inherit (John viii. 41; Deut. xxiii. 2; Judg. xi. 1, 2). On the general subject Michaelis's Laws of Moses, bk. v. art. 268; Selden, de Ux. Heb. i. 16. iii. 12, and *de Jur. The words וַיְהַזְּנוּת הָרֶכֶב, A. V. "and they washed his armor" (1 K. xxii. 38) should be "and the harlots washed," which is not only the natural rendering, but in accordance with the LXX. and Josephus. H. H.

[e] Αὗται αἱ γύναικες ἐκ τῆς ὁδοῦ τοὺς παρίοντας ξυναρπάζουσι (Theophr. Char. xxviii.). So Catullus (Carm. xxxvii. 16) speaks conversely of semitarii mœchi.

spring of Charod [i. e. of trembling], עֵין חֲרֹד: πηγὴ Ἀράδ, Alex. την γην Ιαερ: fons qui vocatur Harad), a spring by (עַל) which Gideon and his great army encamped on the morning of the day which ended in the rout of the Midianites (Judg. vii. 1), and where the trial of the people by their mode of drinking apparently took place. The word, slightly altered, recurs in the proclamation to the host: "Whosoever is fearful and trembling (חָרֵד, chared) let him return" (ver. 3): but it is impossible to decide whether the name Charod was, as Prof. Stanley proposes, bestowed on account of the trembling, or whether the mention of the trembling was suggested by the previously existing name of the fountain: either would suit the paronomastic vein in which these ancient records so delight. The word chared (A. V. "was afraid") recurs in the description of another event which took place in this neighborhood, possibly at this very spot — Saul's last encounter with the Philistines — when he "was afraid, and his heart trembled greatly," at the sight of their fierce hosts (1 Sam. xxviii. 5). The 'Ain Jalûd, with which Prof. Stanley would identify Harod (S. & P.) is very suitable to the circumstances, as being at present the largest spring in the neighborhood, and as forming a pool of considerable size at which great numbers might drink (Rob. ii. 323). But if at that time so copious, would it not have been seized by the Midianites before Gideon's arrival? However, if the 'Ain Jalûd be not this spring, we are very much in the dark, since the "hill of Moreh," the only landmark afforded us (vii. 1), has not been recognized. The only hill of Moreh of which we have any certain knowledge was by Shechem, 25 miles to the south. If 'Ain Jalûd be Harod, then Jebel Duhy must be Moreh.

It is quite possible that the name Jalûd is a corruption of Harod. In that case it is a good example of the manner in which local names acquire a new meaning in passing from one language to another. Harod itself probably underwent a similar process after the arrival of the Hebrews in Canaan, and the paronomastic turn given to Gideon's speech, as above, may be an indication of the change. G.

HA'RODITE, THE (הַחֲרֹדִי [patronym., see below]: ὁ Ῥουδαῖος; Alex. ο Αρουδαιος, [ο Αρωδαιος:] de Harodi), the designation of two of the thirty-seven warriors of David's guard, SHAMMAH and ELIKA (2 Sam. xxiii. 25), doubtless derived from a place named Harod, either that just spoken of or some other. In the parallel passage of Chronicles by a change of letter the name appears as HARORITE.

HARO'EH (הָרֹאֶה, i. e. ha-Roeh = the seer: Ἀραά [Vat. corrupt]), a name occurring in the genealogical lists of Judah as one of the sons of "Shobal, father of Kirjath-jearim" (1 Chr. ii. 52). The Vulg. translates this and the following words, "qui videbat dimidium requietionum." A somewhat similar name — REAIAH — is given in v. 2 as the son of Shobal, but there is nothing to establish the identity of the two.

HA'RORITE, THE (הַחֲרוֹרִי [see HARODITE]: ὁ Ἀρωρί; [Vat. FA. ο Αδι;] Alex. Θαδ·: Arorites), the title given to SHAMMOTH, one of the warriors of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 27). We have here an example of the minute discrepancies which exist between these two parallel lists. In this case it appears to have arisen from an exchange of ד, D, for ר, R, and that at a very early date, since the LXX. is in agreement with the present Hebrew text. But there are other differences, for which see SHAMMAH.

HARO'SHETH (חֲרֹשֶׁת, Charôsheth [working in wood. stone, etc., Ges.; or city of crafts, of artificial work, Fürst]: Ἀρισώθ; [Vat. Αρεισωθ; Alex. Ασειρωθ, in ver. 16, δρυμου:] Haroseth), or rather "Harosheth of the Gentiles," as it was called (probably for the same reason that Galilee was afterwards), from the mixed races that inhabited it, a city in the north of the land of Canaan, supposed to have stood on the west coast of the lake Merom (el-Hûleh), from which the Jordan issues forth in one unbroken stream, and in the portion of the tribe of Naphtali. It was the residence of Sisera, captain of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg. iv. 2), whose capital, Hazor, one of the fenced cities assigned to the children of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36), lay to the northwest of it; and it was the point to which the victorious Israelites under Barak pursued the discomfited host and chariots of the second potentate of that name (Judg. iv. 16). Probably from intermarriage with the conquered Canaanites. the name of Sisera became afterwards a family name (Ezr. ii. 53). Neither is it irrelevant to allude to this coincidence in connection with the moral effects of this decisive victory; for Hazor, once "the head of all those kingdoms" (Josh. xi. 6, 10), had been taken and burnt by Joshua; its king, Jabin I., put to the sword; and the whole confederation of the Canaanites of the north broken and slaughtered in the celebrated battle of the waters of Merom (Josh. xi. 5–14) — the first time that "chariots and horses" appear in array against the invading host, and are so summarily disposed of, according to Divine command, under Joshua; but which subsequently the children of Joseph feared to face in the valley of Jezreel (Josh. xvii. 16–18); and which Judah actually failed before in the Philistine plain (Judg. i. 19). Herein was the great difficulty of subduing plains, similar to that of the Jordan, beside which Harosheth stood. It was not till the Israelites had asked for and obtained a king, that they began "to multiply chariots and horses" to themselves, contrary to the express words of the law (Deut. xvii. 16), as it were to fight the enemy with his own weapons. (The first instance occurs 2 Sam. viii. 4, comp. 1 Chr. xviii. 4; next in the histories of Absalom, 2 Sam. xv. 1, and of Adonijah, 1 K. i. 5; while the climax was reached under Solomon, 1 K. iv. 26.) And then it was that their decadence set in! They were strong in faith when they hamstrung the horses and burned the chariots with fire of the kings of Hazor, of Madon, of Shimron, and of Achshaph (Josh. xi. 1). And yet so rapidly did they decline when their illustrious leader was no more, that the city of Hazor had risen from its ruins; and in contrast to the kings of Mesopotamia and of Moab (Judg. iii.), who were both of them foreign potentates, another Jabin, the territory of whose ancestors had been assigned to the tribe of Naphtali, claimed the distinction of being the first to revolt against and shake off the dominion of Israel in his newly acquired inheritance. But the victory won by Deborah and Barak was well worthy of the song of triumph which it inspired (Judg. v.), and of the proverbial celebrity which ever afterwards attached to it (Ps. lxxxiii. 9, 10). The whole territory was gradually won back, to be held permanently, as it would seem (Judg. iv. 24); at all events we hear nothing more of Hazor, Harosheth, or the Canaanites of the north, in the succeeding wars.

The site of Harosheth does not appear to have been identified by any modern traveller.

E. S. Ff.

* Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 143) supposes Harosheth to be the high Tell called Harothieh, near the base of Carmel, where the Kishon flows along toward the sea. "I have no doubt," he says, "of this identification." A castle there would guard the pass along the Kishon into the plain of Esdraelon, and the ruins still found on this "enormous double mound" show that a strong fortress must have stood here in former times. A village of the same name occurs higher up on the other side of the river, and hence somewhat nearer the scene of the Deborah-Barak battle. This writer says that Harothieh is the Arabic form of the Hebrew Harosheth, and (according to his view of the direction of the flight) lies directly in the way of the retreat of Sisera's forces. It is about eight miles from Megiddo, and in the neighborhood of Accho ('Akka), and hence exactly in the region where the Gentile "nations," to which Harosheth belonged, still dwelt and were powerful; for we learn from Judg. i. 31 that the Hebrews had been unable to drive them out from that part of the country.

En-dor is mentioned (Ps. lxxxiii. 10) as a place of slaughter on this occasion. Hence, Stanley, in his graphic sketch (Jewish Church, i. 359), represents the Canaanites as escaping in the opposite direction, through the eastern branch of the plain, and thence onward to Harosheth, supposed by him to be among the northern hills of Galilee. En-dor was not far from Tabor (the modern village is distinctly visible from its top), and in that passage of the Psalmist it may be named as a vague designation of the battle-field, while possibly those who "perished at En-dor" were some of the fugitives driven in that direction, about whose destruction there was something remarkable, as known by some tradition not otherwise preserved. H.

HARP (כִּנּוֹר, Kinnor), in Greek κιννύρα or κινύρα, from the Hebrew word, the sound of which corresponds with the thing signified, like the German knurren, "to produce a shrill tone" (Liddell and Scott). Gesenius inclines to the opinion that כִּנּוֹר is derived from כָּנַר, "an unused onomatopoetic root, which means to give forth a tremulous and stridulous sound, like that of a string when touched." The kinnor was the national instrument of the Hebrews, and was well known throughout Asia. There can be little doubt that it was the earliest instrument with which man was acquainted, as the writer of the Pentateuch assigns its invention, together with that of the עוּגָב, Ugab, incorrectly translated "organ" in the A. V., to the antediluvian period (Gen. iv. 21). Dr. Kalisch (Hist. and Crit. Com. on the Old Test.) considers Kinnor to stand for the whole class of stringed instruments (Neginoth), as Ugab, says he, "is the type of all wind instruments." Writers who connect the κινύρα with κινυρός (wailing), κινύομαι (I lament), conjecture that this instrument was only employed by the Greeks on occasions of sorrow and distress. If this were the case with the Greeks it was far different with the Hebrews, amongst whom the kinnor served as an accompaniment to songs of cheerfulness and mirth as well as of praise and thanksgiving to the Supreme Being (Gen. xxxi. 27; 1 Sam. xvi. 23; 2 Chr xx. 28; Ps xxxiii. 2), and was very rarely used, if ever, in times of private or national affliction. The Jewish bard finds no employment for the kinnor during the Babylonian Captivity, but describes it as put aside or suspended on the willows (Ps. cxxxvii. 2); and in like manner Job's harp "is changed into mourning" (xxx. 31), whilst the hand of grief pressed heavily upon him. The passage "my bowels shall sound like a harp for

Assyrian harps. (Nineveh marbles.)

Moab" (Is. xvi. 11) has impressed some Biblical critics with the idea that the kinnor had a lugubrious sound; but this is an error, since כִּכְנוֹר יֶהֱמֶה refers to the vibration of the chords and not to the sound of the instrument (Gesen. and Hitzig, in Comment.).

Touching the shape of the kinnor a great difference of opinion prevails. The author of Shilte Haggibborim describes it as resembling the modern harp; Pfeiffer gives it the form of a guitar: and St. Jerome declares it to have resembled in shape the Greek letter delta; and this last view is supported by Hieronymus, quoted by Joel Brill in the preface to Mendelssohn's Psalms. Josephus records (Antiq. vii. 12, § 3) that the kinnor had ten strings, and that it was played on with the plectrum; others assign to it twenty-four, and in the Shilte Haggibborim it is said to have had forty-seven. Josephus's statement, however, ought not to be received as conclusive, as it is in open contradiction to what is set forth in the 1st book of Samuel (xvi. 23, xviii. 10), that David played on the kinnor with his hand. As it is reasonable to suppose that there was a smaller and a larger kinnor, inasmuch as it was sometimes played by the Israelites whilst walking (1 Sam. x. 5), the opinion of Munk — "on jouait peut-être des deux manières, suivant les dimensions de l'instrument" — is well entitled to consideration. The Talmud (Mass. Beracoth) has preserved a curious tradition to the effect that over the bed of David, facing the north, a kinnor was suspended, and that when at midnight the north wind touched the chords they vibrated and produced musical sounds.

The כנור על השמינית — "harp on the Sheminith" (1 Chr. xv. 21) — was so called from its eight strings. Many learned writers, including the author of Shilte Haggibborim, identify the word "Sheminith" with the octave; but it would indeed be rash to conclude that the ancient Hebrews understood the octave in the sense in which it is employed in modern times. [SHEMINITH.] The skill of the Jews on the kinnor appears to have reached its highest point of perfection in the age of David, the effect of whose performances, as well as of those by the members of the "Schools of the Prophets," are described as truly marvelous (comp. 1 Sam. x. 5, xvi. 23, and xix. 20).

D. W. M.

HARROW. The word so rendered 2 Sam. xii. 31, 1 Chr. xx. 3 (חָרִיץ) is probably a threshing-machine, the verb rendered "to harrow" (עָדַר), Is. xxviii. 24; Job xxxix. 10; Hos. x. 11, expresses apparently the breaking of the clods, and is so far analogous to our harrowing, but whether done by any such machine as we call "a harrow," is very doubtful. In modern Palestine, oxen are sometimes turned in to trample the clods, and in some parts of Asia a bush of thorns is dragged over the surface, but all these processes, if used, occur (not after, but) before the seed is committed to the soil. [See AGRICULTURE.] H. H.

HAR'SHA (חַרְשָׁא [deaf, Ges. 6te Aufl.; see Fürst]: Ἀρσά; [Ἀδασάν; in Ezr., Vat. Αρησα:] Harsa). Bene-Charsha [sons of C.] were among the families of Nethinim who came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54). In the parallel list in Esdras the name is CHAREA.

HART (אַיָּל: ἔλαφος: cervus). The hart is reckoned among the clean animals (Deut. xii. 15, xiv. 5, xv. 22), and seems, from the passages quoted as well as from 1 K. iv. 23, to have been commonly killed for food. Its activity furnishes an apt comparison in Is. xxxv. 6, though in this respect the hind was more commonly selected by the sacred writers. In Ps. xlii. 1 the feminine termination of the verb renders an emendation necessary: we must therefore substitute the hind; and again in Lam. i. 6 the true reading is אֵילִים, "rams" (as given in the LXX. and Vulg.). The proper name Ajalon is derived from ayyal, and implies that harts were numerous in the neighborhood. W. L. B.

The Heb. masc. noun ayyal (אַיָּל), which is always rendered ἔλαφος by the LXX., denotes, there can be no doubt, some species of Cervidæ (deer tribe), either the Dama vulgaris, fallow-deer, or the Cervus Barbarus, the Barbary deer, the southern representative of the European stag (C. elaphus), which occurs in Tunis and the coast of Barbary. We have, however, no evidence to show that the Barbary deer ever inhabited Palestine, though there is no reason why it may not have done so in primitive times. Hasselquist (Trav.

Barbary deer.

p. 211) observed the fallow-deer on Mount Tabor. Sir G. Wilkinson says (Anc. Egypt. p. 227, 8vo ed.), "The stag with branching horns figured at Beni Hassan is also unknown in the valley of the Nile; but it is still seen in the vicinity of the Natron lakes, as about Tunis, though not in the desert between the river and the Red Sea." This is doubtless the Cervus Barbarus.

Most of the deer tribe are careful to conceal their calves after birth for a time. May there not be some allusion to this circumstance in Job xxxix. 1, "Canst thou mark when the hinds do calve?" etc. Perhaps, as the LXX. uniformly renders ayyal by ἔλαφος, we may incline to the belief that the Cervus Barbarus is the deer denoted. The feminine noun אַיָּלָה, ayyâlâh, occurs frequently in the O. T. For the Scriptural allusions see under HIND. W. H.

* The word أَيَّل in Arabic is not confined to any particular species, but is as general as our word deer. It in fact applies as well to the mountain goat وَعِل. G. E. P.

HA'RUM (הָרֻם [elevated, lofty]: Ἀραίν; [Vat.] Alex. Ἀραείμ: Arum). A name occurring in one of the most obscure portions of the genealogies of Judah, in which Coz is said to have begotten "the families of Aharhel son of Harum" (1 Chr. iv. 8).

HARU'MAPH (חֲרוּמָף [slit-nosed, Ges.]: Ἐρωμάφ; [Vat. Ερωμαθ:] Haromaph), father or ancestor of Jedaiah, who assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

HARU'PHITE, THE (הַחֲרוּפִי [patronym., see Hariph]: ὁ Χαραιφίηλ; [Vat. FA. -φειηλ; Ald.] Alex. Ἀρουφί: [Haruphites]), the designation of Shephatiahu, one of the Korhites who repaired to David at Ziklag when he was in distress (1 Chr. xii. 5). The Masorets read the word Hariphite, and point it accordingly, הַחֲרִיפִי.

HA'RUZ (חָרוּץ [zealous, active]: Ἀρούς: Harus), a man of Jotbah, father of Meshullemeth, queen of Manasseh, and mother of AMON king of Judah (2 K. xxi. 19).

HARVEST. [AGRICULTURE.]

HASADI'AH (חֲסַדְיָה [whom Jehovah loves]: Ἀσαδία: Hasadia), one of a group of five persons among the descendants of the royal line of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 20), apparently sons of Zerubbabel, the leader of the return from Babylon. It has been conjectured that this latter half of the family was born after the restoration, since some of the names, and amongst them this one — "beloved of Jehovah," appear to embody the hopeful feeling of that time. [ASADIAS.]

HASENU'AH (הַסְנוּאָה, i. e. has-Senuah [the hated]; Ἀσινοῦ; [Vat. Ααινα;] Alex. Ἀσανουα: Asana), a Benjamite, of one of the chief families in the tribe (1 Chr. ix. 7). The name is really Senuah, with the definite article prefixed.

HASHABI'AH (חֲשַׁבְיָה, and with final û, חֲשַׁבְיָהוּ; Ἀσαβίας, [Ἀσαβία, Ἀσεβίας,] Ασεβία, [etc.:] Hasabias, [Hasabia, Hasebias,] Hasebia), a name signifying "regarded of Jehovah," much in request among the Levites, especially at the date of the return from Babylon.

1. A Merarite Levite, son of Amaziah, in the line of Ethan the singer (1 Chr. vi. 45; Heb. 30)

2. Another Merarite Levite (1 Chr. ix. 14).

3. CHASHABIA'HU: another Levite, the fourth of the six sons of Jeduthun (the sixth is omitted here, but is supplied in ver. 17), who played the harp in the service of the house of God under David's order (1 Chr. xxv. 3), and had charge of the twelfth course (19).

4. CHASHABIA'HU: one of the Hebronites, i. e. descendants of Hebron the son of Kohath, one of the chief families of the Levites (1 Chr. xxvi. 30) He and the 1,700 men of his kindred had superintendence for King David over business both sacred and secular on the west[a] of Jordan. Possibly this is the same person as

5. The son of Kemuel, who was "prince" (עָשַׂר) of the tribe of Levi in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 17).

6. CHASHABIA'HU: another Levite, one of the "chiefs" (עָשַׂר) of his tribe, who officiated for King Josiah at his great passover-feast (2 Chr. xxxv. 9). In the parallel account of 1 Esdras the name appears as ASSABIAS.

7. A Merarite Levite who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 19). In 1 Esdras the name is ASEBIA.

8. One of the chiefs of the priests (and therefore of the family of Kohath) who formed part of the same caravan (Ezr. viii. 24). In 1 Esdras the name is ASSANIAS.

9. "Ruler" (עָשַׂר) of half the circuit or environs (פֶּלֶךְ) of Keilah; he repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 17).

10. One of the Levites who sealed the covenant of reformation after the return from the Captivity (Neh. x. 11). Probably this is the person named as one of the "chiefs" (רָאשֵׁי) of the Levites in the times immediately subsequent to the return from Babylon (xii. 24; comp. 26).

11. Another Levite, son of Bunni (Neh. xi. 15). Notwithstanding the remarkable correspondence between the lists in this chapter and those in 1 Chr. ix. — and in none more than in this verse compared with 1 Chr. ix. 14 — it does not appear that they can be identical, inasmuch as this relates to the times after the Captivity, while that in Chronicles refers to the original establishment of the ark at Jerusalem by David, and of the tabernacle (comp 19, 21, and the mention of Gibeon, where the tabernacle was at this time, in ver. 35). But see NEHEMIAH.

12. Another Levite in the same list of attendants on the Temple; son of Mattaniah (Neh. xi. 22).

13. A priest of the family of Hilkiah in the days of Joiakim son of Jeshua, that is in the generation after the return from the Captivity (Neh. xii. 21; comp. 1, 10, 26).

HASHAB'NAH (חֲשַׁבְנָה [see supra]: [Ἐσσαβανά; Alex. Εσσαβανα, and so Vat. FA., exc. the wrong division of words:] Hasebna), one of the chief ("heads") of the "people" (i. e. the laymen) who sealed the covenant at the same time with Nehemiah (Neh. x 25).

HASHABNI'AH (חֲשַׁבְנִיָה [whom Jehovah regards]: Ἀσαβανία; [Vat. Ἀσαβανεαμ;] Alex. Ἀσβανια; [FA. Ἀσβενεαμ:] Hasebonia). 1. Father of Hattush, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

2. [Hasebaia.] A Levite who was among those who officiated at the great fast under Ezra and Nehemiah when the covenant was sealed (Neh. ix. 5). This and several other names are omitted in both MSS. of the LXX.

HASHBAD'ANA (חֲשַׁבְדָּנָה [intelligence in judging, Gesen.]: Ἀσαβαδμά; [Vat. FA.] omit; Alex. Ασαβαμα:] Hasbadana), one of the men (probably Levites) who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the people in Jerusalem (Neh. viii. 4).

HA'SHEM (הָשֵׁם [perh. fat, rich, Ges.]: Ἀσάμ; [Vat. FA. corrupt: Assem]). The sons of Hashem the Gizonite are named amongst the members of David's guard in the catalogue of 1 Chr. (xi. 34.) In the parallel list of 2 Sam. xxiii. we find "of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan." After a lengthened examination, Kennicott decides that the text of both passages originally stood "of the sons of Hashem, Guni" (Dissertation, pp. 198–203).

HASHMAN'NIM (חַשְׁמַנִּים: πρέσβεις: legati). This word occurs only in the Hebrew of Ps. lxviii. 31: "Hashmannim (A. V. "princes") shall come out of Egypt, Cush shall make her hands to hasten to God." In order to render this word "princes," or the like, modern Hebraists have had recourse to extremely improbable derivations from the Arabic. The old derivation from the civil name of Hermopolis Magna in the Heptanomis, preserved in the modern Arabic أشمونين, "the two Ashmoons," seems to us more reasonable. The ancient Egyptian name is Ha-shmen or Ha-shmoon, the abode of eight; the sound of the signs for eight, however, we take alone from the Coptic, and Brugsch reads them Sesennu (Geog. Inschr. i. pp. 219, 220), but not, as we think, on conclusive grounds. The Coptic form is ϣⲙⲟⲩⲛ ϐ, "the two Shmoons," like the Arabic. If we suppose that Hashmannim is a proper name and signifies Hermopolites, the mention might be explained by the circumstance that Hermopolis Magna was the great city of the Egyptian Hermes, Thoth, the god of wisdom; and the meaning might therefore be that even the wisest Egyptians should come to the temple, as well as the distant Cushites. R. S. P.

HASHMO'NAH (חַשְׁמֹנָה [fruitfulness]: Σελμωνᾶ; Alex. Ασελμωνα: Hesmona), a station of the Israelites, mentioned Num. xxxiii. 29, as next before Moseroth, which, from xx. 28 and Deut. x. 6, was near Mount Hor; this tends to indicate the ocality of Hashmonah. H. H.

HA'SHUB (חָשׁוּב, i. e. Chasshub [associate, friend, or intelligent]: Ἀσούβ: Asub). The reduplication of the Sh has been overlooked in the A. V., and the name is identical with that elsewhere correctly given as HASSHUB.

1. A son of Pahath-Moab who assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 23).

2. Another man who assisted in the same work, but at another part of the wall (Neh. iii. 11).

3. [Vat. FA. Ασουθ.] The name is mentioned again among the heads of the "people" (that is the laymen) who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 23). It may belong to either of the foregoing.

4. [Rom. omits; Vat. Alex. FA. Ασουβ.] A Merarite Levite (Neh. xi. 15). In 1 Chr. ix. 14, he appears again as HASSHUB.

HASHU'BAH (חֲשֻׁבָה [esteemed, or associated]: Ἀσουβέ; Alex. Ασεβα: Hasaba), the first of a group of five men, apparently the latter half of the family of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 20). For a suggestion concerning these persons, see HASADIAH.

HA'SHUM (חָשֻׁם [rich, distinguished]: Ἀσούμ, Ἀσάμ [etc.: Hasum, Hasom, Hasem]).

1. Bene-Chashum, two hundred and twenty-three in number, came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 19; Neh. vii. 22). Seven men of them had married foreign wives from whom they had to separate (Ezr. x. 33). The chief man of the family was among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 18). [In 1 Esdr. ix. 33 the name is ASOM.]

2. [Ἀσώμ; [Vat. FA.] omit:] Asum.) The name occurs amongst the priests or Levites who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the congregation (Neh. viii. 4). In 1 Esdr. ix. 44 the name is given corruptly as LOTHASUBUS.

HASHU'PHA (חֲשֻׁפָא [uncovered]: Ἀσφά; [Alex. FA. Ασειφα: Hasupha]), one of the families of Nethinim who returned from captivity in the first caravan (Neh. vii. 46). The name is accurately HASUPHA, as in Ezr. ii. 43. [ASIPHA.]

HAS'RAH (חַסְרָה [perh. splendor, Fürst]: Ἀράς; [Vat. Χελληs;] Alex. Εσσερη: Hasra), the form in which the name HARHAS is given in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 22 (comp. 2 K. xxii. 14).

HASSENA'AH (הַסְנָאָה [the thorn-hedge, Fürst]: Ἀσανά; [Vat. Ασαν; FA. Ασαναα:] Asnaa). The Bene-has-senaah [sons of Hassenaah] rebuilt the fish-gate in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 3). The name is doubtless that of the place mentioned in Ezr. ii. 35, and Neh. vii. 38 — SENAAH, with the addition of the definite article. Perhaps it has some connection with the rock or cliff SENEH (1 Sam. xiv. 4).

HAS'SHUB (חַשּׁוּב [intelligent, knowing, Ges.]: Ἀσούβ: Hassub), a Merarite Levite (1 Chr. ix. 14). He appears to be mentioned again in Neh. xi. 15, in what may be a repetition of the same genealogy; but here the A. V. have given the name as HASHUB.

HASU'PHA (חֲשׂוּפָא [uncovered, naked]: Ἀσουφά; [Vat. Ασουφε:] Hasupha). Bene-Chasûpha [sons of C.] were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 43). In Nehemiah the name is inaccurately given in the A. V. [as in the Genevan version] HASHUPHA; in Esdras it is ASIPHA.

HAT. [HEAD-DRESS, at the end of the art.]

HA'TACH (הָתָךְ [Pers. eunuch, Gesen.] Ἀχραθαῖος; Alex. [ver. 5,] Αχραθεος; [ver. 9, with FA.[1], Αχθραθαιος; Comp. 'Αθάχ:] Athach), one of the eunuchs (A. V. "chamberlains") in the court of Ahasuerus, in immediate attendance on Esther (Esth. iv. 5, 6, 9, 10). The LXX. alter ver. 5 to τὸν εὐνοῦχον αὐτῆς.

HA'THATH (הֲתָתָה [fearful]: 'Αθάθ: Hathat), a man in the genealogy of Judah; one of the sons of Othniel the Kenazite, the well-known judge of Israel (1 Chr. iv. 13).

HATI'PHA (חֲטִיפָא [seized, captive]: 'Ατουφά, 'Ατιφά; [in Ezr., Alex. Ατιφα; in Neh., Vat. Alex. FA. Ατειφα:] Hatipha). Bene-Chatipha [sons of C.] were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 54; Neh. vii. 56). [ATIPHA.]

HATI'TA (חֲטִיטָא [digging, exploring]: 'Ατιτά; [in Ezr., Vat. Ατητα; in Neh., Vat. FA. Αι ειτα:] Hatita). Bene-Chatita [sons of C.] were among the "porters" or "children of the porters" (הַשֹּׁעֲרִים, i. e. the gate-keepers), a division of the Levites who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45). In Esdras the name is abbreviated to TETA.

HAT'TIL (חַטִּיל [wavering, or decaying]: 'Ατίλ, 'Ετθήλ; Alex. Αττιλ, [Ετθηλ; in Ezr., Vat. Ατεια; in Neh., Vat. FA. Εγηλ:] Hattil). Bene-Chattil [sons of C.] were among the "children of Solomon's slaves" who came back from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59). [HAGIA.]

HAT'TUSH (חַטּוּשׁ [prob. assembled, Ges.; contender, Fürst]: Χαττούς, 'Αττούς, [etc.:] Hattus). 1. A descendant of the kings of Judah, apparently one of the "sons of Shechaniah" (1 Chr. iii. 22), in the fourth or fifth generation from Zerubbabel. A person of the same name, expressly specified as one of the "sons of David of the sons of Shechaniah," accompanied Ezra on his journey from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 2), whither Zerubbabel himself had also come only seventy or eighty years before (Ezr. ii. 1, 2). Indeed, in another statement Hattush is said to have actually returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 2). At any rate he took part in the sealing of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 4). To obviate the discrepancy between these last-mentioned statements and the interval between Hattush and Zerubbabel in 1 Chr. iii., Lord A. Hervey proposes to read the genealogy in that chapter as if he were the nephew of Zerubbabel, Shemaiah in ver. 22 being taken as identical with Shimei in ver. 19. For these proposals the reader is referred to Lord Hervey's Genealogies, pp. 103, 307, 322, &c. [LETTUS; SHECHANIAH.]

2. ('Αττούθ [Vat. FA. Ατουθ; Alex. αυτους; Comp. 'Αττούς.]) Son of Hashabniah; one of those who assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

HAU'RAN (חַוְרָן [see infra]: Αὐρανῖτις: Auran: Arab. حَوْرَان), a province of Palestine twice mentioned by Ezekiel in defining the north-eastern border of the Promised Land (xlvii. 16, 18). Had we no other data for determining its situation we should conclude from his words that it lay north of Damascus. There can be little doubt, however, that it is identical with the well-known Greek province of Auranitis, and the modern Hauran. The name is probably derived from the word חוֹר, Hûr, "a hole or cave;" the region still abounds in caves which the old inhabitants excavated partly to serve as cisterns for the collection of water, and partly for granaries in which to secure their grain from plunderers. Josephus frequently mentions Auranitis in connection with Trachonitis, Batanæa, and Gaulanitis, which with it constituted the ancient kingdom of Bashan (B. J. i. 20, § 4; ii. 17, § 4). It formed part of that Τραχωνίτιδος χώρα referred to by Luke (iii. 1) as subject to Philip the tetrarch (comp. Joseph. Ant. xvii. 11, § 4). It is bounded on the west by Gaulanitis, on the north by the wild and rocky district of Trachonitis, on the east by the mountainous region of Batanæa, and on the south by the great plain of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21). The surface is perfectly flat and the soil is among the richest in Syria. Not a stone is to be seen save on the few low volcanic tells that rise up here and there, like islands in a sea. It contains upwards of a hundred towns and villages, most of them now deserted, though not ruined. The buildings in many of these are remarkable, the walls are of great thickness, and the roofs and doors are of stone, evidently of remote antiquity (see Porter's Five Years in Damascus, vol. ii. [also his Giant Cities of Bashan; Wetzstein's Reisebericht üb. Hauran u. die Trachonen (Berlin, 1861)]). Some Arab geographers have described the Hauran as much more extensive than here stated (Bohaed. Vit. Sal. ed. Schult. p. 70; Abulfed. Tab. Syr. s. v.); and at the present day the name is applied by those at a distance to the whole country east of Jaulan; but the inhabitants themselves define it as above.

* HAVENS, FAIR. [FAIR HAVENS.]

HAVI'LAH (חֲוִילָה [circle, district, Fürst] Εὐϊλά, Εὐεῖλά: Hevila). 1. A son of Cush (Gen x. 7); and —

2. A son of Joktan (x. 29). Various theories have been advanced respecting these obscure peoples. It appears to be most probable that both stocks settled in the same country, and there intermarried; thus receiving one name, and forming one race, with a common descent. It is immaterial to the argument to decide whether in such instances the settlements were contemporaneous, or whether new immigrants took the name of the older settlers. In the case of Havilah, it seems that the Cushite people of this name formed the westernmost colony of Cush along the south of Arabia, and that the Joktanites were an earlier colonization. It is commonly thought that the district of Khäwlán (خَوْلَان), in the Yemen, preserves the trace of this ancient people; and the similarity of name (خ being interchangeable with ח, and the termination being redundant), and the group of Joktanite names in the Yemen, render the identification probable. Niebuhr states that there are two Khäwláns (Descr. 270, 280), and it has hence been argued by some that we have thus the Cushite and the Joktanite Havilah. The second Khäwlán, however, is a town, and not a large and well-known district like the first, or more northern one; and the hypothesis based on Niebuhr's assertion is unnecessary, if the theory of a double settlement be adopted. There is also another town in the Yemen called Hāwlán (حَوْلَان).

The district of Khāwlán lies between the city of San'à and the Hijáz, i. e. in the northwestern portion of the Yemen. It took its name, according to the Arabs, from Khāwlán, a descendant of Kahtán [JOKTAN] (Marásid, s. v.), or, as some say, of Kahlán, brother of Himyer (Caussin, Essai, i. 113, and tab. ii.). This genealogy says little more than that the name was Joktanite; and the difference between Kahtán and Kahlán may be neglected, both being descendants of the first Joktanite settler, and the whole of these early traditions pointing to a Joktanite settlement, without perhaps a distinct preservation of Joktan's name, and certainly none of a correct genealogy from him downwards.

Khāwlán is a fertile territory, embracing a large part of myrrhiferous Arabia: mountainous; with plenty of water; and supporting a large population. It is a tract of Arabia better known to both ancients and moderns than the rest of the Yemen, and the eastern and central provinces. It adjoins Nejrán (the district and town of that name), mentioned in the account of the expedition of Ælius Gallus, and the scene of great persecutions of the Christians by Dhu-Nuwás, the last of the Tubbaas before the Abyssinian conquest of Arabia, in the year 523 of our era (cf. Caussin, Essai, i. 121 ff.). For the Chaulanitæ, see the Dictionary of Geography.

An argument against the identity of Khāwlán and Havilah has been found in the mentions of a Havilah on the border of the Ishmaelites, "as thou goest to Assyria" (Gen. xxv. 18), and also on that of the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 7). It is not however necessary that these passages should refer to 1 or 2: the place named may be a town or country called after them; or it may have some reference to the Havilah named in the description of the rivers of the garden of Eden; and the LXX. render it, following apparently the last supposition, Εὐϊλάτ in both instances, according to their spelling of the Havilah of Gen. ii. 11.

Those who separate the Cushite and Joktanite Havilah either place them in Niebuhr's two Khāwlāns (as already stated), or they place 2 on the north of the peninsula, following the supposed argument derived from Gen. xxv. 18, and 1 Sam. xv. 7, and finding the name in that of the Χαυλοταῖοι (Eratosth. ap. Strabo, xvi. 767), between the Nabatæi and the Agræi, and in that of the town of حويلة on the Persian Gulf (Niebuhr, Descr. 342). A Joktanite settlement so far north is however very improbable. They discover 1 in the Avalitæ on the African coast (Ptol. iv. 7; Arrian, Peripl. 263, ed. Müller), the modern name of the shore of the Sinus Avalatis being, says Gesenius, Zeylah = Zuweylah = Havilah, and Saadiah having three times in Gen. written Zeylah for Havilah. But Gesenius seems to have overlooked the true orthography of the name of the modern country, which is not زَيْلَة, but زَيْلَع, with a final letter very rarely added to the Hebrew. E. S. P.

HAVI'LAH ([Εὐιλάτ; Alex. Ευειλατ: Hevilath] Gen. ii. 11). [EDEN, p. 657.]

HAVOTH-JAIR (חַוֹת יָאִיר, i. e. Chavroth Jair [villages of Jair, i. e. of the enlightener]: ἐπαύλεις and κῶμαι Ἰαΐρ, Θανώθ [Ἰαΐρ, etc.:] vicus, Havoth Jair, viculus Jair, [etc.]) certain villages on the east of Jordan, in Gilead or Bashan. The word Chavvah, which occurs in the Bible in this connection only, is perhaps best explained by the similar term in modern Arabic, which denotes a small collection of huts or hovels in a country place (see the citations in Gesenius, Thes. 451; and Stanley, S. & P. App. § 84).

(1.) The earliest notice of the Havoth-jair is in Num. xxxii. 41, in the account of the settlement of the Transjordanic country, where Jair, son of Manasseh, is stated to have taken some villages (A. V. "the small towns;" but there is no article in the Hebrew) of Gilead — which was allotted to his tribe — and to have named them after himself, Havvoth-jair. (2.) In Deut. iii. 14 it is said that Jair "took all the tract of Argob, unto the boundary of the Geshurite and the Maacathite, and called them after his own name, Bashan-havoth-jair." Here the villages are referred to, but there must be a hiatus after the word "Maacathite," in which they were mentioned, or else there is nothing to justify the plural "them." (3.) In the records of Manassch in Josh. xiii. 30 and 1 Chr. ii. 23 (A. V., in both "towns of Jair"), the Havvoth-jair are reckoned with other districts as making up sixty "cities" (עָרִים). In 1 K. iv. 13 they are named as part of the commissariat district of Bengeber, next in order to the "sixty great cities" of Argob. There is apparently some confusion in these different statements as to what the sixty cities really consisted of, and if the interpretation of Chavvah given above be correct, the application of the word "city" to such transient erections is remarkable and puzzling. Perhaps the remoteness and inaccessibility of the Transjordanic district in which they lay may explain the one, and our ignorance of the real force of the Hebrew word Ir, rendered "city," the other. Or perhaps, though retaining their ancient name, they had changed their original condition, and had become more important, as has been the case in our own country with more than one place still designated as a "hamlet," though long since a populous town. (4.) No less doubtful is the number of the Havoth-jair. In 1 Chr. ii. 22 they are specified as twenty-three, but in Judg. x. 4, as thirty. In the latter passage, however, the allusion is to a second Jair, by whose thirty sons they were governed, and for whom the original number may have been increased.

The word עֲיָרִים, "cities," is perhaps employed here for the sake of the play which it affords with עַיָרִים, "ass-colts." [JAIR; BASHAN-HAVOTH-JAIR.] G.

HAWK (אַיָּה, nēts: ἱέραξ: accipiter), the translation of the above-named Heb. term, which occurs in Lev. xi. 16 and Deut. xiv. 15 as one of the unclean birds, and in Job xxxix. 26, where it is asked, "Doth the nēts fly by thy wisdom and stretch her wings towards the south?" The word is doubtless generic, as appears from the expression in Deut. and Lev. "after his kind," and includes various species of the Falconidæ, with more especial allusion perhaps to the small diurnal birds, such as the kestrel (Falco tinnunculus), the hobby (Hypotriorchis subbuteo), the gregarious lesser kestrel (Tinnunculus cenchris), common about the ruins in the plain districts of Palestine, all of which were probably known to the ancient Hebrews. With respect to the passage in Job (l. c.), which appears to allude to the migratory habits of hawks, it is curious to observe that of the ten or twelve lesser raptors of Palestine, nearly all are summer migrants. The kestrel remains all the year, but T. cenchris, Micronisus gabar, Hyp. eleonoræ, and F. melanopterus, are all migrants from the south. Besides the above-named smaller hawks, the two magnificent species, F. Saker and F. lanarius, are summer visitors to Palestine. "On one occasion," says Mr. Tristram, to whom we are indebted for much information on the subject of the birds of Palestine, "while riding with an Arab guide I observed a falcon of large size rise close to us. The guide, when I pointed it out to him, exclaimed, 'Taïr Saq'r.'[a] Taïr, the Arabic for 'bird,' is universally throughout N. Africa and the East applied to those falcons which are capable of being trained for hunting, i. e. 'the bird,' par excellence." These two species of falcons, and perhaps the hobby and goshawk (Astur palumbarius) are employed by the Arabs in Syria and Palestine for the purpose of taking partridges, sand-grouse, quails, herons, gazelles, hares, etc. Dr. Russell (Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, ii. p. 196, 2d ed.) has given the Arabic names of several falcons, but it is probable that some at least of these names apply rather to the different sexes than to distinct species. See a very graphic description of the sport of falconry, as pursued by the Arabs of N. Africa, in the Ibis, i. p. 284; and comp. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 208 (i. 309–311, Am. ed.).

Whether falconry was pursued by the ancient Orientals or not, is a question we have been unable to determine decisively. No representation of such a sport occurs on the monuments of ancient Egypt (see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. p. 221), neither is there any definite allusion to falconry in the Bible. With regard, however, to the negative evidence supplied by the monuments of Egypt, we must be careful ere we draw a conclusion; for the camel is not represented, though we have Biblical evidence to show that this animal was used by the Egyptians as early as the time of Abraham; still, as instances of various modes of capturing fish, game, and wild animals, are not unfrequent on the monuments, it seems probable the art was not known to the Egyptians. Nothing definite can be learnt from the passage in 1 Sam. xxvi. 20, which speaks of "a partridge hunted on the mountains," as this may allude to the method of taking these birds by "throw-sticks," etc. [PARTRIDGE.] The hind or hart "panting after the water-brooks" (Ps. xlii. 1) may appear at first sight to refer to the mode at present adopted in the East of taking gazelles, deer, and bustards, with the united aid of falcon and greyhound: but, as Hengstenberg (Comment. on Ps. l. c.) has argued, it seems pretty clear that the exhaustion spoken of is to be understood as arising not from pursuit, but from some prevailing drought, as in Ps. lxiii. 1, "My soul thirsteth for thee in a dry land." (See also Joel i. 20.) The poetical version of Brady and Tate —

> "As pants the hart for cooling streams
> When heated in the chase," has therefore somewhat prejudged the matter. For the question as to whether falconry was known to the ancient Greeks, see Beckmann, History of Inventions (i. 198–205, Bohn's ed.). W. H.

HAY (חָצִיר, châtzîr: ἐν τῷ πεδίῳ χλῶρος, χόρτος: prata, herba), the rendering of the A. V. in Prov. xxvii. 25, and Is. xv. 6, of the above-named Heb. term, which occurs frequently in the O. T., and denotes "grass" of any kind, from an unused root, "to be green." [GRASS.] In Num. xi. 5 this word is properly translated "leeks." [LEEK.] Harmer (Observat. i. 425, ed. 1797), quoting from a MS. paper of Sir J. Chardin, states that hay is not made anywhere in the East, and that the fenum of the Vulg. (aliis locis) and the "hay" of the A. V. are therefore errors of translation. It is quite probable that the modern Orientals do not make hay in our sense of the term; but it is certain that the ancients did mow their grass, and probably made use of the dry material. See Ps. xxxvii. 2. "They shall soon be cut down (יִמָּלוֹ), and wither as the green herb;" Ps. lxxii. 6, "Like rain upon the mown grass" (גֵּז). See also Am. vii. 1, "The king's mowings" (גִּזֵּי הַסָּלְקוֹשׁ): and Ps. cxxix. 7, where of the "grass upon the housetops" (Poa annua ?) it is said that "the mower (קוֹצֵר) filleth not his hand" with it, "nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom." We do not see, therefore, with the author of Fragments in Continuation of Calmet (No. clxxviii.), any gross impropriety in our version of Prov. xxvii. 25, or in that of Is. xv. 6. "Certainly," says this writer, "if the tender grass[b] is but just beginning to show itself, the hay, which is grass cut and dried after it has arrived at maturity, ought by no means to be associated with it, still less ought it to be placed before it." But where is the impropriety? The tender grass (דֶּשֶׁא) may refer to the springing after-grass,

[a] "The word Saq'r, صقر, is the name of all the raptores, of the falcons, hawks, and kites."

G. E. P.

[b] "The hay appeareth, and the tender grass sheweth itself, and herbs of the mountains are gathered" and the "hay" to the hay-grass. However, in the two passages in question, where alone the A. V. renders châtzir by "hay," the word would certainly be better translated by "grass." We may remark that there is an express Hebrew term for "dry grass" or "hay," namely, chashash,[a] which, apparently from an unused root signifying "to be dry,"[b] is rendered in the only two places where the word occurs (Is. v. 24, xxxiii. 11) "chaff" in the Authorized Version. We do not, however, mean to assert that the chashash of the Orientals represents our modern English hay. Doubtless the "dry grass" was not stacked, but only cut in small quantities, and then consumed. The grass of "the latter growth" (Am. vii. 1) (לֶקֶשׁ), perhaps like our after-grass, denotes the mown grass as it grows afresh after the harvest; like the Chordum fœnum of Pliny (H. N. viii. 28). W. H.

HAZ'AEL (חֲזָאֵל [El (God) is seeing, Fürst, Ges.]: Ἀζαήλ: Hazaël) was a king of Damascus, who reigned from about B. C. 886 to B. C. 840. He appears to have been previously a person in a high position at the court of Ben-hadad, and was sent by his master to Elisha, when that prophet visited Damascus, to inquire if he would recover from the malady under which he was suffering. Elisha's answer that Ben-hadad might recover, but would die, and his announcement to Hazael that he would one day be king of Syria, which seems to have been the fulfillment of the commission given to Elijah (1 K. xix. 15) to appoint Hazael king — led to the murder of Ben-hadad by his ambitious servant, who forthwith mounted the throne (2 K. viii. 7–15). He was soon engaged in hostilities with Ahaziah king of Judah, and Jehoram king of Israel, for the possession of the city of Ramoth-Gilead (ibid. viii. 28). The Assyrian inscriptions show that about this time a bloody and destructive war was being waged between the Assyrians on the one side, and the Syrians, Hittites, Hamathites, and Phœnicians on the other. [See DAMASCUS.] Ben-hadad had recently suffered several severe defeats at the hands of the Assyrian king; and upon the accession of Hazael the war was speedily renewed. Hazael took up a position in the fastnesses of the Anti-Libanus, but was there attacked by the Assyrians, who defeated him with great loss, killing 16,000 of his warriors, and capturing more than 1100 chariots. Three years later the Assyrians once more entered Syria in force; but on this occasion Hazael submitted and helped to furnish the invaders with supplies. After this, internal troubles appear to have occupied the attention of the Assyrians, who made no more expeditions into these parts for about a century. The Syrians rapidly recovered their losses; and towards the close of the reign of Jehu, Hazael led them against the Israelites (about B. C. 860), whom he "smote in all their coasts" (2 K. x. 32), thus accomplishing the prophecy of Elisha (ibid. viii. 12). His main attack fell upon the eastern provinces, where he ravaged "all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, and the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan" (ibid. x. 33). After this he seems to have held the kingdom of Israel in a species of subjection (ibid. xiii. 3–7, and 22); and towards the close of his life he even threatened the kingdom of Judah. Having taken Gath (ibid. xii. 17; comp. Am. vi. 2), he proceeded to attack Jernsalem, defeated the Jews in an engagement (2 Chr. xxiv. 24), and was about to assault the city, when Joash induced him to retire by presenting him with "all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and in the king's house" (2 K. xii. 18). Hazael appears to have died about the year B. C. 840 (ibid. xiii. 24), having reigned 46 years. He left his crown to his son Ben-hadad (ibid.). G. R.

* The true import of Hazael's answer to the prophet on being informed of his future destiny (2 K. viii. 13), does not appear in the A. V.: "But what, is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" This is the language of a proud and self-approving spirit, spurning an undeserved imputation: "Thy servant is not a dog that he should do this great thing." It is obvious, moreover, that in this form the terms of the question are incongruous. If he had said, Is thy servant a dog, that he should do so base a thing, the question would have been consistent with itself. But the incongruity disappears, and the pertinency of the illustration is obvious, when we render according to the Hebrew: "What is thy servant, the dog, that he should do this great thing?" The use of the definite article in the Hebrew, as well as the congruity of the expression, requires this rendering.[c] [DOG.] T. J. C.

* HAZ'AEL, HOUSE OF (Am. i. 4), probably some well-known edifice or palace, which this king had built at Damascus, and which, according to the prophet, the fire (God's instrument of punishment) was destined to burn up. Some understood by "the house" Damascus itself, and others Hazael's family or personal descendants. But the clause which follows — "the palaces of Ben-hadad" — as Baur (Der Prophet Amos, p. 217) points out, favors the other explanation. H.

HAZA'IAH [3 syl.] (חֲזָיָה: [Jehovah decides or views]: Ὀζία: [Vat. FA. Ὀζειε:] Hazia), a man of Judah of the family of the Shilonites A. V. "Shiloni"), or descendants of SHELAH (Neh. xi. 5).

HA'ZAR-AD'DAR, etc. [HAZER.]

HAZARMA'VETH (חֲצַרְמָוֶת: [in Gen., Σαρμώθ; [Alex.[2] Ασαρμώθ; in 1 Chr., Rom. Vat. omit, Alex. Ασαμωθ:] Asarmoth; the court of death, Ges.), the third, in order, of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 26). The name is preserved, almost literally, in the Arabic Hadramäut (حضرموت) and Hadrumäut (حضرموت),

---

and the appellation of a province and an ancient people of Southern Arabia. This identification of the settlement of Hazarmaveth is accepted by Biblical scholars as not admitting of dispute. It rests not only on the occurrence of the name, but is supported by the proved fact that Joktan settled in the Yemen, along the south coast of Arabia, by the physical characteristics of the inhabitants of this region, and by the identification of the names of several others of the sons of Joktan. The province of Hadramāwt is situate east of the modern Yemen (anciently, as shown in ARABIA, the limits of the latter province embraced almost the whole of the south of the peninsula), extending to the districts of Shihr and Mahreh. Its capital is Shibām, a very ancient city, of which the native writers give curious accounts, and its chief ports are Mirbāt, Zafāri [SEPHAR], and Kisheem, from whence a great trade was carried on in ancient times with India and Africa. Hadramāwt itself is generally cultivated, in contrast to the contiguous sandy deserts (called El-Ahkāf, where lived the gigantic race of 'Ā'd), is partly mountainous, with watered valleys, and is still celebrated for its frankincense (El-Idreesee, ed. Jomard, i. p. 54; Niebuhr, Descr. p. 245), exporting also gum-arabic, myrrh, dragon's blood, and aloes, the latter, however, being chiefly from Socotra, which is under the rule of the sheykh of Kesheem (Niebuhr, l. c. et seq.). The early kings of Hadramāwt were Joktanites distinct from the descendants of Yaarub, the progenitor of the Joktanite Arabs generally; and it is hence to be inferred that they were separately descended from Hazarmaveth. They maintained their independence against the powerful kings of Himyer, until the latter were subdued at the Abyssinian invasion (Ibn-Khaldoon, ap. Caussin, Essai, i. 135 ff.). The Greeks and Romans call the people of Hadramāwt. variously, Chatramotitæ, Chatrammitæ, etc.; and there is little doubt that they were the same as the Adramitæ, etc. (the latter not applying to the descendants of HADORAM, as some have suggested); while the native appellation of an inhabitant, Hadramee, comes very near Adramitæ in sound. The modern people, although mixed with other races, are strongly characterized by fierce, fanatical, and restless dispositions. They are enterprising merchants, well known for their trading and travelling propensities. E. S. P.

HAZ'AZON-TA'MAR, 2 Chr. xx. 2. [HAZEZON-TAMAR.]

HAZEL (לוּז). The Hebrew term lûz occurs only in Gen. xxx. 37, where it is coupled with the "poplar" and "chestnut," as one of the trees from which Jacob cut the rods, which he afterwards peeled. Authorities are divided between the hazel and the almond-tree, as representing the lûz; in favor of the former we have Kimchi, Rashi, Luther, and others; while the Vulgate, Saadias, and Gesenius adopt the latter view. The rendering in the LXX., κάρυον, is equally applicable to either. We think the latter most probably correct, both because the Arabic word lûz is undoubtedly the "almond-tree," and because there is another word in the Hebrew language, egóz (אֱגוֹז), which is applicable to the hazel. The strongest argument on the other side arises from the circumstance of another word, shâkêd (שָׁקֵד), having reference to the almond; it is supposed, however, that the latter applies to the fruit exclusively, and the word under discussion to the tree: Rosenmüller identifies the shâkêd with the cultivated, and lûz with the wild almond-tree. For a description of the almond-tree, see the article on that subject. The Hebrew term appears as a proper name in LUZ, the old appellation of Bethel. W. L. B.

HAZELELPO'NI (הַצְלֶלְפּוֹנִי: Ἐσηλελββών; Alex. Ἐσηλελφων: Asalelphuni), the sister of the sons of Etam in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3). The name has the definite article prefixed, and is accurately "the Tzelelponite," as of a family rather than an individual.

* That the name is genealogical rather than individual appears also from the appended ־ִי (see Ges. Lehrgeb. der Hebr. Sprache, p. 514). It is variously explained: protection of the presence (Fürst); or, shade coming upon me (Ges.). Ewald makes the name still more expressive: Give shade thou who seest me, i. e. God (Lehrbuch, p. 502). This gives a different force to the ending. H.

HA'ZER (חָצֵר, i. e. Chatzer, from חָצַר, to surround or inclose), a word which is of not unfrequent occurrence in the Bible in the sense of a "court" or quadrangle to a palace[a] or other building, but which topographically seems generally employed for the "villages" of people in a roving and unsettled life, the semi-permanent collections of dwellings which are described by travellers among the modern Arabs to consist of rough stone walls covered with the tent cloths, and thus holding a middle position between the tent of the wanderer — so transitory as to furnish an image of the sudden termination of life (Is. xxxviii. 12) — and the settled, permanent, town.

As a proper name it appears in the A. V. —

1. In the plural, HAZERIM, and HAZEROTH, for which see below.

2. In the slightly different form of HAZOR.

3. In composition with other words, giving a special designation to the particular "village" intended. When thus in union with another word the name is Hazar (Chatzar). The following are the places so named, and it should not be overlooked that they are all in the wilderness itself, or else quite on the confines of civilized country: —

1. HA'ZAR-AD'DAR (חֲצַר אַדָּר: ἔπαυλις Ἀράδ, Σάραδα: Alex. Αδδαρα: Villa nomine Adar, Addar), a place named as one of the landmarks on the southern boundary of the land promised to Israel between Kadesh-barnea and Azmon (Num. xxxiv. 4). In the specification of the south boundary of the country actually possessed (Josh. xv. 3), the name appears in the shorter form of Addar (A. V. ADAR), and an additional place is named on each side of it. The site of Hazar-addar does not appear to have been encountered in modern times.

The LXX. reading might lead to the belief that Hazar-addar was identical with ARAD, a Canaan-

[a] In 2 K. xx 4, the Masorets (Keri) have substituted חצר (A. V. "court") for the חעיר of the original text. The same change should probably be made in Jer. xli. 7. [See ISHMAEL, 6.]

ite city which lay in this direction, but the presence of the Ain in the latter name forbids such an inference.

2. HA'ZAR-E'NAN (חֲצַר עֵינָן [in Ezek. xlvii. 17, חֲצַר עֵינוֹן] = village of springs: Ἀρσεναΐν, [αὐλη τοῦ Αἰνάν, αὐ. τ. Αἰλάμ; Vat. in Num., Αρσε:αειμ:] Alex. Ασερναιν, αυλη του Αιναν: Villa Enun, Atrium Enon, [A. Enan]), the place at which the northern boundary of the land promised to the children of Israel was to terminate (Num. xxxiv. 9), and the eastern boundary commence (10). It is again mentioned in Ezekiel's prophecy (xlvii. 17. xlviii. 1) of what the ultimate extent of the land will be. These boundaries are traced by Mr. Porter, who would identify Hazar-enan with Kuryetein = "the two cities," a village more than sixty miles E. N. E. of Damascus, the chief ground for the identification apparently being the presence at Kuryetein of "large fountains," the only ones in that "vast region," a circumstance with which the name of Hazar-enan well agrees (Porter, Damascus, i. 252, ii. 358). The great distance from Damascus and the body of Palestine is the main impediment to the reception of this identification.

3. HA'ZAR-GAD'DAH (חֲצַר גַּדָּה [village of Gaddah or fortune: Rom. Σερί, Vat. Σερειμ:] Alex. Ασεργαδδα: Aser-Gadda), one of the towns in the southern district of Judah (Josh. xv. 27), named between Moladah and Heshmon. No trace of the situation of this place appears in the Onomasticon, or in any of the modern travellers. In Van de Velde's map a site named Jurrah is marked as close to Molada (el-Milh), but it is perhaps too much to assume that Gaddah has taken this form by the change so frequent in the East of D to R.

4. HA'ZAR-HAT-TI'CON (חֲצַר הַתִּיכוֹן [the middle village]: Αὐλὴ τοῦ Σαυνάν; [Alex. corrupt:] Domus Tichon), a place named in Ezekiel's prophecy of the ultimate boundaries of the land (Ez. xlvii. 16), and specified as being on the boundary (אֶל גְּבוּל) of Hauran. It is not yet known.

5. HA'ZAR-SHU'AL (חֲצַר שׁוּעָל = fox-village: Χολασεωλά, Ἀρσωλά, Ἐσερσουάλ; Alex. Ασαρσουλα, [Σερσουλα, etc.:] Hasersual, Hasar-suhal), a town in the southern district of Judah, lying between Hazar-gaddah and Beer-sheba (Josh. xv. 28, xix. 3; 1 Chr. iv. 28). It is mentioned in the same connection after the return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 27). The site has not yet been conclusively recovered; but in Van de Velde's map (1858) a site, Saweh, is marked at about the right spot, which may be a corruption of the original name. This district has been only very slightly explored; when it is so we may look for most interesting information.

6. HA'ZAR-SU'SAH (חֲצַר סוּסָה = horse-village: Σαρσουσίν [Vat. -σειν]; Alex. Ασερσουσιμ: [Hasersusa]), one of the "cities" allotted to Simeon in the extreme south of the territory of Judah (Josh. xix. 5). Neither it nor its companion BETH-MARCABOTH, the "house of chariots," are named in the list of the towns of Judah in chap. xv., but they are included in those of Simeon in 1 Chr. iv. 31, with the express statement that they existed before and up to the time of David. This appears to invalidate Professor Stanley's suggestion (S. & P. p. 160) that they were the depôts for the trade with Egypt in chariots and horses, which commenced in the reign of Solomon. Still, it is difficult to know to what else to ascribe the names of places situated, as these were, in the Bedouin country, where a chariot must have been unknown, and where even horses seem carefully excluded from the possessions of the inhabitants — "camels, sheep, oxen, and asses" (1 Sam. xxvii. 9). In truth the difficulty arises only on the assumption that the names are Hebrew, and that they are to be interpreted accordingly. It would cease if we could believe them to be in the former language of the country, adopted by the Hebrews, and so altered as to bear a meaning in Hebrew. This is exactly the process which the Hebrew names have in their turn undergone from the Arabs, and is in fact one which is well known to have occurred in all languages, though not yet recognized in the particular case of the early local names of Palestine.

7. HA'ZAR-SU'SIM (חֲצַר סוּסִים, village of horses: Ἡμισουσεωσίν, as if חֲצִי; [Vat. Ημισυς εως Ορομ; Alex. Ημισυ Εωσιμ:] Hasarsusim), the form under which the preceding name appears in the list of the towns of Simeon in 1 Chr. iv. 31. G.

HAZE'RIM. The AVIMS, or more accurately the Avvim, a tribe commemorated in a fragment of very ancient history, as the early inhabitants of the southwestern portion of Palestine, are therein said to have lived "in the villages (A. V. "Hazerim," חַצֵרִים [Ασηδώθ; Alex. Ασηρωθ: Haserim]), as far as Gaza" (Deut. ii. 23), before their expulsion by the Caphtorim. The word is the plural of HAZER, noticed above, and as far as we can now appreciate the significance of the term, it implies that the Avvim were a wandering tribe who had retained in their new locality the transitory form of encampment of their original desert-life. G.

HAZE'ROTH (חֲצֵרוֹת [stations, camping grounds]: Ασηρώθ; [in Deut., Αὐλών: Haseroth:] Num. xi. 35, xii. 16, xxxiii. 17, Deut. i. 1), a station of the Israelites in the desert, mentioned next to Kibroth-Hattaavah, and perhaps recognizable in the Arabic حضرا, Hudhera (Robinson, i. 151; Stanley, S. & P. pp. 81, 82), which lies about eighteen hours' distance from Sinai on the road to the Akabah. The word appears to mean the sort of uninclosed villages in which the Bedouins are found to congregate. [HAZER.] H. H.

HAZE'ZON-TA'MAR, and HAZAZON-TA'MAR (חֲצְצֹן תָּמָר, but in Chron. חֲצָצוֹן תָּ[a] [proh. wet place of palms, palm-marsh, Dietr.; rows of palms, palm-forest, Fürst]: Ἀσασονθαμάρ, or Ἀσασὰν Θαμάρ: [Alex. Ασασαν Θ., Ανασαν Θ.; Vat. in 2 Chr., Ασαμ Θαμαρα:] Asasonthamar), the name under which, at a very early period of the history of Palestine, and

[a] The translators of the A. V. have curiously reversed the two variations of the name. In Genesis, where the Hebrew is Hazazon, they have Hazeson, and the opposite in Chronicles a document believed by many to be the oldest of all these early records, we first hear of the place which afterwards became En-gedi. The Amorites were dwelling at Hazazon-Tamar when the four kings made their incursion, and fought their successful battle with the five (Gen. xiv. 7). The name occurs only once again — in the records of the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xx. 2) — when he is warned of the approach of the horde of Ammonites, Moabites, Mehunim, and men of Mount Seir, whom he afterwards so completely destroyed, and who were no doubt pursuing thus far exactly the same route as the Assyrians had done a thousand years before them. Here the explanation, "which is En-gedi," is added. The existence of the earlier appellation, after En-gedi had been so long in use, is a remarkable instance of the tenacity of these old oriental names, of which more modern instances are frequent. See Accho, Bethsaida, etc.

Hazazon-tamar is interpreted in Hebrew to mean the "pruning or felling of the palm" (Gesen. Thes. p. 512). Jerome (Quæst. in Gen.) renders it urbs palmarum. This interpretation of the name is borne out by the ancient reputation of the palms of En-gedi (Ecclus. xxiv. 14, and the citations from Pliny, given under that name). The Samaritan Version has פלוג כדי = the Valley of Cadi, possibly a corruption of En-gedi. The Targums have En-gedi.

Perhaps this was the "city of palm-trees" (Ir hat-temarim) out of which the Kenites, the tribe of Moses' father-in-law, went up into the wilderness of Judah, after the conquest of the country (Judg. i. 16). If this were so, the allusion of Balaam to the Kenite (Num. xxiv. 21) is at once explained. Standing as he was on one of the lofty points of the highlands opposite Jericho, the western shore of the Dead Sea as far as En-gedi would be before him, and the cliff, in the clefts of which the Kenites had fixed their secure "nest," would be a prominent object in the view. This has been already alluded to by Professor Stanley (S. & P., p. 225, n. 4). G.

HA'ZIEL (חֲזִיאֵל [El's (God's) beholding]: Ἰεηήλ; [Vat. Ειειηλ:] Alex. Αζιηλ: Hosiel), a Levite in the time of king David, of the family of Shimei or Shimi, the younger branch of the Gershonites (1 Chr. xxiii. 9).

HA'ZO (חָזוֹ [look, visibility, Fürst]: Ἀζαῦ: Azau), a son of Nahor, by Milcah his wife (Gen. xxii. 22): perhaps, says Gesenius, for חֲזוֹרָה, "a vision." The name is unknown, and the settlements of the descendants of Hazo cannot be ascertained. The only clew is to be found in the identification of Chesed, and the other sons of Nahor; and hence he must, in all likelihood, be placed in Ur of the Chaldees, or the adjacent countries. Bunsen (Bibelwerk, i. pt. 2, p. 49) suggests Chasene by the Euphrates, in Mesopotamia, or the Chazene in Assyria (Strabo, xvi. p. 736).

HA'ZOR (חָצוֹר [inclosure, castle]: Ἀσώρ; [Alex. in 1 K. ix. 15, Ασερ:] Asor, [Hasor]). 1. A fortified city, which on the occupation of the country was allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36). Its position was apparently between Ramah and Kedesh (ibid. xii. 19). on the high ground overlooking the Lake of Merom (ὑπέρκειται τῆς Σεμεχωνίτιδος λίμνης, Joseph. Ant. v. 5, § 1). There is no reason for supposing it a different place from that of which Jabin was king (Josh. xi. 1), both when Joshua gained his signal victory over the northern confederation, and when Deborah and Barak routed his general Sisera (Judg. iv. 2, 17; 1 Sam. xii. 9). It was the principal city of the whole of the North Palestine, "the head of all those kingdoms" (Josh. xi. 10, and see Onomasticon, Asor). Like the other strong places of that part, it stood on an eminence (הָעֵל, Josh. xi. 13, A. V. "strength"), but the district around must have been on the whole flat, and suitable for the manœuvres of the "very many" chariots and horses which formed part of the forces of the king of Hazor and his confederates (Josh. xi. 4, 6, 9; Judg. iv. 3). Hazor was the only one of those northern cities which was burnt by Joshua; doubtless it was too strong and important to leave standing in his rear. Whether it was rebuilt by the men of Naphtali, or by the second Jabin (Judg. iv.), we are not told, but Solomon did not overlook so important a post, and the fortification of Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer, the points of defense for the entrance from Syria and Assyria, the plain of Esdraelon, and the great maritime lowland respectively, was one of the chief pretexts for his levy of taxes (1 K. ix. 15). Later still it is mentioned in the list of the towns and districts whose inhabitants were carried off to Assyria by Tiglath-Pileser (2 K. xv. 29; Joseph. Ant. ix. 11, § 1). We encounter it once more in 1 Macc. xi. 67, where Jonathan, after encamping for the night at the "water of Genesar," advances to the "plain of Asor" (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 5, § 7; the Greek text of the Maccabees has prefixed an n from the preceding word πεδίον: A. V. Nasor) to meet Demetrius, who was in possession of Kadesh (xi. 63; Joseph. as above). [Nasor.]

Several places bearing names probably derived from ancient Hazors have been discovered in this district. A list will be found in Rob. iii. 366, note (and compare also Van de Velde, Syr. and Pal. ii. 178; Porter. Damascus, i. 304). But none of these answer to the requirements of this Hazor. The nearest is the site suggested by Dr. Robinson, namely, Tell Khuraibeh, "the ruins," which, though without any direct evidence of name or tradition in its favor, is so suitable, in its situation on a rocky eminence, and in its proximity both to Kedesh and the Lake Hûleh, that we may accept it until a better is discovered (Rob. iii. 364, 365).

* The ruins of a large city of very ancient date have recently been found about two miles southeast of Kedes (Kedesh, 3), on an isolated hill called Tell Harah. The walls of the citadel and a portion of the city walls are distinctly traceable. Captain Wilson, of the Palestine Exploring Expedition, inclines to regard this place as the site of the Bible Hazor (Josh. xix. 36), instead of Tell Khuraibeh. (See Journ. of Sacr. Literature, April, 1866, p. 245.) It is not said that the ancient name, or any similar one, still adheres to the locality. Thomson proposes Hazere or Hazêry as the site of this Hazor, northwest of the Hûleh (Merom), and in the centre of the mountainous region which overhangs that lake: the ruins are very extensive as well as ancient, and a living tradition among the Arabs supports this claim (see Land and Book, i 439). Robinson objects to this identification that it is too remote from the Hûleh, and is within the limits of Asher, and not in those of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 32, 36). For Ritter's view that this Hazor is a Hatzûry on the rocky slopes above Banias (Cæsarea Philippi), first heard of by Burckhardt in that quarter, see his Geogr. of Palestine, Gage's trans., ii. 221–225. Robinson states that the few remains on a knoll there which bears this name are wholly unimportant, and indicate nothing more than a Mezra'ah, or goat village (Later Res. iii. 402). It is not surprising that a name which signifies "stronghold," or "fortification," should belong to various places, both ancient and modern. H.

2. ('Ασοριωρναΐν, including the following name: Alex. omits: Asor.) One of the "cities" of Judah in the extreme south, named next in order to Kedesh (Josh xv. 23). It is mentioned nowhere else, nor has it yet been identified (see Rob. ii. 34, note). The Vatican LXX. unites Hazor with the name following it, Ithnan; which causes Reland to maintain that they form but one (Pal. pp. 144, 708); but the LXX. text of this list is so corrupt, that it seems impossible to argue from it. In the Alex. MS. Hazor is entirely omitted, while Ithnan again is joined to Ziph.

3. (LXX. omits; [Cod. Sarrav. Ασωρ την καινην; Comp. Αἰασὼρ τὴν καινὴν:] Asor nova.) Hazor-Hadattah, = "new Hazor," possibly contradistinguished from that just mentioned; another of the southern towns of Judah (Josh. xv. 25). The words are improperly separated in the A. V.

4. ('Ασερών, αὕτη 'Ασώρ; Alex. [Ασερωμ, αυτη] Ασωραμαμ: Hesron, hœc est Asor.) "Hezron which is Hazor" (Josh. xv. 25); but whether it be intended that it is the same Hazor as either of those named before, or that the name was originally Hazor, and had been changed to Hezron, we cannot now decide.

5. ([Vat. Alex. FA.[1] omit; Comp. FA.[3] 'Ασώρ: Asor.) A place in which the Benjamites resided after their return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 33). From the places mentioned with it, as Anathoth, Nob, Ramah, etc., it would seem to have lain north of Jerusalem, and at no great distance therefrom. But it has not yet been discovered. The above conditions are not against its being the same place with BAAL-HAZOR, though there is no positive evidence beyond the name in favor of such an identification.

The word appears in combination — with Baal in BAAL-HAZOR, with Ain in EN-HAZOR. G.

* 6. (ἡ αὐλή: Asor.) In Jer. xlix. 28–33, Hazor appears to denote a region of Arabia under the government of several sheiks (see ver. 38, "kingdoms of Hazor"), whose desolation is predicted by the prophet in connection with that of KEDAR. The inhabitants are described (ver. 31) as a nation dwelling "without gates or bars," i. e. not in cities, but in unwalled villages, חֲצֵרִים (comp. Ezek. xxxviii. 11, and see HAZER, HAZERIM), from which circumstance some would derive the name (see Hitzig on Jer. xlix. 28; Winer, Realw., art. Hazor, 4; and the Rev. J. L. Porter, art. Hazor, 4, in Kitto's Cycl. of Bibl. Lit., 3d ed.). A.

* HEAD-BANDS (Is. iii. 20), probably an incorrect translation; see GIRDLE. H.

HEAD-DRESS. The Hebrews do not appear to have regarded a covering for the head as an essential article of dress. The earliest notice we have of such a thing is in connection with the sacerdotal vestments, and in this case it is described as an ornamental appendage "for glory and for beauty" (Ex. xxviii. 40). The absence of any allusion to a head-dress in passages where we should expect to meet with it, as in the trial of jealousy (Num. v. 18), and the regulations regarding the leper (Lev. xiii. 45), in both of which the "uncovering of the head" refers undoubtedly to the hair, leads to the inference that it was not ordinarily worn in the Mosaic age; and this is confirmed by the practice, frequently alluded to, of covering the head with the mantle. Even in after times it seems to have been reserved especially for purposes of ornament: thus the tzânîph (צָנִיף) is noticed as being worn by nobles (Job xxix. 14), ladies (Is. iii. 23), and kings (Is. lxii. 3), while the peêr (פְּאֵר) was an article of holiday dress (Is. lxi. 3, A. V. "beauty;" Ez. xxiv. 17, 23), and was worn at weddings (Is. lxi. 10): the use of the μίτρα was restricted to similar occasions (Jud. xvi. 8; Bar. v. 2). The former of these terms undoubtedly describes a kind of turban: its primary sense (צָנַף, "to roll around") expresses the folds of linen wound round the head, and its form probably resembled that of the high-priest's mitznepheth (a word derived from the same root, and identical in meaning, for in Zech. iii. 5, tzânîph = mitznepheth), as described by Josephus (Ant. iii. 7, § 3). The renderings of the term in the A. V., "hood" (Is. iii. 23), "diadem" (Job xxix. 14; Is. lxii. 3), "mitre" (Zech. iii. 5), do not convey the right idea of its meaning. The other term, peêr, primarily means an ornament, and is so rendered in the A. V. (Is. lxi. 10; see also ver. 3, "beauty"), and is specifically applied to the head-dress from its ornamental character. It is uncertain what the term properly describes: the modern turban consists of two parts, the knook, a stiff, round cap occasionally rising to a considerable height, and the shash, a long piece of muslin wound about it (Russell, Aleppo, i. 104): Josephus' account of the high-priest's head-dress implies a similar construction; for he says that it was made of thick bands of linen doubled round many times, and sewn together: the whole covered by a piece of fine linen to conceal the seams. Saalschütz (Archæol. i. 27, note) suggests that the tzâniph and the peêr represent the shush and the kwook, the latter rising high above the other, and so the most prominent and striking feature. In favor of this explanation it may be remarked that the peêr is more particularly connected with the migbaah, the high cap of the ordinary priests, in Ex. xxxix. 28, while the tzâniph, as we have seen, resembled the high-priest's mitre, in which the cap was concealed by the linen folds. The objection, however, to this explanation is that the etymological force of peêr is not brought out: may not that term have applied to the jewels and other ornaments with which the turban is frequently decorated (Russell, i. 106), some of which are represented in the accompanying illustration borrowed from Lane's Mod. Egypt. Append. A. The term used for putting on either the tzâniph or the peêr is חָבַשׁ, "to bind round" (Ex. xxix. 9; Lev. viii. 13): hence the words in Ez. xvi. 10, "I girded thee about with fine linen," are to be understood of the turban; and by the use of the same term Jonah (ii. 5) represents the weeds wrapped as a turban round his head. The turban as now worn in the East varies very much in shape; the most prevalent forms are shown in Russell's Aleppo, i. 102.

If the tzâniph and the peêr were reserved for holiday attire, it remains for us to inquire whether any and what covering was ordinarily worn over the head. It appears that frequently the robes supplied the place of a head-dress, being so ample that they might be thrown over the head at pleasure: the râdîd and the tsâiph at all events were so used [DRESS], and the veil served a similar purpose. [VEIL.] The ordinary head-dress of the Bedouin consists of the keffiyeh, a square handkerchief, generally of red and yellow cotton, or cotton and silk, folded so that three of the corners hang down over the back and shoulders, leaving the face exposed, and bound round the head by a cord (Burckhardt, Notes, i. 48). It is not improbable that a similar covering was used by the Hebrews on certain occasions: the "kerchief" in Ez. xiii. 18, has been so understood by some writers (Harmer, Observations, ii. 393), though the word more probably refers to a species of veil; and the σιμικίνθιον (Acts xix. 12, A V. "apron"), as explained by Suidas (τὸ τῆς κεφαλῆς φόρημα), was applicable to the purposes of a head-dress. [HANDKERCHIEF.] Neither of these cases, however, supplies positive evidence on the point, and the general absence of allusions leads to the inference that the head was usually uncovered, as is still the case in many parts of Arabia (Wellsted, Travels, i. 74). The introduction of the Greek hat (πέτασος) by Jason, as an article of dress adapted to the gymnasium, was regarded as a national dishonor (2 Macc. iv. 12): in shape and material the petasus very much resembled the common felt hats of this country (Dict. of Ant. art. Pileus).

Bedouin Head-dress: the Keffiyeh.

The Assyrian head-dress is described in Ez. xxiii. 15 under the terms מְרוּחֵי טְבוּלִים, "exceeding in dyed attire;" it is doubtful, however, whether tebûlim describes the colored material of the head-dress (tinctæ a coloribus quibus tinctæ sint); another sense has been assigned to it more appropriate to the description of a turban (fasciis obvolvit, Ges. Thes. p. 542). The term s'rûchê [מְרוּחֵי] expresses the flowing character of the Eastern head-dress, as it falls down over the back (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 308). The word rendered "hats" in Dan. iii. 21 (כֻּרְבָּלָא) properly applies to a cloak. W. L. B.

HEARTH. 1. אָח: ἐσχάρα: arula (Ges 69), a pot or brazier for containing fire. 2. מוֹקֵד m. and מוֹקָדָה f.: καύστρα, καύσις: incendium (Ges. p. 620). 3. כִּיר, or כִּיּוֹר (Zech. xii. 6). δαλός: caminus; in dual, כִּירַיִם (Lev. xi. 35): χυτρόποδες: chytropodes; A. V. "ranges for pots" (Ges. p. 672).

One way of baking, much practiced in the East, is to place the dough on an iron plate, either laid on, or supported on legs above the vessel sunk in the ground, which forms the oven. This plate or "hearth" is in Arabic طَابِجِن, tajen; a word which has probably passed into Greek in τήγανον. The cakes baked "on the hearth" (Gen. xviii. 6 ἐγκρυφίας, subcinericios panes) were probably baked in the existing Bedouin manner, on hot stones covered with ashes. The "hearth" of king Jehoiakim's winter palace, Jer. xxxvi. 23, was possibly a pan or brazier of charcoal. HEATH (עֲרוֹעֵר, 'ărô'êr, and ערער, 'ar'âr: [a] ἡ ἀγριομυρίκη, ὄνος ἄγριος: myrica). The prophet Jeremiah compares the man "who maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord," to the 'ar'âr in the desert (xvii. 6). Again, in the judgment of Moab (xlviii. 6), to her inhabitants it is said, "Flee, save your lives, and be like the 'ărôêr in the wilderness," where the margin has "a naked tree." There seems no reason to doubt Celsius' conclusion (Hierob. ii. 195), that the 'ar'âr is identical with the 'ar'ar (عَرْعَر) of Arabic writers, which is some species of juniper. Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. 125, 6) states that when he was in the pass of Nemela he observed juniper trees (Arab. 'ar'ar) on the porphyry rocks above. The berries, he adds, have the appearance and taste of the common juniper, except that there is more of the aroma of the pine. "These trees were ten or fifteen feet in height, and hung upon the rocks even to the summits of the cliffs and needles." This appears to be the Juniperus Sabina, or savin, with small scale-like leaves, which are pressed close to the stem, and which is described as being a gloomy-looking bush inhabiting the most sterile soil (see English Cycl. N. Hist. iii. 311); a character which is obviously well suited to the naked or destitute tree spoken of by the prophet. Rosenmüller's explanation of the Hebrew word, which is also adopted by Maurer, "qui destitutus versatur" (Schol. ad Jer. xvii. 6), is very unsatisfactory. Not to mention the tameness of the comparison, it is evidently contradicted by the antithesis in ver. 8: Cursed is he that trusteth in man . . . he shall be like the juniper that grows on the bare rocks of the desert: Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord . . . he shall be as a tree planted by the waters. The contrast between the shrub of the arid desert and the tree growing by the waters is very striking; but Rosenmüller's interpretation appears to us to spoil the whole. Even more unsatisfactory is Michaelis (Supp. Lex. Heb. p. 1971), who thinks "guinea hens" (Numida meleagris) are intended! Gesenius (Thes. p. 1073, 4) understands these two Heb. terms to denote "parietinæ, ædificia eversa" (ruins); but it is more in accordance with the Scriptural passages to suppose that some tree is intended, which explanation, moreover, has the sanction of the LXX. and Vulgate, and of the modern use of a kindred Arabic word.

HEATHEN. The Hebrew words גּוֹי, גּוֹיִם, gôi, gôyim, together with their Greek equivalents ἔθνος, ἔθνη, have been somewhat arbitrarily rendered "nations," "gentiles," and "heathen" in the A. V. It will be interesting to trace the manner in which a term, primarily and essentially general in its signification, acquired that more restricted sense which was afterwards attached to it. Its development is parallel with that of the Hebrew people, and its meaning at any period may be taken as significant of their relative position with regard to the surrounding nations.

1. While as yet the Jewish nation had no political existence, gôyim denoted generally the nations of the world, especially including the immediate descendants of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 18; comp. Gal. iii. 16). The latter, as they grew in numbers and importance, were distinguished in a most marked manner from the nations by whom they were surrounded, and were provided with a code of laws and a religious ritual, which made the distinction still more peculiar. They were essentially a separate people (Lev. xx. 23); separate in habits, morals, and religion, and bound to maintain their separate character by denunciations of the most terrible judgments (Lev. xxvi. 14–38; Deut. xxviii.). On their march through the desert they encountered the most obstinate resistance from Amalek, "chief of the gôyim" (Num. xxiv. 20), in whose sight the deliverance from Egypt was achieved (Lev. xxvi. 45). During the conquest of Canaan and the subsequent wars of extermination, which the Israelites for several generations carried on against their enemies, the seven nations of the Canaanites, Amorites, Hittites, Hivites, Jebusites, Perizzites, and Girgashites (Ex. xxxiv. 24), together with the remnants of them who were left to prove Israel (Josh. xxiii. 13; Judg. iii. 1; Ps. lxxviii. 55), and teach them war (Judg. iii. 2), received the especial appellation of gôyim. With these the Israelites were forbidden to associate (Josh. xxiii. 7); intermarriages were prohibited (Josh. xxiii. 12; 1 K. xi. 2); and as a warning against disobedience the fate of the nations of Canaan was kept constantly before their eyes (Lev. xviii. 24, 25; Deut. xviii. 12). They are ever associated with the worship of false gods, and the foul practices of idolaters (Lev. xviii. xx.), and these constituted their chief distinctions, as gôyim, from the worshippers of the one God, the people of Jehovah (Num. xv. 41; Deut. xxviii. 10). This distinction was maintained in its full force during the early times of the monarchy (2 Sam. vii. 23; 1 K. xi. 4–8, xiv. 24; Ps. cvi. 35). It was from among the gôyim, the degraded tribes who submitted to their arms, that the Israelites were permitted to purchase their bond servants (Lev. xxv. 44, 45), and this special enactment seems to have had the effect of giving to a national tradition the force and sanction of a law (comp. Gen. xxxi. 15). In later times this regulation was strictly adhered to. To the words of Eccl. ii. 7 "I bought men-servants and maid-servants," the Targum adds, "of the children of Ham, and the rest of the foreign nations."

And not only were the Israelites forbidden to intermarry with these gôyim, but the latter were virtually excluded from the possibility of becoming naturalized. An Ammonite or Moabite was shut out from the congregation of Jehovah even to the tenth generation (Deut. xxiii. 3), while an Edomite or Egyptian was admitted in the third (vers. 7, 8). The necessity of maintaining a separation so broadly marked is ever more and more manifest as we follow the Israelites through their history, and observe their constantly recurring tendency to idolatry. Offense and punishment followed each other with all the regularity of cause and effect (Judg. ii. 12, iii. 6–8, &c.).

2. But, even in early Jewish times, the term gôyim received by anticipation a significance of

[a] From the root עָרַר, "to be naked," in allusion c the bare nature of the rocks on which the Juniperus Sabina often grows. Comp. Ps. cii. 17, תְּפִלַּת הָעַרְעָר "the prayer of the destitute" (or ill clad) wider range than the national experience (Lev. xxvi. 33, 38; Deut. xxx. 1), and as the latter was gradually developed during the prosperous times of the monarchy, the gôyim were the surrounding nations generally, with whom the Israelites were brought into contact by the extension of their commerce, and whose idolatrous practices they readily adopted (Ez. xxiii. 30; Am. v. 26). Later still, it is applied to the Babylonians who took Jerusalem (Neh. v. 8; Ps. lxxix. 1, 6, 10), to the destroyers of Moab (Is. xvi. 8), and to the several nations among whom the Jews were scattered during the Captivity (Ps. cvi. 47; Jer. xlvi. 28; Lam. i. 3, &c.), the practice of idolatry still being their characteristic distinction (Is. xxxvi. 18; Jer. x. 2, 3, xiv. 22). This signification it retained after the return from Babylon, though it was used in a more limited sense as denoting the mixed race of colonists who settled in Palestine during the Captivity (Neh. v. 17), and who are described as fearing Jehovah, while serving their own gods (2 K. xvii. 29–33; Ezr. vi. 21).

Tracing the synonymous term ἔθνη through the Apocryphal writings, we find that it is applied to the nations around Palestine (1 Macc. i. 11), including the Syrians and Philistines of the army of Gorgias (1 Macc. iii. 41, iv. 7, 11, 14), as well as the people of Ptolemais, Tyre, and Sidon (1 Macc. v. 9, 10, 15). They were image-worshippers (1 Macc. iii. 48; Wisd. xv. 15), whose customs and fashions the Jews seem still to have had an unconquerable propensity to imitate, but on whom they were bound by national tradition to take vengeance (1 Macc. ii. 68; 1 Esdr. viii. 85). Following the customs of the gôyim at this period denoted the neglect or concealment of circumcision (1 Macc. i. 15), disregard of sacrifices, profanation of the Sabbath, eating of swine's flesh and meat offered to idols (2 Macc. vi. 6–9, 18, xv. 1, 2), and adoption of the Greek national games (2 Macc. iv. 12, 14). In all points Judaism and heathenism are strongly contrasted. The "barbarous multitude" in 2 Macc. ii. 21 are opposed to those who played the man for Judaism, and the distinction now becomes an ecclesiastical one (comp. Matt. xviii. 17). In 2 Esdr. iii. 33, 34, the "gentes" are defined as those "qui habitant in seculo" (comp. Matt. vi. 32; Luke xii. 30).

As the Greek influence became more extensively felt in Asia Minor, and the Greek language was generally used, Hellenism and heathenism became convertible terms, and a Greek was synonymous with a foreigner of any nation. This is singularly evident in the Syriac of 2 Macc. v. 9, 10, 13; cf. John vii. 35; 1 Cor. x. 32; 2 Macc. xi. 2.

In the N. T. again we find various shades of meaning attached to ἔθνη. In its narrowest sense it is opposed to "those of the circumcision" (Acts x. 45; cf. Esth. xiv. 15, where ἀλλόφυλος = ἀπερίτμητος), and is contrasted with Israel, the people of Jehovah (Luke ii. 32), thus representing the Hebrew גּוֹיִם at one stage of its history. But, like gôyim, it also denotes the people of the earth generally (Acts xvii. 26; Gal. iii. 14). In Matt. vi. 7 ἐθνικός is applied to an idolater.

But, in addition to its significance as an ethnographical term, gôyim had a moral sense which must not be overlooked. In Ps. ix. 5, 15, 17 (comp. Ez. vii. 21) the word stands in parallelism with רְשָׁעִים, râshâ, the wicked, as distinguished by his moral obliquity (see Hupfeld on Ps. i. 1); and in ver. 17 the people thus designated are described as "forgetters of God," that know not Jehovah (Jer. x. 25). Again in Ps. lix. 5 it is to some extent commensurate in meaning with בֹּגְדֵי אָוֶן, bôg'dê âven, "iniquitous transgressors;" and in these passages, as well as in Ps. x. 16, it has a deeper significance than that of a merely national distinction, although the latter idea is never entirely lost sight of.

In later Jewish literature a technical definition of the word is laid down which is certainly not of universal application. Elias Levita (quoted by Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, i. 665) explains the sing. gôi as denoting one who is not of Israelitish birth. This can only have reference to its after signification; in the O. T. the singular is never used of an individual, but is a collective term, applied equally to the Israelites (Josh. iii. 17) as to the nations of Canaan (Lev. xx. 23), and denotes simply a body politic. Another distinction, equally unsupported, is made between גּוֹיִם, gôyim, and אֻמִּים, ummim, the former being defined as the nations who had served Israel, while the latter were those who had not (Jalkut Chadûsh, fol. 20, no. 20; Eisenmenger, i. 667). Abarbanel on Joel iii. 2 applies the former to both Christians and Turks, or Ishmaelites, while in Sepher Juchasin (fol. 148, col. 2) the Christians alone are distinguished by this appellation. Eisenmenger gives some curious examples of the disabilities under which a gôi labored. One who kept sabbaths was judged deserving of death (ii. 206), and the study of the law was prohibited to him under the same penalty; but on the latter point the doctors are at issue (ii. 209).

HEAVEN. There are four Hebrew words thus rendered in the O. T., which we may briefly notice. 1. רָקִיעַ (στερέωμα: firmamentum; Luth. Veste), a solid expanse, from רָקַע, "to beat out;" a word used primarily of the hammering out of metal (Ex. xxxix. 3, Num. xvi. 38). The fuller expression is רְקִיעַ הַשָּׁמַיִם (Gen. i. 14 f.). That Moses understood it to mean a solid expanse is clear from his representing it as the barrier between the upper and lower waters (Gen. i. 6 f.), i. e. as separating the reservoir of the celestial ocean (Ps. civ. 3, xxix. 3) from the waters of the earth, or those on which the earth was supposed to float (Ps. cxxxvi. 6). Through its open lattices (אֲרֻבּוֹת Gen. vii. 11; 2 K. vii. 2, 19; comp. κόσκινον, Aristoph. Nub. 373) or doors (דְּלָתַיִם, Ps. lxxviii. 23) the dew and snow and hail are poured upon the earth (Job xxxviii. 22, 37, where we have the curious expression "bottles of heaven," "utres cœli"). This firm vault, which Job describes as being "strong as a molten looking-glass" (xxxvii. 18), is transparent, like pellucid sapphire, and splendid as crystal (Dan. xii. 3; Ex. xxiv. 10; Ez. i. 22; Rev. iv. 6), over which rests the throne of God (Is. lxvi. 1; Ez. i. 26), and which is opened for the descent of angels, or for prophetic visions (Gen. xxviii. 17; Ez. i. 1; Acts vii. 56, x. 11). In it, like gems or golden lamps, the stars are fixed to give light to the earth, and regulate the seasons (Gen. i. 14–19); and the whole magnificent, immeasurable structure (Jer. xxxi. 37) is supported by the mountains as its pillars, or strong foundations (Ps. xviii. 7; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Job xxvi. 11). Similarly the Greeks believed in an οὐρανὸς τολύχαλκος (Hom. Il. v. 504), or σιδήρεος (Hom. Od. xv. 328), or ἀδάμαστος (Orph. Hymn. ad Cælum), which the philosophers called στερέμνιον, or κρυσταλλοειδές (Emped. ap. Plut. de Phil. Plac. ii. 11; Artemid. ap. Sen Nat. Quæst. vii. 13; quoted by Gesenius, s. v.) It is clear that very many of the above notions were mere metaphors resulting from the simple primitive conception, and that later writers among the Hebrews had arrived at more scientific views, although of course they retained much of the old phraseology, and are fluctuating and undecided in their terms. Elsewhere, for instance, the heavens are likened to a curtain (I's. civ. 2; Is. xl. 22). In A. V. "heaven" and "heavens" are used to render not only רָקִיעַ, but also שָׁמַיִם, מָרוֹם, and שְׁחָקִים, for which reason we have thrown together under the former word the chief features ascribed by the Jewish writers to this portion of the universe. [FIRMAMENT, Amer. ed.]

2. שָׁמַיִם is derived from שָׁמָה, "to be high." This is the word used in the expression "the heaven and the earth," or "the upper and lower regions" (Gen. i. 1), which was a periphrasis to supply the want of a single word for the Cosmos (Deut. xxxii. 1; Is. i. 2; Ps. cxlviii. 13). "Heaven of heavens" is their expression of infinity (Neh. ix. 6; Ecclus. xvi. 18).

3. מָרוֹם, used for heaven in Ps. xviii. 16; Jer. xxv. 30; Is. xxiv. 18. Properly speaking it means a mountain, as in Ps. cii. 19, Ez. xvii. 23. It must not, however, be supposed for a moment that the Hebrews had any notion of a "Mountain of Meeting," like Albordsh, the northern hill of Babylonish mythology (Is. xiv. 13), or the Greek Olympus, or the Hindoo Meru, the Chinese Kuenlun, or the Arabian Caf (see Kalisch, Gen. p. 24, and the authorities there quoted), since such a fancy is incompatible with the pure monotheism of the Old Testament.

4. שְׁחָקִים, "expanses," with reference to the extent of heaven, as the last two words were derived from its height; hence this word is often used together with שָׁמַיִם, as in Deut. xxxiii. 26; Job xxxv. 5. In the A. V. it is sometimes rendered clouds, for which the fuller term is עָבֵי שְׁחָקִים (Ps. xviii. 12). The word שָׁחַק means first "to pound," and then "to wear out." So that, according to some, "clouds" (from the notion of dust) is the original meaning of the word. Gesenius, however, rejects this opinion (Thes. s. v.).

In the N. T. we frequently have the word οὐρανός, which some consider to be a Hebraism, or a plural of excellence (Schleusner, Lex. Nov. Test., s. v.). St. Paul's expression ἕως τρίτου οὐρανοῦ (2 Cor. xii. 2) has led to much conjecture. Grotius said that the Jews divided the heaven into three parts, namely, (1.) Nubiferum, the air or atmosphere, where clouds gather. (2.) Astriferum, the firmament, in which the sun, moon, and stars are fixed. (3.) Empyreum, or Angeliferum, the upper heaven, the abode of God and his angels, i. e. 1. עוֹלָם הִיתכוֹן (or רָקִיעַ); 2. עוֹלָם שֵׁפֶל (or שָׁמַיִם); and 3. עוֹלָם הָעֶלְיוֹן (or "heaven of heavens," שְׁמֵי שְׁמַיִם). This curiously explicit statement is entirely unsupported by Rabbinic authority, but it is hardly fair of Meyer to call it a fiction, for it may be supposed to rest on some vague Biblical evidence (cf. Dan. iv. 12, "the fowls of the heaven;" Gen. xxii. 17, "the stars of the heaven;" Ps. ii. 4, "he that sitteth in the heavens," etc.). The Rabbis spoke of two heavens (cf. Deut. x. 14, "the heaven and the heaven of heavens"), or seven (ἑπτὰ οὐρανοὺς οὕς τινες ἀριθμοῦσι κατ' ἐπανάβασιν, Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 7, p. 636). "Resch Lakisch dixit septem esse cœlos, quorum nomina sunt, 1. velum; 2. expansum; 3. nubes; 4. habitaculum; 5. habitatio; 6. sedes fixa; 7. Araboth," or sometimes "the treasury." At the sin of Adam, God ascended into the first; at the sin of Cain into the second; during the generation of Enoch into the third, etc.; afterwards God descended downwards into the sixth at the time of Abraham, into the fifth during the life of Isaac, and so on down to the time of Moses, when He redescended into the first (see many passages quoted by Wetstein, ad 2 Cor. xii. 2). Of all these definitions and deductions we may remark simply with Origen, ἑπτὰ δὲ οὐρανοὺς ἢ ὅλως περιωρισμένον ἀριθμὸν αὐτῶν αἱ φερόμεναι ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἀπαγγέλλουσι γραφαί (c. Cels. vi. c. 21. p. 289) [i. e. "of seven heavens, or any definite number of heavens, the Scriptures received in the churches of God do not inform us"].

If nothing has here been said on the secondary senses attached to the word "heaven," the omission is intentional. The object of this Dictionary is not practical, but exegetical; not theological, but critical and explanatory. A treatise on the nature and conditions of future beatitude would here be wholly out of place. We may, however, remark that as heaven was used metaphorically to signify the abode of Jehovah, it is constantly employed in the N. T. to signify the abode of the spirits of the just. (See for example Matt. v. 12, vi. 20; Luke x. 20, xii. 33; 2 Cor. v. 1; Col. i. 5.)

* HEAVE-OFFERING. [SACRIFICE.]

HE'BER. The Heb. עֵבֶר and חֶבֶר are more forcibly distinguished than the English Eber and Heber. In its use, however, of this merely aspirate distinction the A. V. of the O. T. is consistent: Eber always = עֵבֶר, and Heber חֶבֶר. In Luke iii. 35, Heber = Eber, Ἔβερ; the distinction so carefully observed in the O. T. having been neglected by the translators of the N. T.

The LXX. has a similar distinction, though not consistently carried out. It expresses עֵבֶר by Ἔβερ (Gen. x. 21), Ἕβερ (1 Chr. i. 25), Ἑβραίους (Num. xxiv. 24); while חֶבֶר is variously given as Χοβόρ, Χαβέρ, Ἀβάρ, or Ἀβέρ. In these words, however, we can clearly perceive two distinct groups of equivalents, suggested by the effort to express two radically different forms. The transition from Χοβόρ through Χαβέρ to Ἀβέρ is sufficiently obvious.

The Vulg. expresses both indifferently by Heber except in Judg. iv. 11 ff., where Haber is probably suggested by the LXX. Χαβέρ; and Num. xxiv. 24, Hebræos, evidently after the LXX. Ἐβραίους.

Excluding Luke iii. 35, where Heber = Eber, we have in the O. T. six of the name.

1. Grandson of the Patriarch Asher (Gen. xlvi. 17; 1 Chr. vii. 31; Num. xxvi. 45).

2. Of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 18).

3. [Ὡβήδ; Alex. Ιωβηδ; Comp. Ἐβέρ: Heber.] A Gadite (1 Chr. v. 13).

4. A Benjamite (1 Chr. viii. 17).

5. [Ὡβήδ; Vat. Ωβδη; Ald. Ἀβέρ: Heber.] Another Benjamite (1 Chr. viii. 22).

6. Heber, the Kenite, the husband of Jael (Judg. iv. 11–17, v. 24). It is a question how he could be a Kenite, and yet trace his descent from Hobab, or Jethro, who was priest of Midian. The solution is probably to be sought in the nomadic habits of the tribe, as shown in the case of Heber himself, of the family to which he belonged (Judg. i. 16), and of the Kenites generally (in 1 Sam. xv. 6, they appear among the Amalekites). It should be observed that Jethro is never called a Midianite, but expressly a Kenite (Judg. i. 16); that the expression "priest of Midian," may merely serve to indicate the country in which Jethro resided; lastly, that there would seem to have been two successive migrations of the Kenites into Palestine, one under the sanction of the tribe of Judah at the time of the original occupation, and attributed to Jethro's descendants generally (Judg. i. 16); the other a special, nomadic expedition of Heber's family, which led them to Kedesh in Naphtali, at that time the debatable ground between the northern tribes, and Jabin, King of Canaan. We are not to infer that this was the final settlement of Heber: a tent seems to have been his sole habitation when his wife smote Sisera (Judg. iv. 21).

7. (Ἐβερ: Heber.) The form in which the name of the patriarch EBER is given in the genealogy. Luke iii. 35. T. E. B.

* HEBREW LANGUAGE. See SHEMITIC LANGUAGES, §§ 6–13.

HE'BREW, HE'BREWS. This word first occurs as applied to Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13): it was afterwards given as a name to his descendants. Four derivations have been proposed: —

I. Patronymic from Abram.

II. Appellative from עָבַר.

III. Appellative from עֵבֶר.

IV. Patronymic from Eber.

I. From Abram, Abræi, and by euphony Hebræi (August., Ambrose). Displaying, as it does, the utmost ignorance of the language, this derivation was never extensively adopted, and was even retracted by Augustine (Retract. 16). The euphony alleged by Ambrose is quite imperceptible, and there is no parallel in the Lat. meridie = mezidie.

II. עִבְרִי, from עָבַר = "crossed over," applied by the Canaanites to Abraham upon his crossing the Euphrates (Gen. xiv. 13, where LXX. περάτης = transitor). This derivation is open to the strong objection that Hebrew nouns ending in are either patronymics, or gentilic nouns (Buxtorf, Leusden). This is a technical objection which, though fatal to the περάτης, or appellativ derivation as traced back to the verb, does not apply to the same as referred to the noun עבר. The analogy of Galli, Angli, Hispani derived from Gallia, Anglia, Hispania (Leusd.), is a complete blunder in ethnography; and at any rate it would confirm rather than destroy the derivation from the noun.

III. This latter comes next in review, and is essentially the same with II.; since both rest upon the hypothesis that Abraham and his posterity were called Hebrews in order to express a distinction between the races E. and W. of the Euphrates. The question of fact is not essential whether Abraham was the first person to whom the word was applied, his posterity as such inheriting the name; or whether his posterity equally with himself were by the Canaanites regarded as men from "the other side" of the river. The real question at issue is whether the Hebrews were so called from a progenitor Eber (which is the fourth and last derivation), or from a country which had been the cradle of their race, and from which they had emigrated westward into Palestine; in short, whether the word Hebrew is a patronymic, or a gentile noun.

IV. The latter opinion in one or other of its phases indicated above is that suggested by the LXX., and maintained by Jerome, Theodor., Origen, Chrysost., Arias Montanus, R. Bechai, Paul Burg., Münster, Grotius, Scaliger, Selden, Rosenm., Gesen., Eichhorn; the former is supported by Joseph., Suidas, Bochart, Vatablus, Drusius, Vossius, Buxtorf, Hottinger, Leusden, Whiston, Bauer. As regards the derivation from עֵבֶר, the noun (or according to others the prep.), Leusden himself, the great supporter of the Buxtorfian theory, indicates the obvious analogy of Transmarini, Transylvani, Transalpini, words which from the description of a fixed and local relation attained in process of time to the independence and mobility of a gentile name. So natural indeed is it to suppose that Eber (trans, on the other side) was the term used by a Canaanite to denote the country E. of the Euphrates, and Hebrew the name which he applied to the inhabitants of that country, that Leusden is driven to stake the entire issue as between derivations III. and IV. upon a challenge to produce any passage of the O. T. in which עֵבֶר הַנָּהָר = עֵבֶר. If we accept Rosenm. Schol. on Num. xxiv. 24, according to which Eber by parallelism with Asshur = Trans-Euphratian, this challenge is met. But if not, the facility of the abbreviation is sufficient to create a presumption in its favor; while the derivation with which it is associated harmonizes more perfectly than any other with the later usage of the word Hebrew, and is confirmed by negative arguments of the strongest kind. In fact it seems almost impossible for the defenders of the patronymic Eber theory to get over the difficulty arising from the circumstance that no special prominence is in the genealogy assigned to Eber, such as might entitle him to the position of head or founder of the race. From the genealogical scheme in Gen. xi. 10–26, it does not appear that the Jews thought of Eber as a source primary, or even secondary, of the national descent. The genealogy neither starts from him, nor in its uniform sequence does it rest upon him with any emphasis. There is nothing to distinguish Eber above Arphaxad, Peleg, or Serug. Like them he is but a link in the chain by which Shem is connected with Abraham. Indeed the tendency of the Israelitish retrospect is to stop at Jacob. It is with Jacob that their history as a nation begins: beyond Jacob they held their ancestry in common with the Edomites; beyond Isaac they were in danger of being confounded with the Ishmaelites. The predominant figure of the emphatically Hebrew Abraham might tempt them beyond those points of affinity with other races, so distasteful, so anti-national; but it is almost inconceivable that they would voluntarily originate, and perpetuate an appellation of themselves which landed them on a platform of ancestry where they met the whole population of Arabia (Gen. x. 25, 30).

As might have been expected, an attempt has been made to show that the position which Eber occupies in the genealogy is one of no ordinary kind, and that the Hebrews stood in a relation to him which was held by none other of his descendants, and might therefore be called par excellence "the children of Eber."

There is, however, only one passage in which it is possible to imagine any peculiar resting-point as connected with the name of Eber. In Gen. x. 21 Shem is called "the father of all the children of Eber." But the passage is apparently not so much genealogical as ethnographical; and in this view it seems evident that the words are intended to contrast Shem with Ham and Japheth, and especially with the former. Now Babel is plainly fixed as the extreme E. limit of the posterity of Ham (ver. 10), from whose land Nimrod went out into Assyria (ver. 11, margin of A. V.): in the next place, Egypt (ver. 13) is mentioned as the W. limit of the same great race; and these two extremes having been ascertained, the historian proceeds (ver. 15–19) to fill up his ethnographic sketch with the intermediate tribes of the Canaanites. In short, in ver. 6–20, we have indications of three geographical points which distinguish the posterity of Ham, namely, Egypt, Palestine, and Babylon. At the last-mentioned city, at the river Euphrates, their proper occupancy, unaffected by the exceptional movement of Asshur, terminated, and at the same point that of the descendants of Shem began. Accordingly, the sharpest contrast that could be devised is obtained by generally classing these latter nations as those beyond the river Euphrates; and the words "father of all the children of Eber," i. e. father of the nations to the east of the Euphrates, find an intelligible place in the context.

But a more tangible ground for the specialty implied in the derivation of Hebrew from Eber is sought in the supposititious fact that Eber was the only descendant of Noah who preserved the one primeval language; and it is maintained that this language transmitted by Eber to the Hebrews, and to them alone of all his descendants, constitutes a peculiar and special relation (Theodor., Voss., Leusd.).

It is obvious to remark that this theory rests upon three entirely gratuitous assumptions: first, that the primeval language has been preserved; next, that Eber alone preserved it; lastly, that having so preserved it, he communicated it to his son Peleg, but not to his son Joktan.

The first assumption is utterly at variance with the most certain results of ethnology: the two others are grossly improbable. The Hebrew of the O. T. was not the language of Abraham when he first entered Palestine: whether he inherited his language from Eber or not, decidedly the language which he did speak must have been Chaldee (comp. Gen. xxxi. 47), and not Hebrew (Eichhorn). This supposed primeval language was in fact the language of the Canaanites, assumed by Abraham as more or less akin to that in which he had been brought up, and could not possibly have been transmitted to him by Eber.

The appellative (περάτης) derivation is strongly confirmed by the historical use of the word Hebrew. A patronymic would naturally be in use only among the people themselves, while the appellative which had been originally applied to them as strangers in a strange land would probably continue to designate them in their relations to neighboring tribes, and would be their current name among foreign nations. This is precisely the case with the terms Israelite and Hebrew respectively. The former was used by the Jews of themselves among themselves, the latter was the name by which they were known to foreigners. It is used either when foreigners are introduced as speaking (Gen. xxxix. 14, 17, xli. 12; Ex. i. 16, ii. 6: 1 Sam. iv. 6, 9, xiii. 19, xiv. 11, xxix. 3), or where they are opposed to foreign nations (Gen. xliii. 32; Ex. i. 15, ii. 11; Deut. xv. 12; 1 Sam. xiii. 3, 7). So in Greek and Roman writers we find the name Hebrews, or, in later times, Jews (Pausan. v. 5, § 2, vi. 24, § 6; Plut. Sympos. iv. 6, 1; Tac. Hist. v. 1; Joseph. passim). In N. T. we find the same contrast between Hebrews and foreigners (Acts vi. 1; Phil. iii. 5); the Hebrew language is distinguished from all others (Luke xxiii. 38; John v. 2, xix. 13; Acts xxi. 40, xxvi. 14; Rev. ix. 11); while in 2 Cor. xi. 22, the word is used as only second to Israelite in the expression of national peculiarity.

Gesenius has successfully controverted the opinion that the term Israelite was a sacred name, and Hebrew the common appellation.

Briefly, we suppose that Hebrew was originally a Cis-Euphratian word applied to Trans-Euphratian immigrants; it was accepted by these immigrants in their external relations; and after the general substitution of the word Jew, it still found a place in that marked and special feature of national contradistinction, the language (Joseph. Ant. i. 6, § 4; Suidas, s. v. Ἑβραῖοι; Euseb. de Præp. Evang. ii. 4; Ambrose, Comment. in Phil. iii. 5; August. Quæst. in Gen. 24; *Consens. HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE. The principal questions which have been raised, and the opinions which are current respecting this epistle may be considered under the following heads:

I. Its canonical authority.
II. Its author.
III. To whom was it addressed?
IV. Where and when was it written?
V. In what language was it written?

VI. Condition of the Hebrews, and scope of the Epistle.

VII. Literature connected with it.

I. The most important question that can be entertained in connection with this epistle touches its canonical [a] authority.

The universal Church, by allowing it a place among the Holy Scriptures, acknowledges that there is nothing in its contents inconsistent with the rest of the Bible. But the peculiar position which is assigned to it among the epistles shows a trace of doubts as to its authorship or canonical authority, two points which were blended together in primitive times. Has it then a just claim to be received by us as a portion of that Bible which contains the rule of our faith and the rule of our practice, laid down by Christ and his Apostles? Was it regarded as such by the Primitive Church, to whose clearly-expressed judgment in this matter all later generations of Christians agree to defer?

Of course, if we possessed a declaration by an inspired apostle that this epistle is canonical, all discussion would be superfluous. But the interpretation (by F. Spanheim and later writers) of 2 Pet. iii. 15 as a distinct reference to St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews seems scarcely tenable. For, if the "you" whom St. Peter addresses be all Christians (see 2 Pet. i. 2), the reference must not be limited to the Epistle to the Hebrews; or if it include only (see 2 Pet. iii. 1) the Jews named in 1 Pet. i. 1, there may be special reference to the Galatians (vi. 7–9) and Ephesians (ii. 3–5), but not to the Hebrews.

Was it then received and transmitted as canonical by the immediate successors of the Apostles? The most important witness among these, Clement (A. D. 70 or 95), refers to this epistle in the same way as, and more frequently than, to any other canonical book. It seems to have been "wholly transfused," says Mr. Westcott (On the Canon, p. 32), into Clement's mind. Little stress can be laid upon the few possible allusions to it in Barnabas, Hermas, Polycarp, and Ignatius. But among the extant authorities of orthodox Christianity during the first century after the epistle was written, there is not one dissentient voice, whilst it is received as canonical by Clement writing from Rome; by Justin Martyr,[b] familiar with the traditions of Italy and Asia; by his contemporaries, Pinytus (?) the Cretan bishop, and the predecessors of Clement and Origen at Alexandria; and by the compilers of the Peshito version of the New Testament. Among the writers of this period who make no reference to it, there is not one whose subject necessarily leads us to expect him to refer to it. Two heretical teachers, Basilides at Alexandria and Marcion at Rome, are recorded as distinctly rejecting the epistle.

But at the close of that period, in the North African church, where first the Gospel found utterance in the Latin tongue, orthodox Christianity first doubted the canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Gospel, spreading from Jerusalem along the northern and southern shores of the Mediterranean, does not appear to have borne fruit in North Africa until after the destruction of Jerusalem had curtailed intercourse with Palestine And it came thither not on the lips of an inspired apostle, but shorn of much of that oral tradition in which, with many other facts, was embodied the ground of the eastern belief in the canonical authority and authorship of this anonymous epistle. To the old Latin version of the Scriptures, which was completed probably about A. D. 170, this epistle seems to have been added as a composition of Barnabas, and as destitute of canonical authority. The opinion or tradition thus embodied in that age and country cannot be traced further back. About that time the Roman Church also began to speak Latin; and even its latest Greek writers gave up, we know not why, the full faith of the Eastern Church in the canonical authority of this epistle.

During the next two centuries the extant fathers of the Roman and North African churches regard the epistle as a book of no canonical authority. Tertullian, if he quotes it, disclaims its authority and speaks of it as a good kind of apocryphal book written by Barnabas. Cyprian leaves it out of the number of St. Paul's epistles, and, even in his books of Scripture Testimonies against the Jews, never makes the slightest reference to it. Irenæus, who came in his youth to Gaul, defending in his

[a] The Rev. J. Jones, in his Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the N. T., indicates the way in which an inquiry into this subject should be conducted; and Dr. N. Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel History is a storehouse of ancient authorities. But both these great works are nearly superseded for ordinary purposes by the invaluable compendium of the Rev. B. F. Westcott, On the Canon of the New Testament, to which the first part of this article is greatly indebted. [There is a 2d edition of this work, Lond. 1866.]

[b] Lardner's remark, that it was not the method of Justin to use allusions so often as other authors have done, may supply us with something like a middle point between the conflicting declarations of two living writers, both entitled to be heard with attention. The index of Otto's edition of Justin contains more than 50 references by Justin to the epistles of St. Paul; while Prof. Jowett (On the Thessalonians, etc., 1st ed. i. 345) puts forth in England the statement that Justin was unacquainted with St. Paul and his writings.

* This statement is modified in the 2d edition of Prof. Jowett's work (Lond. 1859). He there says (i. 444) that "Justin refers to the Twelve in several passages, but nowhere in his genuine writings mentions St. Paul. And when speaking of the books read in the Christian assemblies, he names only the Gospels and the Prophets. (Apol. i. 67.) . . . On the other hand, it is true that in numerous quotations from the Old Testament, Justin appears to follow St. Paul." The statement that "the index of Otto's edition of Justin contains more than 50 references by Justin to the epistles of St Paul" is not correct, if his index to Justin's undisputed works is intended, the number being only 39 (exclusive of 6 to the Epistle to the Hebrews), and 16 of these being to quotations from or allusions to the Old Testament common to Justin and St. Paul. In most of the remainder, the correspondence in language between Justin and the epistles of St. Paul is not close. Still the evidence that Justin was acquainted with the writings of the great Apostle to the Gentiles appears to be satisfactory. See particularly on this point the articles of Otto in Illgen's Zeitschr. f. d. hist. Theol., 1842, Heft 2, pp. 41–54, and 1843, Heft 1, pp. 34–43. In such works as the two Apologies and the Dialogue with Trypho, quotations from St. Paul were not to be expected. That Justin was acquainted with the Epistle to the Hebrews is also probable, but that he regarded it as "canonical" can hardly be proved or disproved See the careful and judicious remarks of Mr. Westcott, Canon of the New Test., 2d ed., p. 146 ff.

great work the Divinity of Christ, never quotes, scarcely refers to the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Muratorian Fragment on the Canon leaves it out of the list of St. Paul's epistles. So did Caius and Hippolytus, who wrote at Rome in Greek; and so did Victorinus of Pannonia. But in the fourth century its authority began to revive; it was received by Hilary of Poitiers, Lucifer and Faustinus of Cagliari, Fabius and Victorinus of Rome, Ambrose of Milan, and Philaster (?) and Gaudentius of Brescia. At the end of the fourth century, Jerome, the most learned and critical of the Latin Fathers, reviewed the conflicting opinions as to the authority of this epistle. He considered that the prevailing, though not universal view of the Latin churches, was of less weight than the view, not only of ancient writers, but also of all the Greek and all the Eastern churches, where the epistle was received as canonical and read daily; and he pronounced a decided opinion in favor of its authority. The great contemporary light of North Africa, St. Augustine, held a similar opinion. And after the declaration of these two eminent men, the Latin churches united with the East in receiving the epistle. The 3d Council of Carthage, A. D. 397, and a decretal of Pope Innocent, A. D. 416, gave a final confirmation to their decision.

Such was the course and the end of the only considerable opposition which has been made to the canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Its origin has not been ascertained. Some critics have conjectured that the Montanist or the Novatian controversy instigated, and that the Arian controversy dissipated, so much opposition as proceeded from orthodox Christians. The references to St. Paul in the Clementine Homilies have led other critics to the startling theory that orthodox Christians at Rome, in the middle of the second century, commonly regarded and described St. Paul as an enemy of the Faith; — a theory which, if it were established, would be a much stranger fact than the rejection of the least accredited of the epistles which bear the Apostle's name. But perhaps it is more probable that that jealous care, with which the Church everywhere, in the second century, had learned to scrutinize all books claiming canonical authority, misled, in this instance, the churches of North Africa and Rome. For to them this epistle was an anonymous writing, unlike an epistle in its opening, unlike a treatise in its end, differing in its style from every apostolic epistle, abounding in arguments and appealing to sentiments which were always foreign to the Gentile, and growing less familiar to the Jewish mind. So they went a step beyond the church of Alexandria, which, while doubting the authorship of this epistle, always acknowledged its authority. The church of Jerusalem, as the original receiver of the epistle, was the depository of that oral testimony on which both its authorship and canonical authority rested, and was the fountain-head of information which satisfied the Eastern and Greek churches. But the church of Jerusalem was early hidden in exile and obscurity. And Palestine, after the destruction of Jerusalem, became unknown ground to that class of "dwellers in Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome," who once maintained close religious intercourse with it. All these considerations may help to account for the fact that the Latin churches hesitated to receive an epistle, the credentials of which, from peculiar circumstances, were originally imperfect, and had become inaccessible to them when their version of Scripture was in process of formation, until religious intercourse betweeen East and West again grew frequent and intimate in the fourth century.

But such doubts were confined to the Latin churches from the middle of the second to the close of the fourth century. All the rest of orthodox Christendom from the beginning was agreed upon the canonical authority of this epistle. No Greek or Syriac writer ever expressed a doubt. It was acknowledged in various public documents: received by the framers of the Apostolical Constitutions (about A. D. 250, Beveridge); quoted in the epistle of the Synod of Antioch, A. D. 269; appealed to by the debaters in the first Council of Nice; included in that catalogue of canonical books which was added (perhaps afterwards) to the canons of the Council of Laodicea, A. D. 365; and sanctioned by the Quinisextine Council at Constantinople, A. D. 692.

Cardinal Cajetan, the opponent of Luther, was the first to disturb the tradition of a thousand years, and to deny the authority of this epistle. Erasmus, Calvin, and Beza questioned only its authorship. The bolder spirit of Luther, unable to perceive its agreement with St. Paul's doctrine, pronounced it to be the work of some disciple of the Apostle, who had built not only gold, silver, and precious stones, but also wood, hay, and stubble upon his master's foundation. And whereas the Greek Church in the fourth century gave it sometimes the tenth [a] place, or at other times, as it now does, and as the Syrian, Roman, and English churches do, the fourteenth place among the epistles of St. Paul, Luther, when he printed his version of the Bible, separated this book from St. Paul's epistles, and placed it with the epistles of St. James and St. Jude, next before the Revelation; indicating by this change of order his opinion that the four relegated books are of less importance and less authority [b] than the rest of the New Testament. His opinion found some promoters; but it has not been adopted in any confession of the Lutheran Church.

The canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews is then secure, so far as it can be established by the tradition of Christian churches. The doubts which affected it were admitted in remote places, or in the failure of knowledge, or under the pressure of times of intellectual excitement; and they have disappeared before full information and calm judgment.

II. Who was the author of the Epistle? — This question is of less practical importance than the last; for many books are received as canonical, whilst little or nothing is known of their writers. In this epistle the superscription, the ordinary source of information, is wanting. Its omission has been accounted for, since the days of Clement of Alexandria (apud Euseb. H. E. vi. 14) and Chrysostom, by supposing that St. Paul withheld his name, lest the sight of it should repel any Jewish Christians who might still regard him rather as an enemy of the law (Acts xxi. 21) than as a benefactor to their nation (Acts xxiv. 17). And

[a] The Vatican Codex (B), A. D. 350, bears traces of an earlier assignment of the fifth place to the Ep. to the Hebrews. [See BIBLE, p. 305 b, Amer. ed.]

Pantænus, or some other predecessor of Clement, adds that St. Paul would not write to the Jews as an Apostle because he regarded the Lord himself as their Apostle (see the remarkable expression, Heb. iii. 1, twice quoted by Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 12, 63).

It was the custom of the earliest fathers to quote passages of Scripture without naming the writer or the book which supplied them. But there is no reason to doubt that at first, everywhere, except in North Africa, St. Paul was regarded as the author. "Among the Greek fathers," says Olshausen (Opuscula, p. 95), no one is named either in Egypt, or in Syria, Palestine, Asia, or Greece, who is opposed to the opinion that this epistle proceeds from St. Paul." The Alexandrian fathers, whether guided by tradition or by critical discernment, are the earliest to note the discrepancy of style between this epistle and the other thirteen. And they received it in the same sense that the speech in Acts xxii. 1–21 is received as St. Paul's. Clement ascribed to St. Luke the translation of the epistle into Greek from a Hebrew original of St. Paul. Origen, embracing the opinion of those who, he says, preceded him, believed that the thoughts were St. Paul's, the language and composition St. Luke's or Clement's of Rome. Tertullian, knowing nothing of any connection of St. Paul with the epistle, names Barnabas as the reputed author according to the North African tradition, which in the time of Augustine had taken the less definite shape of a denial by some that the epistle was St. Paul's, and in the time of Isidore of Seville appears as a Latin opinion (founded on the dissonance of style) that it was written by Barnabas or Clement. At Rome Clement was silent as to the author of this as of the other epistles which he quotes; and the writers who follow him, down to the middle of the fourth century, only touch on the point to deny that the epistle is St. Paul's.

The view of the Alexandrian fathers, a middle point between the Eastern and Western traditions, won its way in the Church. It was adopted as the most probable opinion by Eusebius;[a] and its gradual reception may have led to the silent transfer which was made about his time, of this epistle from the tenth place in the Greek Canon to the fourteenth, at the end of St. Paul's epistles, and before those of other Apostles. This place it held everywhere till the time of Luther; as if to indicate the deliberate and final acquiescence of th universal church in the opinion that it is one of the works of St. Paul, but not in the same full sense[b] as the other ten [nine] epistles, addressed to particular churches, are his.

In the last three centuries every word and phrase in the epistle has been scrutinized with the most exact care for historical and grammatical evidence as to the authorship. The conclusions of individual inquirers are very diverse; but the result has not been any considerable disturbance of the ancient tradition.[c] No new kind of difficulty has been discovered: no hypothesis open to fewer objections than the tradition has been devised. The laborious work of the Rev. C. Forster (The Apostolical Authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews), which is a storehouse of grammatical evidence, advocates the opinion that St. Paul was the author of the language, as well as the thoughts of the epistle. Professor Stuart, in the Introduction to his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, discusses the internal evidence at great length, and agrees in opinion with Mr. Forster.[d] Dr. C. Wordsworth, On the Canon of the Scriptures,

[a] Professor Blunt, On the Right Use of the Early Fathers, pp. 439–444. gives a complete view of the evidence of Clement, Origen, and Eusebius as to the authorship of the epistle.

[b] In this sense may be fairly understood the indirect declaration that this epistle is St. Paul's, which the Church of England puts into the mouth of her ministers in the Offices for the Visitation of the Sick and the Solemnization of Matrimony.

[c] Bishop Pearson (De successione priorum Romæ episcoporum, ch. viii. § 8) says that the way in which Timothy is mentioned (xiii. 23) seems to him a sufficient proof that St. Paul was the author of this epistle. For another view of this passage see Bleek. i. 273.

[d] * It has been asserted by some German critics, as Schulz and Seyffarth, that an unusually large proportion of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα, or peculiar words, is found in the Epistle to the Hebrews as compared with other epistles of Paul. This is denied by Prof. Stuart, who institutes an elaborate comparison between this epistle and the First Epistle to the Corinthians in reference to this point. (See his Comm. on Hebrews, 2d ed., p. 217 ff., 223 ff.) As the result of this examination, he finds in 1 Cor. 230 words which occur nowhere else in the writings of Paul; while in the Epistle to the Hebrews, according to the reckoning of Seyffarth, there are only 118 words of this class. Taking into account the comparative length of the two epistles, the number of peculiar words in the Epistle to the Hebrews as compared with that in 1 Cor. is, according to Prof. Stuart, in the proportion of 1 to 1½. Hence he argues, that "if the number of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα in our epistle proves that it was not from the hand of Paul, it must be more abundantly evident that Paul cannot have been the author of the First Epistle to the Corinthians."

The facts in the case, however, are very different from what Prof. Stuart supposes. In the first place, 20 of his ἅπαξ λεγόμενα in 1st Corinthians are found in the Epistle to the Hebrews, which, to make the comparison tolerably fair, should be assumed as Pauline; 5 others are found only in quotations; and 13 more do not properly belong in the list, while 25 should be added to it. Correcting these errors, we find the number of peculiar words in 1 Cor. to be about 217 On the other hand, the number of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα in the Epistle to the Hebrews, not reckoning, of course, those in quotations from the Old Testament, instead of being only 118, as Prof. Stuart assumes, is about 300. (The precise numbers vary a little according to the text of the Greek Testament adopted as the basis of comparison.) Leaving out of account quotations from the Old Testament, the number of lines in the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, in Knapp's edition of the Greek Testament, is 922; in the Epistle to the Hebrews, 640. We have then the proportion — 640 : 922 : : 300 : 432; showing that if the number of peculiar words was as great in 1 Corinthians in proportion to its length as in the Epistle to the Hebrews, we should find there 432 instead of about 217. In other words, the number of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα in Hebrews exceeds that in 1 Corinthians in nearly the proportion of 2 to 1. No judicious critic would rest an argument in such a case on the mere number of peculiar words; but if this matter is to be discussed at all, it is desirable that the facts should be correctly presented. There is much that is erroneous or fallacious in Professor Stuart's other remarks on the internal evidence. The work of Mr. Forster in relation to this subject (mentioned above), displays the same intellectual characteristics as his treatise on the Himyaritic Inscriptions, his One Primeval Language, and his New Plea for the Authenticity of the Text of the Three Heavenly Witnesses (1 John v. 7), recently published A

Lect. ix., leans to the same conclusion. Dr. S. Davidson, in his Introduction to the New Testament, gives a very careful and minute summary of the arguments of all the principal modern critics who reason upon the internal evidence, and concludes, in substantial agreement with the Alexandrian tradition, that St. Paul was the author of the epistle, and that, as regards its phraseology and style, St. Luke coöperated with him in making it what it now appears. The tendency of opinion in Germany has been to ascribe the epistle to some other author than St. Paul. Luther's conjecture, that Apollos was the author, has been widely adopted by Le Clerc, Bleek, De Wette, Tholuck, Bunsen, and others.[a] [Apollos, Amer. ed.] Barnabas has been named by Wieseler, Thiersch, and others,[b] Luke by Grotius, Silas by others. Neander attributes it to some apostolic man of the Pauline school, whose training and method of stating doctrinal truth differed from St. Paul's. The distinguished name of H. Ewald has been given recently to the hypothesis (partly anticipated by Wetstein), that it was written neither by St. Paul, nor to the Hebrews, but by some Jewish teacher residing at Jerusalem to a church in some important Italian town, which is supposed to have sent a deputation to Palestine. Most of these guesses are quite destitute of historical evidence, and require the support of imaginary facts to place them on a seeming equality with the traditionary account. They cannot be said to rise out of the region of possibility into that of probability; but they are such as any man of leisure and learning might multiply till they include every name in the limited list that we possess of St. Paul's contemporaries.

The tradition of the Alexandrian fathers is not without some difficulties. It is truly said that the style of reasoning is different from that which St. Paul uses in his acknowledged epistles. But it may be replied, — Is the adoption of a different style of reasoning inconsistent with the versatility of that mind which could express itself in writings so diverse as the Pastoral Epistles and the preceding nine? or in speeches so diverse as those which are severally addressed to pagans at Athens and Lycaonia, to Jews at Pisidian Antioch, to Christian elders at Miletus? Is not such diversity just what might be expected from the man who in Syrian Antioch resisted circumcision and St. Peter, but in Jerusalem kept the Nazarite vow, and made concessions to Hebrew Christians; who professed to become "all things to all men" (1 Cor. ix. 22); whose education qualified him to express his thoughts in the idiom of either Syria or Greece, and to vindicate to Christianity whatever of eternal truth was known in the world, whether it had become current in Alexandrian philosophy, or in Rabbinical tradition?

If it be asked to what extent, and by whom was St. Paul assisted in the composition of this epistle, the reply must be in the words of Origen, "Who wrote [i. e. as in Rom. xvi. 22, wrote from the author's dictation[c]] this epistle, only God knows." The style is not quite like that of Clement of Rome. Both style and sentiment are quite unlike those of the author of the Epistle of Barnabas Of the three apostolic men named by African fathers, St. Luke is the most likely to have shared in the composition of this epistle. The similarity in phraseology which exists between the acknowledged writings of St. Luke and this epistle; his constant companionship with St. Paul, and his habit of listening to and recording the Apostle's arguments, form a strong presumption in his favor.

But if St. Luke were joint-author with St. Paul, what share in the composition is to be assigned to him? This question has been asked by those who regard joint-authorship as an impossibility, and ascribe the epistle to some other writer than St. Paul. Perhaps it is not easy, certainly it is not necessary, to find an answer which would satisfy or silence persons who pursue an historical inquiry into the region of conjecture. Who shall define the exact responsibility of Timothy or Silvanus, or Sosthenes in those seven epistles which St. Paul inscribes with some of their names conjointly with his own? To what extent does St. Mark's language clothe the inspired recollections of St. Peter, which, according to ancient tradition, are recorded in the second Gospel? Or, to take the acknowledged writings of St. Luke himself, — what is the share of the "eye-witnesses and ministers of the word" (Luke i. 2), or what is the share of St. Paul himself in that Gospel, which some persons, not without countenance from tradition, conjecture that St. Luke wrote under his master's eye, in the prison at Cæsarea; or who shall assign to the follower and the master their portions respectively in those seven characteristic speeches at Antioch, Lystra, Athens, Miletus, Jerusalem, and Cæsarea? If St. Luke wrote down St. Paul's Gospel, and condensed his missionary speeches, may he not have taken afterwards a more important share in the composition of this epistle?

III. To whom was the Epistle sent? — This question was agitated as early as the time of Chrysostom, who replies — to the Jews in Jerusalem and Palestine. The ancient tradition preserved by Clement of Alexandria, that it was originally written in Hebrew by St. Paul, points to the same quarter. The unfaltering tenacity with which the Eastern Church from the beginning maintained the authority of this epistle leads to the inference that it was sent thither with sufficient credentials in the first instance. Like the First Epistle of St. John it has no inscription embodied in its text, and yet it differs from a treatise by containing several direct personal appeals, and from a homily, by closing with messages and salutations. Its present title, which, though ancient, cannot be proved to have [a] Among these must now be placed Dean Alford, who in the fourth volume of his Greek Testament (published since the above article was in type), discusses the question with great care and candor, and concludes that the epistle was written by Apollos to the Romans, about A. D. 69, from Ephesus.

[b] Among these are some, who, unlike Origen, deny that Barnabas is the author of the epistle which bears his name. If it be granted that we have no specimen of his style, the hypothesis which connects him with the Epistle to the Hebrews becomes less improbable. Many circumstances show that he possessed some qualifications for writing such an epistle; such as his Levitical descent, his priestly education, his reputation at Jerusalem, his acquaintance with Gentile churches, his company with St. Paul, the tradition of Tertullian, etc.

[c] Lünemann, followed by Dean Alford, argues that Origen must have meant here, as he confessedly does a few lines further on, to indicate an author, not a scribe, by ὁ γράψας; but he acknowledges that Olshausen, Stenglein, and Delitzsch, do not allow the necessity been inscribed by the writer of the epistle, might have been given to it, in accordance with the use of the term Hebrews in the N. T., if it had been addressed either to Jews who lived at Jerusalem, and spoke Aramaic (Acts vi. 1), or to the descendants of Abraham generally (2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5).

But the argument of the epistle is such as could be used with most effect to a church consisting exclusively of Jews by birth, personally familiar with,[a] and attached to, the Temple-service. And such a community (as Bleek, Hebräer, i. 31, argues) could be found only in Jerusalem and its neighborhood. And if the church at Jerusalem retained its former distinction of including a great company of priests (Acts vi. 7) — a class professionally familiar with the songs of the Temple, accustomed to discuss the interpretation of Scripture, and acquainted with the prevailing Alexandrian philosophy — such a church would be peculiarly fit to appreciate this epistle. For it takes from the Book of Psalms the remarkable proportion of sixteen out of thirty-two quotations from the O. T., which it contains. It relies so much on deductions from Scripture that this circumstance has been pointed out as inconsistent with the tone of independent apostolic authority, which characterizes the undoubted epistles of St. Paul. And so frequent is the use of Alexandrian philosophy and exegesis that it has suggested to some critics Apollos as the writer, to others the Alexandrian church as the primary recipient of the epistle.[b] If certain members of the church at Jerusalem possessed goods (Heb. x. 34), and the means of ministering to distress (vi. 10), this fact is not irreconcilable, as has been supposed, with the deep poverty of other inhabitants of Jerusalem (Rom. xv. 26, &c.); but it agrees exactly with the condition of that church thirty years previously (Acts ii. 45, and iv. 34), and with the historical estimate of the material prosperity of the Jews at this time (Merivale, History of the Romans under the Empire, vi. 531, ch. lix.). If St. Paul quotes to Hebrews the LXX. without correcting it where it differs from the Hebrew, this agrees with his practice in other epistles, and with the fact that, as elsewhere so in Jerusalem, Hebrew was a dead language, acquired only with much pains by the learned. The Scriptures were popularly known in Aramaic or Greek: quotations were made from memory, and verified by memory. Probably Prof. Jowett is correct in his inference (1st edit. i. 361), that St. Paul did not familiarly know the Hebrew original, while he possessed a minute knowledge of the LXX.

Ebrard limits the primary circle of readers even to a section of the church at Jerusalem. Considering such passages as v. 12, vi. 10, x. 32, as probably inapplicable to the whole of that church, he conjectures that St. Paul wrote to some neophytes whose conversion, though not mentioned in the Acts, may have been partly due to the Apostle's influence in the time of his last recorded sojourn in Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 22).

Some critics have maintained that this epistle was addressed directly to Jewish believers everywhere; others have restricted it to those who dwelt in Asia and Greece. Almost every city in which St. Paul labored has been selected by some critic as the place to which it was originally sent. Not only Rome and Cæsarea, where St. Paul was long imprisoned, but, amid the profound silence of its early Fathers, Alexandria also, which he never saw, have each found their advocates. And one conjecture connects this epistle specially with the Gentile Christians of Ephesus. These guesses agree in being entirely unsupported by historical evidence; and each of them has some special plausibility combined with difficulties peculiar to itself.

IV. Where and when was it written? — Eastern traditions of the fourth century, in connection with the opinion that St. Paul is the writer, name Italy and Rome, or Athens, as the place from whence the epistle was written. Either place would agree with, perhaps was suggested by, the mention of Timothy in the last chapter. An inference in favor of Rome may be drawn from the Apostle's long captivity there in company with Timothy and Luke. Cæsarea is open to a similar inference; and it has been conjecturally named as the place of the composition of the Epp. to the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philippians: but it is not supported by any tradition. From the expression "they of (ἀπό) Italy," xiii. 24, it has been inferred that the writer could not have been in Italy; but Winer (Grammatik, § 66, 6), denies that the preposition necessarily has that force.

The epistle was evidently written before the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70. The whole argument, and specially the passages viii. 4 and ff., ix. 6 and ff. (where the present tenses of the Greek are unaccountably changed into past in the English version), and xiii. 10 and ff. imply that the Temple was standing, and that its usual course of Divine service was carried on without interruption. A Christian reader, keenly watching in the doomed[c] city for the fulfillment of his Lord's prediction, would at once understand the ominous references to "that which beareth thorns and briers, and is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned;" "that which decayeth and waxeth old, and is ready to vanish away;" and the coming of the expected "Day," and the removing of those things that are shaken, vi. 8, viii. 13, x. 25, 37, xii. 27. But these forebodings seem less distinct and circumstantial than they might have been if uttered immediately before the catastrophe. The references to former teachers xiii. 7, and earlier instruction v. 12, and x. 32, might suit any time after the first years of the church; but it would be interesting to connect the first reference with the martyrdom[d] of St. James at the Passover A. D. 62. Modern criticism has not destroyed, though it has weakened, the connection of this epistle with St. Paul's Roman captivity (A. D. 61–63) by substituting the reading τοῖς δεσμίοις, "the prisoners," for τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου (A. V. "me in my bonds)," x. 34; by proposing to interpret ἀπολελυμένον, xiii 23, as "sent away," rather than "set at liberty;" and by urging that the condition of the writer, as portrayed in xiii. 18, 19, 23, is not necessarily that of a prisoner, and that there may possibly be no allusion to it in xiii. 3. On the whole, the date which best agrees with the traditionary account of the authorship and destination of the epistle is A. D. 63, about the end of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, or a year after Albinus succeeded Festus as procurator.

V. In what language was it written? — Like St. Matthew's Gospel, the Epistle to the Hebrews has afforded ground for much unimportant controversy respecting the language in which it was originally written. The earliest statement is that of Clement of Alexandria (preserved in Euseb. H. E. vi. 14), to the effect that it was written by St. Paul in Hebrew, and translated by St. Luke into Greek; and hence, as Clement observes, arises the identity of the style of the epistle and that of the Acts. This statement is repeated, after a long interval, by Eusebius, Theodoret, Jerome, and several later fathers: but it is not noticed by the majority. Nothing is said to lead us to regard it as a tradition, rather than a conjecture suggested by the style of the epistle. No person is said to have used or seen a Hebrew original. The Aramaic copy, included in the Peshito, has never been regarded otherwise than as a translation. Among the few modern supporters of an Aramaic original the most distinguished are Joseph Hallet, an English writer in 1727 (whose able essay is most easily accessible in a Latin translation in Wolf's Curæ Philologicæ, iv. 806–837), and J. D. Michaelis, Erklär. des Briefes an die Hebräer. Bleek (i. 6–23), argues in support of a Greek original, on the grounds of (1) the purity and easy flow of the Greek; (2) the use of Greek words which could not be adequately expressed in Hebrew without long periphrase; (3) the use of paronomasia — under which head he disallows the inference against an Aramaic original which has been drawn from the double sense given to διαθήκη, ix. 15; and (4) the use of the Septuagint in quotations and references which do not correspond with the Hebrew text.

VI. Condition of the Hebrews, and scope of the Epistle. — The numerous Christian churches scattered throughout Judæa (Acts ix. 31; Gal. i. 22) were continually exposed to persecution from the Jews (1 Thess. ii. 14), which would become more searching and extensive as churches multiplied, and as the growing turbulence of the nation ripened into the insurrection of A. D. 66. Personal violence, spoliation of property, exclusion from the synagogue, and domestic strife were the universal forms of persecution. But in Jerusalem there was one additional weapon in the hands of the predominant oppressors of the Christians. Their magnificent national Temple, hallowed to every Jew by ancient historical and by gentler personal recollections, with its irresistible attractions, its soothing strains, and mysterious ceremonies, might be shut against the Hebrew Christian. And even if, amid the fierce factions and frequent oscillations of authority in Jerusalem, this affliction were not often laid upon him, yet there was a secret burden which every Hebrew Christian bore within him — the knowledge that the end of all the beauty and awfulness of Zion was rapidly approaching. Paralyzed, perhaps, by this consciousness, and enfeebled by their attachment to a lower form of Christianity, they became stationary in knowledge, weak in faith, void of energy, and even in danger of apostasy from Christ. For, as afflictions multiplied round them, and made them feel more keenly their dependence on God, and their need of near and frequent and associated approach to Him, they seemed, in consequence of their Christianity, to be receding from the God of their fathers, and losing that means of communion with Him which they used to enjoy. Angels, Moses and the High-priest — their intercessors in heaven in the grave, and on earth — became of less importance in the creed of the Jewish Christian; their glory waned as he grew in Christian experience Already he felt that the Lord's day was superseding the Sabbath, the New Covenant the Old. What could take the place of the Temple, and that which was behind the veil, and the Levitical sacrifices and the Holy City, when they should cease to exist? What compensation could Christianity offer him for the loss which was pressing[a] the Hebrew Christian more and more.

James, the bishop of Jerusalem, had just left his place vacant by a martyr's death. Neither to Cephas at Babylon, nor to John at Ephesus, the third pillar of the Apostolic Church, was it given to understand all the greatness of his want, and to speak to him the word in season. But there came to him from Rome the voice of one who had been the foremost in sounding the depth and breadth of that love of Christ which was all but incomprehensible to the Jew, one who feeling more than any other Apostle the weight of the care of all the churches, yet clung to his own people with a love ever ready to break out in impassioned words, and unsought and ill-requited deeds of kindness. He whom Jerusalem had sent away in chains to Rome again lifted up his voice in the hallowed city among his countrymen; but with words and arguments suited to their capacity, with a strange, borrowed accent, and a tone in which reigned no apostolic authority, and a face veiled in very love from wayward children who might refuse to hear divine and saving truth, when it fell from the lips of Paul.

He meets the Hebrew Christians on their own ground. His answer is — "Your new faith gives you Christ, and, in Christ, all you seek, all your fathers sought. In Christ the Son of God you have an all-sufficient Mediator, nearer than angels to the Father, eminent above Moses as a benefactor, more sympathizing and more prevailing than the high-priest as an intercessor: His sabbath awaits you in heaven; to His covenant the old was intended to be subservient; His atonement is the eternal reality[b] of which sacrifices are but the passing shadow; His city heavenly, not made with hands. Having Him, believe in Him with all your heart, with a faith in the unseen future, strong as that of the saints of old, patient under present, and prepared for coming woe, full of energy, and hope, and holiness, and love."

Such was the teaching of the Epistle to the He brews. We do not possess the means of tracing out step by step its effect upon them; but we know that the result at which it aimed was achieved. The church at Jerusalem did not apostatize. It migrated to Pella (Eusebius, H. E. iii. 5); and there, no longer dwindled under the cold shadow of overhanging Judaism, it followed the Hebrew Christians of the Dispersion in gradually entering on the possession of the full liberty which the law of Christ allows to all.

And this great epistle remains to after times, a keystone binding together that succession of inspired men which spans over the ages between Moses and St. John. It teaches the Christian student the substantial identity of the revelation of God, whether given through the Prophets, or through the Son; for it shows that God's purposes are unchangeable, however diversely in different ages they have been "reflected in broken and fitful rays, glancing back from the troubled waters of the human soul." It is a source of inexhaustible comfort to every Christian sufferer in inward perplexity, or amid "reproaches and afflictions." It is a pattern to every Christian teacher of the method in which larger views should be imparted, gently, reverently, and seasonably, to feeble spirits prone to cling to ancient forms, and to rest in accustomed feelings.

VII. Literature connected with the Epistle. — In addition to the books already referred to, four commentaries may be selected as the best representatives of distinct lines of thought; — those of Chrysostom, Calvin, Estius, and Bleek. Lünemann (1855 [3d ed. 1867]), and Delitzsch (1858) have recently added valuable commentaries to those already in existence.

The commentaries accessible to the English reader are those of Professor Stuart (of Andover, U. S. [2d ed., 1833, abridged by Prof. R. D. C. Robbins, Andover, 1860]), and of Ebrard, translated by the Rev. J. Fulton [in vol. vi. of Olshausen's Bibl. Comm., Amer. ed.]. Dr. Owen's Exercitations on the Hebrews are not chiefly valuable as an attempt at exegesis. The Paraphrase and Notes of Peirce [2d ed. Lond. 1734] are praised by Dr. Doddridge. Among the well-known collections of English notes on the Greek text or English version of the N. T., those of Hammond, Pell, Whitby, Macknight, Wordsworth, and Alford may be particularly mentioned. In Prof. Stanley's Sermons and Essays on the Apostolical Age there is a thoughtful and eloquent sermon on this epistle; and it is the subject of three Warburtonian Lectures, by the Rev. F. D. Maurice [Lond. 1846].

A tolerably complete list of commentaries on this epistle may be found in Bleek, vol. ii. pp. 10–16, and a comprehensive but shorter list at the end of Ebrard's Commentary. W. T. B.

T.* 2d ed. p. 314), and others. In justice to this opinion, the chief arguments urged in its support may be more particularly stated. Those furnished by the epistle itself may be classified according to their general nature as formal, doctrinal, personal:

I. To the first class belong, (1.) The absence of a salutation, and in general the treatise-like character of the epistle. The explanation of Pantænus (?) is inadequate, for Paul might have sent a salutation without styling himself "apostle" (cf. Epp. to Phil. Thess. Philem.); the supposition of Clement of Alexandria attributes to the Apostle a procedure which, even if quite worthy of him, was hardly practicable, certainly hazardous, and plainly at variance with the indications that the author was known to his readers (cf. xiii. 18, 19, 22 f.); the assumption that Paul in this epistle abandoned his ordinary manner of composition for some unknown reason, admits the facts, but adopts what, in view of the thirteen extant specimens of his epistolary style, is the less probable explanation of them. (2.) The peculiarities relative to the employment of the O. T. Paul quotes the O. T. freely, in the epistle it is quoted with punctilious accuracy; Paul very often gives evidence of having the Hebrew in mind, the epistle almost (if not quite) uniformly reproduces the LXX. version, and that, too, in a form of the text (Cod. Alex.) differing generally from the LXX. text employed by the Apostle (Cod. Vat.), Paul commonly introduces his quotations as "Scripture," often gives the name of the human author, but in the epistle the quotations, with but a single exception (ii. 6), are attributed more or less directly to God. (3.) The characteristics of expression. (a.) The epistle is destitute of many of Paul's favorite expressions — expressions which, being of a general nature and pertinent in any epistle, betray the Apostle's habits of thought. For instance, the phrase ἐν Χριστῷ, which occurs 78 times in the acknowledged epistles of Paul (being found in all except the short Epistle to Titus), does not occur in the Epistle to the Hebrews, although this epistle, quotations excluded, is rather more than one seventh as long as the aggregate length of the other thirteen; the phrase ὁ κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός (variously modified as respects arrangement and pronouns), which occurs in every one of Paul's epistles, and more than 80 times in all, is not to be found in the Epistle to the Hebrews; the word εὐαγγέλιον, though used 60 times by Paul, and in all his epistles except that to Titus, is not met with in this epistle; he uses πατήρ, applied to God 36 times by Paul (exclusive of 6 instances in which God is called the Father of Christ), and occurring in every one of his epistles, is so used but once in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and then by way of antithesis (Heb. xii. 9). (b.) It substitutes certain synonymous words and constructions in place of those usual with Paul: ex. gr. μισθαποδοσία for the simple μισθός employed by Paul; μέτοχον εἶναι, etc., instead of Paul's κοινωνόν etc.; the intransitive use of καθίζω in the phrase καθίζω ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ θεοῦ, where Paul uses the verb transitively; the expression διαπαντός, εἰς τὸ παντελές, εἰς τὸ διηνεκές instead of Paul's πάντοτε. (c.) It exhibits noticeable peculiarities of expression: the phrase εἰς τὸ διηνεκές belongs to this class also; other specimens are the use of ὅσον . . . κατὰ τοσοῦτο or οὕτω, τοσούτῳ . . . ὅσῳ, or ὅσῳ alone, and of παρά and ὑπέρ in expressing comparison; connectives, like ἐφάπαξ (three times), ὅθεν (six times), which are never used by Paul. (d.) And in general its language and style differ from Paul's — its language, in being less Hebraistic, more literary, more idiomatic in construction; its style, in being less impassioned, more regular, more rhythmical and euphonious. These differences have been generally conceded from the first, and by such judges as Clement of Alexandria and Origen, to whom Greek was vernacular. They are not satisfactorily accounted for by supposing a considerable interval of time to have elapsed between the composition of the other epistles and this — for so far as we are acquainted with the Apostle's history we can find no room for such an interval, and his style as exhibited in the other epistles shows no tendency towards the required transformation; nor by assuming that Paul elaborated his style because writing to Jews — for the Jews were not accustomed to finished Greek, and he who 'to the Jews became as a Jew' did not trouble himself to polish his style on occasions when such labor might have been appreciated (cf 2 Cor. xi. 6); nor by attributing the literary elegance of the epistle to its amanuensis — for the other epistles were dictated to different persons, yet exhibit evident marks of a common author.

II. The doctrinal indications at variance with the theory of its Pauline authorship do not amount to a conflict in any particular with the presentations of truth made by the Apostle; nor are its divergencies from the Pauline type of doctrine so marked as those of James and John. Still, it has peculiarities which are distinctive: Paul delights to present the Gospel as justification before God though faith in the Crucified One; in the Epistle to the Hebrews, on the other hand, it is represented as consummated Judaism. In accordance with this fundamental difference, the epistle defines and illustrates faith in a generic sense, as trust in God's assurances and as antithetic to sight: whereas with Paul faith is specific — a sinner's trust in Christ — and antithetic (generally) to works: it sets forth the eternal high-priesthood of the Messiah, while Paul dwells upon Christ's triumphant resurrection: in it the seed of Abraham are believing Jews, while Paul everywhere makes Gentiles joint-heirs with Jews of the grace of life: it is conspicuous, too, among the N. T. writings for its spiritualizing, at times half-mystical, mode of interpreting the O. T. Further, these different presentations of the Christian doctrine are in general made to rest upon different grounds: Paul speaks as the messenger of God, often referring, indeed, to the O. T., but still oftener quietly assuming plenary authority to declare truth not revealed to holy men of old; but the writer to the Hebrews rests his teaching upon Biblical statements almost exclusively.

III. Among the matters personal which seem to conflict with the opinion that the epistle is Paul's, are enumerated, (1.) The circumstance that it is addressed to Jewish readers: if Paul wrote it, he departed, in doing so, from his ordinary province of labor (cf. Gal. ii. 9; Rom. xv. 20). (2.) The omission of any justification of his apostolic course relative to Judaism; and, assuming the epistle to have been destined for believers at Jerusalem, his use of language implying affectionate intimacy with them (xiii. 19, etc.; cf. Acts xxi. 17 f.). (3.) The cool, historic style in which reference is made to the early persecutions and martyrdoms of the church at Jerusalem (xiii. 7, xii. 4). In these Paul had been a prominent actor; and such passages as 1 Cor. xv. 9; 1 Tim. i. 12 f., show how he was accustomed to allude to them, even in writing to third parties. (4.) The intimation (ii. 3) that the writer, like his readers, received the Gospel indirectly, through those who had been the personal disciples of Christ. Paul, on the contrary, uniformly insists that he did not receive the Gospel through any human channel, but by direct revelation; and he accordingly claims coequality with the other Apostles (Gal. i. 1, 11, 12, 15, 16; ii. 6; 1 Cor. ix. 1; xi. 23; Eph. iii. 2, 3; 2 Cor. xi. 5). The reply, that the writer here uses the plural communicatively and, strictly speaking, does not mean to include himself, is unsatisfactory. For he does not quietly drop a distinction out of sight; he expressly designates three separate classes, namely, "the Lord," "them that heard," and "we," and, in the face of this explicit distinction, includes himself in the third class — this he does, although his argument would have been strengthened had he been able (like Paul) to appeal to a direct revelation from heaven.

These internal arguments are not offset by the evidence from tradition. Respecting that evidence, statements like Olshausen's give an impression not altogether correct. For, not to mention that Eusebius, although often citing the epistle as Paul's, elsewhere admits (as Origen had virtually done before him, Euseb. H. E. vi. 25) that its apostolic origin was not wholly unquestioned by the oriental churches (H. E. iii. 3), and in another passage (H. E. vi. 13) even classes it himself among the antilegomena, it is noticeable that the Alexandrian testimony from the very first gives evidence that the epistle was felt to possess characteristics at variance with Pauline authorship. The statement of Clement that the epistle was translated from the Hebrew, is now almost unanimously regarded as incorrect; how then can we be assured of the truth of the accompanying assertion — or rather, the other half of the same statement — that it was written by Paul? Further, in the conflict of testimony between the East and the West, it is not altogether clear that the probabilities favor the East. Half a century before we find the epistle mentioned in the East, and hardly thirty years after it was written, it was known and prized at Rome by a man anciently believed to have been a fellow-laborer with the Apostle. It seems hardly possible that, had Paul been its author, Clement should have been ignorant of the fact; or that, the fact once known, knowledge of it should have died out while the epistle itself survived. And yet in all parts of the West — n Gaul, Italy, Africa — the epistle was regarded as un-Pauline.

The theory that Paul was mediately or indirectly the author, has been adopted by Hug (Einl. ii. 422 f.), Ebrard (in Olshausen's Com. on N. T., vi. 620, Kendrick's ed.), Guericke (Gesammtgesch. des N. T. p. 419 f.), Davidson (Introduction to the N. T. iii 256 f.), Delitzsch (in Rudelbach and Guericke's Zeitschr. for 1849, trans. in the Evangel. Rev. Mercersburg, Oct. 1850, p. 184 ff., and in his Com. p. 707), Bloomfield (Gr. Test., 9th ed., ii. 574 ff.), Roberts (Discussions on the Gospels, pt. i. chap. vi.), and others, who think Luke to have given the epistle its present form; by Thiersch (in the Progr. named above, and in Die Kirche im Apost. Zeitalt. p. 197 f.), Conybeare (as above), and others, who make Barnabas chiefly responsible for its style; by Olshausen (Opusc. p. 118 ff.), who supposes that sundry presbyters were concerned in its origin; and by many who regard the Apostle's assistant as unknown. Now respecting the theory of mediate authorship it may be remarked: If Paul dictated the epistle, and Luke or some other scribe merely penned it, Paul remains its sole author; this was his usual mode of composing; this mode of composition does not occasion any perceptible diversity in his style; hence, this form of the hypothesis is useless as an explanation of the epistle's peculiarities. Again, if the epistle is assumed to be the joint production of Paul and some friend or friends, the assumption is unnatural, without evidence, without unequivocal analogy in the origin of any other inspired epistle, and insufficient to remove the difficulties in the case. Once more, if we suppose the ideas to be in the main Paul's, but their present form to be due to some one else, then Paul, not having participated actively in the work of composing the epistle, cannot according to the ordinary use of language be called its author. Whatever be the capacity in which Paul associates Timothy, Silvanus, and Sosthenes with himself in the salutation prefixed to some of his epistles, — and it is noteworthy that he does not on this account hesitate to continue in the 1st pers. sing. (see Phil. i. 3), or to use the 3d pers. of his associate at the very next mention of him (ii. 19), — the assumption of some similar associate in composing the Epistle to the Hebrews, even if it had historic warrant, would not answer the purpose designed. For the style of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, in which Sosthenes is conjoined with Paul, bears the Apostle's impress as unmistakably as does the style of the 2d Epistle to the Corinthians, where Timothy writes in the salutation. And in both, the individuality of the Apostle is as sharply defined as it is in the Epistle to the Romans. (The philological evidence thought by Delitzsch to show Luke's hand in the composition, has been collected and examined by Lünemann, as above, § 1.)

The opinion that Paul was the proper and sole author (besides the modern advocates of it already named), has been defended by Gelpke (Vindiciæ, etc.), a writer in the Spirit of the Pilgrims for 1828 and 1829 (in reply to Prof. Norton), Gurney in the Bibl. Repos. for 1832, p. 409 ff., extracted from Biblical Notes and Dissertations, Lond. 1830), Stier (Der Brief an die Hebräer, ii. p. 422), Lewin (Life and Epp. of St. Paul, ii. 332–899), writers in the Journal of Sacred Lit. for 1860, pp. 102 ff., 193 ff., Hofmann (Schriftbeweis. ii. 2, 2te Aufl., p. 378, cf. p. 105), Robbins (in the Bibl. Sacra for 1861, p. 469 ff.), cf. Tobler (in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr. for 1864, p. 353 ff.); Wordsworth (Gr. Review for Jan. 1868, p. 29 ff.); — see a review of the evidence in favor of, and against, the Pauline authorship, in the Bibl. Sacra for Oct. 1867.

The opinion that the epistle was destined originally for Alexandrian readers (in opposition to which see Lünem. Handb. Einl. § 2), has been adopted by Köstlin (as above, p. 388 ff.), Wieseler (as above, and in the Stud. u. Krit. for 1867, p. 665 ff.), Conybeare and Howson (as above), Bunsen (Hippol. and his Age, ii. 140, Germ. ed. i. 365), Hilgenfeld (Zeitschr. f. wiss. Theol., 1858, p. 103), Ritschl (as above), and seems to be favored by Muratori's Fragment (see Westcott, Canon of the N. T. 2d ed. p. 480, cf. p. 190). Rome as its destination has been advocated fully by Holtzmann in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift for 1867, pp. 1–35.

The date of the epistle is fixed by Ebrard at A. D. 62; by Lardner, Davidson, Schaff, Lindsay, and others at 63; by Lange (in Herzog's Real-Encyk. xi. 245) towards 64; by Stuart, Tholuck, and others about 64; by Wieseler in the year 64 "between spring and July"; by Riehm, Hilgenfeld (as above) 64–66; De Wette, Lünemann, and others 65–67; Ewald "summer of 66"; Bunsen 67; Conybeare and Howson, Bleek (Einl. ins N. T. p. 533) 68–9; Alford 68–70.

The doctrine of the epistle has been specially discussed by Neander (Planting, etc. bk. vi. chap ii. Robinson's ed. p. 487 f.), Köstlin (Johan. Lehrbegr. p. 387 ff.), Reuss (Histoire de la Théologie Chrétienne, tom. ii.), Messner (as above), most fully by Riehm (as above); its Christology by Moll (in a series of programs, 1854 ff.), A. Sarrus (Jésus Christ d'après l'auteur de l'Ép. aux Hebr., Strasb. 1861), and Beyschlag (Christologie des N. T., 1866, p. 176 ff.). The Melchisedec priesthood is treated of by Auberlen (Stud. u. Krit. for 1857, p. 453 ff.).

Its mode of employing the O. T. has been considered by De Wette (Theol. Zeitschr. by Schleierm., De Wette and Lücke, 3te Heft, p. 1 ff.), Tholuck (Beilage i. to his Com., also published separately with the title *Das alte Test. im N. HE'BRON (חֶבְרוֹן) [union, alliance]: Χεβρών; [Rom. in 1 Chr. xv. 9, Χεβρώμ:] Hebron). 1. The third son of Kohath, who was the second son of Lævi; the younger brother of Amram, father of Moses and Aaron (Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18, xxiii. 12). The immediate children of Hebron are not mentioned by name (comp. Ex. vi. 21, 22), but he was the founder of a "family" (Mishpachah) of Hebronites (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23, 30, 31) or Bene-Hebron (1 Chr. xv. 9, xxiii. 19), who are often mentioned in the enumerations of the Levites in the passages above cited. JERIAH was the head of the family in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 31, xxiv. 23: in the last of these passages the name of Hebron does not now exist in the Hebrew, but has been supplied in the A. V. from the other lists). In the last year of David's reign we find them settled at Jazer in Gilead (a place not elsewhere named as a Levitical city), "mighty men of valor" (גִּבֵּי חַיִל), 2,700 in number, who were superintendents for the king over the two and a half tribes in regard to all matters sacred and secular (1 Chr. xxvi. 31, 32). At the same time 1700 of the family under Hashabiah held the same office on the west [a] of Jordan (ver. 30).

2. This name appears in the genealogical lists of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 42, 43), where Mareshah is said to have been the "father of Hebron," who again had four sons, one of whom was Tappuach. The three names just mentioned are those of places, as are also many others in the subsequent branches of this genealogy — Ziph, Maon, Beth-zur, etc. But it is impossible at present to say whether these names are intended to be those of the places themselves or of persons who founded them. HE'BRON (חֶבְרוֹן [see supra]: Χεβρών and Χεβρών: [Hebron; 1 Macc. v. 65, Chebron:] Arab. الخليل = the friend), a city of Judah (Josh. xv. 54): situated among the mountains (Josh. xx. 7), 20 Roman miles south of Jerusalem, and the same distance north of Beer-sheba (Onom. s. v. Ἀρκώ). Hebron is one of the most ancient cities in the world still existing; and in this respect it is the rival of Damascus. It was built, says a sacred writer, "seven years before Zoan in Egypt" (Num. xiii. 22). But when was Zoan built? It is well we can prove the high antiquity of Hebron independently of Egypt's mystic annals. It was a well-known town when Abraham entered Canaan 3780 years ago (Gen. xiii. 18). Its original name was Kirjath-Arba (קִרְיַת־אַרְבַּע: LXX., Κριαθ-αρβοκσεφέρ, Judg. i. 10), "the city of Arba;" so called from Arba, the father of Anak, and progenitor of the giant Anakim (Josh. xxi. 11, xv. 13, 14). It was sometimes called Mamre, doubtless from Abraham's friend and ally, Mamre the Amorite (Gen. xxiii. 19, xxxv. 27); but the "oak of Mamre," where the Patriarch so often pitched his tent, appears to have been not in, but near Hebron. [MAMRE.] The chief interest of this city arises from its having been the scene of some of the most remarkable events in the lives of the patriarchs. Sarah died at Hebron; and Abraham then bought from Ephron the Hittite the field and cave of Machpelah, to serve as a family tomb (Gen. xxiii. 2–20). The cave is still there; and the massive walls of the Haram or mosque, within which it lies, form the most remarkable object in the whole city. [MACHPELAH.] [b] Abraham is called by Mohammedans el-Khalil, "the Friend," i. e. of God, and this is the modern name of Hebron. When the Israelites entered Palestine Hebron was taken by Joshua from the descendants of Anak, and given to Caleb (Josh. x. 36, xiv. 6–15, xv. 13, 14). It was assigned to the Levites, and made "a city of refuge" (Josh. xxi. 11–13). Here David first established the seat of his government, and dwelt during the seven years and a half he reigned over Judah (2 Sam. v. 5). Hebron was rebuilt after the Captivity; but it soon fell into the hands of the Edomites, from whom it was rescued by Judas Maccabæus (Neh. xi. 25; 1 Macc v. 65; Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 6). A short time before the capture of Jerusalem Hebron was burned by an officer of Vespasian (Joseph. B. J. iv. 9, § 9). About the beginning of the 12th century it was captured by the Crusaders. It subsequently lay for a time in ruins (Albert Aq. vii. 15; Sæwulf in Early Travels in Pal., p. 45); but in A. D. 1167 it was made the seat of a Latin bishopric (Will. Tyr. xx. 3). In 1187 it reverted to the Muslems, and has ever since remained in their hands.

Hebron now contains about 5000 inhabitants, of whom some 50 families are Jews. It is picturesquely situated in a narrow valley, surrounded by rocky hills. This, in all probability, is that "valley of Eshcol," whence the Jewish spies got the great bunch of grapes (Num. xiii. 23). Its sides are still clothed with luxuriant vineyards, and its grapes are considered the finest in Southern Palestine. Groves of gray olives, and some other fruit-trees, give variety to the scene. The valley runs from north to south: and the main quarter of the town, surmounted by the lofty walls of the venerable Haram, lies partly on the eastern slope (Gen. xxxvii. 14; comp. xxiii. 19). [ESHCOL.] The houses are all of stone, solidly built, flat-roofed, each having one or two small cupolas. The town has no walls, but the main streets opening on the principal roads have gates. In the bottom of the valley south of the town is a large tank, 130 ft. square, by 50 deep; the sides are solidly built with hewn stones. At the northern end of the principal quarter is another, measuring 85 ft. long, by 55 broad. Both are of high antiquity; and one of them, probably the former, is that over which David hanged the murderers of Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 12). About a mile from the town, up the valley, is one of the largest oak-trees in Palestine. It stands quite alone in the midst of the vineyards. It is 23 ft. in girth, and its branches cover a space 90 ft. in diameter. This, say some, is the very tree beneath which Abraham pitched his tent; but, however this may be, it still bears the name of the patriarch. (Porter's Handbook, p. 67 ff.; Rob. ii. 73 ff.) J. [a] The expression here is literally "were superintendents of Israel beyond (מֵעֵבֶר) Jordan for the west (מִיַּרְכָה) in all the business," etc. "Beyond Jordan" generally means "on the east," but here, induced probably by the word following, "westward," our translators have rendered it "on this side" comp. Deut. i. 1, 5, Josh. ix. 1, &c.). May not the meaning be that Hashabiah and his brethren were settled on the western side of the Transjordanic country?

2. (עֶבְרֹן, and עֶבְרוֹן: Ἐλβών, Alex. Αχραν: Achran, later editions Abran). One of the towns in the territory of Asher (Josh. xix. 28), on the boundary of the tribe. It is named next to Rehob, and is apparently in the neighbourhood of Zidon. By Eusebius and Jerome it is merely mentioned (Onomast. Achran), and no one in modern times has discovered its site. It will be observed that the name in the original is quite different from that of Hebron, the well-known city of Judah (No. 1), although in the A. V. they are the same, our translators having represented the ain by H, instead of by G, or by the vowel only, as is their usual custom. But, in addition, it is not certain whether the name should not rather be Ebdon or Abdon (עבדון), since that form is found in many MSS. (Davidson, Hebr. Text; Ges. Thes. p. 980), and since an Abdon is named amongst the Levitical cities of Asher in other lists, which otherwise would be unmentioned here. On the other hand, the old versions (excepting only the Vat. LXX., which is obviously corrupt) unanimously retain the R

[ABDON.]

* Kirjath Arba does not appear to have been the original name of Hebron; but simply the name immediately prior to the Israelitish occupancy. For we are told that it was so called from Arba, the father of Anak (Josh. xv. 13, 14); and the children of Anak were the occupants when Caleb took it, as we learn from the same passage. But in Abraham's time there was a different occupant, Mamre the ally of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13, 24); and the place was then called by his name (Gen. xxiii. 19, xxxv. 27). This appellation, then, preceded that of Kirjath Arba. But as the place was a very ancient one (Num. xiii. 22), and as Mamre was Abraham's contemporary, it had some name older than either of these two. What was that previous name? The first mention of the place (Gen. xiii. 18) would obviously indicate Hebron as the previous and original name — subsequently displaced (in part at least) by Mamre, afterwards by Arba, but restored to its ancient and time-honored rights when Arba's descendants, the Anakim, were driven out by the descendants of Abraham. HE'BRONITES, THE (הַחֶבְרֹנִי: ὁ Χεβρών, ὁ Χεβρωνί [Vat. -νει]: Hebroni, Hebronite). A family of Kohathite Levites, descendants of Hebron the son of Kohath (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23). In the reign of David the chief of the family west of the Jordan was Hashabiah; while on the east in the land of Gilead were Jerijah and his brethren, "men of valor," over the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. xxvi. 30, 31, 32). W. A. W.

HEDGE (מְכוּכָה, גָּדֵר, גְּדֵרָה; מְשׂוּכָה: φραγμός). The first three words thus rendered in the A. V., as well as their Greek equivalent, denote simply that which surrounds or incloses, whether it be a stone wall (גָּדֵר, geder, Prov. xxiv. 31; Ez. xlii. 10), or a fence of other materials. גָּדֵר, gâdêr, and גְּדֵרָה, g'dêrâh, are used of the hedge of a vineyard (Num. xxii. 24; Ps. lxxxix. 40; 1 Chr. iv. 23), and the latter is employed to describe the wide walls of stone, or fences of thorn, which served as a shelter for sheep in winter and summer (Num. xxxii. 16). The stone walls which surround the sheepfolds of modern Palestine are frequently crowned with sharp thorns (Thomson, Land and Book, i. 299), a custom at least as ancient as the time of Homer (Od. xiv. 10), when a kind of prickly pear (ἀχέρδος) was used for that purpose, as well as for the fences of cornfields at a later period (Arist. Eccl. 355). In order to protect the vineyards from the ravages of wild beasts (Ps. lxxx. 12) it was customary to surround them with a wall of loose stones or mud (Matt. xxi. 33; Mark xii. 1), which was a favorite haunt of serpents (Eccl. x. 8), and a retreat for locusts from the cold (Nah. iii. 17). Such walls are described by Maundrell as surrounding the gardens of Damascus. "They are built of great pieces of earth, made in the fashion of brick and hardened in the sun. In their dimensions they are each two yards long and somewhat more than one broad, and half a yard thick. Two rows of these, placed one upon another, make a cheap, expeditious, and, in this dry country, a durable wall" (Early Trav. in Pal. p. 487). A wall or fence of this kind is clearly distinguished in Is. v. 5 from the tangled hedge, מְשׂוּכָה, m'sûcâh (מְכוּכָה, Mic. vii. 4), which was planted as an additional safeguard to the vineyard (cf. Eccles. xxviii. 24), and was composed of the thorny shrubs with which Palestine abounds. The prickly pear, a species of cactus, so frequently employed for this purpose in the East at present, is believed to be of comparatively modern introduction. The aptness of the comparison of a tangled hedge of thorn to the difficulties which a slothful man conjures up as an excuse for his inactivity, will be at once recognized (Prov. xv. 19; cf. Hos. ii. 6). The narrow paths between the hedges of the vineyards and gardens, "with a fence on this side and a fence on that side" (Num. xxii. 24), are distinguished from the "highways," or more frequented tracks, in Luke xiv. 23. W. A. W.

HE'GAI [2 syl.] (הֵגַי) [Persian name, Ges.]: Γαΐ: Egeus), one of the eunuchs (A. V. "chamberlains" of the court of Ahasuerus, who had special charge of the women of the harem (Esth. ii. 8, 15). According to the Hebrew text he was a distinct person from the "keeper of the concubines" — Shaashgaz (14), but the LXX. have the same name in 14 as in 8, while in 15 they omit it altogether. In verse 3 the name is given under the different form of — HE'GE (הֵגֵא: Egeus), probably a Persian name. Aja signifies eunuch in Sanskrit, in accordance with which the LXX. have τῷ εὐνούχῳ. Hegias, Ἡγίας, is mentioned by Ctesias as one of the people about Xerxes, Gesenius, Thes. Addenda, p. 83 b.

HEIFER (עֶגְלָה: δάμαλις: vacca). The Hebrew language has no expression that exactly corresponds to our heifer; for both eglah and parah are applied to cows that have calved (1 Sam. vi. 7–12; Job xxi. 10; Is. vii. 21): indeed eglah means a young animal of any species, the full expression being eglath bakar, "heifer of kine" (Deut. xxi. 3; 1 Sam. xvi. 2; Is. vii. 21). The heifer or young cow was not commonly used for ploughing, but only for treading out the corn (Hos. x. 11; but see Judg. xiv. 18),[a] when it ran about without any headstall (Deut. xxv. 4); hence the expression an "unbroken heifer" (Hos. iv. 16; A. V. "backsliding"), to which Israel is compared. A similar sense has been attached to the expression "calf of three years old," i. e., unsubdued, in Is. xv. 5, Jer. xlviii. 34; but it is much more probably to be taken as a proper name, Eglath Shelishiyah, such names being not uncommon. The sense of "dissolute" is conveyed undoubtedly in Am. iv. 1. The comparison of Egypt to a "fair heifer" (Jer. xlvi. 20) may be an allusion to the well-known form under which Apis was worshipped (to which we may also refer the words in ver. 15, as understood in the LXX., "Why is the bullock, μόσχος ἐκλεκτός, swept away?"), the "destruction" threatened being the bite of the gad-fly, to which the word keretz would fitly apply. "To plough with another man's heifer" (Judg. xiv. 18) implies that an advantage has been gained by unfair means. The proper names Eglah, En-eglaim, and Parah, are derived from the Hebrew terms at the head of this article. W. L. B.

HEIR. The Hebrew institutions relative to inheritance were of a very simple character. Under the patriarchal system the property was divided among the sons of the legitimate wives (Gen. xxi. 10, xxiv. 36, xxv. 5), a larger portion being assigned to one, generally the eldest, on whom devolved the duty of maintaining the females of the family. [BIRTHRIGHT.] The sons of concubines were portioned off with presents (Gen. xxv. 6): occasionally they were placed on a par with the legitimate sons (Gen. xlix. 1 ff.), but this may have been restricted to cases where the children had been adopted by the legitimate wife (Gen. xxx. 3). At a later period the exclusion of the sons of concubines was rigidly enforced (Judg. xi. 1 ff.). Daughters had no share in the patrimony (Gen. xxxi. 14), but received a marriage portion, consisting of a maid-servant (Gen. xxix. 24, 29), or some other property. As a matter of special favor they sometimes took part with the sons (Job xlii. 15). The Mosaic law regulated the succession to real property thus: it was to be divided among the sons, the eldest receiving a double portion (Deut. xxi. 17), the others equal shares: if there were no sons, it went to the daughters (Num. xxvii. 8), on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (Num. xxxvi. 6 ff.; Tob. vi. 12, vii. 13), otherwise the patrimony was forfeited (Joseph. Ant. iv. 7, § 5). If there were no daughters, it went to the brother of the deceased; if no brother, to the paternal uncle; and, failing these, to the next of kin (Num. xxvii. 9–11). In the case of a widow being left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her, and in the event of his refusal the next of kin (Ruth iii. 12, 13): with him rested the obligation of redeeming the property of the widow (Ruth iv. 1 ff.), if it had been either sold or mortgaged: this obligation was termed מִשְׁפַּט הַגְּאֻלָּה ("the right of inheritance"), and was exercised in other cases besides that of marriage (Jer. xxxii. 7 ff.). If none stepped forward to marry the widow, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin. The object of these regulations evidently was to prevent the alienation of the land, and to retain it in the same family: the Mosaic law enforced, in short, a strict entail. Even the assignment of the double portion, which under the patriarchal regime had been at the disposal of the father (Gen. xlviii. 22), was by the Mosaic law limited to the eldest son (Deut. xxi. 15–17). The case of Achsah, to whom Caleb presented a field (Josh. xv. 18, 19; Judg. i. 15), is an exception: but perhaps even in that instance the land reverted to Caleb's descendants either at the death of Achsah or in the year of Jubilee. The land being thus so strictly tied up, the notion of heirship, as we understand it, was hardly known to the Jews: succession was a matter of right, and not of favor — a state of things which is embodied in the Hebrew language itself, for the word יָרַשׁ (A. V. "to inherit") implies possession, and very often forcible possession (Deut. ii. 12; Judg. i. 29 xi. 24), and a similar idea lies at the root of the words אֲחֻזָּה and נַחֲלָה, generally translated "inheritance." Testamentary dispositions were of course superfluous: the nearest approach to the idea is the blessing, which in early times conveyed temporal as well as spiritual benefits (Gen. xxvii. 19, 37; Josh. xv. 19). The references to wills in St Paul's writings are borrowed from the usages of Greece and Rome (Heb. ix. 17), whence the custom was introduced into Judæa: "several wills are noticed by Josephus in connection with the Herods (Ant. xiii. 16, § 1, xvii. 3, § 2; B. J. ii. 2, § 3).

With regard to personal property, it may be presumed that the owner had some authority over it, at all events during his lifetime. The admission of a slave to a portion of the inheritance with the sons (Prov. xvii. 2) probably applies only to the personalty. A presentation of half the personalty formed the marriage portion of Tobit's wife (Tob. viii. 21). A distribution of goods during the father's life-time is implied in Luke xv. 11–13: a distinction may be noted between οὐσία, a general term applicable to personalty, and κληρονομία, the landed property, which could only be divided after the father's death (Luke xii. 13).

There is a striking resemblance between the Hebrew and Athenian customs of heirship, particularly as regards heiresses (ἐπίκληροι), who were, in both nations, bound to marry their nearest relation: the property did not vest in the husband even for his lifetime, but devolved upon the son of the heiress as soon as he was of age, who also bore the name, not of his father, but of his maternal grandfather. The object in both countries was the same, namely, to preserve the name and property of every family (Dict. of Ant. art. 'Επίκληρος). W. L. B.

HE'LAH (חֶלָאָה [rust]: 'Αωδά; Alex. Αλαα: Halua), one of the two wives of Ashur, father of Tekoa (1 Chr. iv. 5). Her three children are enumerated in ver. 7. In the LXX. the passage is very much confused, the sons being ascribed to different wives from what they are in the Hebrew text.

HE'LAM (חֵילָם [perh. power of the people, Ges.]: Αἰλάμ: Helam), a place east of the Jordan, but west of the Euphrates ("the river"), at which the Syrians were collected by Hadarezer, and at which David met and defeated them (2 Sam. x. 16, 17). In the latter verse the name appears as Chelamah (חֶלְאָמָה), but the final syllable is probably only the particle of motion. This longer form, Χαλαμάκ, the present text[b] of the LXX. inserts in ver. 16 as if the name of the river [but Alex. and Comp. omit it]; while in the two other places it has Αἰλάμ, corresponding to the Hebrew text. By Josephus (Ant. vii. 6, § 3) the name is [a] * It has been suggested that in Gal. iv. 2 Paul may have referred to a peculiar testamentary law among the Galatians (see Gaius, Institutiones, i. § 55) conferring on the father a right to determine the time of the son's majority, instead of its being fixed by statute. In that case we should have an instance of the facility with which Paul could avail himself of his knowledge of minute local regulations in the lands which he visited. (See Baumg.-Crusius, Comm. über den Brief an die Galater, p. 91.) But that passage in Gaius, when more closely examined, proves not to be decisive as to the existence of such a right among the Galatians (see Lightfoot's St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, p. 164, 2d ed.). The Apostle, in arguing his point (Gal. iv. 2), may have framed a case of this nature for the sake of illustration, or have had in mind a certain discretionary power which the Roman laws granted to the father. H.

[b] This is probably a late addition, since in the LXX. text as it stood in Origen's Hexapla, Χαλαμάκ was omitted after ποταμοῦ (see Bahrdt, a. l. c.).

given as Χαλαμά, and as being that of the king of the Syrians beyond Euphrates — πρὸς Χαλαμὰν τὸν τῶν πέραν Εὐφράτου Σύρων βασιλέα.

In the Vulgate no name is inserted after fluvium; but in ver. 16, for "came to Helam," we find adduxit exercitum eorum, reading חֵילָם, "their army." This too is the rendering of the old translator Aquila — ἐν δυνάμει αὐτῶν — of whose version ver. 16 has survived. In 17 the Vulgate agrees with the A. V.

Many conjectures have been made as to the locality of Helam; but to none of them does any certainty attach. The most feasible perhaps is that it is identical with Alamatha, a town named by Ptolemy, and located by him on the west of the Euphrates near Nicephorium. G.

HEL'BAH (חֶלְבָּה [fat]: Χεβδά; [Alex. Σχεδιαν (acc.); Comp. Ἑλβά:] Helba), a town of Asher, probably on the plain of Phœnicia, not far from Sidon (Judg. i. 31). J. L. P.

HEL'BON (חֶלְבּוֹן [fat, i. e. fruitful]: Χελβών; [Alex. Χεβρων]), a place only mentioned once in Scripture. Ezekiel, in describing the wealth and commerce of Tyre, says, "Damascus was thy merchant in the wine of Helbon [xxvii. 18]." The Vulgate translates these words in vino pingui; and some other ancient versions also make the word descriptive of the quality of the wine. There can be no doubt, however, that Helbon is a proper name. Strabo speaks of the wine of Chalybon (οἶνον ἐκ Συρίας τὸν Χαλυβῶνιον) from Syria as among the luxuries in which the kings of Persia indulged (xv. p. 735); and Athenæus assigns it to Damascus (i. 22). Geographers have hitherto represented Helbon as identical with the city of Aleppo, called Haleb (حَلَب) by the Arabs; but there are strong reasons against this. The whole force and beauty of the description in Ezekiel consists in this, that in the great market of Tyre every kingdom and city found ample demand for its own staple products. Why, therefore, should the Damascenes supply wine of Aleppo, conveying it a long and difficult journey overland? If strange merchants had engaged in this trade, we should naturally expect them to be some maritime people who could carry it cheaply along the coast from the port of Aleppo.

A few years ago the writer directed attention to a village and district within a few miles of Damascus, still bearing the ancient name Helbon (the Arabic حَلْبُون corresponds exactly to the Hebrew חֶלְבּוֹן), and still celebrated as producing the finest grapes in the country. (See Journal of Sac. Lit. July 1853, p. 260; Five Years in Damascus, ii. 330 ff.). There cannot be a doubt that this village, and not Aleppo, is the Helbon of Ezekiel and Strabo. The village is situated in a wild glen, high up in Antilebanon. The remains of some large and beautiful structures are strewn around it. The bottom and sides of the glen are covered with terraced vineyards; and the whole surrounding country is rich in vines and fig-trees (Handb. for Syr. and Pal., pp. 495–6).

J. L. P.

* The discovery of this Helbon is one of the results of missionary labor in that part of the East. Mr. Porter, who writes the article above, was formerly connected with the mission at Damascus. Dr. Robinson accepts the proposed identification as unquestionably correct. The name alone is not decisive, for Haleb (Aleppo) may answer to Helbon; but Aleppo "produces no wine of any reputation; nor is Damascus the natural channel of commerce between Aleppo and Tyre" (Later Res. iii. 472). Fairbairn (Ezekiel and the Book of his Prophecy, p. 301, 2d ed.) follows the old opinion. Rüetschi (Herzog's Real.-Encyk. v. 698) makes Ezekiel's Helbon and this one near Damascus the same, but thinks Ptolemy's Chalybon (see above) too far north to be identical with them.

HELCHI'AH (Χελκίας; [Vat. -κει-.] Helcias), 1 Esdr. viii. 1. [HILKIAH.]

HELCHI'AS (Helcias) the same person as the preceding, 2 Esdr. i. 1. [HILKIAH.]

HEL'DAI [2 syl.] (חֶלְדַּי [worldly, transient]: Χολδία; [Vat. Χολδεια;] Alex. Χολδαΐ: Holdai). 1. The twelfth captain of the monthly courses for the temple service (1 Chr. xxvii. 15). He is specified as "the Netophathite," and as a descendant of Othniel.

2. An Israelite who seems to have returned from the Captivity; for whom, with others, Zechariah was commanded to make certain crowns as memorials (Zech. vi. 10). In ver. 14 the name appears to be changed to HELEM. The LXX. translate παρὰ τῶν ἀρχόντων.

HE'LEB (חֶלֶב [milk]: Vat. omits; Alex. Αλαφ; [Comp. Ἑλάβ:] Heled), son of Baanah, the Netophathite, one of the heroes of king David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 29). In the parallel list the name is given as — HE'LED (חֶלֶד: Χθαδδ; [FA. Χοαδδ;] Alex. Ελαδ; Heled), 1 Chr. xi. 30 [where he is mentioned as one of "the valiant men" of David's army].

HE'LEK (חֶלֶק [part, portion]: Χελέγ, Alex. Χελεκ; [in Josh., Κελέζ, Alex. Φελεκ:] Helec), one of the descendants of Manasseh, the second son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 30), and founder of the family of the HELEKITES. The Benc-Chelek [sons of C.] are mentioned in Josh. xvii. 2 as of much importance in their tribe. The name has not however survived, at least it has not yet been met with.

HE'LEKITES, THE (הַחֶלְקִי, i. e. the Chelkite: ὁ Χελεγί [Vat. -γει], Alex. Χελεκι: familia Helecitarum), the family descended from the foregoing (Num. xxvi. 30).

HE'LEM (חֵלֶם [hammer or blow]: [Rom. Βαγηελάμ; Vat. Βαλααμ; Alex.] Ελαμ: Helem). A man named among the descendants of Asher, in a passage evidently much disordered (1 Chr. vii. 35). If it be intended that he was the brother of Shamer, then he may be identical with Hotham, in ver. 32, the name having been altered in copying; but this is mere conjecture. Burrington (i. 265) quotes two Hebrew MSS., in which the name is written חלם, Cheles.

2. [LXX. τοῖς ὑπομένουσι.] A man mentioned only in Zech. vi. 14. Apparently the same who is given as HELDAI in ver. 10 (Ewald, Propheten, ii. 536, note).

HE'LEPH (חֶלֶף) [exchange, instead of]: Μαλάμ; Alex. Μελεφ — both include the preposition prefixed: Heleph), the place from which the boundary of the tribe of Naphtali started (Josh. xix. 33), but where situated, or on which quarter, cannot be ascertained from the text. Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 320) proposes to identify it with Beit-lif, an ancient site, nearly due east of the Ras Abyad, and west of Kades, on the edge of a very marked ravine, which probably formed part of the boundary between Naphtali and Asher (Van de Velde, Syria, i. 233; and see his map, 1858). G.

HE'LEZ (חֶלֶץ) [perh. loins, thigh, Gesen.]: Σελλής — the initial Σ is probably from the end of the preceding word, [Χελλής; 1 Chr. xxvii. 10 Vat. Χεσλης;] Alex. Ελλης, Χελλης: Heles, Helles). 1. One of "the thirty" of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 27: in the latter, חֶלֶץ), an Ephraimite, and captain of the seventh monthly course (1 Chr. xxvii. 10). In both these passages of Chronicles he is called "the Pelonite," of which Kennicott decides that "the l'altite" of Samuel is a corruption (Dissertation, etc., pp. 183–184). [PALTITE.]

2. [Χελλής: Helles.] A man of Judah, son of Azariah (1 Chr ii. 39); a descendant of Jerahmeel, of the great family of Hezron.

HE'LI ('Ηλί, 'Ηλεί: Heli), the father of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary (Luke iii. 23); maintained by Lord A. Hervey, the latest investigator of the genealogy of Christ, to have been the real brother of Jacob the father of the Virgin herself. (Hervey, Genealogies, pp. 130, 138.) The name, as we possess it, is the same as that employed by the LXX. in the O. T. to render the Hebrew עֵלִי, ELI the high-priest.

2. The third of three names inserted between ACHITOB and AMARIAS in the genealogy of Ezra, in 2 Esdr. i. 2 (compare Ezr. vii. 2, 3).

HELI'AS, 2 Esdr. vii. 39. [ELIJAH.]

HELIODO'RUS ('Ηλιόδωρος [gift of the sun]), the treasurer (ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν πραγμάτων) of Seleucus Philopator, who was commissioned by the king, at the instigation of Apollonius [APOLLONIUS] to carry away the private treasures deposited in the Temple at Jerusalem. According to the narrative in 2 Macc. iii. 9 ff., he was stayed from the execution of his design by a "great apparition" (ἐπιφάνεια), in consequence of which he fell down "compassed with great darkness," and speechless. He was afterwards restored at the intercession of the high-priest Onias, and bore witness to the king of the inviolable majesty of the Temple (2 Macc. iii.). The full details of the narrative are not supported by any other evidence. Josephus, who was unacquainted with 2 Macc., takes no notice of it; and the author of the so-called iv. Macc. attributes the attempt to plunder the Temple to Apollonius, and differs in his account of the miraculous interposition, though he distinctly recognizes it (de Macc. 4 οὐρανόθεν ἔφιπποι προυφάνησαν ἄγγελοι . . . καταπεσὼν δὲ ἡμιθανὴς ὁ Απολλώνιος . . .). Heliodorus afterwards murdered Seleucus, and made an unsuccessful attempt to seize the Syrian crown B. C. 175 (App. Syr. p. 45). Cf. Wernsdorf, De fide Lib. Macc. § liv. Raphael's grand picture of "Heliodorus" will be known to most by copies and engravings, if not by the original. B. F. W.

HEL'KAI [2 syl.] (חִלְקָי) [whose portion is Jehovah]: 'Ελκαί; [Vat. Alex. FA.[1] omit:] Helci), a priest of the family of Meraioth (or Meremoth, see ver. 3), who was living in the days of Joiakim the high-priest, i. e. in the generation following the return from Babylon under Jeshua and Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 15; comp. 10, 12).

HEL'KATH (חֶלְקַת) [field]: 'Εξελεκέθ, [Χελκάτ:] Alex. Χελκαθ, [Θελκαθ:] Holcath, and Helcath), the town named as the starting-point for the boundary of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 25), and allotted with its "suburbs" to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 31). The enumeration of the boundary seems to proceed from south to north; but nothing absolutely certain can be said thereon, nor has any traveller recovered the site of Helkath. Eusebius and Jerome report the name much corrupted (Onom. Ethæ), but evidently knew nothing of the place. Schwarz (p. 191) suggests the village Yerka, which lies about 8 miles east of Akka (see Van de Velde's map); but this requires further examination.

In the list of Levitical cities in 1 Chr. vi. HUKOK is substituted for Helkath. G.

HEL'KATH HAZ'ZURIM (חֶלְקַת הַצֻּרִים) [field of the sharp edges, Keil; but see infra]: μερὶς τῶν ἐπιβούλων — perhaps reading עֲרֻמִּים; Aquila, Κλῆρος τῶν στερεῶν: Ager robustorum), a smooth piece of ground, apparently close to the pool of Gibeon, where the combat took place between the two parties of Joab's men and Abner's men, which ended in the death of the whole of the combatants, and brought on a general battle (2 Sam. ii. 16). [GIBEON; JOAB.] Various interpretations are given of the name. In addition to those given above, Gesenius (Thes. p. 485 a) renders it "the field of swords." The margin of the A. V. has "the field of strong men," agreeing with Aquila and the Vulgate; Ewald (Gesch. iii. 147), "das Feld der Tückischen." G.

* The field received its name from the bloody duel fought there, as expressly said (2 Sam. ii. 16). The Scripture words put before us the horrible scene: "And they caught every one his fellow by the head and thrust his sword in his fellow's side; so they fell down together: wherefore that place was called Helkath-hazzurim." The name may be = "field of the rocks," i. e. of the strong men, firm as rocks (see Wordsworth, in loc.). H.

HELKI'AS (Χελκίας; [Vat. Χελκειας:] Vulg. omits). A fourth variation of the name of Hilkiah the high-priest, 1 Esdr. i. 8. [HILKIAH.]

HELL. This is the word generally and unfortunately used by our translators to render the Hebrew Sheol (שְׁאוֹל, or שְׁאל: Ἅιδης, and once θάνατος, 2 Sam. xxii. 6: Inferi or Inferna, or sometimes Mors). We say unfortunately, because — although, as St. Augustine truly asserts, Sheol, with its equivalents Inferi and Hades, are never used in a good sense (De Gen. ad Lit. xii. 33), yet — the English word Hell is mixed up with numberless associations entirely foreign to the minds of the ancient Hebrews. It would perhaps have been better to retain the Hebrew word Sheol, or else render it always by "the grave" or "the pit." Ewald accepts Luther's word Hölle; even Unterwelt, which is suggested by De Wette, involves conceptions too human for the purpose.

Passing over the derivations suggested by older writers, it is now generally agreed that the word comes from the root שְׁאַל, "to make hollow" (comp. Germ. Hölle, "hell," with Höhle, "a hollow"), and therefore means the vast hollow subterranean resting-place which is the common receptacle of the dead (Ges. Thes. p. 1348; Böttcher, de Inferis, c. iv. p. 137 ff.; Ewald, ad Ps. p. 42). It is deep (Job xi. 8) and dark (Job x. 21, 22), in the centre of the earth (Num. xvi. 30; Deut. xxxii. 22), having within it depths on depths (Prov. ix. 18), and fastened with gates (Is. xxxviii. 10) and bars (Job xvii. 16). Some have fancied (as Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 203, Eng. ed.) that the Jews, like the Greeks, believed in infernal rivers: thus Clemens Alex. defines Gehenna as "a river of fire" (Fragm. 38), and expressly compares it to the fiery rivers of Tartarus (Strom. v. 14, 92); and Tertullian says that it was supposed to resemble Pyriphlegethon (Apolog. cap. xlvii.). The notion, however, is not found in Scripture, for Ps. xviii. 5 is a mere metaphor. In this cavernous realm are the souls of dead men, the Rephaim and ill-spirits (Ps. lxxxvi. 13, lxxxix. 48; Prov. xxiii. 14; Ez. xxxi. 17, xxxii. 21). It is all-devouring (Prov. i. 12, xxx. 16), insatiable (Is. v. 14), and remorseless (Cant. viii. 6). The shadows, not of men only, but even of trees and kingdoms, are placed in Sheol (Is. xiv. 9–20; Ez. xxxi. 14–18, xxxii. passim).

It is clear that in many passages of the O. T. Sheol can only mean "the grave," and is so rendered in the A. V. (see, for example, Gen. xxxvii. 35, xlii. 38; 1 Sam. ii. 6; Job xiv. 13). In other passages, however, it seems to involve a notion of punishment, and is therefore rendered in the A. V. by the word "Hell." But in many cases this translation misleads the reader. It is obvious, for instance, that Job xi. 8; Ps. cxxxix. 8; Am. ix. 2 (where "hell" is used as the antithesis of "heaven"), merely illustrate the Jewish notions of the locality of Sheol in the bowels of the earth. Even Ps. ix. 17, Prov. xv. 24, v. 5, ix. 18, seem to refer rather to the danger of terrible and precipitate death than to a place of infernal anguish. An attentive examination of all the passages in which the word occurs will show that the Hebrew notions respecting Sheol were of a vague description. The rewards and punishments of the Mosaic law were temporal, and it was only gradually and slowly that God revealed to his chosen people a knowledge of future rewards and punishments. Generally speaking, the Hebrews regarded the grave as the final end of all sentient and intelligent existence, "the land where all things are forgotten" (Ps. lxxxviii. 10–12; Is. xxxviii. 9–20; Ps. vi. 5; Eccl. ix. 10; Ecclus. xvii. 27, 28). Even the righteous Hezekiah trembled lest, "when his eyes closed upon the cherubim and the mercy-seat," he should no longer "see the Lord, even the Lord in the land of the living."

In the N. T. the word Hades (like Sheol) sometimes means merely "the grave" (Rev. xx. 13; Acts ii. 31; 1 Cor. xv. 55), or in general "the unseen world." It is in this sense that the creeds say of our Lord κατῆλθεν ἐν ᾅδῃ or εἰς ᾅδου, descendit ad inferos, or inferna, meaning "the state of the dead in general, without any restriction of happiness or misery" (Beveridge on Art. iii.), a doctrine certainly, though only virtually, expressed in Scripture (Eph. iv. 9; Acts ii. 25–31). Similarly Josephus uses Hades as the name of the place whence the soul of Samuel was evoked (Ant. vi. 14, § 2). Elsewhere in the N. T. Hades is used of a place of torment (Luke xvi. 23; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Matt. xi. 23, &c.). Consequently it has been the prevalent, almost the universal, notion that Hades is an intermediate state between death and resurrection, divided into two parts, one the abode of the blessed and the other of the lost. This was the belief of the Jews after the exile, who gave to the places the names of Paradise and Gehenna (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1, § 3; cf. Otho, Lex. Rabb. s. vv.), of the Fathers generally (Tert. de Animâ, c. lv.; Jerome in Eccl. iii.; Just. Mart. Dial. c. Tryph. § 105, &c.; see Pearson on Creed, Art. v.), and of many moderns (Trench on the Parables, p. 467; Alford on Luke xvi. 23). In holding this view, main reliance is placed on the parable of Dives and Lazarus; but it is impossible to ground the proof of an important theological doctrine on a passage which confessedly abounds in Jewish metaphors. "Theologia parabolica non est demonstrativa" is a rule too valuable to be forgotten; and if we are to turn rhetoric into logic, and build a dogma on every metaphor, our belief will be of a vague and contradictory character. "Abraham's bosom," says Dean Trench, "is not heaven, though it will issue in heaven, so neither is Hades hell, though to issue in it, when death and Hades shall be cast into the lake of fire which is the proper hell. It is the place of painful restraint (φυλακή, 1 Pet. iii. 19; ἄβυσσος, Luke viii. 31), where the souls of the wicked are reserved to the judgment of the great day." But respecting the condition of the dead whether before or after the resurrection we know very little indeed; nor shall we know anything certain until the awful curtains of mortality are drawn aside. Dogmatism on this topic appears to be peculiarly misplaced. [See PARADISE.]

The word most frequently used in the N. T. for the place of future punishment is Gehenna (γέεννα), or Geheuna of fire (ἡ γ. τοῦ πυρός), and this word we must notice only so far as our purpose requires; for further information see GEHENNA and HINNOM. The valley of Hinnom, for which Gehenna is the Greek representative, once pleasant with the waters of Siloa ("irrigua et nemorosa, plenaque deliciis," Hieron. ad Jer. vii. 19, 31; Matt. v. 22), and which afterwards regained its old appearance ("hodieque hortorum prœbens delicias," id.), was with its horrible associations of Moloch-worship (Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2–6; 2 K. xxiii. 10) so abhorrent to Jewish feeling that they adopted the word as a symbol of disgust and torment. The feeling was kept up by the pollution which the valley underwent at the hands of Josiah, after which it was made the common sink of all the filth and corruption in the city, ghastly fires being kept burning (according to R. Kimchi) to preserve it from absolute putrefaction (see authorities quoted in Otho, Lex. Rabb. s. v. Hinnom, etc.). The fire and the worm were fit emblems of anguish, and as such had seized hold of the Jewish imagination (Is. lxvi. 24; Jud. xvi. 17; Ecclus. vii. 17); hence the application of the word Gehenna and its accessories in Matt. v. 22, 29, 30; Luke xii. 5.

A part of the valley of Hinnom was named Tophet (2 K. xxiii 10; for its history and derivation see TOPHET), a word used for what is defiled and abominable (Jer. vii. 31, 32, xix. 6–13). It was applied by the Rabbis to a place of future torment (Targ. on Is. xxx. 33; Talm. Erubin, f. 19. 1; Böttcher, pp. 80, 85), but does not occur in the N. T. In the vivid picture of Isaiah (xxx. 33), which is full of fine irony against the enemy, the name is applied to purposes of threatening (with a probable allusion to the recent acts of Hezekiah, see Rosenmüller, ad loc.). Besides the authorities quoted, see Bochart (Phaleg, p. 528), Ewald (Proph. ii. 55), Selden (de Diis Syris, p. 172 ff.), Wilson (Lands of the Bible, i. 499), etc.

The subject of the punishment of the wicked, and of Hell as a place of torment, belongs to a Theological rather than a Biblical Dictionary.

F. W. F.

* Some of the positions in the previous article cannot be viewed as well established. That "generally speaking, the Hebrews regarded the grave as the final end of all sentient and intelligent existence" is a statement opposed to the results of the best scholarship. Against it stand such considerations as these: a four hundred years' residence of the Israelites among a people proved to have held the doctrine of a future life; the Hebrew doctrine of the nature of the soul; the translation of Enoch and Elijah; the prevalent views of necromancy, or conjuring by the spirits of the dead, (a practice prohibited by law, and yet resorted to by a monarch of Israel); the constant assertion that the dead were gathered to their fathers, though buried far away; the explicit and deliberate utterances of many passages, e. g., the 16th, 17th, 49th, 72d Psalms, Eccles. xii. 13, 14, Daniel xii. 2, 3; and the known fact that the doctrine of immortality existed among the Jews (excepting the small sect of Sadducees) at the time of Christ. The utterances about the silence and inactivity of the grave must therefore be understood from the present point of view, and as having reference to the activities of this life.

The statements of Gesenius and very many others about the gates and bars of Hades simply convert rhetoric into logic, and might with equal propriety invest the Kingdom of Heaven with "keys." The theory so prevalent, that Hades was the common province of departed spirits, divided, however, into two compartments, Paradise and Gehenna, seems to have been founded more upon the classical writers and the Rabbins — to whom it appeals so largely — than upon the Bible. It is undoubtedly true, that under the older economy the whole subject was much less distinct than under the new, and the Hades of the N. T. expresses more than the Sheol of the O. T. (See Fairbairn, Hermeneut. Manual, p. 290 ff.) Sheol was, no doubt, the unseen world, the state of the dead generally. So in modern times we often intentionally limit our views, and speak of the other world, the invisible world, the undiscovered country, the grave, the spirit land, etc. But vagueness of designation is not to be confounded with community of lot or identity of abode or condition.

Sheol, the unknown region into which the dying disappeared, was naturally and always invested with gloom to a sinful race. But the vague term was capable of becoming more or less definite according to the writer's thought. Most commonly it was simply the grave, as we use the phrase; sometimes the state of death in general; sometimes a dismal place opposed to heaven, e. g., Job xi. 8, Ps. cxxxix. 8, Am. ix. 2; sometimes a place of extreme suffering, Ps. lxxvi. 13, ix. 17, Prov. xxiii. 14. (See Bibl. Sacra, xiii. 155 ff.) No passage of the O. T., we believe, implies that the spirits of the good and bad were there brought together. The often cited passage (Is. xiv. 9) implies the contrary, showing us only the heathen kings meeting another king in mockery.

To translate this Hebrew term, the LXX. adopted the nearest Greek word, Hades, which by derivation signifies the invisible world. But the Greek word could not carry Greek notions into Hebrew theology.

When Christ and his Apostles came, they naturally laid hold of this Greek word already introduced into religious use. But, of course, they employed it from their own stand-point. And as it was the purpose of their mission to make more distinct the doctrine of retribution, and as under their teachings death became still more terrible to the natural man, so throughout the N. T. Hades seems invariably viewed as the enemy of man, and from its alliance with sin and its doom, as hostile to Christ and his church. In many instances it is with strict propriety translated "hell." Even in Acts ii. 27, 31, quoted from the O. T., Hades is the abode of the wicked dead. In Luke xvi. 23 it certainly is the place of torment. In Matt. xvi. 18 it is the abode and centre of those powers that were arrayed against Christ and his church. In Luke x. 15, Matt. xi. 23, it is the opposite of heaven. The word occurs, according to the Received Text, in 1 Cor. xv. 55; but the reading is not supported by the older MSS. The only remaining instances are the four that occur in Rev. i. 18, vi. 8, xx. 13, 14, where, though in three of these cases personified, it is still viewed as a terror to man and a foe to Christ and his kingdom, over which at length he has gained the victory. While therefore Gehenna is the term which most distinctly designates the place of future punishment, Hades also repeatedly is nearly its equivalent; and, notwithstanding the greater vagueness of the terms, it remains true, as Augustin asserts, that neither Hades nor Sheol are ever used in a good sense, or (we may add) in any other than a sense that carries the notion of terror.

HELLENIST (Ἑλληνιστής: Græcus; cf. Ἑλληνισμός, 2 Macc. iv. 13). In one of the earliest notices of the first Christian Church at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 1), two distinct parties are recognized among its members, "Hebrews" and "Hellenists" (Grecians), who appear to stand towards one another in some degree in a relation of jealous rivalry. So again, when St. Paul first visited Jerusalem after his conversion, he "spake and disputed with the Hellenists" (Acts ix. 29), as if expecting to find more sympathy among them than with the rulers of the Jews. The term Hellenist occurs once again in the N. T. according to the common text, in the account of the foundation of the church at Antioch (Acts xi. 20),[a] but there the context, as well as the form of the sentence

[a] * On that passage see the note under GREEK, GREEKS (Amer. ed.)

(καὶ πρὸς τοὺς Ἕ., though the καί is doubtful), seems to require the other reading "Greeks" (Ἕλληνες), which is supported by great external evidence, as the true antithesis to "Jews" (Ἰουδαίοις, not Ἑβραίοις, v. 19).

The name, according to its derivation, whether the original verb (Ἑλληνίζω) be taken, according to the common analogy of similar forms (Μηδίζω, Ἀττικίζω, Φιλιππίζω), in the general sense of adopting the spirit and character of Greeks, or, in the more limited sense of using the Greek language (Xen. Anab. vii. 3, § 25), marks a class distinguished by peculiar habits, and not by descent. Thus the Hellenists as a body included not only the proselytes of Greek (or foreign) parentage (οἱ σεβόμενοι Ἕλληνες, Acts xvii. 4 (?); οἱ σεβόμενοι προσήλυτοι, Acts xiii. 43; οἱ σεβόμενοι, Acts xvii. 17), but also those Jews who, by settling in foreign countries, had adopted the prevalent form of the current Greek civilization, and with it the use of the common Greek dialect, to the exclusion of the Aramaic, which was the national representative of the ancient Hebrew. Hellenism was thus a type of life, and not an indication of origin. Hellenists might be Greeks, but when the latter term is used (Ἕλληνες, John xii. 20), the point of race and not of creed is that which is foremost in the mind of the writer.

The general influence of the Greek conquests in the East, the rise and spread of the Jewish Dispersion, and the essential antagonism of Jew and Greek, have been noticed in other articles [ALEXANDER THE GREAT; ALEXANDRIA; DISPERSION; ANTIOCHUS IV. EPIPHANES], and it remains only to characterize briefly the elements which the Hellenists contributed to the language of the N. T., and the immediate effects which they produced upon the Apostolic teaching: —

1. The flexibility of the Greek language gained for it in ancient time a general currency similar to that which French enjoys in modern Europe; but with this important difference, that Greek was not only the language of educated men, but also the language of the masses in the great centres of commerce. The colonies of Alexander and his successors originally established what has been called the Macedonian dialect throughout the East; but even in this the prevailing power of Attic literature made itself distinctly felt. Peculiar words and forms adopted at Alexandria were undoubtedly of Macedonian origin, but the later Attic may be justly regarded as the real basis of Oriental Greek. This first type was, however, soon modified, at least in common use, by contact with other languages. The vocabulary was enriched by the addition of foreign words, and the syntax was modified by new constructions. In this way a variety of local dialects must have arisen, the specific characters of which were determined in the first instance by the conditions under which they were formed, and which afterwards passed away with the circumstances which had produced them. But one of these dialects has been preserved after the ruin of the people among whom it arose, by being consecrated to the noblest service which language has yet fulfilled. In other cases the dialects perished together with the communities who used them in the common intercourse of life, but in that of the Jews the Alexandrine version of the O. T., acting in this respect like the great vernacular versions of England and Germany, gave a definiteness and fixity to the popular language which could not have been gained without the existence of some recognized standard. The style of the LXX. itself is, indeed, different in different parts, but the same general character runs through the whole, and the variations which it presents are not greater than those which exist in the different books of the N. T.

The functions which this Jewish-Greek had to discharge were of the widest application, and the language itself combined the most opposite features. It was essentially a fusion of Eastern and Western thought. For disregarding peculiarities of inflexion and novel words, the characteristic of the Hellenistic dialect is the combination of a Hebrew spirit with a Greek body, of a Hebrew form with Greek words. The conception belongs to one race, and the expression to another. Nor is it too much to say that this combination was one of the most important preparations for the reception of Christianity, and one of the most important aids for the adequate expression of its teaching. On the one hand, by the spread of the Hellenistic Greek, the deep, theocratic aspect of the world and life, which distinguishes Jewish thought, was placed before men at large; and on the other, the subtle truths, which philosophy had gained from the analysis of mind and action, and enshrined in words, were transferred to the service of revelation. In the fullness of time, when the great message came, a language was prepared to convey it; and thus the very dialect of the N. T. forms a great lesson in the true philosophy of history and becomes in itself a monument of the providential government of mankind.

This view of the Hellenistic dialect will at once remove one of the commonest misconceptions relating to it. For it will follow that its deviations from the ordinary laws of classic Greek are themselves bound by some common law, and that irregularities of construction and altered usages of words are to be traced to their first source, and interpreted strictly according to the original conception out of which they sprang. A popular, and even a corrupt, dialect is not less precise, or, in other words, is not less human than a polished one, though its interpretation may often be more difficult from the want of materials for analysis. But in the case of the N. T., the books themselves furnish an ample store for the critic, and the Septuagint, when compared with the Hebrew text, provides him with the history of the language which he has to study.

2. The adoption of a strange language was essentially characteristic of the true nature of Hellenism. The purely outward elements of the national life were laid aside with a facility of which history offers few examples, while the inner character of the people remained unchanged. In every respect the thought, so to speak, was clothed in a new dress. Hellenism was, as it were, a fresh incorporation of Judaism according to altered laws of life and worship. But as the Hebrew spirit made itself distinctly visible in the new dialect, so it remained undestroyed by the new conditions which regulated its action. While the Hellenistic Jews followed their natural instinct for trade, which was originally curbed by the Mosaic Law, and gained a deeper insight into foreign character, and with this a truer sympathy, or at least a wider tolerance towards foreign opinions, they found means at the same time to extend the knowledge of the principles of their divine faith, and to gain respect and attention even from those who did not openly embrace their religion. Hellenism accomplished for the outer world what the Return [CYRUS] accomplished for the Palestinian Jews: it was the necessary step between a religion of form and a religion of spirit: it witnessed against Judaism as final and universal, and it witnessed for it, as the foundation of a spiritual religion which should be bound by no local restrictions. Under the influence of this wider instruction a Greek body grew up around the Synagogue, not admitted into the Jewish Church, and yet holding a recognized position with regard to it, which was able to apprehend the Apostolic teaching, and ready to receive it. The Hellenists themselves were at once missionaries to the heathen, and prophets to their own countrymen. Their lives were an abiding protest against polytheism and pantheism, and they retained with unshaken zeal the sum of their ancient creed, when the preacher had popularly occupied the place of the priest, and a service of prayer and praise and exhortation had succeeded in daily life to the elaborate ritual of the Temple. Yet this new development of Judaism was obtained without the sacrifice of national ties. The connection of the Hellenists with the Temple was not broken, except in the case of some of the Egyptian Jews. [THE DISPERSION.] Unity coexisted with dispersion; and the organization of a catholic church was foreshadowed, not only in the widening breadth of doctrine, but even externally in the scattered communities which looked to Jerusalem as their common centre.

In another aspect Hellenism served as the preparation for a catholic creed. As it furnished the language of Christianity, it supplied also that literary instinct which counteracted the traditional reserve of the Palestinian Jews. The writings of the N. T., and all the writings of the Apostolic age, with the exception of the original Gospel of St. Matthew, were, as far as we know, Greek; and Greek seems to have remained the sole vehicle of Christian literature, and the principal medium of Christian worship, till the Church of North Africa rose into importance in the time of Tertullian. The Canon of the Christian Scriptures, the early Creeds, and the Liturgies, are the memorials of this Hellenistic predominance in the Church, and the types of its working; and if in later times the Greek spirit descended to the investigation of painful subtleties, it may be questioned whether the fullness of Christian truth could have been developed without the power of Greek thought tempered by Hebrew discipline.

The general relations of Hellenism to Judaism are well treated in the histories of Ewald and Jost; but the Hellenistic language is as yet, critically speaking, almost unexplored. Winer's Grammar (Gramm. d. N. T. Sprachidioms, 6te Aufl. 1855 [7e Aufl. by Lünemann, 1867]) has done great service in establishing the idea of law in N. T. language, which was obliterated by earlier interpreters, but even Winer does not investigate the origin of the peculiarities of the Hellenistic dialect. The idioms of the N. T. cannot be discussed apart from those of the LXX.; and no explanation can be considered perfect which does not take into account the origin of the corresponding Hebrew idioms. For this work even the materials are as yet deficient. The text of the LXX. is still in a most unsatisfactory condition; and while Bruder's Concordance leaves nothing to be desired for the vocabulary of the N. T., Trommius's Concordance to the LXX., however useful, is quite untrustworthy for critical purposes. [See LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, Amer. ed.; also NEW TESTAMENT, IV.]

HELMET. [ARMS, p. 161.]

HE'LON (חֵלֹן) [strong, powerful]: Χαιλών: Helon), father of Eliab, who was the chief man of the tribe of Zebulun, when the census was taken in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 9, ii. 7, vii. 24, 29, x. 16).

* HELPS. This is the term used in the authorized English Version, and in the Rheims N. T. for ἀντιλήψεις, 1 Cor. xii. 28. The Vulgate translates, opitulationes; Wycliffe, helpyngis (helpings); Tyndale, Cranmer, and the Geneva Bible, helpers; Luther, Helfer. The noun occurs only once in the N. T., but the verb ἀντιλαμβάνομαι, i. e. to take in turn, to lay hold of, to help, also to take part in, occurs three times, Luke i. 54 ("hath holpen his servant Israel"), Acts xx. 35 ("to support the weak"), 1 Tim. vi. 2 (οἱ τῆς εὐεργεσίας ἀντιλαμβανόμενοι, "partakers of the benefit"). With the classics ἀντίληψις signifies a taking in turn, seizure; receipt; perception, but with the later writers and in the O. T. Apocrypha (2 Macc. viii. 19; 3 Macc. v. 50; Ecclus. xi. 12; li. 7; 1 Esdr. viii. 27 al.) also aid, support. This must be the meaning of the word in 1 Cor. xii., and it is so understood by nearly all the commentators from Chrysostom (ἀντέχεσθαι τῶν ἀσθενῶν) down to De Wette, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth, and Kling (in Lange's Bibelwerk). It corresponds with the meaning of the verb in Luke i. 54 and Acts xx. 35, and suits the connection. Paul enumerates the ἀντιλήψεις among the charismata, and puts them between the miraculous powers (δυνάμεις and χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων) which were not confined to any particular office, and the gifts of government and administration (κυβερνήσεις) which belonged especially to the presbyter-bishops, and in the highest degree to the Apostles as the gubernatores ecclesiæ. Ἀντιλήψεις doubtless comprehends the various duties of the deacons and deaconesses of the Apostles' church, especially the care of the poor and the sick. We may take it, however, in a more comprehensive sense for Christian charity and philanthropy. The plural indicates the diversity of the gift in its practical operation and application; comp. διακονίαι, 1 Cor. xii. 5. These helps or helpings are represented here as a gift of the Spirit. The duty is based on the possession of the gift, but the gift is not confined to the deacons or any class of church officers. It is found also among the laity, especially the female portion, in all ages and all branches of Christendom. But from time to time God raises up heroes of Christian charity and angels of mercy whom He endows, in an extraordinary measure, with the charisma of ἀντίληψις, διακονία, and ἀγάπη for the benefit of suffering humanity.

HEM OF GARMENT (צִיצִת: κράσπεδον: fimbria). The importance which the later Jews, especially the Pharisees (Matt. xxiii. 5), attached to the hem or fringe of their garments was founded upon the regulation in Num. xv. 38, 39, which attached a symbolical meaning to it. We must not, however, conclude that the fringe owed its origin to that passage: it was in the first instance the ordinary mode of finishing the robe, the ends of the threads composing the woof being left in order to prevent the cloth from unraveling, just as in the Egyptian calasiris (Her. ii. 81; Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, ii. 90), and in the Assyrian robes as represented in the bas-reliefs of Nineveh, the blue ribbon being added to strengthen the border. The Hebrew word tzizith is expressive of this fretted edge: the Greek κράσπεδα (the etymology of which is uncertain, being variously traced to κροσσός, ἄκρος πέδον, and κρηπίς) applies to the edge of a river or mountain (Xen. Hist. Gr. iii. 2, § 16, iv. 6, § 8), and is explained by Hesychius as τὰ ἐν τῷ ἄκρῳ τοῦ ἱματίου κεκλωσμένα ῥάμματα καὶ τὸ ἄκρον αὐτοῦ. The beyed or outer robe was a simple quadrangular piece of cloth, and generally so worn that two of the corners hung down in front; these corners were ornamented with a "ribbon of blue," or rather dark violet, the ribbon itself being, as we may conclude from the word used, פָּתִיל, as narrow as a thread or piece of string. The Jews attached great sanctity to this fringe (Matt. ix. 20, xiv. 36; Luke viii. 44), and the Pharisees made it more prominent than it was originally designed to be, enlarging both the fringe and the ribbon to an undue width (Matt. xxiii. 5). Directions were given as to the number of threads of which it ought to be composed, and other particulars, to each of which a symbolical meaning was attached (Carpzov, Apparat. p. 198). It was appended in later times to the talith more especially, as being the robe usually worn at devotions: whence the proverbial saying quoted by Lightfoot (Exercit. on Matt. v. 40), "He that takes care of his fringes deserves a good coat." HE'MAM (הֵימָם [exterminating, or raging]: Αἰμάν: Heman). Hori (i. e. Horite) and Hemam were sons (A. V. "children," but the word is Bene) of Lotan, the eldest son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 22). In the list in 1 Chr. i. the name appears as HOMAM, which is probably the correct form.

HE'MAN (הֵימָן [true, reliable]: [Αἰμονάν, Αἰνάν; Alex.] Αἰμαν, [Ημαν: Eman, Heman]). 1. Son of Zerah, 1 Chr. ii. 6; 1 K. iv. 31. See following article.

2. [Αἰμάν; Vat. 1 Chr. xxv. 6, Αἰμανει, 2 Chr. xxix. 14, Ωναιμαν; Alex. Ps. lxxxviii. 1, Αιθαμ: Hemam, Heman, Eman.] Son of Joel, and grandson of Samuel the prophet, a Kohathite. He is called "the singer" (הַמְּשֹׁרֵר), rather, the musician, 1 Chr. vi. 33, and was the first of the three chief Levites to whom was committed the vocal and instrumental music of the temple-service in the reign of David, as we read 1 Chr. xv. 16–22, Asaph and Ethan, or rather, according to xxv. 1, 3, Jeduthun,[a] being his colleagues. [JEDUTHUN.] The genealogy of Heman is given in 1 Chr. vi. 33–38 (A. V.), but the generations between Assir, the son of Korah, and Samuel are somewhat confused, owing to two collateral lines having got mixed. A rectification of this genealogy will be found at p. 214 of the Genealogies of our Lord, where it is shown that Heman is 14th in descent from Levi. A further account of Heman is given 1 Chr. xxv., where he is called (ver. 5) "the king's seer in the matters of God," the word חֹזֵה, "seer," which in 2 Chr. xxxv. 15 is applied to Jeduthun, and in xxix. 30 to Asaph, being probably used in the same sense as is נָבִיא, "prophesied," of Asaph and Jeduthun in xxv. 1–3. We there learn that Heman had fourteen sons, and three daughters [HANANIAH I.], of which the sons all assisted in the music under their father, and each of whom was head of one of the twenty-four wards of Levites, who "were instructed in the songs of the Lord," or rather, in sacred music. Whether or no this Heman is the person to whom the 88th Psalm is ascribed is doubtful. The chief reason for supposing him to be the same is, that as other Psalms are ascribed to Asaph and Jeduthun, so it is likely that this one should be to Heman the singer. But on the other hand he is there called 'the Ezrahite;" and the 89th Psalm is ascribed to "Ethan the Ezrahite."[b] But since Heman and Ethan are described in 1 Chr. ii. 6, as "sons of Zerah," it is in the highest degree probable that Ezrahite means "of the family of Zerah," and consequently that Heman of the 88th Psalm is different from Heman the singer, the Kohathite. In 1 K. iv. 31 again (Heb. v. 11), we have mention, as of the wisest of mankind, of Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol, a list corresponding with the names of the sons of Zerah, in 1 Chr. ii. 6. The inference from which is that there was a Heman, different from Heman the singer, of the family of Zerah the son of Judah, and that he is distinguished from Heman the singer, the Levite, by being called the Ezrahite. As regards the age when Heman the Ezrahite lived, the only thing that can be asserted is that he lived before Solomon, who was said to be "wiser than Heman," and after Zerah the son of Judah. His being called "son of Zerah" in 1 Chr. ii. 6 indicates nothing as to the precise age when he and his brother lived. They are probably mentioned in this abridged genealogy, only as having been illustrious persons of their family. Nor is anything known of Mahol their father. It is of course uncertain whether the tradition which ascribed the 88th Psalm to Heman's authorship is trustworthy. Nor is there anything in the Psalm itself which clearly marks the time of its composition. The 89th Psalm, ascribed to Ethan, seems to be subsequent to the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah, unless possibly the calamities described in the latter part of the Psalm may be understood of David's flight at Absalom's rebellion, in which case ver. 41 would allude to Shimei the son of Gera.

If Heman the Kohathite, or his father, had married an heiress of the house of Zerah, as the sons of Hakkoz did of the house of Barzillai, and was so reckoned in the genealogy of Zerah, then all the notices of Heman might point to the same person, and the musical skill of David's chief musician, and the wisdom of David's seer, and the genius of the author of the 88th Psalm, concurring in the same individual, would make him fit to be joined with those other worthies whose wisdom was only exceeded by that of Solomon. But it is impossible to assert that this was the case.

HE'MATH (חֲמָת [fortress, citadel]: Αἰμαθ; [Vat.] Alex. Εμαθ: Emath). Another form — not warranted by the Hebrew — of the well-known name HAMATH (Am. vi. 14).

HE'MATH (חַמַּת) i. e. Hammath [heat, warm spring]: Αἰμάθ; [Vat. Μεσημα:] Vulg. translates de calore), a person, or a place, named in the genealogical lists of Judah, as the origin of the Kenites, and the "father" of the house of RECHAB (1 Chr. ii. 55).

HEM'DAN (חֶמְדָּן [pleasant one, Fürst]: Ἀμαδά: Amdam or Hamdam, some copies Hamdan), the eldest son of Dishon, son of Anah the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26). In the parallel list of 1 Chr. (i. 41) the name is changed to Hamran (חַמְרָן), which in the A. V. is given as AMRAM, probably following the Vulgate Hamram, in the earliest MSS. Amaran.

The name Hemdan is by Knobel (Genesis, p. 256) compared with those of Humeidy and Hamady, two of the five families of the tribe of Omran or Amran, who are located to the E. and S. E. of Akaba. Also with the Bene-Hamyle, who are found a short distance S. of Kerek (S. E. corner of the Dead Sea); and from thence to el-Busaireh, probably the ancient BOZRAH, on the road to Petra. (See Burckhardt, Syria, etc., pp. 695, 407.)

HEM'LOCK. [GALL.]

HEN (חֵן [favor, grace]: Hem). According to the rendering of the passage (Zech. vi. 14) adopted in the A. V. Hen (or accurately Chen) is the name of a son of Zephaniah, and apparently the same who is called Josiah in ver. 10. But by the LXX. (χάρις), Ewald (Gunst), and other interpreters, the words are taken to mean "for the favor of the son of Zephaniah."

HEN. The hen is nowhere noticed in the Bible except in the passages (Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 34) where our Saviour touchingly compares His anxiety to save Jerusalem to the tender care of a hen "gathering her chickens under her wings." The word employed is ὄρνις, which is used in the same specific sense in classical Greek (Aristoph. Av. 102, Vesp. 811). That a bird, so intimately connected with the household, and so common in Palestine, as we know from Rabbinical sources, should receive such slight notice, is certainly singular; it is almost equally singular that it is nowhere represented in the paintings of ancient Egypt (Wilkinson, i. 234).[a] W. L. B.

HE'NA (חֲנַע [depression, low land, Fürst]: Ἀνά; [in 2 K. xix., Vat. Ανες, Alex. Αινα; in Is., by confusion with next word, Rom. Αναγουγάνα, Vat. Sin. Αναγουγαυα:] Ana) seems to have been one of the chief cities of a monarchical state which the Assyrian kings had reduced shortly before the time of Sennacherib (2 K [xviii. 34,] xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13). Its connection with Sepharvaim, or Sippara, would lead us to place it in Babylonia, or at any rate on the Euphrates. Here, at no great distance from Sippara (now Mosaib), is an ancient town called Ana or Anah, which seems to have been in former times a place of considerable importance It is mentioned by Abulfeda, by William of Tyre and others (see Asseman. Bibl. Or. vol. iii. pt. ii. p. 560, and p. 717). The conjecture by some (see Winer's Realwörterbuch, s. v.) that this may be Hena, is probable, and deserves acceptance. A further conjecture identifies Ana with a town called Anat (ת is merely the feminine termination), which is mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions as situated on an island in the Euphrates (Fox Talbot's Assyrian Texts, 21; Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, 355) at some distance below its junction with the Chabour; and which appears as Anatho (Ἀναθώ) in Isidore of Charax (Mans. Parth. p. 4). The modern Anat is on the right bank of the stream, while the name also attaches to some ruins a little lower down upon the left bank; but between them is "a string of islands" (Chesney's Euphrates Expedition, i. 53), on one or more of which the ancient city may have been situated. G. R.

HEN'ADAD (חֲנָדָד [favor of Hadad, Fürst, Ges.]: Ἡναδάδ, [etc. :] Henadad, Enadud), the head of a family of Levites who took a prominent part in the rebuilding of the Temple under Jeshua (Ezr. iii. 9). Bavai and Binnui (Neh. iii. 18, 24), who assisted in the repair of the wall of the city, probably belonged to the same family. The latter also represented his family at the signing of the covenant (Neh. x. 9).

HE'NOCH (חֲנוֹךְ: Ἐνώχ: Henoch). 1. The form in which the well-known name ENOCH is given in the A. V. of 1 Chr. i. 3. The Hebrew word is the same both here and in Genesis, namely, Chanoc. Perhaps in the present case our translators followed the Vulgate.

2. So they appear also to have done in 1 Chr. i. 33 with a name which in Gen. xxv. 4 is more accurately given as HANOCH.

HE'PHER (חֵפֶר [a well]: Ὀφέρ: Hepher). 1. A descendant of Manasseh. The youngest of the sons of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 32), and head of the family of the HEPHERITES. Hepher was father of ZELOPHEHAD (xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1; [Josh. xvii. 2, 3]), whose daughters first raised the question of the right of a woman having no brother, to hold the property of her father.

2. (Ἡφάλ: Hepher.) The second son of Naarah, one of the two wives of Ashur, the "father of Tekoa" (1 Chr. iv. 6), in the genealogy of Judah.

3. [Rom. Vat. Alex. FA. corrupted by false division of the words; Comp. Ἀφάρ; Ald. Ἀφέρ.] The Mecherathite, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the list of 1 Chr. xi. 36. In the catalogue of 2 Samuel this name does not exist (see xxiii. 34); and the conclusion of Kennicott, after a full investigation of the passages, is that the names in Samuel are the originals, and that Hepher is a mere corruption of them.

HE'PHER (חֵפֶר [a well]: Ὀφέρ; [Vat in 1 K. corrupt; Comp. Ἐφέρ·] Opher), a place in ancient Canaan, which, though not mentioned in the history of the conquest, occurs in the list of conquered kings (Josh. xii. 17). It was on the west of Jordan (comp. 7). So was also the "land of Hepher" (אֶרֶץ חֵ, terra Epher), which is named with Socoh as one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 10). To judge from this catalogue it lay towards the south of central Palestine, at any rate below Dor. so that there cannot be any connection between it and GATH-HEPHER, which was in Zebulun near Sepphoris.

HE'PHERITES, THE (הַחֶפְרִי [patronym., see above], i. e. the Hepherite: ὁ Ὀφερί [Vat. -ρει-]: familia Hepheritarum), the family of Hepher the son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 32).

HEPH'ZIBAH (חֶפְצִי־בָהּ: θέλημα ἐμόν: voluntas mea in ea). 1. A name signifying My delight in her, which is to be borne by the restored Jerusalem (Is. lxii. 4). The succeeding sentence contains a play on the word — "for Jehovah delighteth (חָפֵץ, chaphetz) in thee."

2. (Ἀψιβά; [Vat.[1] Ὀφειβα:] Alex. Ὀφσιβα; Joseph. Ἀχιβά: Haphsibæ). It was actually the name of the queen of King Hezekiah, and the mother of Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 1). In the parallel account (2 Chr. xxxiii. 1) her name is omitted. No clue is given us to the character of this queen. But if she was an adherent of Jehovah — and this the wife of Hezekiah could not fail to be — it is not impossible that the words of Is. lxii. 4 may contain a complimentary allusion to her.

HERALD (כָּרוֹזָא [from the Pers., crier, caller, Dietr.]). The only notice of this officer in the O. T. occurs in Dan. iii. 4; the term there used is connected etymologically with the Greek κηρύσσω and κράζω, and with our "cry." There is an evident allusion to the office of the herald in the expressions κηρύσσω, κήρυξ, and κήρυγμα, which are frequent in the N. T., and which are but inadequately rendered by "preach," etc. The term "herald" might be substituted in 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 5. W. L. B.

HER'CULES (Ἡρακλῆς [Hera's glory]), the name commonly applied by the western nations to the tutelary deity of Tyre, whose national title was Melkart[a] (מלך קרת, i. e. the king of the city = πολιοῦχος, Μελίκαρος, Phil. Bybl. ap. Euseb. Præp. Ev. i. 10). The identification was based upon a similarity of the legends and attributes referred to the two deities, but Herodotus (ii. 44) recognized their distinctness, and dwells on the extreme antiquity of the Tyrian rite (Herod. l. c.; cf. Strabo, xvi. p. 757; Arr. Alex. ii. 16; Joseph. Ant. viii. 5, § 3; c. Apion. i. 18). The worship of Melkart was spread throughout the Tyrian colonies, and was especially established at Carthage (cf. Hamilcar), where it was celebrated even with human sacrifices (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4 (5); cf. Jer. xix. 5). Mention is made of public embassies sent from the colonies to the mother state to honor the national God (Arr. Alex. ii. 24; Q. Curt. iv. 2; Polyb. xxxi. 20), and this fact places in a clearer light the offense of Jason in sending envoys (θεωροὺς) to his festival (2 Macc. iv. 19 ff.).

There can be little doubt but that Melkart is the proper name of the Baal — the Prince (הַבַּעַל) — mentioned in the later history of the O. T. The worship of "Baal" was introduced from Tyre (1 K. xvi. 31; cf. 2 K. xi. 18) after the earlier Canaanitish idolatry had been put down (1 Sam. vii. 4; cf. 1 K. xi. 5–8), and Melkart (Hercules) and Astarte appear in the same close relation (Joseph. Ant. l. c.) as Baal and Astarte. The objections which are urged against the identification appear to have little weight; but the supposed connections between Melkart and other gods (Moloch, etc.) which have been suggested (Pauly, Real-Encycl. s. v. Melcarth) appear less likely (cf. Gesenius, l. c.; Movers, Phönizier, i. 176 ff., 385 ff.). [BAAL.]

The direct derivation of the word Hercules from Phœnician roots, either as הַרכֵּל, circuitor, the traveller, in reference to the course of the sun, with whom he was identified, or to the journeys of the hero, or again as אַרכֵּל (Ἀρχαλεύς, Etym. M.), the strong conquers, has little probability.

HERD, HERDSMAN. The herd was greatly regarded both in the patriarchal and Mosaic period. Its multiplying was considered as a blessing, and its decrease as a curse (Gen. xiii. 2; Deut. vii. 14, xxviii. 4; Ps. cvii. 38, cxliv. 14; Jer. li. 23). The ox was the most precious stock next to horse and mule, and (since those were rare) the thing of greatest value which was commonly possessed (1 K. xviii. 5). Hence we see the force of Saul's threat (1 Sam. xi. 7). The herd yielded the most esteemed sacrifice (Num. vii. 3; Ps. lxix. 31; Is lxvi. 3); also flesh-meat and milk, chiefly converted, probably, into butter and cheese (Deut. xxxii. 14; 2 Sam. xvii. 29), which such milk yields more copiously than that of small cattle[b] (Arist. Hist. Anim. iii. 20). The full-grown ox is hardly ever slaughtered in Syria; but, both for sacrificial and convivial purposes, the young animal was preferred (Ex. xxix. 1) — perhaps three years might be the age up to which it was so regarded (Gen. xv. 9) — and is spoken of as a special dainty (Gen. xviii. 8; Am. vi. 4; Luke xv. 23). The case of Gideon's sacrifice was one of exigency (Judg. vi. 25) and exceptional. So that of the people (1 Sam. xiv. 32) was an act of wanton excess. The agricultural and general usefulness of the ox, in ploughing, threshing [AGRICULTURE], and as a beast of burden (1 Chr. xii. 40; Is. xlvi. 1), made such a slaughtering seem wasteful; nor, owing to difficulties of grazing, fattening, etc., is beef the product of an eastern climate. The animal was broken to service probably in his third year (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34; comp. Plin. H. N. viii. 70, ed. Par.). In the moist season, when grass abounded in the waste lands, especially in the "south" region,

[a] This identification is distinctly made in a Maltese inscription quoted by Gesenius (Ersch und Gruber's Encyklop. s. v. Bel., and Thesaurus, s. v. בעל), where מלקרת בעל צר answers to Ἡρακλεῖ ἀρχηγέτῃ.

[b] These were common, and are frequently alluded to. The expression עֶשְׁתֹּרֹת־צֹאנֶךָ, 2 Sam. xvii. 29 means cheese of cows' milk; חֶמְאָה, Arab. خمأ, Gen. xviii. 8, Is. vii. 15, 2 Sam. xvii. 29, Job xx. 17, Judg. v. 25, Prov. xxx. 33, is properly rendered "butter" (which Gesenius, s. v., is mistaken in declaring to be "hardly known to the Orientals, except as a medicine"). The word גְּבִינָה, Job x. 10, is the same as the Arab جبن, applied by the Bedouins to their goats'-milk cheese. [BUTTER; CHEESE.]

herds grazed there; e. g. in Carmel on the W. side of the Dead Sea (1 Sam. xxv. 2; 2 Chr. xxvi. 10). Dothan also. Mishor, and Sharon (Gen. xxxvii. 17; comp. Robinson, iii. 122; Stanley, S. & P. pp. 247, 260, 484, 485; 1 Chr. xxvii. 29; Is. lxv. 10) were favorite pastures. For such purposes Uzziah built towers in the wilderness (2 Chr. xxvi. 10). Not only grass,[a] but foliage, is acceptable to the ox, and the hills and woods of Bashan and Gilead afforded both abundantly; on such upland (Ps. l. 10; lxv. 12) pastures cattle might graze, as also, of course, by river sides, when driven by the heat from the regions of the "wilderness." Especially was the eastern table-land (Ez. xxxix. 18; Num. xxxii. 4) "a place for cattle," and the pastoral tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh who settled there, retained something of the nomadic character and handed down some image of the patriarchal life (Stanley, S. & P. pp. 324–5). Herdsmen, etc., in Egypt were a low, perhaps the lowest, caste; hence as Joseph's kindred, through his position, were brought into contact with the highest castes, they are described as "an abomination;" but of the abundance of cattle in Egypt, and of the care there bestowed on them, there is no doubt (Gen. xlvii. 6, 17; Ex. ix. 4, 20). Brands were used to distinguish the owner's herds (Wilkinson, iii. 8, 195; iv. 125–131). So the plague of hail was sent to smite especially the cattle (Ps. lxxviii. 48), the first-born of which also were smitten (Ex. xii. 29). The Israelites departing stipulated for (Ex. x. 26) and took "much cattle" with them (xii. 38). [WILDERNESS OF WANDERING.] Cattle formed thus one of the traditions of the Israelitish nation in its greatest period, and became almost a part of that greatness. They are the object of providential care and legislative ordinance (Ex. xx 10, xxi. 28,[b] xxxiv. 19; Lev. xix. 19, xxv. 7; Deut. xi. 15, xxii. 1, 4, 10, xxv. 4; Ps. civ. 14; Is. xxx. 23; Jon. iv. 11), and even the Levites, though not holding land, were allowed cattle (Num. xxxv. 2, 3). When pasture failed, a mixture of various grains (called, Job vi. 5, בָּלִיל, rendered "fodder" in the A. V., and, Is. xxx. 24, "provender;"[c] comp. the Roman farrago and ocymum, Plin. xviii. 10 and 42) was used, as also תֶּבֶן, "chopped straw" (Gen. xxiv. 25; Is. xi. 7, lxv. 25), which was torn in pieces by the threshing-machine and used probably for feeding in stalls. These last formed an important adjunct to cattle-keeping, being indispensable for shelter at certain seasons (Ex. ix. 6, 19). The herd, after its harvest-duty was done, which probably caused it to be in high condition, was specially worth caring for; at the same time most open pastures would have failed because of the heat. It was then probably stalled, and would continue so until vegetation returned. Hence the failure of "the herd" from "the stalls" is mentioned as a feature of scarcity (Hab. iii. 17). "Calves of the stall" (Mal. iv. 2; Prov. xv. 17) are the objects of watchful care. The Reubenites, etc., bestowed their cattle "in cities" when they passed the Jordan to share the toils of conquest (Deut. iii. 19), i. e. probably in some pastures closely adjoining, like the "suburbs" appointed for the cattle of the Levites (Num. xxxv. 2, 3; Josh. xxi. 2). Cattle were ordinarily allowed as a prey in war to the captor (Deut. xx. 14; Josh. viii. 2), and the case of Amalek is exceptional, probably to mark the extreme curse to which that people was devoted (Ex. xvii. 14; 1 Sam. xv. 3). The occupation of herdsman was honorable in early times (Gen. xlvii. 6; 1 Sam. xi. 5; 1 Chr. xxvii. 29, xxviii. 1). Saul himself assumed it in the interval of his cares as king; also Doeg was certainly high in his confidence (1 Sam. xxi. 7). Pharaoh made some of Joseph's brethren "rulers over his cattle." David's herd-masters were among his chief officers of state. In Solomon's time the relative importance of the pursuit declined as commerce grew, but it was still extensive (Eccl. ii. 7; 1 K. iv. 23). It must have greatly suffered from the inroads of the enemies to which the country under the later kings of Judah and Israel was exposed. Uzziah, however, (2 Chr. xxvi. 10), and Hezekiah (xxxii. 28, 29), resuming command of the open country, revived it. Josiah also seems to have been rich in herds (xxxv. 7–9). The prophet Amos at first followed this occupation (Am. i. 1, vii. 14). A goad was used (Judg. iii. 31; 1 Sam. xiii. 21, דַּרְבָּן, מַלְמָד), being, as mostly, a staff armed with a spike. For the word Herd as applied to swine, see SWINE; and on the general subject, Ugolini, xxix., de R. R. vett. Hebr. c. ii., which will be found nearly exhaustive of it. H. H.

HER'MAS (Ἑρμᾶς, from Ἑρμῆς, the "Greek god of gain," or Mercury), the name of a person to whom St. Paul sends greeting in his Epistle to the Romans (xvi. 14), and consequently then resident in Rome, and a Christian: and yet the origin of the name, like that of the other four mentioned in the same verse, is Greek. However, in those days, even a Jew, like St. Paul himself, might acquire Roman citizenship. Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen, agree in attributing to him the work called the Shepherd: which, from the name of Clement occurring in it, is supposed to have been written in the pontificate of Clement I.; while others affirm it to have been the work of a namesake in the following age, and brother to Pius I.; others again have argued against its genuineness. (Cave, Hist. Lit. s. v.; Bull, Defens. Fid. Nic. i. 2, 3–6; Dindorf, Præf. ad Hermæ Past.) From internal evidence, its author, whoever he was, appears to have been a married man and father of a family: a deep mystic, but without ecclesiastical rank. Further, the work in question is supposed to have been originally written in Greek — in which language it is frequently cited by the Greek Fathers — though it now only exists entire in a Latin version.[a] It was never received into the canon; but yet was generally cited with respect only second to that which was paid to the authoritative books of the N. T., and was held to be in some sense inspired (Caillau's Patres, tom. i. p. 17). It may be styled the Pilgrim's Progress of ante-Nicene times; and is divided into three parts: the first containing four visions, the second twelve moral and spiritual precepts, and the third ten similitudes, each intended to shadow forth some verity (Caillau, ibid.). Every man, according to this writer, is attended by a good and bad angel, who are continually attempting to affect his course through life; a doctrine which forcibly recalls the fable of Prodicus respecting the choice of Hercules (Xenoph. Mem. ii. 1).

The Hermas of the Epistle to the Romans is celebrated as a saint in the Roman calendar on May 9 (Butler's Lives of the Saints, May 9).

HER'MES (Ἑρμῆς), the name of a man mentioned in the same epistle with the preceding (Rom. xvi. 14). "According to the Greeks," says Calmet (Dict. s. v.), "he was one of the Seventy disciples, and afterwards Bishop of Dalmatia." His festival occurs in their calendar upon April 8 (Neale, Eastern Church, ii. 774). E. S. Ff.

HERMOG'ENES (Ἑρμογένης) [born of Hermes], a person mentioned by St. Paul in the latest of all his epistles (2 Tim. i. 15; see Alford's Proleg. c. vii. § 35), when "all in Asia" (i. e. those whom he had left there) "had turned away from him," and among their number "Phygellus and Hermogenes." It does not appear whether they had merely forsaken his cause, now that he was in bonds, through fear, like those of whom St. Cyprian treats in his celebrated work De Lapsis; or whether, like Hymenæus and Philetus (ibid. ch. ii. 18), they had embraced false doctrine. It is just possible that there may be a contrast intended between these two sets of deserters. According to the legendary history, bearing the name of Abdias (Fabricii Cod. Apocryph. N. T. p. 517), Hermogenes had been a magician, and was, with Philetus, converted by St. James the Great, who destroyed the charm of his spells. Neither the Hermogenes, who suffered in the reign of Domitian (Hofmann, Lex. Univ. s. v.; Alford on 2 Tim. i. 15), nor the Hermogenes against whom Tertullian wrote — still less the martyrs of the Greek calendar (Neale, Eastern Church, ii. p. 770, January 24, and p. 781, September 1) — are to be confounded with the person now under notice, of whom nothing more is known. HER'MON (חֶרְמוֹן [prominent, lofty]: Ἀερμών: [Hermon]), a mountain on the north-eastern border of Palestine (Deut. iii. 8; Josh. xii. 1), over against Lebanon (Josh. xi. 17), adjoining the plateau of Bashan (1 Chr. v. 23). Its situation being thus clearly defined in Scripture, there can be no doubt as to its identity. It stands at the southern end, and is the culminating point of the Anti-Libanus range; it towers high above the ancient border-city of Dan and the fountains of the Jordan, and is the most conspicuous and beautiful mountain in Palestine or Syria. The name Hermon was doubtless suggested by its appearance — "a lofty prominent peak," visible from afar (חֶרְמוֹן has the same meaning as the Arabic حَرَم); just as Lebanon was suggested by the white character of its limestone strata. Other names were also given to Hermon, each in like manner descriptive of some striking feature. The Sidonians called it Sirion (שִׂרְיוֹן, from שָׂרָה "to glitter"), and the Amorites Senir (שְׂנִיר, from שָׁנַר "to clatter"), both signifying "breast-plate," and suggested by its rounded glittering top, when the sun's rays were reflected by the snow that covers it (Deut. iii. 9; Cant. iv. 8; Ez. xxvii. 5).

[a] * Nearly the whole of the Greek text of the Shepherd has now been recovered from a manuscript found at Mount Athos by Constantine Simonides, and a considerable portion of the work is preserved in the Codex Sinaiticus published by Tischendorf in 1862. The Greek text was first published by Anger and Dindorf at Leipsic in 1856, better by Tischendorf in Dressel's Patres Apostolici, Lips. 1857 (2d ed. with the readings of the Cod. Sin. 1863); but the best edition is that of Hilgenfeld, Fasc. iii. of his Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum, Lips. 1866. A.

it was also named Sion, "the elevated" (שִׂיאֹן), towering over all its compeers (Deut. iv. 48). So now, at the present day, it is called Jebel esh-Sheikh (جبل الشيخ), "the chief mountain" — a name it well deserves; and Jebel eth-Thelj (جبل الثلج), "snowy mountain," which every man who sees it will say is peculiarly appropriate. When the whole country is parched with the summer-sun, white lines of snow streak the head of Hermon. This mountain was the great landmark of the Israelites. It was associated with their northern border almost as intimately as the sea was with the western (see יָם in Ex. xxvii. 12, A. V. "west;" Josh. viii. 9). They conquered all the land east of the Jordan, "from the river Arnon unto Mount Hermon" (Deut. iii. 8, iv. 48; Josh. xi. 17). Baal-gad, the border-city before Dan became historic, is described as "under Mount Hermon" (Josh. xiii. 5, xi. 17); and when the half-tribe of Manasseh conquered their whole allotted territory, they are said to have "increased from Bashan unto Baal-hermon and Senir, and unto Mount Hermon" (1 Chr. v. 23). In one passage Hermon would almost seem to be used to signify "north," as the word "sea" (יָם) is for "west" — "the north and the south Thou hast created them; Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name" (Ps. lxxxix. 12). The reason of this is obvious. From whatever part of Palestine the Israelite turned his eyes northward, Hermon was there, terminating the view. From the plain along the coast, from the mountains of Samaria, from the Jordan valley, from the heights of Moab and Gilead, from the plateau of Bashan, that pale-blue, snow-capped cone forms the one feature on the northern horizon. The "dew of Hermon" is once referred to in a passage which has long been considered a geographical puzzle — "As the dew of Hermon, the dew that descended on the mountains of Zion" (Ps. cxxxiii. 3). Zion (צִיּוֹן) is probably used here for Sion (שִׂיאֹן), one of the old names of Hermon (Deut. iv. 48).[a] The snow on the summit of this mountain condenses the vapors that float during the summer in the higher regions of the atmosphere, causing light clouds to hover around it, and abundant dew to descend on it, while the whole country elsewhere is parched, and the whole heaven elsewhere cloudless.

Hermon has three summits, situated like the angles of a triangle, and about a quarter of a mile from each other. They do not differ much in elevation. This may account for the expression in Ps. xlii. 7 (6), "I will remember thee from the land of the Jordan and the Hermons (חֶרְמֹנִים) — perhaps also for the three appellations in 1 Chr. v. 23. On one of the summits are curious and interesting ruins. Round a rock which forms the crest of the peak are the foundations of a rude circular wall, composed of massive stones; and within the circle is a large heap of hewn stones, surrounding the remains of a small and very ancient temple. This is evidently one of those "high places," which the old inhabitants of Palestine, and the Jews frequently in imitation of them, set up "upon every high mountain and upon every hill" (Deut. xii. 2; 2 K. xvii. 10, 11). In two passages of Scripture this mountain is called Baal-hermon (בַּעַל חֶרְמוֹן, Judg. iii. 3; 1 Chr. v. 23); and the only reason that can be assigned for it is that Baal was there worshipped. Jerome says of it, "dicitur turque in vertice ejus insigne templum, quod ab ethnicis cultui habetur e regione Paneadis et Libani" — reference must here be made to the building whose ruins are still seen (Onom. s. v. Hermon). It is remarkable that Hermon was anciently encompassed by a circle of temples, all facing the summit. Can it be that this mountain was the great sanctuary of Baal, and that it was to the old Syrians what Jerusalem was to the Jews, and what Mekkah is to the Muslems? (See Handb. for Syr. and Pal. 454, 457; Reland, Pal. p. 323 ff.)

The height of Hermon has never been measured, though it has been often estimated. It is unquestionably the second mountain in Syria, ranking next to the summit of Lebanon near the Cedars, and only a few hundred feet lower than it. It may safely be estimated at 10,000 feet. It rises up an obtuse truncated cone, from 2000 to 3000 feet above the ridges that radiate from it — thus having a more commanding aspect than any other mountain in Syria. The cone is entirely naked. A coating of disintegrated limestone covers the surface, rendering it smooth and bleak. The snow never disappears from its summit. In spring and early summer the top is entirely covered. As summer advances the snow gradually melts from the tops of the ridges, but remains in long glittering streaks in the ravines that radiate from the centre, looking in the distance like the white locks that scantily cover the head of old age. (See Five Years in Damascus, vol. i.)

A tradition, originating apparently about the time of Jerome (Reland, p. 326), gave the name Hermon to the range of Jebel ed-Duhy near Tabor, the better to explain Ps. lxxxix. 12. The name still continues in the monasteries of Palestine, and has thus crept into books of travel. [GILBOA, note.] J. L. P.

* But few of the travellers in Syria have gone to the top of Hermon, and the view from it has not been often described. We are indebted to Mr. Tristram for the following sketch (Land of Israel, p. 614, 2d ed.): —

"We were at last on Hermon, whose snowy head had been a sort of pole-star for the last six months. We had looked at him from Sidon, from Tyre, from Carmel, from Gerizim, from the hills about Jerusalem, from the Dead Sea, from Gilead, and from Nebo; and now we were looking down on them all, as they stood out from the embossed map that lay spread at our feet. The only drawback was a light fleecy cloud which stretched from Carmel's top all along the Lebanon, till it rested upon Jebel Sunnin, close to Baal-bec. But it lifted sufficiently [a] * It is against this equivalence that the consonants are different (see above) and that the meanings are different (lofty: sunny, bright). Besides, to make the dew of Hermon fall upon itself renders what follows irrelevant; for we can refer the blessing and the spiritual life spoken of only to Zion, the sacred mount. See under HERMON, THE DEW OF. H.

to give us a peep of the Mediterranean in three places, and amongst them of Tyre. There was a haze, too, over the Ghor so that we could only see as far as Jebel Ajlún and Gilead; but Lakes Huleh and Gennesaret, sunk in the depths beneath us, and reflecting the sunlight, were magnificent. We could scarcely realize that at one glance we were taking in the whole of the land through which, for more than six months, we had been incessantly wandering. Not less striking were the views to the north and east, with the head waters of the Awaj (Pharpar) rising beneath us, and the Barada (Abana), in the far distance, both rivers marking the courses of their fertilizing streams by the deep green lines of verdure, till the eye rested on the brightness of Damascus, and then turned up the wide opening of Cœle-Syria, until shut in by Lebanon.

"A ruined temple of Baal, constructed of squared stones arranged nearly in a circle, crowns the highest of the three peaks of Hermon, all very close together. We spent a great part of the day on the summit, but were before long painfully affected by the rarity of the atmosphere. The sun had sunk behind Lebanon before we descended to our tents, but long after we had lost him he continued to paint and gild Hermon with a beautiful mingling of Alpine and desert hues."

Mr. Porter, author of Five Years in Damascus, ascended Hermon in 1852. For an extended account of the incidents and results of the exploration, see Bibl. Sacra, xi. 41–56. See the notices, also, in Mr. Porter's Handbook, ii. 453 ff. Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 438) speaks of his surprise at finding that from the shores of the Dead Sea he had a distinct view of "Mount Hermon towering to the sky far, far up the Ghor to the north." It was a new evidence, he adds, that Moses also could have seen Hermon (Deut. xxxiv. 1 ff.) from the mountains of Moab [NEBO, Amer. ed.].

Sirion or Shirion, the Sidonian name of Hermon, signifies a "breast-plate," or "coat of mail;" and if (as assumed above), it be derived from שָׁרַר "to glitter," [a] it refers, naturally, not to any supposed resemblance of figure or shape, but to the shining appearance of that piece of armor. Hermon answers remarkably to that description. As seen at a distance through the transparent atmosphere, with the snow on its summit and stretching in long lines down its declivities, it glows and sparkles under the rays of the sun as if robed in a vesture of silver.

It is altogether probable that the Saviour's transfiguration took place on some one of the heights of Hermon. The Evangelists relate the occurrence in connection with the Saviour's visit to Cæsarea Philippi, which was in that neighborhood. Hence also the healing of the lunatic boy (Luke ix. 37) took place at the foot of Hermon. Dean Alford assumes (Greek Test. i. 168) that Jesus had been journeying southward from Cæsarea Philippi during the six or eight days which immediately preceded the transfiguration, and hence infers that the high mountain which he ascended must be sought near Capernaum. But that is not the more obvious view. Neither of the Evangelists says that Jesus was journeying southward during these days but, on the contrary, having stated just before that Jesus came into "the parts" (Matt. xvi. 13) or "the villages" (Mark viii. 27) of Cæsarea Philippi, they leave us to understand that he preached during the time mentioned, in that region, and then came to the mountain there on which he was transfigured. [TABOR.] H.

* HERMON, DEW OF. The dew on this mountain is proverbially excellent and abundant (see Ps. cxxxiii. 3). "More copious dew," says Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 608 f. 2d ed.), "we never experienced than that on Hermon. Everything was drenched with it, and the tents were small protection. The under sides of our macintosh sheets were in water, our guns were rusted, dew-drops were hanging everywhere. . . . . The hot air in the daytime comes streaming up the Ghor from the Huleh, while Hermon arrests all the moisture, and deposits it congealed at nights." As Mr. Porter states, "one of its hills is appropriately called Tell Abu Nedy, i. e. 'Father of the Dew,' for the clouds seem to cling with peculiar fondness round its wooded top and the little Wely of Sheikh Abu Nedy, which crowns it" (Handbook, ii. 463). Van de Velde (Syr. and Pal. i. 126) testifies to this peculiarity of Hermon.

It has perplexed commentators not a little to explain how the Psalmist (cxxxiii. 3) could speak of the dew of Hermon in the north of Palestine as falling on Zion in Jerusalem. The A. V. does not show the difficulty; for the words "and the dew" being interpolated between the clauses, the dew of Hermon appears there as locally different from that which descended on Mount Zion. But the Hebrew sentence will not bear that construction (see Hupfeld, Die Psalmen, iv. 320). Nor, where the places are so far apart from each other, can we think of the dew as carried in the atmosphere from one place to the other. Hupfeld (iv. 322) suggests that perhaps "as the dew of Hermon" may be a formula of blessing (comp. the curse on Gilboa, 2 Sam. i. 21), and as applied here may represent Zion as realizing the idea of that blessing, both spiritual and natural, in the highest degree. Rüttcher (Aehrenlese zum A. T., p. 58) assumes an appellative sense of חֶרְמוֹן, i. e. dew (not of any particular mountain of that name), but of lofty heights generally, which would include Zion. Hengstenberg's explanation is not essentially different from this (Die Psalmen, iv. 83), except that with him the generalized idea would be = Hermon-dew, instead of = Dew of Hermons. H.

tyranny of a foreign usurper. Religion was adopted as a policy; and the Hellenizing designs of Antiochus Epiphanes were carried out, at least in their spirit, by men who professed to observe the Law. Side by side with the spiritual "kingdom of God," proclaimed by John the Baptist, and founded by the Lord, a kingdom of the world was established, which in its external splendor recalled the traditional magnificence of Solomon. The simultaneous realization of the two principles, national and spiritual, which had long variously influenced the Jews, in the establishment of a dynasty and a church, is a fact pregnant with instruction. In the fullness of time a descendant of Esau established a false counterpart of the promised glories of Messiah.

Various accounts are given of the ancestry of the Herods; but neglecting the exaggerated statements of friends and enemies,[a] it seems certain that they were of Idumæan descent (Jos. Ant. xiv. 1, 3), a fact which is indicated by the forms of some of the names which were retained in the family (Ewald, Geschichte, iv. 477, note). But though aliens by race, the Herods were Jews in faith. The Idumæans had been conquered and brought over to Judaism by John Hyrcanus (B. C. 130, Jos. Ant. xiii. 9, § 1); and from the time of their conversion they remained constant to their new religion, looking upon Jerusalem as their mother city and claiming for themselves the name of Jews (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7. § 7; B. J. i. 10, § 4, iv. 4, § 4).

The general policy of the whole Herodian family, though modified by the personal characteristics of the successive rulers, was the same. It centred in the endeavor to found a great and independent kingdom, in which the power of Judaism should subserve to the consolidation of a state. The protection of Rome was in the first instance a necessity, but the designs of Herod I. and Agrippa I. point to an independent eastern empire as their end, and not to a mere subject monarchy. Such a consummation of the Jewish hopes seems to have found some measure of acceptance at first [HERODIANS]; and by a natural reaction the temporal dominion of the Herods opened the way to the destruction of the Jewish nationality. The religion which was degraded into the instrument of unscrupulous ambition lost its power to quicken a united people. The high-priests were appointed and deposed by Herod I. and his successors with such a reckless disregard for the character of their office (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenthums, i. 322, 325, 421), that the office itself was deprived of its sacred dignity (comp. Acts xxiii. 2 ff.; Jost, 430, &c.). The nation was divided, and amidst the conflict of sects a universal faith arose, which more than fulfilled the nobler hopes that found no satisfaction in the treacherous grandeur of a court.

The family relations of the Herods are singularly complicated from the frequent recurrence of the same names, and the several accounts of Josephus are not consistent in every detail. The following table, however, seems to offer a satisfactory summary of his statements. The members of the Herodian family who are mentioned in the N. T are distinguished by capitals.

Josephus is the one great authority for the history of the Herodian family. The scanty notices which occur in Hebrew and classic writers throw very little additional light upon the events which he narrates. Of modern writers Ewald has treated the whole subject with the widest and clearest view. Jost in his several works has added to the records of Josephus gleanings from later Jewish writers. Where the original sources are so accessible, monographs are of little use. The following are quoted by Winer: Noldii Hist. Idumæa . . . Franeq. 1660; E. Spanhemii Stemma . . . Herodis M., which are reprinted in Havercamp's Josephus (ii. 331 ff.; 402 ff).

1. HEROD THE GREAT (Ἡρῴδης) was the second son of Antipater, who was appointed procurator of Judæa by Julius Cæsar, B. C. 47, and Cypros, an Arabian of noble descent (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7, § 3). At the time of his father's elevation, though only fifteen[b] years old, he received the government of Galilee (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9, § 2), and shortly afterwards that of Cœle-Syria. When Antony came to Syria, B. C. 41, he appointed Herod and his elder brother Phasael tetrarchs of Judæa (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 13, § 1). Herod was forced to abandon Judæa next year by an invasion of the Parthians, who supported the claims of Antigonus, the representative of the Asmonæan dynasty, and fled to Rome (B. C. 40). At Rome he was well received by Antony and Octavian, and was appointed by the senate king of Judæa to the exclusion of the Hasmonæan line (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 14, § 4; App. Bell. C. 39). In the course of a few years, by the help of the Romans, he took Jerusalem (B. C. 37), and completely established his authority throughout his dominions. An expedition which he was forced to make against Arabia saved him from taking an active part in the civil war, though he was devoted to the cause of Antony. After the battle of Actium he visited Octavian at Rhodes, and his noble bearing won for him the favor of the conqueror, who confirmed him in the possession of the kingdom, B. C. 31, and in the next year increased it by the addition of several important cities (Joseph. Ant. xv. 10, § 1 ff.), and afterwards gave him the province of Trachonitis and the district of Paneas (Joseph. Ant. l. c.). The remainder of the reign of Herod was undisturbed by external troubles, but his domestic life was embittered by an almost uninterrupted series of injuries and cruel acts of vengeance. Hyrcanus, the grandfather of his wife Mariamne, was put to death shortly before his visit to Augustus. Mariamne herself, to whom he was passionately devoted, was next sacrificed to his jealousy. One execution followed another, till at last, in B. C. 6, he was persuaded to put to death the two sons of Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus, in whom the chief hope of the people lay. Two years afterwards he condemned to death An-

[a] The Jewish partisans of Herod (Nicolaus Damascenus, ap. Jos. Ant. xiv. 1, 3) sought to raise him to the dignity of a descent from one of the noble families which returned from Babylon; and, on the other hand, early Christian writers represented his origin as utterly mean and servile. Africanus has preserved a tradition (Routh, Rel. Sacr. ii. p. 235), on the authority of "the natural kinsmen of the Saviour," which makes Antipater, the father of Herod, the son of one Herod, a slave attached to the service of a temple of Apollo at Ascalon, who was taken prisoner by Idumæan robbers, and kept by them, as his father could not pay his ransom. The locality (cf. Philo, Leg. ad Caium, § 30) no less than the office, was calculated to fix a heavy reproach upon the name (cf. Routh, ad loc.). This story is repeated with great inaccuracy by Epiphanius (Hær. xx.).

ipater, his eldest son, who had been their most active accuser, and the order for his execution was among the last acts of Herod's life, for he died himself five days after the death of his son, B. C. 4, in the same year which marks the true date of the Nativity. [JESUS CHRIST.]

These terrible acts of bloodshed which Herod perpetrated in his own family were accompanied by others among his subjects equally terrible, from the numbers who fell victims to them. The infirmities of his later years exasperated him to yet greater cruelty; and, according to the well-known story, he ordered the nobles whom he had called to him in his last moments to be executed immediately after his decease, that so at least his death might be attended by universal mourning (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 6, § 5). It was at the time of this fatal illness that he must have caused the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 16–18), and from the comparative insignificance of the murder of a few young children in an unimportant village when contrasted with the deeds which he carried out or designed, it is not surprising that Josephus has passed it over in silence. The number of children in Bethlehem and "all the borders thereof" (ἐν πᾶσιν τοῖς ὁρίοις) may be estimated at about ten or twelve;[a] and the language of the Evangelist leaves in complete uncertainty the method in which the deed was effected (ἀποστείλας ἀνεῖλεν). The scene of open and undisguised violence which has been consecrated by Christian art is wholly at variance with what may be supposed to have been the historic reality. At a later time the murder of the children seems to have been connected with the death of Antipater. Thus, according to the anecdote preserved by Macrobius (c. A. D. 410), "Augustus, cum audisset inter pueros quos in Syria Herodes, Rex Judæorum, intra bimatum (Matt. ii. 16; ib. Vulg. a bimatu et infra) jussit interfici, filium quoque ejus occisum, ait: Melius est Herodis porcum esse quam filium" (Macrob. Sat. ii. 4) But Josephus has preserved two very remarkable references to a massacre which Herod caused to be made shortly before his death, which may throw an additional light upon the history. In this it is said that Herod did not spare "those who seemed most dear to him" (Ant. xvi. 11, § 7), but "slew all those of his own family who sided with the Pharisees (ὁ Φαρισαῖος)" in refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the Roman emperor, while they looked forward to a change in the royal line (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 2, § 6; cf. Lardner, Credibility, etc., i. 278 ff., 332 f., 349 f.). How far this event may have been directly connected with the murder at Bethlehem it is impossible to say, from the obscurity of the details, but its occasion and character throw a great light upon St. Matthew's narrative.

In dealing with the religious feelings or prejudices of the Jews, Herod showed as great contempt for public opinion as in the execution of his personal vengeance. He signalized his elevation to the throne by offerings to the Capitoline Jupiter (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenthums, i. 318), and surrounded his person by foreign mercenaries, some of whom had been formerly in the service of Cleopatra (Jos. Ant. xv. 7, § 3; xvii. 1, § 1; 8, § 3). His coins and those of his successors bore only Greek legends; and he introduced heathen games within the walls of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xv. 8, § 1). He displayed ostentatiously his favor towards foreigners (Jos. Ant. xvi. 5, § 3), and oppressed the old Jewish aristocracy (Jos. Ant. xv. 1, § 1). The later Jewish traditions describe him as successively the servant of the Hasmonæans and the Romans, and relate that one Rabbin only survived the persecution which he directed against them, purchasing his life by the loss of sight (Jost, i. 319, &c.).

While Herod alienated in this manner the affections of the Jews by his cruelty and disregard for the Law, he adorned Jerusalem with many splendid monuments of his taste and magnificence. The Temple, which he rebuilt with scrupulous care, so that it might seem to be a restoration of the old one rather than a new building (Jos. Ant. xv. 11 ., was the greatest of these works. The restoration was begun B. C. 20, and the Temple itself was completed in a year and a half (Jos. Ant. xv. 11, § 6). The surrounding buildings occupied eight years more (Jos. Ant. xv. 11, § 5). But fresh additions were constantly made in succeeding years, so that at the time of the Lord's visit to Jerusalem at the beginning of His ministry, it was said that the Temple was "built (ᾠκοδομήθη) in forty and six years" (John ii. 20), a phrase which expresses the whole period from the commencement of Herod's work to the completion of the latest addition then made, for the final completion of the whole building is placed by Josephus (Ant. xx. 8, § 7, ἤδη δὲ τότε καὶ τὸ ἱερὸν ἐτετέλεστο) in the time of Herod Agrippa II. (c. A. D. 50).

Yet even this splendid work was not likely to mislead the Jews as to the real spirit of the king. While he rebuilt the Temple at Jerusalem, he rebuilt also the Temple at Samaria (Jos. Ant. xv. 8, § 5), and made provision in his new city Cæsarea for the celebration of heathen worship (Jos. Ant. xv. 9, § 5); and it has been supposed (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. i. 323) that the rebuilding of the Temple furnished him with the opportunity of destroying the authentic collection of genealogies which was of the highest importance to the priestly families. Herod, as appears from his public designs, affected the dignity of a second Solomon, but he joined the license of that monarch to his magnificence; and it was said that the monument which he raised over the royal tombs was due to the fear which seized him after a sacrilegious attempt to rob them of secret treasures (Jos. Ant. xvi. 7, § 1).

It is, perhaps, difficult to see in the character of Herod any of the true elements of greatness Some have even supposed that the title — the great — is a mistranslation for the elder (רבא, Jost, i. 319, note; ὁ μέγας, Ewald, Gesch. iv. 473, &c.); and yet on the other hand he seems to have possessed the good qualities of our own Henry VIII. with his vices. He maintained peace at home during a long reign by the vigor and timely generosity of his administration. Abroad he conciliated the good-will of the Romans under circumstances of unusual difficulty. His ostentatious display and even his arbitrary tyranny was calculated to inspire Orientals with awe. Bold and yet prudent, oppressive and yet profuse, he had many of the characteristics which make a popular hero; and the title

II. Herod Antipas (Ἀντίπατρος, Ἀντίπας) was the son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan (Jos. Ant. xvii. 1, § 3). His father had originally destined him as his successor in the kingdom (cf. Matt. ii. 22; Archelaus), but by the last change of his will appointed him "tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa" (Jos. Ant. xvii. 8, § 1, Ἡρ. ὁ τετράρχης, Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1; cf. Luke iii. 1, τετραρχοῦντος τῆς Γαλιλαίας Ἡρ.), which brought him a yearly revenue of 200 talents (Jos. Ant. xvii. 13, § 4; cf. Luke viii. 3, Χουζᾶ ἐπιτρόπου Ἡρ.). He first married a daughter of Aretas, "king of Arabia Petræa," but after some time (Jos. Ant. xviii. 5, § 1) he made overtures of marriage to Herodias, the wife of his half-brother Herod-Philip, which she received favorably. Aretas, indignant at the insult offered to his daughter, found a pretext for invading the territory of Herod, and defeated him with great loss (Jos. l. c.). This defeat, according to the famous passage in Josephus (Ant. xviii. 5, § 2), was attributed by many to the murder of John the Baptist, which had been committed by Antipas shortly before, under the influence of Herodias (Matt. xiv. 4 ff.; Mark vi. 17 ff.; Luke iii. 19). At a later time the ambition of Herodias proved the cause of her husband's ruin. She urged him to go to Rome to gain the title of king (cf. Mark vi. 14, ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἡρ. by courtesy), which had been granted to his nephew Agrippa; but he was opposed at the court of Caligula by the emissaries of Agrippa [Herod Agrippa], and condemned to perpetual banishment at Lugdunum, A. D. 39 (Jos. Ant. xviii. 7, § 2), whence he appears to have retired afterwards to Spain (B. J. ii. 9, § 6; but see note on p. 796). Herodias voluntarily shared his punishment, and he died in exile. [Herodias.]

Pilate took occasion from our Lord's residence in Galilee to send Him for examination (Luke xxiii. 6 ff.) to Herod Antipas, who came up to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover (cf. Jos. Ant. xviii. 6, § 3), and thus heal the feud which had existed between the tetrarch and himself (Luke xxiii. 12; cf. Luke xiii. 1, περὶ τῶν Γαλιλαίων, ὧν τὸ αἷμα Πίλατος ἔμιξεν μετὰ τῶν θυσιῶν αὐτῶν).[a] The share which Antipas thus took in the Passion is specially noticed in the Acts (iv. 27) in connection with Ps. ii. 1, 2. His character, as it appears in the Gospels, answers to the general tenor of his life. He was unscrupulous (Luke iii. 19, περὶ πάντων ὧν ἐποίησεν πονηρῶν), tyrannical (Luke xiii. 31), and weak (Matt. xiv. 9). Yet his cruelty was marked by cunning (Luke xiii. 32, τῇ ἀλώπεκι ταύτῃ), and followed by remorse (Mark vi. 14). In contrast with Pilate he presents the type of an Eastern despot, capricious, sensual, and superstitious. This last element of superstition is both natural and clearly marked. For a time "he heard John gladly" (Mark vi. 20), and was anxious to see Jesus (Luke ix. 9, xxiii. 8), in the expectation, as it is said, of witnessing some miracle wrought by Him (Luke xiii. 31, xxiii. 8).

The city of Tiberias, which Antipas founded and named in honor of the emperor, was the most conspicuous monument of his long reign; but, like the rest of the Herodian family, he showed his passion for building cities in several places, restoring Sepphoris, near Tabor, which had been destroyed in the wars after the death of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xvii. 12, § 9; xviii. 2, § 1) and Betharamphtha (Beth-haram) in Peræa, which he named Julias, "from the wife of the emperor" (Jos. Ant. xviii. 2, 1; Hieron. Euseb. Chron. A. D. 29, Livias).

III. Archelaus (Ἀρχέλαος [ruler of the people]) was, like Herod Antipas, the son of Herod the Great and Malthace. He was brought up with his brother at Rome (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 3), and in consequence of the accusations of his eldest brother Antipater, the son of Doris, he was excluded by his father's will from any share in his dominions. Afterwards, however, by a second change, the "kingdom" was left to him, which had been designed for his brother Antipas (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 8, § 1), and it was this unexpected arrangement which led to the retreat of Joseph to Galilee (Matt. ii. 22). Archelaus did not enter on his power without strong opposition and bloodshed (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9); but Augustus confirmed the will of Herod in its essential provisions, and gave Archelaus the government of "Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, with the cities of Cæsarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem" (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 13, § 5), which produced a revenue of 400 (Joseph. B. J. ii. 6, § 3) or 600 talents (Ant. xvii. 13, 5). For the time he received the title of Ethnarch, with the promise of that of king, if he proved worthy of it (Joseph. l. c.). His conduct justified the fears which his character inspired. After violating the Mosaic law by the marriage with Glaphyra, his brother's widow (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 13, § 1), he roused his subjects by his tyranny and cruelty to appeal to Rome for redress.[b] Augustus at once summoned him to his presence, and after his cause was heard he was banished to Vienne in Gaul (A. D. 7), where probably he died (Joseph. l. c.; cf. Strab. xvi. p. 765; Dio Cass. lv. 27); though in the time of Jerome, his tomb was shown near Bethlehem (Onomasticon).

a * Pilate's sending Jesus to Herod seems to have been an expedient merely to dispose of the case, if possibly he might do so, in that way. Herod, conciliated by an apparent act of courtesy, may then have made advances on his part to the procurator, which led to the restoration of a better understanding between them. That it was their common enmity to Christ which made Herod and Pilate friends on this occasion (as is often said) does not agree with the manifest anxiety of Pilate to release Jesus. H.

b * Of this character of Archelaus Matthew's statement (ii. 22) furnishes a significant intimation. On returning from Egypt Joseph evidently meant to go directly to Bethlehem; but hearing that Archelaus had succeeded Herod rather than some other one of his sons, he avoided that place and proceeded to Galilee. H.

daughter of a high-priest Simon (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, 4), and must be carefully distinguished from the tetrarch Philip. [HEROD PHILIP II.] He married Herodias, the sister of Agrippa I., by whom he had a daughter Salome. Herodias, however, left him, and made an infamous marriage with his half-brother Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17; Luke iii. 19). He is called only Herod by Josephus, but the repetition of the name Philip is fully justified by the frequent recurrence of names in the Herodian family (e. g. Antipater). The two Philips were confounded by Jerome (ad Matt. l. c.); and the confusion was the more easy, because the son of Mariamne was excluded from all share in his father's possessions (τῆς διαθήκης ἐξήλειψεν) in consequence of his mother's treachery (Joseph. B. J. i. 30, § 7), and lived afterwards in a private station.

V. HEROD PHILIP II. (Φίλιππος) was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra ('Ιεροσολυμῖτις). Like his half-brothers [a] Antipas and Archelaus, he was brought up at Rome (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 3), and on the death of his father advocated the claims of Archelaus before Augustus (Joseph. B. J. ii. 6, § 1). He received as his own government "Batanæa, Trachonitis, Auranitis (Gaulonitis), and some parts about Jamnia" (Joseph. B. J. ii. 6, § 3), with the title of tetrarch (Luke iii. 1, Φιλίππου . . . τετραρχοῦντος τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας). His rule was distinguished by justice and moderation (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4, § 6), and he appears to have devoted himself entirely to the duties of his office without sharing in the intrigues which disgraced his family (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, 6). He built a new city on the site of Paneas, near the sources of the Jordan, which he called Cæsarea (Καισαρεία ἡ Φιλίππου, Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27), and raised Bethsaida (in lower Gaulonitis) to the rank of a city under the title of Julias (Joseph. Ant. ii. 9, § 1; xviii. 2, § 1), and died there A. D. 34 (xviii. 5, § 6). He married Salome, the daughter of Philip (1.) and Herodias (Ant. xviii. 6, § 4), but as he left no children at his death his dominions were added to the Roman province of Syria (xviii. 5, § 6).

VI. HEROD AGRIPPA I. ('Ηρῴδης, Acts; 'Αγρίππας, Joseph.) was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was brought up at Rome with Claudius and Drusus, and after a life of various vicissitudes (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7), was thrown into prison by Tiberius for an unguarded speech, where he remained till the accession of Caius (Caligula) A. D. 37. The new emperor gave him the governments formerly held by the tetrarchs Philip and Lysanias, and bestowed on him the ensigns of royalty and other marks of favor (Acts xii. 1, 'Ηρ. ὁ βασιλεύς). The jealousy of Herod Antipas and his wife Herodias was excited by these distinctions, and they sailed to Rome in the hope of supplanting Agrippa in the emperor's favor. Agrippa was aware of their design, and anticipated it by a counter-charge against Antipas of treasonous correspondence with the Parthians. Antipas failed to answer the accusation, and was banished to Gaul (A. D. 39), and his dominions were added to those already held by Agrippa (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7, § 2). Afterwards Agrippa rendered important services to Claudius (Joseph. B. J. ii. 11, §§ 2, 3), and received from him in return (A. D. 41) the government of Judæa and Samaria; so that his entire dominions equaled in extent the kingdom of Herod the Great. Unlike his predecessors, Agrippa was a strict observer of the Law (Joseph. Ant. xix. 7, § 3), and he sought with success the favor of the Jews.[b] It is probable that it was with this view [c] he put to death James the son of Zebedee, and further imprisoned Peter (Acts xii. 1 ff.) But his sudden death, which followed immediately afterwards, interrupted his ambitious projects.

In the fourth year of his reign over the whole of Judæa (A. D. 44) Agrippa attended some games at Cæsarea, held in honor of the emperor. When he appeared in the theatre (Joseph. Ant. xix. 8, § 2, δευτέρᾳ τῶν θεωριῶν ἡμέρᾳ; Acts xii. 21, τακτῇ ἡμέρᾳ) in "a robe of silver stuff (ἐξ ἀργύρου πεποιημένην πᾶσαν, Joseph.; ἐσθῆτα βασιλικήν, Acts xii. 21) which shone in the morning light, his flatterers saluted him as a god; and suddenly he was seized with terrible pains, and being carried from the theatre to the palace died after five days' agony (ἐφ' ἡμέρας πέντε τῷ τῆς γαστρὸς ἀλγήματι διεργασθεὶς τὸν βίον κατέστρεψεν, Joseph. Ant. xix. 8; γενόμενος σκωληκόβρωτος ἐξέψυξεν, Acts xii. 23; cf. 2 Macc. ix. 5–9).

By a singular and instructive confusion Eusebius (H. E. ii. 10; cf. Heinichen, Exc. 2, ad loc.) converts the owl, which, according to Josephus, appeared to Herod as a messenger of evil (ἄγγελος κακῶν) into "the angel" of the Acts, who was the unseen minister of the Divine Will (Acts xii. 23 ἐπάταξεν αὐτὸν ἄγγελος Κυρίου; cf. 2 K. xix. 35, LXX.).

Various conjectures have been made as to the occasion of the festival at which the event took place. Josephus (l. c.) says that it was in "behalf of the emperor's safety," and it has been supposed that it might be in connection with his return from Britain; but this is at least very uncertain (cf. Wieseler, Chron. d. Apost. Zeit. p. 131 ff.). Josephus mentions also the concourse "of the chief men throughout the province" who were present on the occasion; and though he does not notice the embassy of the Tyrians and Agrippa's speech, yet his narrative is perfectly consistent with both facts.

VII. HEROD AGRIPPA II. ('Αγρίππας, N. T. Joseph.) was the son of Herod Agrippa I. and Cypros, a grand-niece of Herod the Great. At the time of the death of his father, A. D. 44, he was at Rome, and his youth (he was 17 years old) prevented Claudius from carrying out his first intention of appointing him his father's successor (Joseph. Ant. xix. 9, §§ 1, 2). Not long afterwards, however, the emperor gave him (c. A. D. 50) the kingdom of Chalcis, which had belonged to his uncle (who died A. D. 48; Joseph. Ant. xx. 4, § 2; B. J. ii. 12, § 1); and then transferred him (A. D. 52) to the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip and [b] Jost (Gesch. d. Judenthums, i. 420) quotes a legend that Agrippa burst into tears on reading in a public service Deut. xvii. 15; whereupon the people cried out, "Be not distressed, Agrippa, thou art our brother" in virtue, that is, of his half-descent from the Hasmonæans.

[c] Jost (p. 421, &c.), who objects that these acts are inconsistent with the known humanity of Agrippa entirely neglects the reason suggested by St. Luke (Acts xii. 3)

Lysanias (Joseph. Ant. xx. 6, § 1; B. J. ii. 12, § 8), with the title of king (Acts xxv. 13, Ἀγρίππας ὁ βασιλεύς, xxvi. 2, 7, &c.).

Nero afterwards increased the dominions of Agrippa by the addition of several cities (Ant. xx. 6, § 4); and he displayed the lavish magnificence which marked his family by costly buildings at Jerusalem and Berytus, in both cases doing violence to the feelings of the Jews (Ant. xx. 7, § 11; 8, § 4). The relation in which he stood to his sister Berenice (Acts xxv. 13) was the cause of grave suspicion (Joseph. Ant. xx. 6, § 3), which was noticed by Juvenal (Sat. vi. 155 ff.). In the last Roman war Agrippa took part with the Romans, and after the fall of Jerusalem retired with Berenice to Rome, where he died in the third year of Trajan (A. D. 100), being the last prince of the house of Herod (Phot. Cod. 33).

The appearance of St. Paul before Agrippa (A. D. 60) offers several characteristic traits. Agrippa seems to have been intimate with Festus (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7, § 11); and it was natural that the Roman governor should avail himself of his judgment on a question of what seemed to be Jewish law (Acts xxv. 18 ff., 26; cf. Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, § 7). The "pomp" (πολλὴ φαντασία) with which the king came into the audience chamber (Acts xxv. 23) was accordant with his general bearing; and the cold irony with which he met the impassioned words of the Apostle (Acts xxvi. 27, 28) suits the temper of one who was contented to take part in the destruction of his nation. HERO'DIANS (Ἡρῳδιανοί: [Herodiani]). In the account which is given by St. Matthew (xxii. 15 ff.) and St. Mark (xii. 13 ff.) of the last efforts made by different sections of the Jews to obtain from our Lord himself the materials for his accusation, a party under the name of Herodians is represented as acting in concert with the Pharisees[a] (Matt. xxii. 16; Mark xii. 13). St. Mark mentions the combination of the two parties for a similar object at an earlier period (Mark iii. 6), and in another place (viii. 15; cf. Luke xii. 1) he preserves a saying of our Lord, in which "the leaven of Herod" is placed in close connection with "the leaven of the Pharisees"). In the Gospel of St. Luke, on the other hand, the Herodians are not brought forward at all by name.

These very scanty notices of the Evangelists as to the position of the Herodians are not compensated by other testimonies; yet it is not difficult to fix their characteristics by a reference to the condition of Jewish feeling in the Apostolic age. There were probably many who saw in the power of the Herodian family the pledge of the preservation of their national existence in the face of Roman ambition. In proportion as they regarded the independent nationality of the Jewish people as the first condition of the fulfillment of its future destiny, they would be willing to acquiesce in the dominion of men who were themselves of foreign descent [Herod], and not rigid in the observance of the Mosaic ritual. Two distinct classes might thus unite in supporting what was a domestic tyranny as contrasted with absolute dependence on Rome — those who saw in the Herods a protection against direct heathen rule, which was the one object of their fear (cf. Judhas. f. 19, ap. Lightfoot, Harm. Ev. p. 470, ed. Leusd. "Herodes etiam senem Hillel magno in honore habuit; namque hi homines regem illum esse non ægre ferebant"), and those who were inclined to look with satisfaction upon such a compromise between the ancient faith and heathen civilization, as Herod the Great and his successors had endeavored to realize, as the true and highest consummation of Jewish hopes.[b] On the one side the Herodians — partisans of Herod in the widest sense of the term — were thus brought into union with the Pharisees, on the other, with the Sadducees. Yet there is no reason to suppose that they endeavored to form any very systematic harmony of the conflicting doctrines of the two sects, but rather the conflicting doctrines themselves were thrown into the background by what appeared to be a paramount political necessity. Such coalitions have been frequent in every age; and the rarity of the allusions to the Herodians, as a marked body, seems to show that this, like similar coalitions, had no enduring influence as the foundation of party. The feelings which led to the coalition remained, but they were incapable of animating the common action of a united body for any length of time. B. F. W.

* On the occasion mentioned in Matt. xxii. 16 and Mark xii. 13, the Herodians appear as supporters of the claim of the Roman emperors to receive tribute-money from the Jews. This fact agrees a Origen (Comm. in Matt. tom. xvii. § 26) regards this combination of the Herodians and Pharisees as a combination of antagonistic parties, the one favorable to the Roman government (εἰκὸς γὰρ ὅτι ἐν τῷ λαῷ τότε οἱ μὲν διδάσκοντες τελεῖν τὸν φόρον Καίσαρι ἐκαλοῦντο Ἡρῳδιανοὶ ὑπὸ τῶν μὴ θελόντων τοῦτο γίνεσθαι . . .), and the other opposed to it; but this view, which is only conjectural (εἰκός), does not offer a complete solution of the various relations of the Herodians to the other parties of the times. Jerome, following Origen, limits the meaning of the term yet more: "Cum Herodianis, id est, nullibus Herodis, seu quos litudentes Pharisæi, quia Romanis tributa solvebant, Herodianos vocabant et non divino cultui deditos" (Hieron. Comm. in Matt. xxii. 15).

b In this way the Herodians were said to regard Herod (Antipas) as "the Messiah": Ἡρῳδιανοὶ κατ' ἐκείνους τοὺς χρόνους ἦσαν οἱ τὸν Ἡρῴδην Χριστὸν εἶναι λέγοντες, ὡς ἱστορεῖται (Vict. Ant. ap. Cram. Cat. in Marc. p. 400). Philastrius (Hær. xxviii.) applies the same belief to Herod Agrippa; Epiphanius (Hær. xix.) to Herod the Great. Jerome in one place (ad Matt. xxii. 15) calls the idea "a ridiculous notion of some Latin writers, which rests on no authority (quod nusquam legimus)"; and again (Dial. c. Lucifer. xxiii.) mentions it in a general summary of heretical notions without hesitation. The belief was, in fact, one of general sentiment, and not of distinct and pronounced confession.

best with the view that they were essentially a political and not a religious party, and hence in this respect stood at the very opposite pole from the Pharisees, for the latter denied the Roman right of government and resisted all foreign innovations. It is remarkable that we find two such hostile parties acting together in any instance. And especially in regard to that earlier combination (Mark iii. 6), it does not appear from the narrative how a coalition of the Pharisees with the Herodians was to enable them to accomplish the death of Jesus. We can only conjecture how this may have been. The influence of Christ among the people in Galilee at that period was very great, and therefore any open act of violence on the part of his enemies was out of the question. Means more covert must be employed. The Herodians, as the partisans of Herod, had influence with that ruler; and the Pharisees, intriguing with them and fixing upon some political accusation, may have hoped to secure Herod's interposition in arresting and putting to death the object of their malice. It is not without significance that the overture for this alliance came from the Pharisees and not from the Herodians (μετὰ τῶν Ἡρῳδιανῶν συμβούλιον ἐποίουν, Mark iii. 6). H.

HERO'DIAS (Ἡρωδίας, a female patronymic from Ἡρῴδης; on patronymics and gentilic names in ιας, see Matthiæ, Greek Gr. § 101 and 103), the name of a woman of notoriety in the N. T., daughter of Aristobulus, one of the sons of Mariamne and Herod the Great, and consequently sister of Agrippa I.

She first married Herod, surnamed Philip, another of the sons of Mariamne and the first Herod (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 4; comp. B. J. i. 29, § 4), and therefore her full uncle; then she eloped from him, during his lifetime (Ant. ibid.), to marry Herod Antipas, her step-uncle, who had been long married to, and was still living with, the daughter of Æneas or Aretas — his assumed name — king of Arabia (ibid. xvii. 9, § 4). Thus she left her husband, who was still alive, to connect herself with a man whose wife was still alive. Her paramour was indeed less of a blood relation than her original husband; but being likewise the half-brother of that husband, he was already connected with her by affinity — so close that there was only one case contemplated in the Law of Moses where it could be set aside, namely, when the married brother had died childless (Lev. xviii. 16, and xx. 21, and for the exception Deut. xxv. 5 ff.). Now Herodias had already had one child — Salome — by Philip (Ant. xviii. 5, § 4), and, as he was still alive, might have had more. Well, therefore, may she be charged by Josephus with the intention of confounding her country's institutions (ibid. xviii. 5, § 4); and well may St. John the Baptist have remonstrated against the enormity of such a connection with the tetrarch, whose conscience would certainly seem to have been a less hardened one (Matt. xiv. 9 says he "was sorry" Mark vi. 20 that he "feared" St. John; and "heard him gladly").

The consequences both of the crime, and of the reproof which it incurred, are well known. Aretas made war upon Herod for the injury done to his daughter, and routed him with the loss of his whole army (Ant. xviii. 5, § 1). The head of St. John the Baptist was granted to the request of Herodias (Matt. xiv. 8–11; Mark vi. 24–28). According to Josephus the execution took place in a fortress called Machærus, on the frontier between the dominions of Aretas and Herod, according to Pliny (v. 15), looking down upon the Dead Sea from the south (comp. Robinson, i. 570, note). And it was to the iniquity of this act, rather than to the immorality of that illicit connection that, the historian says, some of the Jews attributed the defeat of Herod. In the closing scene of her career, indeed, Herodias exhibited considerable magnanimity; as she preferred going with Antipas to Lugdunum,[a] and there sharing his exile and reverses, till death ended them, to the remaining with her brother Agrippa I., and partaking of his elevation (Ant xviii. 7, § 2).

There are few episodes in the whole range of the N. T. more suggestive to the commentator than this one scene in the life of Herodias.

1. It exhibits one of the most remarkable of the undesigned coincidences between the N. T. and Josephus; that there are some discrepancies in the two accounts, only enhances their value. More than this, it has led the historian into a brief digression upon the life, death, and character of the Baptist, which speaks volumes in favor of the genuineness of that still more celebrated passage, in which he speaks of "Jesus," that "wise man, if man he may be called" (Ant. xviii. 3, § 3; comp. xx. 9, § 1, unhesitatingly quoted as genuine by Euseb. H. E. i. 11).[b]

2. It has been warmly debated whether it was the adultery, or the incestuous connection, that drew down the reproof of the Baptist. It has been already shown that, either way, the offense merited condemnation upon more grounds than one.

3. The birthday feast is another undesigned coincidence between Scripture and profane history. The Jews abhorred keeping birthdays as a pagan custom (Bland on Matt. xiv. 6). On the other hand, it was usual with the Egyptians (Gen. xl. 20; comp. Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 7), with the Persians (Herod. i. 133), with the Greeks, even in the case of the dead, whence the Christian custom of keeping anniversaries of the martyrs (Bähr, ad Herod. iv. 26), and with the Romans (Pers. Sat. ii. 1–3). Now the Herods may be said to have gone beyond Rome in the observance of all that was Roman. Herod the Great kept the day of his accession; Antipas — as we read here — and Agrippa I., as Josephus tells us (Ant. xix. 7, § 1), their a This town is probably Lugdunum Convenarum, a town of Gaul, situated on the right bank of the Garonne, at the foot of the Pyrenees, now St. Bertrand de Comminges (Murray, Handb. of France, p. 314); Eusebius, H. E. i. 11, says Vienne, confounding Antipas with Archelaus; Burton on Matt. xiv. 3, Alford, and moderns in general, Lyons. In Josephus (B. J. ii. 9, § 6), Antipas is said to have died in Spain — apparently, from the context, the land of his exile. A town on the frontiers therefore, like the above, would satisfy both passages.

b * Tholuck has made admirable use of the argument from this source in his Glaubwürdigkeit der Evang. Geschichte, pp. 354–357. It is shown that the personal names, the places, dates, and customs, Jewish and Roman, mentioned or implied in the account of Herodias and of the beheading of John, are fully confirmed by contemporary writers. On the question whether Josephus and the evangelists disagree in regard to the place where John was imprisoned, see TIBERIAS. H birthday. with such magnificence, that the "birthdays of Herod" (Herodis dies) had passed into a proverb when Persius wrote (Sat. v. 180).

4. And yet dancing, on these festive occasions, was common to both Jew and Gentile; and was practiced in the same way — youths and virgins, singly, or separated into two bands, but never intermingled, danced to do honor to their deity, their hero, or to the day of their solemnity. Miriam (Ex. xv. 20), the daughter of Jephthah (Judges xi. 34), and David (2 Sam. vi. 14), are familiar instances in Holy Writ; the "Carmen Sæculare" of Horace, to quote no more, points to the same custom amongst Greeks and Romans. It is plainly owing to the elevation of woman in the social scale, that dancing in pairs (still unknown to the East) has come into fashion.

5. The rash oath of Herod, like that of Jephthah in the O. T., has afforded ample discussion to casuists. It is now ruled that all such oaths, where there is no reservation, expressed or implied, in favor of the laws of God or man, are illicit and without force. And so Solomon had long since decided (1 K. ii. 20–24; see Sanderson, De Juram. Oblig. Prælect. iii. 16). E. S. Ff.

HERO'DION (Ἡρωδίων: Herodion), a relative of St. Paul (τὸν συγγενῆ μου: cognatus), to whom he sends his salutation amongst the Christians of the Roman Church (Rom. xvi. 11). Nothing appears to be certainly known of him. By Hippolytus, however, he is said to have been bishop of Tarsus; and by Pseudo-Dorotheus, of Patræ (Winer, sub voc.).

HERON (אֲנָפָה). The Hebrew anâphah appears as the name of an unclean bird in Lev. xi. 19, Deut. xiv. 18. From the addition of the words "after her kind," we may infer that it was a generic name for a well-known class of birds, and hence it is the more remarkable that the name does not occur elsewhere in the Bible. It is quite uncertain what bird is intended; the only point on which any two commentators seem to agree is, that it is not the heron, for many suppose the preceding word, translated in the A. V. "stork," to apply in reality to the heron. The LXX. translates it χαράδριος, which may be regarded as applicable to all birds frequenting swampy ground (ἐν χαράδραις), but more particularly to the plover. This explanation loses what little weight it might otherwise have had, from the probability that it originated in a false reading, namely, agaphah, which the translators connected with agaph, "a bank." The Talmudists evidently were at a loss, for they describe it indefinitely as a "high-flying bird of prey" (Chulin, 63 a). The only ground on which an opinion can be formed, is the etymology of the word; it is connected by Gesenius (Thes. p. 127) with the root anaph, "to snort in anger," and is therefore applicable to some irritable bird, perhaps the goose. The parrot, swallow, and a kind of eagle have been suggested without any real reason. W. L. B.

HE'SED (חֶסֶד [kindness, favor]: Ἐσδί; Alex. Εσδ: Benhesed), the son of Hesed, or Ben-Chesed, was commissary for Solomon in the district of "the Arubboth, Socoh, and all the land of Hepher" (1 K. iv. 10).

HESH'BON (חֶשְׁבּוֹן [prudence, understanding]: Ἐσεβών: [Rom. Vat. in Josh. xxi. 39, Εσβών:] Hesebon), the capital city of Sihon king of the Amorites (Num. xxi. 26). It stood on the western border of the high plain (Mishor, Josh. xiii. 17), and on the boundary-line between the tribes of Reuben and Gad. The ruins of Hesbân, 20 miles east of the Jordan, on the parallel of the northern end of the Dead Sea, mark the site, as they bear the name, of the ancient Heshbon. The city is chiefly celebrated from its connection with Sihon, who was the first to give battle to the invading Israelites. He marched against them to Jahaz, which must have been situated a short distance south of Heshbon, and was there completely overthrown (Deut. ii. 32 ff.). Heshbon was rebuilt by the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxxii. 37), but was assigned to the Levites in connection with the tribe of Gad (Josh. xxi. 39). After the Captivity it fell into the hands of the Moabites, to whom it had originally belonged (Num. xxi. 26), and hence it is mentioned in the prophetic denunciations against Moab (Is. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 2, 34, 45). In the fourth century it was still a place of some note (Onom. s. v. Esebon), but it has now been for many centuries wholly desolate.

The ruins of Heshbon stand on a low hill rising out of the great undulating plateau. They are more than a mile in circuit; but not a building remains entire. Towards the western part is a singular structure, whose crumbling ruins exhibit the workmanship of successive ages—the massive stones of the Jewish period, the sculptured cornice of the Roman era, and the light Saracenic arch, all grouped together. There are many cisterns among the ruins; and towards the south, a few yards from the base of the hill, is a large ancient reservoir, which calls to mind the passage in Cant. vii. 4, "Thine eyes are like the fish-pools of Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim." (See Burckhardt, Trav. in Syr., p. 365; Irby and Mangles, p. 472.) [Bath-rabbim.] J. L. P.

* For a description of the ruins of Hesbân, see Tristram's Land of Israel, p. 544, 2d ed. Among other monuments of the old city, he speaks of "the foundations of a forum, or public building of the Roman period, arranged exactly like the forum at Pompeii. . . . Some portions of the walls are standing — a few tiers of worn stones; and the space is thickly strewn with piles of Doric shafts, capitals of columns, broken entablatures, and large stones with the broad bevelled edge. In one edifice, of which a large portion remains, near the foot of the hill, Jewish stones, Roman arches, Doric pillars, and Saracenic arches, are all strangely mingled. . . . The old wells were so numerous that we had to ride with great care to avoid them." Instead of "fish-pools" said (A. V.) to have been at Heshbon (Cant. vii. 4), we should read "pools" or "tanks" (בְּרֵכוֹת): and, as we see above, the remains of water-works of this description are still abundant there. Of all the marks of antiquity the Arabs consider none more decisive than the ruins of cisterns or reservoirs (Wetzstein's Reisebericht über Hauran, etc., p. 86). H.

HESH'MON (חֶשְׁמוֹן [thriving, fruitfulness]: LXX. omits, both MSS.; [Comp. Aid. Ἀσεμών:] Hassemon), a place named, with others, as lying between Moladah and Beer-sheba (Josh. xv, 27), and therefore in the extreme south of Judah. Nothing further is known of it; but may it not be another form of the name Azmon, given in Num. xxxiv. 4 as one of the landmarks of the southern boundary of Judah? G.

HES'RON (חֶצְרוֹן) [enclosed, as by a wall]: Ἀσρών; Alex. Ασρωμ: Hesron). HEZRON, the son of Reuben (Num. xxvi. 6, [21]). Our translators followed the Vulg. in adopting this form of the name. [In many modern editions of the A. V. however, it is spelt Hezron. A.] W. A. W.

HES'RONITES, THE (הַחֶצְרֹנִי: ὁ Ασρωνί; [Vat.] Alex. ο Ασρωει: Hesronite). Descendants of Hesron, or Hezron, the son of Reuben (Num. xxvi. 6). [In many modern editions of the A. V. the word is spelt Hezronites. — A.] W. A. W.

HETH (חֵת, i. e. Cheth [terror, giant]: Χέτ: Heth), the forefather of the nation of THE HITTITES. In the genealogical tables of Gen. x. and 1 Chr. i., Heth is stated as a son of Canaan, younger than Zidon the firstborn, but preceding the Jebusite, the Amorite, and the other Canaanite families. Heth and Zidon alone are named as persons; all the rest figure as tribes (Gen. x. 15; 1 Chr. i. 13; LXX. τὸν Χετταῖον: [Vulg. Hethæum;] and so Josephus, Ant. i. 6, § 2).

The Hittites were therefore a Hamite race, neither of the "country" nor the "kindred" of Abraham and Isaac (Gen. xxiv. 3, 4; xxviii. 1, 2). In the earliest historical mention of the nation — the beautiful narrative of Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah — they are styled, not Hittites, but Bene-Cheth (A. V. "sons, and children of Heth," Gen. xxiii. 3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 18, 20; xxv. 10; xlix. 32). Once we hear of "daughters of Heth" (xxvii. 46), the "daughters of the land;" at that early period still called, after their less immediate progenitor, "daughters of Canaan" (xxviii. 1, 8, compared with xxvii. 46, and xxvi. 34, 35).

In the Egyptian monuments the name Chat is said to stand for Palestine (Bunsen, Ægypten, quoted by Ewald, Gesch. i. 317, note). G.

HETH'LON (הֶתְלֹן), the way of Hethlon [i. e. of the lurking-place or stronghold]: [LXX. translate the name: Hethalon]), the name of a place on the northern border of the "promised land." It is mentioned only twice in Scripture (Ez. xlvii. 15, xlviii. 1). In all probability the "way of Hethlon" is the pass at the northern end of Lebanon, from the sea-coast of the Mediterranean to the great plain of Hamath, and is thus identical with "the entrance of Hamath" in Num. xxxiv. 8, &c. (See Five Years in Damascus, ii. 356.) J. L. P.

HEZ'EKI (חִזְקִי), i. e. Hizki, a short form of Hizkiah, strength of Jehovah = Hezekiah: Ἀζακί; [Vat. Αζακει:] Hezeci), a man in the genealogies of Benjamin, one of the Bene-Elpaal [sons of E.], a descendant of Shaaraim (1 Chr. viii. 17).

HEZEKI'AH (חִזְקִיָּה, generally חִזְקִיָּהוּ, Hizkiya'hu, and also with initial י — יְחִזְקִיָּהוּ: LXX. and Joseph. Ἐζεκίας: Ezechias; = strength of Jehovah, comp. Germ. Gotthard, Ges.), twelfth king of Judah, son of the apostate Ahaz and Abi (or Abijah), ascended the throne at the age of 25 B. C. 726. Since, however, Ahaz died at the age of 36, some prefer to make Hezekiah only 20 years old at his accession (reading כ for כה), as otherwise he must have been born when Ahaz was a boy of 11 years old. This, indeed, is not impossible (Hieron. Ep. ad Vitalem, 132, quoted by Bochart, Geogr. Sacr. p. 920; see Keil on 2 K. xviii. 1; Knobel, Jes. 22, &c.); but, if any change be desirable, it is better to suppose that Ahaz was 25 and not 20 years old at his accession (LXX. Syr Arab. 2 Chr. xxviii. 1), reading כה for כ in 2 K. xvi. 2.

Hezekiah was one of the three most perfect kings of Judah (2 K. xviii. 5; Ecclus. xlix. 4). His first act was to purge, and repair, and reopen with splendid sacrifices and perfect ceremonial, the Temple which had been despoiled and neglected during the careless and idolatrous reign of his father. This consecration was accompanied by a revival of the theocratic spirit, so strict as not even to spare "the high places," which, although tolerated by many well-intentioned kings, had naturally been profaned by the worship of images and Asherahs (2 K. xviii. 4). On the extreme importance and probable consequences of this measure, see HIGH PLACES. A still more decisive act was the destruction of a brazen serpent, said to have been the one used by Moses in the miraculous healing of the Israelites (Num. xxi. 9), which had been removed to Jerusalem, and had become, "down to those days," an object of adoration, partly in consequence of its venerable character as a relic, and partly perhaps from some dim tendencies to the ophiolatry common in ancient times (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 622). To break up a figure so curious and so highly honored showed a strong mind, as well as a clear-sighted zeal, and Hezekiah briefly justified his procedure by calling the image נְחֻשְׁתָּן, "a brazen thing," possibly with a contemptuous play on the word נָחָשׁ, "a serpent." How necessary this was in such times may be inferred from the fact that "the brazen serpent" is, or was, reverenced in the Church of St. Ambrose at Milan (Prideaux, Connect. i. 19, Oxf. ed.).[a] When the kingdom of Israel had fallen, Hezekiah extended his pious endeavors to Ephraim and Manasseh, and by inviting the scattered inhabitants to a peculiar Passover kindled their indignation also against the idolatrous practices which still continued among them. This Passover was, from the necessities of the case, celebrated at an unusual, though not illegal (Num. ix. 10, 11) time, and by an excess of Levitical zeal, it was continued for the unprecedented period of fourteen days. For these latter facts the Chronicler (2 Chr. xxix., xxx., xxxi.) is our sole authority, and he characteristically narrates them at great length. It would appear at first sight that this Passover was celebrated immediately after the purification of the Temple (see Prideaux, l. c.), but careful consideration makes it almost certain that it could not have taken place before the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign, when the fall of Samaria had stricken remorseful terror into the heart of Israel (2 Chr. xxxi. 1, xxx. 6, 9, and Keil on 2 K. xviii. 3).

By a rare and happy providence the most pious of kings was confirmed in his faithfulness, and seconded in his endeavors by the powerful assistance of the noblest and most eloquent of prophets. The influence of Isaiah was, however, not gained without a struggle with the "scornful" remnant of the former royal counsellors (Is. xxviii. 14), who in all probability recommended to the king such alliances and compromises as would be in unison rather with the dictates of political expediency, than with that sole unhesitating trust in the arm of Jehovah which the prophets inculcated. The leading man of this cabinet was Shebna, who, from the omission of his father's name, and the expression in Is. xxii. 16 (see Blunt, Undes. Coincidences), was probably a foreigner, perhaps a Syrian (Hitzig). At the instance of Isaiah, he seems to have been subsequently degraded from the high post of prefect of the palace (which office was given to Eliakim, Is. xxii. 21), to the inferior, though still honorable, station of state-secretary (סֹפֵר, 2 K. xviii. 18); the further punishment of exile with which Isaiah had threatened him (xxii. 18) being possibly forgiven on his amendment, of which we have some traces in Is. xxxvii. 2 ff. (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 617).

At the head of a repentant and united people, Hezekiah ventured to assume the aggressive against the Philistines, and in a series of victories not only rewon the cities which his father had lost (2 Chr. xxviii. 18), but even dispossessed them of their own cities except Gaza (2 K. xviii. 8) and Gath (Joseph. Ant. ix. 13, § 3). It was perhaps to the purposes of this war that he applied the money which would otherwise have been used to pay the tribute exacted by Shalmanezer, according to the agreement of Ahaz with his predecessor, Tiglath Pileser. When, after the capture of Samaria, the king of Assyria applied for this impost, Hezekiah refused it, and in open rebellion omitted to send even the usual presents (2 K. xviii. 7), a line of conduct to which he was doubtless encouraged by the splendid exhortation of his prophetic guide.

Instant war was averted by the heroic and long-continued resistance of the Tyrians under their king Elulæus (Joseph. Ant. ix. 14), against a siege, which was abandoned only in the fifth year (Grote, Greece, iii. 359, 4th ed.), when it was found to be impracticable. This must have been a critical and intensely anxious period for Jerusalem, and Hezekiah used every available means to strengthen his position, and render his capital impregnable (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Chr. xxxii. 3–5, 30; Is. xxii. 8–11, xxxiii. 18; and to these events Ewald also refers Ps. xlviii. 13). But while all Judæa trembled with anticipation of Assyrian invasion, and while Shebna and others were relying "in the shadow of Egypt," Isaiah's brave heart did not fail, and he even denounced the wrath of God against the proud and sinful merchant-city (Is. xxiii.), which now seemed to be the main bulwark of Judæa against immediate attack.

It was probably during the siege of Samaria that Shalmanezer died, and was succeeded by Sargon, who, jealous of Egyptian influence in Judæa, sent an army under a Tartan or general (Is. xx. 1), which penetrated Egypt (Nah. iii. 8–10) and destroyed No-Amon; although it is clear from Hezekiah's rebellion (2 K. xviii. 7) that it can have produced but little permanent impression. Sargon, in the tenth year of his reign (which is the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah), made an expedition to Palestine; but his annals make no mention of any conquests from Hezekiah on this occasion, and he seems to have occupied himself in the siege of Ashdod (Is. xx. 1), and in the inspection of mines (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. ix.). This must therefore be the expedition alluded to in 2 K. xviii. 13; Is. xxxvi. 1; an expedition which is merely alluded to, as it led to no result. But if the Scripture narrative is to be reconciled with the records of Assyrian history it seems necessary to make a transposition in the text of Isaiah (and therefore of the book of Kings). That some such expedient must be resorted to, if the Assyrian history is trustworthy, is maintained by Dr. Hincks in a paper On the rectification of Chronology, which the newly-discovered Apis-steles render necessary. "The text," he says, "as it originally stood, was probably to this effect: 2 K. xviii. 13. Now in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah the king of Assyria came up [alluding to the attack mentioned in Sargon's Annals]; xx. 1–19. In those days was king Hezekiah sick unto death, etc., xviii. 13. And Sennacherib, king of Assyria, came up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them, etc., xviii. 13, xix. 37" (Dr. Hincks, in Journ. of Sacr. Lit. Oct. 1858). Perhaps some later transcriber, unaware of the earlier and unimportant invasion, confused the allusion to Sargon in 2 K. xviii. 13 with the detailed story of Sennacherib's attack (2 K. xviii. 14 to xix. 37), and, considering that the account of Hezekiah's illness broke the continuity of the narrative, removed it to the end.

According to this scheme, Hezekiah's dangerous illness (2 K. xx.; Is. xxxviii.; 2 Chr. xxxii. 24) nearly synchronized with Sargon's futile invasion, in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, eleven years before Sennacherib's invasion. That it must have preceded the attack of Sennacherib is nearly obvious from the promise in 2 K. xx. 6, as well as from modern discoveries (Layard, Nin. and Bab. i. 145); and such is the view adopted by the Rabbis (Seder Olam, cap. xxiii.), Ussher, and by most commentators, except Vitringa and Gesenius (Keil, ad loc.; Prideaux, i. 22). There seems to be no ground whatever for the vague conjecture so confidently advanced (Winer, s. v. Hiskias; Jahn, Hebr. Common. § xli.) that the king's illness was the same plague which had destroyed the Assyrian army. The word שְׁחִין is not elsewhere applied to the plague, but to carbuncles and inflammatory ulcers (Ex. ix. 9; Job ii. 7, &c.). Hezekiah, whose kingdom was in a dangerous crisis, who had at that time no heir (for Manasseh was not born till long afterwards, 2 K. xxi. 1), and who regarded death as the end of existence (Is. xxxviii.), "turned his face to the wall and wept sore" at the threatened approach of dissolution. God had compassion on his anguish, and heard his prayer. Isaiah had hardly left the palace when he was ordered to promise the king immediate recovery, and a fresh lease of life, ratifying the promise by a sign, and curing the boil by a plaster of figs, which were often used medicinally in similar cases (Ges. Thes. i. 311; Celsius, Hierobot. ii. 377; Bartholinus, De Morbis Biblicis, x. 47). What was the exact nature of the disease we cannot say; according to Meade it was fever terminating in abscess. For some account of the retrogression of the shadow on the sundial of Ahaz, see DIAL. On this remarkable passage we must be content to refer the reader to Carpzov, App. Crit. p. 351 ff.; Winer, s. v. Hiskias and Uhren; Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 332 ff.; the elaborate notes of Keil on 2 K. xx.; Rosenmüller and Gesenius on Is. xxxviii., and especially Ewald, Gesch. iii. 658.

Various ambassadors came with letters and gifts to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery (2 Chr. xxxii. 23), and among them an embassy from Meroẖach-Baladan (or Berodach, 2 K. xx. 12; ὁ Βαλαδας, Joseph. l. c.), the viceroy of Babylon, the Mardokempados of Ptolemy's canon. The ostensible object of this mission was to compliment Hezekiah on his convalescence (2 K. xx. 12; Is. xxxix. 1), and "to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land" (2 Chr. xxxii. 31), a rumor of which could not fail to interest a people devoted to astrology. But its real purpose was to discover how far an alliance between the two powers was possible or desirable, for Mardokempados, no less than Hezekiah, was in apprehension of the Assyrians. In fact Sargon expelled him from the throne of Babylon in the following year (the 16th of Hezekiah), although after a time he seems to have returned and reëstablished himself for six months, at the end of which he was murdered by Belibos (Dr. Hincks, l. c.; Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. ch. viii.; Layard, Nin. and Bab. i. 141). Community of interest made Hezekiah receive the overtures of Babylon with unconcealed gratification; and, perhaps, to enhance the opinion of his own importance as an ally, he displayed to the messengers the princely treasures which he and his predecessors had accumulated. The mention of such rich stores is an additional argument for supposing these events to have happened before Sennacherib's invasion (see 2 K. xviii. 14–16), although they are related after them in the Scripture historians. If ostentation were his motive it received a terrible rebuke, and he was informed by Isaiah that from the then tottering and subordinate province of Babylon, and not from the mighty Assyria, would come the ruin and captivity of Judah (Is. xxxix. 5). This prophecy and the one of Micah (Mic. iv. 10) are the earliest definition of the locality of that hostile power, where the clouds of exile so long threatened (Lev. xxvi. 33; Deut. iv. 27, xxx. 3) were beginning to gather. It is an impressive and fearful circumstance that the moment of exultation was chosen as the opportunity for warning, and that the prophecies of the Assyrian deliverance are set side by side with those of the Babylonish Captivity (Davidson On Prophecy, p. 256). The weak friend was to accomplish that which was impossible to the powerful foe. But, although pride was the sin thus vehemently checked by the prophet, Isaiah was certainly not blind to the political motives (Joseph. Ant. x. 2, § 2), which made Hezekiah so complaisant to the Babylonian ambassadors. Into those motives he had inquired in vain, for the king met that portion of his question ("What said these men?") by emphatic silence. Hezekiah's meek answer to the stern denunciation of future woe has been most unjustly censured as "a false resignation which combines selfishness with silliness" (Newman, Hebr. Mon. p. 274). On the contrary it merely implies a conviction that God's decree could not be otherwise than just and right, and a natural thankfulness for even a temporary suspension of its inevitable fulfillment.

Sargon was succeeded (B. C. 702) by his son Sennacherib, whose two invasions occupy the greater part of the Scripture records concerning the reign of Hezekiah. The first of these took place in the third year of Sennacherib (B. C. 700), and occupies only three verses (2 K. xviii. 13–16), though the route of the advancing Assyrians may be traced in Is. x 5, xi. The rumor of the invasion redoubled Hezekiah's exertions, and he prepared for a siege by providing offensive and defensive armor, stopping up the wells, and diverting the watercourses, conducting the water of Gihon into the city by a subterranean canal (Ecclus. xlviii. 17. For a similar precaution taken by the Mohammedans, see Will. Tyr. viii. 7, Keil). But the main hope of the political faction was the alliance with Egypt, and they seem to have sought it by presents and private entreaties (Is. xxx. 6), especially with a view to obtaining chariots and cavalry (Is. xxxi. 1–3), which was the weakest arm of the Jewish service, as we see from the derision which it excited (2 K. xviii. 23). Such overtures kindled Isaiah's indignation, and Shebna may have lost his high office by recommending them. The prophet clearly saw that Egypt was too weak and faithless to be serviceable, and the applications to Pharaoh (who is compared by Rabshakeh to one of the weak reeds of his own river), implied a want of trust in the help of God. But Isaiah did not disapprove of the spontaneously proffered assistance of the tall and warlike Ethiopians (Is. xviii. 2, 7, acc. to Ewald's trans.); because he may have regarded it as a providential aid.

The account given of this first invasion in the Annals of Sennacherib is that he attacked Hezekiah, because the Ekronites had sent their king Padiya (or "Haddiya" acc. to Col. Rawlinson) as a prisoner to Jerusalem (cf. 2 K. xviii. 8); that he took forty-six cities ("all the fenced cities" in 2 K. xviii. 13 is apparently a general expression, cf. xix. 8) and 200,000 prisoners: that he besieged Jerusalem with mounds (cf. 2 K. xix. 32); and although Hezekiah promised to pay 800 talents of silver (of which perhaps 300 only were ever paid) and 30 of gold (2 K. xviii. 14; but see Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 145), yet not content with this he mulcted him of a part of his dominions, and gave them to the kings of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza (Rawlinson, Herod. i. 475 ff). So important was this expedition that Demetrius, the Jewish historian, even attributes to Sennacherib the Great Captivity (Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 146, ed. Sylb.). In almost every particular this account agrees with the notice in Scripture, and we may see a reason for so great a sacrifice on the part of Hezekiah in the glimpse which Isaiah gives us of his capital city driven by desperation into licentious and impious mirth (xxii. 12–14). This campaign must at least have had the one good result of proving the worthlessness of the Egyptian alliance; for at a place called Altagû (the Eltekon of Josh. xv. 59?) Sennacherib inflicted an overwhelming defeat on the combined forces of Egypt and Ethiopia, which had come to the assistance of Ekron. But Isaiah regarded the purchased treaty as a cowardly defection, and the sight of his fellow-citizens gazing peacefully from the house-tops on the bright array of the car-borne and quivered Assyrians, filled him with indignation and despair (Is. xxii. 1–7, if the latest explanations of this chapter be correct).

Hezekiah's bribe (or fine) brought a temporary release, for the Assyrians marched into Egypt, where, if Herodotus (ii. 141) and Josephus (Ant. x. 1–3) are to be trusted, they advanced without resistance to Pelusium, owing to the hatred of the warrior-caste against Sethos the king-priest of Pthah, who had, in his priestly predilections, interfered with their prerogatives. In spite of this advantage, Sennacherib was forced to raise the siege of Pelusium, by the advance of Tirhakah or Tarakos, the ally of Sethos and Hezekiah, who afterwards united the crowns of Egypt and Ethiopia. This magnificent Ethiopian hero, who had extended his conquests to the pillars of Hercules (Strab. xv. 472), was indeed a formidable antagonist. His deeds are recorded in a temple at Medinet Haboo, but the jealousy of the Memphites (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 141) concealed his assistance, and attributed the deliverance of Sethos to the miraculous interposition of an army of mice (Herod. ii. 141). This story may have had its source, however, not in jealousy, but in the use of a mouse as the emblem of destruction (Horapoll. Hierogl. i. 50; Rawlinson, Herod. ad loc.), and of some sort of disease or plague (? 1 Sam. vi. 18; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 185). The legend doubtless gained ground from the extraordinary circumstances which afterwards ruined the army of Sennacherib. We say afterwards, because, however much the details of the two occurrences may have been confused, we cannot agree with the majority of writers (Prideaux, Bochart, Michaelis, Jahn, Keil, Newman, etc.) in identifying the flight of Sennacherib from Pelusium with the event described in 2 K. xix. We prefer to follow Josephus in making them allude to distinct events.

Returning from his futile expedition (ἄπρακτος ἀνεχώρησε, Joseph. Ant. x. 1, § 4), Sennacherib "dealt treacherously" with Hezekiah (Is. xxxiii. 1) by attacking the stronghold of Lachish. This was the commencement of that second invasion, respecting which we have such full details in 2 K. xviii. 17 ff.; 2 Chr. xxxii. 9 ff.; Is. xxxvi. That there were two invasions (contrary to the opinion of Layard, Bosanquet, Vance Smith, etc.) is clearly proved by the details of the first given in the Assyrian annals (see Rawlinson, Herod. i. p. 477). Although the annals of Sennacherib on the great cylinder in the Brit. Museum reach to the end of his eighth year, and this second invasion belongs to his fifth year (B. C. 698, the twenty-eighth year of Hezekiah), yet no allusion to it has been found. So shameful a disaster was naturally concealed by national vanity. From Lachish he sent against Jerusalem an army under two officers and his cupbearer the orator Rabshakeh, with a blasphemous and insulting summons to surrender, deriding Hezekiah's hopes of Egyptian succor, and apparently endeavoring to inspire the people with distrust of his religious innovations (2 K. xviii. 22, 25, 30). The reiteration and peculiarity of the latter argument, together with Rabshakeh's fluent mastery of Hebrew (which he used to tempt the people from their allegiance by a glowing promise, v. 31, 32), give countenance to the supposition that he was an apostate Jew. Hezekiah's ministers were thrown into anguish and dismay; but the undaunted Isaiah hurled back threatening for threatening with unrivaled eloquence and force. He even prophesied that the fires of Tophet were already burning in expectancy of the Assyrian corpses which were destined to feed their flame. Meanwhile Sennacherib, having taken Lachish (an event possibly depicted on a series of slabs at Mosul, Layard, N. and B. 148–152), was besieging Libnah, when, alarmed by a "rumor" of Tirhakah's advance (to avenge the defeat at Altaqû?), he was forced to relinquish once more his immediate designs, and content himself with a defiant letter to Hezekiah. Whether on this occasion he encountered and defeated the Ethiopians (as Prideaux precariously infers from Is. xx. Connect. i. p. 26), or not, we cannot tell. The next event of the campaign, about which we are informed, is that the Jewish king with simple piety prayed to God with Sennacherib's letter outspread before him (cf. 1 Macc. iii. 48), and received a prophecy of immediate deliverance. Accordingly "that night the Angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians 185,000 men."

There is no doubt that some secondary cause was employed in the accomplishment of this event. We are certainly "not to suppose," as Dr. Johnson observed, "that the angel went about with a sword in his hand stabbing them one by one, but that some powerful natural agent was employed." The Babylonish Talmud and some of the Targums attribute it to storms of lightning (Vitringa, Vogel, etc.); Prideaux, Heine (de causâ Strag. Assyr.), and Faber to the Simoon; R. Jose, Ussher, Preiss (de causâ clad. Assyr.), etc., etc., to a nocturnal attack by Tirhakah; Paulus to a poisoning of the waters; and finally Josephus, followed by an immense majority of ancient and modern commentators, including even Keil, to the Pestilence. This would be a cause not only adequate (Justin, xix. 11; Diodor. xix. p. 434: see the other instances quoted by Rosenmüller, Winer, Keil, Jahn, etc.), but most probable in itself from the crowded and terrified state of the camp. There is therefore no necessity to adopt the ingenious conjectures by which Döderlein, Koppe, and Wessler endeavor to get rid of the large number 185,000.[a]

After this reverse Sennacherib fled precipitately to Nineveh, where he revenged himself on as many Jews as were in his power (Tob. i. 18), and after many years (not fifty-five days, as Tobit says, i. 21), was murdered by two of his sons as he drank himself drunk in the house of Nisroch (Assarac?) his god. He certainly lived till B. C. 680, for his 22d year is mentioned on a clay tablet (Rawlinson, l. c.); he must therefore have survived Hezekiah by some seventeen years. It is probable that several of the Psalms (e. g. xlvi.–xlviii., lxxvi.) allude to his discomfiture.

Hezekiah only lived to enjoy for about one year more his well-earned peace and glory. He slept with his fathers after a reign of twenty-nine years, in the 56th year of his age (B. C. 697), and was buried with great honor and universal mourning "in the chiefest of the sepulchres (or 'the road leading up to the sepulchres,' ἐν ἀναβάσει τάφων, LXX., because, as Thenius conjectures, the actual sepulchres were full) of the sons of David" (2 Chr. xxxii. 33). He had found time for many works of peace in the noble and almost blameless course of his troubled life, and to his pious labors we are indebted for at least one portion of the present canon (Prov. xxv. 1; Eccles. xlviii. 17 ff.). He can have no finer panegyric than the words of the son of Sirach, "even the kings of Judah failed, for they forsook the law of the Most High; all except David, and Ezekias, and Judas failed."

[a] * Stanley's note may be cited here: "By what special means this great destruction was effected, with how large or small a remnant Sennacherib returned, is not told. It might be a pestilential blast (Is. xxxvii. 7; Joseph. Ant. x. 1, § 5), according to the analogy by which a pestilence is usually described in Scripture under the image of a destroying angel (Ps. lxxviii. 49; 2 Sam. xxiv. 16); and the numbers are not greater than are recorded as perishing within very short periods — 150,000 Carthaginians in Sicily, 500,000 in seven months at Cairo (Gesenius, ad loc.). It might be accompanied by a storm. So Vitringa understood it, and this would best suit the words in Is. xxx. 29" (History of the Jewish Church, ii. 530). A mutilated account of this wonder was current among the Egyptians. They ascribed it, as a matter of course, to their own divinities, but unquestionably had in view the same occurrence (see Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 141).

Besides the many authors and commentators who have written on this period of Jewish history (on which much light has been recently thrown by Mr. Layard, Sir G. Wilkinson, Sir. H. Rawlinson, Dr. Hincks, and other scholars who have studied the Nineveh remains), see for continuous lives of Hezekiah, Josephus (Ant. ix. 13–x. 2), Prideaux (Connect. i. 16–30), Jahn (Hebr. Comm. § xli.), Winer (s. v. Hiskias), and Ewald (Gesch. iii. 614–644, 2d ed.). F. W. F.

* Dean Stanley devotes a long lecture (History of the Jewish Church, ii. 505–540) to the character of Hezekiah, and the events with which he was connected. "The reign of Hezekiah is the culminating point of interest in the history of the kings of Judah." Yet the interest of his personal history is mainly that which arises from the contemplation of his example as one of faith and piety, and of the wonderful deliverances vouchsafed to the nation for his sake, though both these and his earnest efforts for the reformation of the people served only to delay, but not to avert the hastening ruin of the commonwealth. The sketch drawn by Mr. Stanley of Hezekiah's repairing to the temple with the defiant letter of Sennacherib, to spread it before Jehovah and to implore his help, brings out the monarch's character at that most critical juncture in its best light. The Assyrian conqueror had sent from Lachish, demanding the submission of Hezekiah and the surrender of Jerusalem into the hands of his general. On hearing this summons, Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah, Hezekiah's three highest officers, "tore their garments in horror, and appeared in that state before the king. He, too, gave way to the same uncontrolled burst of grief. He and they both dressed themselves in sackcloth, and the king took refuge in the Temple. The ministers went to seek comfort from Isaiah. The insulting embassy returned to Sennacherib. The army was moved from Lachish and lay in front of the fortress of Libnah. A letter couched in terms like those already used by his envoys, was sent direct from the king of Assyria to the king of Judah. What would be their fate if they were taken, they might know from the fate of Lachish, which we still see on the sculptured monuments, where the inhabitants are lying before the King, stripped in order to be flayed alive. Hezekiah took the letter, and penetrating, as it would seem, into the Most Holy Place, laid it before the Divine Presence enthroned above the cherubs, and called upon him whose name it insulted, to look down and see with his own eyes the outrage that was offered to him. From that dark recess no direct answer was vouchsafed. The answer came through the mouth of Isaiah. From the first moment that Sennacherib's army had appeared, he had held the same language of unbroken hope and confidence, clothed in every variety of imagery. . . . It was a day of awful suspense. In proportion to the strength of Isaiah's confidence and of Hezekiah's devotion, would have been the ruin of the Jewish church and faith, if they had been disappointed of their hope. It was a day of suspense also for the two great armies which were drawing near to their encounter on the confines of Palestine. Like Antiochus in the siege of Orleans, Hezekiah must have looked southward and westward with ever keener and keener eagerness. For already there was a rumor that Tirhakah, the king of Egypt, was on his way to the rescue. Already Sennacherib had heard the rumor, and it was this which precipitated his endeavor to intimidate Jerusalem into submission. The evening closed in on what seemed to be the devoted city. The morning dawned, and with the morning came the tidings from the camp at Libnah, that they were delivered. 'It came to pass that night (2 K. xix. 35) that the Angel of Jehovah went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand.' . . . The Assyrian king at once returned, and, according to the Jewish tradition, wreaked his vengeance on the Israelite exiles whom he found in Mesopotamia. He was the last of the great Assyrian conquerors. No Assyrian host again ever crossed the Jordan. Within a few years from that time . . . the Assyrian power suddenly vanished from the earth."

It was in all probability at the time of Sennacherib's first invasion of Palestine that Hezekiah purchased his exemption from subjection to the Assyrian yoke by the payment of a fine. If the Assyrian inscriptions are rightly interpreted, they furnish an important confirmation of the Biblical account of this expedition, and of its results as regards Hezekiah and the Jews. The boastful record on one of the cylinders is said to read as follows: "'And because Hezekiah, king of Judah,' says Sennacherib, 'would not submit to my yoke, I came up against him, and by force of arms and by the might of my power, I took forty-six of his strong fenced cities; and of the smaller towns which were scattered about, I took and plundered a countless number. And from these places I captured and carried off as spoil two hundred thousand one hundred and fifty people, old and young, male and female, together with horses and mares, asses and camels, oxen and sheep, a countless multitude. And Hezekiah himself I shut up in Jerusalem, his capital city, like a bird in a cage, building towers round the city to hem him in, and raising banks of earth against the gates, so as to prevent escape. . . . Then upon this Hezekiah there fell the fear of the power of my arms, and he sent out to me the chiefs and the elders of Jerusalem with 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver, and divers treasures, a rich and immense booty. (See 2 K. xviii. 13–16.) . . . All these things were brought to me at Nineveh, the seat of my government, Hezekiah having sent them by way of tribute, and as a token of his submission to my power.'" (See Rawlinson's Bampton Lectures for 1859, p. 316 f., Amer. ed.) Dean Milman also calls attention to this coincidence (History of the Jews, i. 427, Amer. ed.).

The chronological order of some of the events in Hezekiah's life is not easily adjusted. The events are related in different books (Kings, Chronicles, Micah, Isaiah), and not with many notations of time. M. von Niebuhr treats of some of the questions relating to the synchronism of Hezekiah's history with that of the Babylonians and Egyptians (Geschichte Assur's u. Babel's, pp. 71, 76, 88, 100 f., 179). For valuable articles on Hezekiah, see Winer's Bibl. Realw. i. 496–499; Herzog's Real-Encyk. vi. 151–157; and Zeller's *Bibl. HE'ZION (חֲזִיוֹן [sight, vision]: Ἀζίαν: [Vat. Αζειν:] Alex. Ἀζαηλ: Hezion), a king of Aram (Syria) father of Tabrimon, and grandfather of Benhadad I. He and his father are mentioned only in 1 K. xv. 18, and their names are omitted by Josephus. In the absence of all information, the natural suggestion is that he is identical with Rezon, the contemporary of Solomon, in 1 K. xi. 23; the two names being very similar in Hebrew, and still more so in other versions (compare Arab. and Peshito on the latter passage); and indeed this conclusion has been adopted by some translators and commentators (Junius, Köhler, Dathe, Ewald). Against it are (a), that the number of generations of the Syrian kings would then be one less than those of the contemporary kings of Judah. But then the reign of Abijam was only three years, and in fact Jeroboam outlived both Rehoboam and his son. (b.) The statement of Nicolaus of Damascus (Joseph. Ant. vii. 5, § 2), that from the time of David for ten generations the kings of Syria were one dynasty, each king taking the name of Hadad, "as did the Ptolemies in Egypt." But this would exclude, not only Hezion and Tabrimon, but Rezon, unless we may interpret the last sentence to mean that the official title of Hadad was held in addition to the ordinary name of the king. [Rezon; Tabrimon.] G.

HE'ZIR (חֵזִיר [swine]: Χηζιν; [Vat. Χηζειν;] Alex. Ιεζειρ; [Comp. Χηζείρ: Hezir]). 1. A priest in the time of David, leader of the 17th monthly course in the service (1 Chr. xxiv. 15).

2. [Ἡζίρ; Vat. Alex. ΓΑ. Ηζειρ: Hazir.] One of the heads of the people (laymen) who sealed the solemn covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 20).

HEZ'RAI [2 syl.] (חֶצְרַי [=חֶצְרוֹן, Hezron, which see], according to the Keri of the Masorets, but the original reading of the text, Cetib, has חצרו = Hezro: Ἀσαραΐ; [Alex. Ασαραι:] Hesrai), a native of Carmel, perhaps of the southern one, and in that case possibly once a slave or adherent of Nabal; one of the 30 heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 35). In the parallel list the name appears as —

HEZ'RO (חצרו [see infra]: Ησερέ; Alex. Ασαραι; [Ald. Ἀσραΐ: Comp. Ἐσρί:] Hesro), in 1 Chr. xi. 37. Kennicott, however (Dissertation, pp. 207, 208), decides, on the almost unanimous authority of the ancient versions, that Hetzrai is the original form of the name.

HEZ'RON (חֶצְרוֹן [blooming, Fürst; but walled, as a garden, Ges.]: Ἀσρών; [Alex. in Num., Ασρωμ:] Hesron). 1. A son of Reuben (Gen. xlvi. 9; Ex. vi. 14), who founded the family of the Hezronites (Num. xxvi. 6).

2. A son of Pharez, and one of the direct ancestors of David (Gen. xlvi. 12; Ruth iv. 18); in LXX. Ἐσρών (once var. lect. Grab. Ἀσρών), and Ἐσρώμ, which is followed in Matt. i. 3. [Vat. in Ruth, Εσρων; in 1 Chr. ii. 9, 18, 21, 25, Εσερων; i. 5, iv. 1, Αρσων: Vulg. Hesron, in Ruth Esron.] T. E. B.

HEZ'RONITES, THE (הַחֶצְרֹנִי: ὁ Ασρωνί [Vat. -νει]: Hesronite). A branch of the tribe of Judah, descendants of Hezron, the son of Pharez (Num. xxvi. 21). [In the A. V. ed. 1611 the word is spelt Hesronites. — A.] W. A. W.

HID'DAI [2 syl.] (הִדָּי [mighty chief] Alex. Αθθαι; [Comp. Ἡδαΐ; Ald. Οὐρί:] Vat omits: Heddai), one of the thirty-seven heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 30), described as "of the torrents of Gaash." In the parallel list of 1 Chr. (xi. 32) the name is given as Hurai. Kennicott (Dissert. p. 194) decides in favor of "Hurai" on grounds for which the reader must be referred to his work.

HIDDE'KEL (חִדֶּקֶל [sharp, swift, Dietr. in Ges. 6te Aufl.]: Τίγρις; [in Dan. (Theodot.),] Τίγρις Ἐδδεκέλ [Alex. Ενδεκελ]: Tygris, Tigris), one of the rivers of Eden, the river which "goeth eastward to Assyria" (Gen. ii. 14), and which Daniel calls "the Great river" (Dan. x. 4), seems to have been rightly identified by the LXX. with the Tigris. It is difficult to account for the initial ח, unless it be for חַי, "lively," which is used of running water in Gen. xxvi. 19. Dekel (דֶּקֶל) is clearly an equivalent of Digla or Diglath, a name borne by the Tigris in all ages. The form Diglath occurs in the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, in Josephus (Ant. i. 1), in the Armenian Eusebius (Chron. Can. pars i. c. 2), in Zonaras (Ann. i. 2), and in the Armenian version of the Scriptures. It is hardened to Diglit (Diglito) by Pliny (H. N. vi. 27). The name now in use among the inhabitants of Mesopotamia is Dijleh.

It has generally been supposed that Digla is a mere Semitic corruption of Tigra, and that this latter is the true name of the stream. Strabo (xi. 14, § 8), Pliny (loc. cit.) and other writers tell us that the river received its designation from its rapidity, the word Tigris (Tigra) meaning in the Medo-Persic language "an arrow." This seems probable enough; but it must be observed that the two forms are found side by side in the Babylonian transcript of the Behistun inscription, and that the ordinary name of the stream in the inscriptions of Assyria is Tiggar. Moreover, if we allow the Dekel or Hiddekel, to mean the Tigris, it would seem probable that this was the more ancient of the two appellations. Perhaps, therefore, it is best to suppose that there was in early Babylonian a root dik, equivalent in meaning, and no doubt connected in origin, with the Aryan tig or tij, and that from these two roots were formed independently the two names, Dekel, Dikla, or Digla, and Tiggar, Tigra, or Tigris. The stream was known by either name indifferently; but on the whole the Aryan appellation predominated in ancient times, and was that most commonly used even by Semitic races. The Arabians, however, when they conquered Mesopotamia, revived the true Semitic title, and this (Dijleh) continues to be the name by which the river is known to the natives down to the present day. The course of the river is described under Tigris. G. R.

HI'EL (חִיאֵל, perhaps for יְחִיאֵל [God lives, Ges.]: Ἀχιήλ; [Vat. Αχειηλ: Comp Χιήλ:] Hiel), a native of Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Ahab (1 K. xvi. 34); and in whom was fulfilled the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. vi 26). Strabo speaks of this cursing of a destroyed city as an ancient custom, and instances the curses imprecated by Agamemnon and Cæsus (Grot. Annot. ad Josh. vi. 26); Masius compares the cursing of Carthage by the Romans (Pol. Syn.).

The term Bethelite (בֵּית הָאֵלִי) here only is rendered family of cursing (Pet. Mart.), and also house or place of cursing (Arab., Syr., and Chald. versions), qu. בֵּית אָלָה; but there seems no reason for questioning the accuracy of the LXX. ὁ Βαιθηλίτης, which is approved by most commentators, and sanctioned by Ges. (Lex. s. v.). The rebuilding of Jericho was an intrusion upon the kingdom of Jehoshaphat, unless with Pet. Mart. we suppose that Jericho had already been detached from it by the kings of Israel. T. HIERAP'OLIS (Ἱεράπολις [sacred city]). This place is mentioned only once in Scripture, and that incidentally, namely, in Col. iv. 13, where its church is associated with those of COLOSSE and LAODICEA. Such association is just what we should expect; for the three towns were all in the basin of the Mæander, and within a few miles of one another. It is probable that Hierapolis was one of the "illustres Asiæ urbes" (Tac. Ann. xiv. 27) which, with Laodicea, were simultaneously desolated by an earthquake about the time when Christianity was established in this district. There is little doubt that the church of Hierapolis was founded at the same time with that of Colossæ, and that its characteristics in the apostolic period were the same. Its modern name is Pambouk-Kalessi. The most remarkable feature of the neighborhood consists of the hot calcareous springs, which have deposited the vast and singular incrustations noticed by travellers. See, for instance, Chandler, Trav. in Asia Minor (1817), i. 264–272; Hamilton, Res. in Asia Minor (1842), i. 507–522. The situation of Hierapolis is extremely beautiful; and its ruins are considerable, the theatre and gymnasium being the most conspicuous. J. S. H.

* Arundel passed within sight of Hierapolis, which he describes as high up on the mountain side, on a terrace extending several miles (Discoveries in Asia Minor, ii. 200). Richter (Wallfahrten, p. 533 ff.) states that Hierapolis and Laodicea (mentioned together, Col. iv. 13) lie within view of each other on opposite sides of the Lycus. For notices by still other travellers, see Pococke's Description of the East, etc., ii. pt. ii. 75; Fellows's Asia Minor, p. 283 ff.; and Schubert's Reise in das Morgenland, p. 283. The various observations are brought concisely together in Lewin's sketch (Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 204 f.). Epaphras may have founded the church at Hierapolis; and at all events, that city was one of the places where he manifested that zeal for the truth accredited to him by the Apostle (Col. iv. 13). The celebrated Stoic philosopher, Epictetus, was a native of Hierapolis, and nearly contemporary with Paul and Epaphras. H.

HIERON'YMUS (Ἱερώνυμος [sacred-named]: Hieronymus), a Syrian general in the time of Antiochus V. Eupator (2 Macc. xii. 2). The name was made distinguished among the Asiatic Greeks by Hieronymus of Cardia, the historian of Alexander's successors. B. F. W.

* HIERU'SALEM is used in the A. V. ed. 1611, and other early editions, for JERUSALEM.

HIGGAI'ON [3 syl.] (הִגָּיוֹן: ᾠδή), a word which occurs three times in the book of Psalms (ix. 17 [16], xix. 15 [14], xcii. 4 [3]). Mendelssohn translates it meditation, thought, idea. Knapp (Die Psalmen) identifies it, in Ps. ix. 17, with the Arabic הגא and הגי, "to mock," and hence his rendering "What a shout of laughter!" (because the wicked are entrapped in their own snares); but in Ps. xcii. 4, he translates it by "Lieder" (songs). R. David Kimchi likewise assigns two separate meanings to the word; on Ps. ix. 17 he says, "This aid is for us (a subject of) meditation and thankfulness," whilst in his commentary on the passage Ps. xcii. 4, he gives to the same word the signification of melody, "this is the melody of the hymn when it is recited (played) on the harp." "We will meditate on this forever" (Rashi, Comm. on Ps. ix. 17). In Ps. ix. 17, Aben Ezra's Comment. on "Higgaion Selah" is, "this will I record in truth:" on Ps. xcii. 4 he says, "Higgaion means the melody of the hymn, or it is the name of a musical instrument." According to Fürst, הגיון is derived from הגה. "to whisper:" (a) it refers to the vibration of the harp, or to the opening of an interlude, an opinion supported by the LXX., Symmachus, and Aquilas: (b) it refers to silent meditation: this is agreeable to the use of the word in the Talmud and in the Rabbinical writings; hence הגיון for logic (Concord. Hebr. atque Chald.).

It should seem, then, that Higgaion has two meanings, one of a general character implying thought, reflection, from הגה (comp. והגיונם עלי כל היום, Ps. ix. 17, and לבי, Lam. iii. 62), and another in Ps. ix. 17 and Ps xcii. 4, of a technical nature, bearing on the import of musical sounds or signs well known in the age of David, but the precise meaning of which cannot at this distance of time be determined.

HIGH PLACES (בָּמוֹת: in the historical books, τὰ ὑψηλά, τὰ ὕψη; in the Prophets, βωμοί; in the Pentateuch, στῆλαι, Lev. xxvi. 30, &c.; and once εἴδωλα, Ez. xvi. 16: excelsa, fana). From the earliest times it was the custom among all nations to erect altars and places of worship on lofty and conspicuous spots. We find that the Trojans sacrificed to Zeus on Mount Ida (Il. x. 171), and we are repeatedly told that such was the custom of the Persians, Greeks, Germans, etc., because they fancied that the hill-tops were nearer heaven, and therefore the most favorable places for prayer and incense (Herod. i. 131; Xen. Cyrop. viii. 7; Mem. iii. 8, § 10; Strab. xv. p. 732; Luc. de Sacrif. i. 4; Creuzer, Symb. i. 159; Winer, s. v. Berggötter). To this general custom we find constant allusion in the Bible (Is. lxv. 7; Jer. iii. 6; Ez. vi. 13, xviii. 6; Hos. iv. 13), and it is especially attributed to the Moabites (Is. xv. 2, xvi. 12; Jer. xlviii. 35). Even Abraham built an altar to the Lord on a mountain near Bethel (Gen. xii. 7, 8; cf. xxii. 2–4, xxxi. 54) which shows that the practice was then as innocent as it was natural; and although it afterwards became mingled with idolatrous observances (Num. xxiii. 3), it was in itself far less likely to be abused than the consecration of groves (Hos. iv. 13). The external religion of the patriarchs was in some outward observances different from that subsequently established by the Mosaic law, and therefore they should not be condemned for actions which afterwards became sinful only because they were forbidden (Heidegger, Hist. Patr. II. iii. § 53). [BAMAH.]

It is, however, quite obvious that if every grove and eminence had been suffered to become a place for legitimate worship, especially in a country where they had already been defiled with the sins of polytheism, the utmost danger would have resulted to the pure worship of the one true God (Hävernick, Einl. i. p. 592). It would infallibly have led to the adoption of nature-goddesses, and "gods of the hills" (1 K. xx. 23). It was therefore implicitly forbidden by the law of Moses (Deut. xii. 11–14), which also gave the strictest injunction to destroy these monuments of Canaanitish idolatry (Lev. xxvi. 30; Num. xxxiii. 52; Deut. xxxiii. 29, ubi LXX. τράχηλος), without stating any general reason for this command, beyond the fact that they had been connected with such associations. It seems, however, to be assumed that every Israelite would perfectly understand why groves and high places were prohibited, and therefore they are only condemned by virtue of the injunction to use but one altar for the purposes of sacrifice (Lev. xvii. 3, 4; Deut. xii. passim, xvi. 21; John iv. 20).

The command was a prospective one, and was not to come into force until such time as the tribes were settled in the promised land, and "had rest from all their enemies round about." Thus we find that both Gideon and Manoah built altars on high places by Divine command (Judg. vi. 25, 26, xiii. 16–23), and it is quite clear from the tone of the book of Judges that the law on the subject was either totally forgotten or practically obsolete. Nor could the unsettled state of the country have been pleaded as an excuse, since it seems to have been most fully understood, even during the life of Joshua, that burnt-offerings could be legally offered on one altar only (Josh. xxii. 29). It is more surprising to find this law absolutely ignored at a much later period, when there was no intelligible reason for its violation — as by Samuel at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii. 10) and at Bethlehem (xvi. 5); by Saul at Gilgal (xiii. 9) and at Ajalon (? xiv. 35); by David (1 Chr. xxi. 26); by Elijah on Mount Carmel (1 K. xviii. 30); and by other prophets (1 Sam. x. 5). To suppose that in all these cases the rule was superseded by a Divine intimation appears to us an unwarrantable expedient, the more so as the actors in the transactions do not appear to be aware of anything extraordinary in their conduct. The Rabbis have invented elaborate methods to account for the anomaly: thus they say that high places were allowed until the building of the Tabernacle; that they were then illegal until the arrival at Gilgal, and then during the period while the Tabernacle was at Shiloh; that they were once more permitted whilst it was at Nob and Gideon (cf. 2 Chr. i. 3), until the building of the Temple at Jerusalem rendered them finally unlawful (R. Sol. Jarchi, Abarbanel, etc., quoted in Carpzov, App. Crit. p. 333 ff.; Reland, Ant. Hebr. i. 8 ff.). Others content themselves with saying that until Solomon's time all Palestine was considered holy ground, or that there existed a recognized exemption in favor of high places for private and spontaneous, though not for the stated and public sacrifices.

Such explanations are sufficiently unsatisfactory; but it is at any rate certain that, whether from the obvious temptations to the disobedience, or from the example of other nations, or from ignorance of any definite law against it, the worship in high places was organized and all but universal throughout Judæa, not only during (1 K. iii. 2–4), but even after the time of Solomon. The convenience of them was obvious, because, as local centres of religious worship, they obviated the unpleasant and dangerous necessity of visiting Jerusalem for the celebration of the yearly feasts (2 K. xxiii. 9). The tendency was ingrained in the national mind; and although it was severely reprehended by the later historians, we have no proof that it was known to be sinful during the earlier periods of the monarchy, except of course where it was directly connected with idolatrous abominations (1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13). In fact the high places seem to have supplied the need of synagogues (Ps. lxxiv. 8), and to have obviated the extreme self-denial involved in having but one legalized locality for the highest forms of worship. Thus we find that Rehoboam established a definite worship at the high places, with its own peculiar and separated priesthood (2 Chr. xi. 15; 2 K. xxiii. 9), the members of which were still considered to be priests of Jehovah (although in 2 K. xxiii. 5 they are called by the opprobrious term כְּמָרִים). It was therefore no wonder that Jeroboam found it so easy to seduce the people into his symbolic worship at the high places of Dan and Bethel, at each of which he built a chapel for his golden calves. Such chapels were of course frequently added to the mere altars on the hills, as appears from the expressions in 1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xvii. 9, &c. Indeed, the word בָּמָה became so common that it was used for any idolatrous shrine even in a valley (Jer. vii. 31), or in the streets of cities (2 K. xvii. 9; Ez. xvi. 31). These chapels were probably not structures of stone, but mere tabernacles hung with colored tapestry (Ez. xvi. 16; ἐμβόλισμα, Aqu. Theod.; Jer. ad loc.; εἴδωλον βαπτόν, LXX.), like the σκηνὴ ἱερά of the Carthaginians (Diod. Sic. xx. 65; Creuzer, Symbol. v. 176, quoted by Ges. Thes. i. 188), and like those mentioned in 2 K. xxiii. 7; Am. v. 26.

Many of the pious kings of Judah were either too weak or too ill informed to repress the worship of Jehovah at these local sanctuaries, while they of course endeavored to prevent it from being contaminated with polytheism. It is therefore appended as a matter of blame or a (perhaps venial) drawback to the character of some of the most pious princes, that they tolerated this disobedience to the proviion of Deuteronomy and Leviticus. On the other hand it is mentioned as an aggravation of the sinfulness of other kings that they built or raised high places (2 Chr. xxi. 11, xxviii. 25), which are generally said to have been dedicated to idolatrous purposes. It is almost inconceivable that so direct a violation of the theocratic principle as the permitted existence of false worship should have been tolerated by kings of even ordinary piety, much less by the highest sacerdotal authorities (2 K. xii. 3). When therefore we find the recurring phrase, "only the high places were not taken away; as yet the people did sacrifice and burn incense on the high places" (2 K. xiv. 4, xv. 4, 35; 2 Chr. xv. 17, &c.), we are forced to limit it (as above) to places dedicated to Jehovah only. The subject, however, is made more difficult by a double discrepancy, for the assertion, that Asa "took away the high places" (2 Chr. xiv. 3), is opposite to what is stated in the first book of Kings (xv. 14), and a similar discrepancy is found in the case of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 6, xx. 33). Moreover in both instances the chronicler is apparently at issue with himself (xiv. 3, xv. 17, xvii. 6, xx. 33). It is incredible that this should have been the result of carelessness or oversight, and we must therefore suppose, either that the earlier notices expressed the will and endeavor of these monarchs to remove the high places, and that the later ones recorded their failure in the attempt (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 468; Keil, Apolog. Versuch, p. 200; Winer, s. vv. Assa, Josaphat); or that the statements refer respectively to Bamoth, dedicated to Jehovah and to idols (Michaelis, Schulz, Bertheau on 2 Chr. xvii. 6, &c.). "Those devoted to false gods were removed, those misdevoted to the true God were suffered to remain. The kings opposed impiety, but winked at error" (Bishop Hall).

At last Hezekiah set himself in good earnest to the suppression of this prevalent corruption (2 K. xviii. 4, 22), both in Judah and Israel (2 Chr. xxxi. 1), although, so rapid was the growth of the evil, that even his sweeping reformation required to be finally consummated by Josiah (2 K. xxiii.), and that too in Jerusalem and its immediate neighborhood (2 Chr. xxxiv. 3). The measure must have caused a very violent shock to the religious prejudices of a large number of people, and we have a curious and almost unnoticed trace of this resentment in the fact that Rabshakeh appeals to the discontented faction, and represents Hezekiah as a dangerous innovator who had provoked God's anger by his arbitrary impiety (2 K. xviii. 22; 2 Chr. xxxii. 12). After the time of Josiah we find no further mention of these Jehovistic high places.

HIGH-PRIEST (הַכֹּהֵן), with the definite article, i. e. the Priest; and in the books subsequent to the Pentateuch with the frequent addition הַגָּדֹל and הָרֹאשׁ). Lev. xxi. 10 seems to exhibit the epithet גָּדֹל (as ἐπίσκοπος and διάκονος in the N. T.) in a transition state, not yet wholly technical; and the same may be said of Num. xxxv. 25, where the explanation at the end of the verse, "which was anointed with the holy oil," seems to show that the epithet גָּדֹל was not yet quite established as distinctive of the chief priest (cf. ver. 28). In all other passages of the Pentateuch it is simply "the priest," Ex. xxix. 30, 44; Lev. xvi. 32: or yet more frequently "Aaron," or "Aaron the priest," as Num. iii. 6, iv. 33; Lev. i. 7, &c. So too "Eleazar the priest," Num. xxvii. 22, xxxi. 26, 29, 31, &c. In the LXX. ὁ ἀρχιερεύς, or ἱερεύς, where the Heb. has only הַכֹּהֵן. Vulg. sacerdos magnus, or primus pontifex, princeps sacerdotum.

In treating of the office of high-priest among the Israelites it will be convenient to consider it—I. Legally. II. Theologically. III. Historically.

I. The legal view of the high-priest's office comprises all that the law of Moses ordained respecting it. The first distinct separation of Aaron to the office of the priesthood, which previously belonged to the firstborn, was that recorded Ex. xxviii. A partial anticipation of this call occurred at the gathering of the manna (ch. xvi.), when Moses bid Aaron take a pot of manna, and lay it up before the Lord: which implied that the ark of the Testimony would thereafter be under Aaron's charge, though it was not at that time in existence. The taking up of Nadab and Abihu with their father Aaron to the Mount, where they beheld the glory of the God of Israel, seems also to have been intended as a preparatory intimation of Aaron's hereditary priesthood. See also xxvii. 21. But it was not till the completion of the directions for making the tabernacle and its furniture that the distinct order was given to Moses, "Take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office, even Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's sons" (Ex. xxviii. 1). And after the order for the priestly garments to be made "for Aaron and his sons," it is added, "and the priest's office shall be theirs for a perpetual statute; and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons," and "I will sanctify both Aaron and his sons to minister to me in the priest's office," xxix. 9, 44.

We find from the very first the following characteristic attributes of Aaron and the high-priests his successors, as distinguished from the other priests.

(1.) Aaron alone was anointed. "He poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron's head, and anointed him to sanctify him" (Lev. viii. 12); whence one of the distinctive epithets of the high-priest was הַכֹּהֵן הַמָּשִׁיחַ, "the anointed priest" (Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16, xxi. 10; see Num. xxxv. 25). This appears also from Ex. xxix. 29, 30, where it is ordered that the one of the sons of Aaron who succeeds him in the priest's office shall wear the holy garments that were Aaron's for seven days, to be anointed therein, and to be consecrated in them. Hence Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. i. 6; Dem. Evang. viii.) understands the Anointed (A. V. "Messiah," or, as the LXX. read, χρίσμα) in Dan. ix. 26, the anointing of the Jewish high-priests: "It means nothing else than the succession of high-priests, whom the Scripture commonly calls χριστούς, anointed;" and so too Tertullian and Theodoret (Rosenm. ad l. c.). The anointing of the sons of Aaron, i. e., the common priests, seems to have been confined to sprinkling their garments with the anointing oil (Ex. xxix. 21, xxviii. 41, &c.), though according to Kalisch on Ex. xxix. 8, and Lightfoot, following the Rabbinical interpretation, the difference consists in the abundant pouring of oil (יֶצֶק) on the head of the high-priest, from whence it was drawn with the finger into two streams, in the shape of a Greek X, while the priests were merely marked with the finger dipped in oil on the forehead (מָשַׁח). But this is probably a late invention of the Rabbins. The anointing of the high-priest is alluded to in Ps. cxxxiii. 2: "It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments." The composition of this anointing oil, consisting of myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, cassia, and olive oil, is prescribed Ex. xxx. 22-25, and its use for any other purpose but that of anointing the priests, the tabernacle, and the vessels, was strictly prohibited on pain of being "cut off from his people." The manufacture of it was intrusted to certain priests, called apothecaries (Neh. iii. 8). But this oil is said to have been wanting under the second Temple (l'rideaux, i. 151; Selden, cap. ix.).

High-priest.

(2.) The high-priest had a peculiar dress, which, as we have seen, passed to his successor at his death. This dress consisted of eight parts, as the Rabbins constantly note, the breastplate, the ephod with its curious girdle, the robe of the ephod, the mitre, the broidered coat or diaper tunic, and the girdle, the materials being gold, blue, red, crimson, and fine (white) linen (Ex. xxviii.). To the above are added, in ver. 42, the breeches or drawers (Lev. xvi. 4) of linen; and to make up the number 8, some reckon the high-priest's mitre, or the plate (צִיץ) separately from the bonnet; while others reckon the curious girdle of the ephod separately from the ephod.[a]

Of these 8 articles of attire, 4, namely, the coat or tunic, the girdle, the breeches, and the bonnet or turban, מִגְבָּעָה, instead of the mitre, מִצְנֶפֶת belonged to the common priests.

It is well known how, in the Assyrian sculptures, the king is in like manner distinguished by the shape of his head-dress; and how in Persia none but the king wore the cidaris or erect tiara.[c] Taking the articles of the high priest's dress in the order in which they are enumerated above, we have (a) the breastplate, or, as it is further named (Ex. xxviii. 15, 29, 30), the breastplate of judgment, חֹשֶׁן מִשְׁפָּט, λογεῖον τῶν κρίσεων (or τῆς κρίσεως) in the LXX., and only in ver. 4, περισταθήσιον. It was, like the inner curtains of the tabernacle, the vail, and the ephod, of "cunning work," מַעֲשֵׂה חֹשֵׁב, "opus plumarium," and "arte plumaria," Vulg. [See EMBROIDERER.] The breastplate was originally 2 spans long, and 1 span broad, but when doubled it was square, the shape in which it was worn. It was fastened at the top by rings and chains of wreathen gold to the two onyx stones on the shoulders, and beneath with two other rings and a lace of blue to two corresponding rings in the ephod, to keep it fixed in its place, above the curious girdle. But the most remarkable and most important parts of this breastplate, were the 12 precious stones, set in 4 rows, 3 in a row, thus corresponding to the 12 tribes, and divided in the same manner as their camps were; each stone having the name of one of the children of Israel engraved upon it. Whether the order followed the ages of the sons of Israel, or, as seems most probable, the order of the encampment, may be doubted; but unless any appropriate distinct symbolism of the different tribes be found in the names of the precious stones, the question can scarcely be decided. According to the LXX. and Josephus, and in accordance with the language of Scripture, it was these stones which constituted the Urim and Thummim, nor does the notion advocated by Gesenius after Spencer and others, that these names designated two little images placed between the folds of the breastplate, seem to rest on any sufficient ground, in spite of the Egyptian analogy[d] brought to bear upon it. Josephus's opinion, on the other hand, improved upon by the Rabbins, as to the manner in which the stones gave out the oracular answer, by preternatural illumination, appears equally destitute of probability. It seems to be far simplest and most in agreement with the different accounts of inquiries made by Urim and Thummim (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18, 19, xxiii. 2, 4, 9, 11, 12, xxviii. 6; Judg. xx. 28; 2 Sam. v. 23, &c.) to suppose that the answer was given simply by the Word of the Lord to the high-priest (comp. John xi. 51), when he had inquired of the Lord clothed with the ephod and breastplate. Such a view agrees with the true notion of the breastplate, of which it was not the leading characteristic to be oracular (as the term λογεῖον supposes, and as is by many thought to be intimated by the descriptive addition "of judgment," i. e., as they

---

[a] In Lev. viii. 7-12 there is a complete account of the putting on of these garments by Aaron, and the whole ceremony of his consecration and that of his sons. It there appears distinctly that, besides the girdle common to all the priests, the high-priest also wore the curious girdle of the ephod.

[b] Josephus, however, whom Bähr follows, calls the bonnets of the priests by the name of מִצְנֶפֶת. See below.

[c] Bähr compares also the apices of the flamens Dialis.

[d] For an account of the image of Thmei worn by the Egyptian judge and priest, see Kalisch's note on Ex. xxviii.; Hengstenberg's Egypt and the Books of Moses; Wilkinson's Egyptians, ii. 27, &c.

understand it, "decision"), but only an incidental privilege connected with its fundamental meaning. What that meaning was we learn from Ex. xxviii. 30, where we read "Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually." Now מִשְׁפָּט is the judicial sentence by which any one is either justified or condemned. In prophetic vision, as in actual oriental life, the sentence of justification was often expressed by the nature of the robe worn. "He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels" (Is. lxi. 10), is a good illustration of this; cf. lxii. 3. In like manner, in Rev. iii. 5, vii. 9, xix. 14, &c., the white linen robe expresses the righteousness or justification of saints. Something of the same notion may be seen in Esth. vi. 8, 9, and on the contrary ver. 12.

The addition of precious stones and costly ornaments expresses glory beyond simple justification. Thus in Is. lxii. 3, "Thou shalt be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God." Exactly the same symbolism of glory is assigned to the precious stones in the description of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 11, 19–21), a passage which ties together with singular force the arrangement of the tribes in their camps, and that of the precious stones in the breastplate. But, moreover, the high-priest being a representative personage, the fortunes of the whole people would most properly be indicated in his person. A striking instance of this, in connection too with symbolical dress, is to be found in Zech. iii. "Now Joshua (the high-priest, ver. 1) was clothed with filthy garments and stood before the angel. And he answered and spake unto those that stood before him, saying, Take away the filthy garments from him. And unto him he said, Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment. And I said, Let them set a fair mitre (צָנִיף) upon his head. So they set a fair mitre upon his head, and clothed him with garments." Here the priest's garments, בְּגָדִים, and the mitre, expressly typify the restored righteousness of the nation. Hence it seems to be sufficiently obvious that the breastplate of righteousness or judgment, resplendent with the same precious stones which symbolize the glory of the New Jerusalem, and on which were engraved the names of the 12 tribes, worn by the high-priest, who was then said to bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart, was intended to express by symbols the acceptance of Israel grounded upon the sacrificial functions of the high-priest. The sense of the symbol is thus nearly identical with such passages as Num. xxiii. 21, and the meaning of the Urim and Thummim is explained by such expressions as קוּמִי אוֹרִי כִּי־בָא אוֹרֵךְ, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come" (Is. lx. 1). Thummim expresses alike complete prosperity and complete innocence, and so fails in exactly with the double notion of light (Is. lx. 1, and lxii. 1, 2). The privilege of receiving an answer from God bears the same relation to the general state of Israel symbolized by the priest's dress, that the promise in Is. liv. 13, "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord" does to the preceding description, "I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires, and I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones," ver. 11, 12, comp. also ver. 14 and 17 (Heb.). It is obvious to add how entirely this view accords with the blessing of Levi in Deut. xxxiii. 8, where Levi is called God's holy one, and God's Thummim and Urim are said to be given to him, because he came out of the trial so clear in his integrity. (See also Bar. v. 2.)

(b.) The Ephod (אֵפוֹד). This consisted of two parts, of which one covered the back, and the other the front, i. e., the breast and upper part of the body, like the ἐπωμίς of the Greeks (see Dict. of Antiquities, art. Tunica, p. 1172). These were clasped together on the shoulder with two large onyx stones, each having engraved on it 6 of the names of the tribes of Israel. It was further united by a "curious girdle" of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen round the waist. Upon it was placed the breastplate of judgment, which in fact was a part of the ephod, and included in the term in such passages as 1 Sam. ii. 28, xiv. 3, xxiii. 9, and was fastened to it just above the curious girdle of the ephod. Linen ephods were also worn by other priests (1 Sam. xxii. 18), by Samuel, who was only a Levite (1 Sam. ii. 18), and by David when bringing up the ark (2 Sam. vi. 14). The expression for wearing an ephod is "girded with a linen ephod." The ephod was also frequently used in the idolatrous worship of the Israelites. See Judg. viii. 27, xvii. 5, &c. [EPHOD; GIRDLE.]

(c.) The Robe of the ephod (מְעִיל). This was of inferior material to the ephod itself, being all of blue (Ex. xxviii. 31), which implied its being only of "woven work" (מַעֲשֵׂה אֹרֵג, xxxix. 22). It was worn immediately under the ephod, and was longer than it, though not so long as the broidered coat or tunic (כְּתֹנֶת תַּשְׁבֵּץ), according to some statements (Bähr, Winer, Kalisch, etc.). The Greek rendering, however, of מְעִיל, ποδήρης, and Josephus's description of it (B. J. v. 5, § 7) seem to outweigh the reasons given by Bähr for thinking the robe only came down to the knees, and to make it improbable that the tunic should have been seen below the robe. It seems likely therefore that the sleeves of the tunic, of white diaper linen, were the only parts of it which were visible, in the case of the high-priest, when he wore the blue robe over it. For the blue robe had no sleeves, but only slits in the sides for the arms to come through. It had a hole for the head to pass through, with a border round it of woven work, to prevent its being rent. The skirt of this robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately. The bells were to give a sound when the high-priest went in and came out of the Holy Place. Josephus in the Antiquities gives no explanation of the use of the bells, but merely speaks of the studied beauty of their appearance. In his Jewish War, however, he tells us that the bells signified thunder, and the pomegranates lightning. For Philo's very curious observations see Lightfoot's Works, ix. p. 25.

Neither does the son of Sirach very distinctly explain it (Ecclus. xlv.), who in his description of the high-priest's attire seems chiefly impressed with its beauty and magnificence, and says of this trimming, "He compassed him with pomegranates and with many golden bells round about, that as he went there might be a sound, and a noise made that might be heard in the temple, for a memorial to the children of his people" Perhaps, however, he means to intimate that the use of the bells was to give notice to the people outside, when the high-priest went in and came out of the sanctuary, as Whiston, Vatablus, and many others have supposed.

(d.) The fourth article peculiar to the high-priest is the mitre or upper turban, with its gold plate, engraved with HOLINESS TO THE LORD, fastened to it by a ribbon of blue. Josephus applies the term מִצְנֶפֶת (μασναεμφθής) to the turbans of the common priests as well, but says that in addition to this, and sewn on to the top of it, the high-priest had another turban of blue; that beside this he had outside the turban a triple crown of gold, consisting, that is, of 3 rims one above the other, and terminating at top in a kind of conical calyx, like the inverted calyx of the herb hyoscyamus. Josephus doubtless gives a true account of the high-priest's turban as worn in his day. It may be fairly conjectured that the crown was appended when the Asmoneans united the temporal monarchy with the priesthood, and that this was continued, though in a modified shape,[a] after the sovereignty was taken from them. Josephus also describes the πέταλον, the lamina or gold plate, which he says covered the forehead of the high-priest. In Ant. vii. 3, § 8, he says that the identical gold plate made in the days of Moses existed in his time: and Whiston adds in a note that it was still preserved in the time of Origen, and that the inscription on it was engraved in Samaritan characters (Ant. iii. 3, § 6). It is certain that R. Eliezer, who flourished in Hadrian's reign, saw it at Rome. It was doubtless placed, with other spoils of the Temple, in the Temple of Peace, which was burnt down in the reign of Commodus. These spoils, however, are expressly mentioned as part of Alaric's plunder when he took Rome. They were carried by Genseric into Africa, and brought by Belisarius to Byzantium, where they adorned his triumph. On the warning of a Jew the emperor ordered them back to Jerusalem, but what became of them is not known (Reland, de Spoliis Templi).

(e.) The broidered coat, כְּתֹנֶת תַּשְׁבֵּץ, was a tunic or long shirt of linen with a tessellated or diaper pattern, like the setting of a stone. The girdle, אַבְנֵט, also of linen, was wound round the body several times from the breast downwards, and the ends hung down to the ankles. The breeches or drawers, מִכְנְסֵי, of linen, covered the loins and thighs; and the bonnet or מִגְבָּעָה was a turban of linen, partially covering the head, but not in the form of a cone like that of the high-priest when the mitre was added to it. These four last were common to all priests. Josephus speaks of the robes (ἐνδύματα) of the chief priests, and the tunics and girdles of the priests, as forming part of the spoil of the Temple, (B. J. vi. 8, § 3). Aaron, and at his death Eleazar (Num. xx. 26, 28), and their successors in the high-priesthood, were solemnly inaugurated into their office by being clad in these eight articles of dress on seven successive days. From the time of the second Temple, when the sacred oil (said to have been hid by Josiah, and lost) was wanting, this putting on of the garments was deemed the official investiture of the office. Hence the robes, which had used to be kept in one of the chambers of the Temple, and were by Hyrcanus deposited in the Baris, which he built on purpose, were kept by Herod in the same tower, which he called Antonia, so that they might be at his absolute disposal. The Romans did the same till the government of Vitellius in the reign of Tiberius, when the custody of the robes was restored to the Jews (Ant. xv. 11, § 4; xviii. 4, § 3).

(3.) Aaron had peculiar functions. To him alone it appertained, and he alone was permitted, to enter the Holy of Holies, which he did once a year, on the great day of atonement, when he sprinkled the blood of the sin-offering on the mercy-seat, and burnt incense within the vail (Lev. xvi.). He is said by the Talmudists, with whom agree Lightfoot, Selden, Grotius, Winer, Bähr, and many others, not to have worn his full pontifical robes on this occasion, but to have been clad entirely in white linen (Lev. xvi. 4, 32). It is singular, however, that on the other hand Josephus says that the great fast day was the chief, if not the only day in the year, when the high-priest wore all his robes (B. J. v. 5, § 7), and in spite of the alleged impropriety of his wearing his splendid apparel on a day of humiliation, it seems far more probable that on the one occasion when he performed functions peculiar to the high-priest, he should have worn his full dress. Josephus too could not have been mistaken as to the fact, which he repeats (cont. Ap. lib. ii. § 7), where he says the high-priests alone might enter into the Holy of Holies, "propriâ stolâ circumamicti." For although Selden,[b] who strenuously supports the Rabbinical statement that the high-priest only wore the 4 linen garments when he entered the Holy of Holies, endeavors to make Josephus say the same thing, it is impossible to twist his words into this meaning. It is true on the other hand, that Lev. xvi. distinctly prescribes that Aaron should wear the 4 priestly garments of linen when he entered into the Holy of Holies, and put them off immediately he came out, and leave them in the Temple; no one being present in the Temple while Aaron made the atonement (ver. 17). Either therefore in the time of Josephus this law was not kept in practice, or else we must reconcile the apparent contradiction by supposing that in consequence of the great jealousy with which the high-priest's robes were kept by the civil power at this time, the custom had arisen for him to wear them, not even always on the 3 great festivals (Ant. xviii. 4, § 3), but only on the great day of expiation. Clad in this gorgeous attire he would enter the Temple in presence of all the people, and after having performed in secret, as the law requires, the rites of expiation in the linen dress, he would resume his pontifical robes and so appear again in public. Thus his wearing the robes would easily come to be identified chiefly with the day of atonement; and this is perhaps the most probable explanation. In other respects the high-priest performed the functions of a priest, but only on new moons and other great feasts, and on such solemn occasions as the dedication of the Temple under Solomon, under Zerubabel, etc. [ATONEMENT, DAY OF.]

[a] Josephus (A. J. xx. 10) says that Pompey would not allow Hyrcanus to wear the diadem, when he restored him to the high priesthood.

[b] Selden himself remarks (cap. vii. in fin.) that Josephus and others always describe the pontifical robes by the name of τῆς στολῆς ἀρχιερατικῆς.

(4.) The high-priest had a peculiar place in the law of the manslayer, and his taking sanctuary in the cities of refuge. The manslayer might not leave the city of refuge during the lifetime of the existing high-priest who was anointed with the holy oil (Num. xxxv. 25, 28). It was also forbidden to the high-priest to follow a funeral, or rend his clothes for the dead, according to the precedent in Lev. x. 6.

The other respects in which the high-priest exercised superior functions to the other priests arose rather from his position and opportunities, than were distinctly attached to his office, and they consequently varied with the personal character and abilities of the high-priest. Such were reforms in religion, restorations of the Temple and its service, the preservation of the Temple from intrusion or profanation, taking the lead in ecclesiastical or civil affairs, judging the people, presiding in the Sanhedrim (which, however, he is said by Lightfoot rarely to have done), and other similar transactions, in which we find the high-priest sometimes prominent, sometimes not even mentioned. (See the historical part of this article.) Even that portion of power which most naturally and usually fell to his share, the rule of the Temple, and the government of the priests and Levites who ministered there, did not invariably fall to the share of the high-priest. For the title "Ruler of the House of God," נְגִיד בֵּית־הָאֱלֹהִים, which usually denotes the high-priest, is sometimes given to those who were not high-priests, as e. g. to Pashur the son of Immer in Jer. xx. 1; comp. 1 Chr. xii. 27. The Rabbins speak very frequently of one second in dignity to the high-priest, whom they call the sagan, and who often acted in the high-priest's room.[a] He is the same who in the O. T. is called "the second priest" (2 K. xxiii. 4, xxv. 18). They say that Moses was sagan to Aaron. Thus too it is explained of Annas and Caiaphas (Luke iii. 2), that Annas was sagan. Ananias is also thought by some to have been sagan, acting for the high-priest (Acts xxiii. 2). In like manner they say Zadok and Abiathar were high-priest and sagan in the time of David. The sagan is also very frequently called memunneh, or prefect of the Temple, and upon him chiefly lay the care and charge of the Temple services (Lightfoot, passim). If the high-priest was incapacitated from officiating by any accidental uncleanness, the sagan or vice high-priest took his place. Thus, e. g., the Jerusalem Talmud tells a story of Simon son of Kamith, that 'on the eve of the day of expiation, he went out to speak with the king, and some spittle fell upon his garments and defiled him: therefore Judah his brother went in on the day of expiation, and served in his stead; and so their mother Kamith saw two of her sons high-priests in one day. She had seven sons, and they all served in the high-priesthood" (Lightfoot, ix. 35). It does not appear by whose authority the high-priests were appointed to their office before there were kings of Israel. But as we find it invariably done by the civil power in later times, it is probable that, in the times preceding the monarchy, it was by the elders, or Sanhedrim The installation and anointing of the high-priest or clothing him with the eight garments, which was the formal investiture, is ascribed by Maimonides to the Sanhedrim at all times (Lightfoot, ix 22).

It should be added, that the usual age for entering upon the functions of the priesthood, according to 2 Chr. xxxi. 17, is considered to have been 20 years, though a priest or high-priest was not actually incapacitated if he had attained to puberty, as appears by the example of Aristobulus, who was high-priest at 17. Onias, the son of Simon the Just, could not be high-priest, because he was but a child at his father's death. Again, according to Lev. xxi., no one that had a blemish could officiate at the altar. Moses enumerates 11 blemishes, which the Talmud expands into 142. Josephus relates how Antigonus mutilated Hyrcanus's ears, to incapacitate him for being restored to the high-priesthood. Illegitimate birth was also a bar to the high-priesthood, and the subtlety of Jewish distinctions extended this illegitimacy to being born of a mother who had been taken captive by heathen conquerors (Joseph. c. Apion. i. § 7). Thus Eleazar said to John Hyrcanus (though, Josephus says, falsely) that if he was a just man, he ought to resign the pontificate, because his mother had been a captive, and he was therefore incapacitated. Lev. xxi. 13, 14, was taken as the ground of this and similar disqualifications. For a full account of this branch of the subject the reader is referred to Selden's learned treatises De Successionibus, etc., and De Success. in Pontif. Ebræor.; and to Prideaux, ii. 306. It was the universal opinion of the Jews that the deposition of a high-priest, which became so common, was unlawful. Josephus (Ant. xv. 3) says that Antiochus Epiphanes was the first who did so, when he deposed Jesus or Jason; Aristobulus, who deposed his brother Hyrcanus, the second: and Herod, who took away the high-priesthood from Ananelus to give it to Aristobulus, the third. See the story of Jonathan son of Ananus, Ant. xix. 6, § 4.

II. Theologically. The theological view of the high-priesthood does not fall within the scope of this Dictionary. It must suffice therefore to indicate that such a view would embrace the consideration of the office, dress, functions, and ministrations of the high-priest, considered as typical of the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and as setting forth under shadows the truths which are openly taught under the Gospel. This has been done to a great extent in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and is occasionally done in other parts of Scripture, as, e. g., Rev. i. 13, where the ποδήρης, and the girdle about the paps, are distinctly the robe, and the curious girdle of the ephod, characteristic of the high-priest. It would also embrace all the moral and spiritual teaching supposed to be intended by such symbols. Philo (de vitâ Mosis), Origen (Homil. in Levit.), Eusebius (Demonst. Evang. lib. iii.); Epiphanius (cont. Melchized. iv. &c.), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. i., and Eliæ Cretens. Comment. p. 195), Augustine (Quæst. in Exod.) may be cited among many others of the ancients who have more or less thus treated the subject. Of moderns, Bähr (Symbolik des Mosaischen Cultus), Fairbairn (Typology of Script.), Kalisch (Comment. on Exod.) have entered fully into this subect, both from the Jewish and Christian point of view. [See end of the article.]

III. To pass to the historical view of the subject. The history of the high-priests embraces a period of about 1370 years, according to the opinion of the present writer, and a succession of about 80 high-priests, beginning with Aaron, and ending with Phannias. "The number of all the high-priests (says Josephus, Ant. xx. 10) from Aaron . . until Phanas . . . was 83," where he gives a comprehensive account of them. They naturally arrange themselves into three groups: (a) those before David; (b) those from David to the Captivity; (c) those from the return from the Babylonish Captivity till the cessation of the office at the destruction of Jerusalem. The two former have come down to us in the canonical books of Scripture, and so have a few of the earliest and the latest of the latter; but for by far the larger portion of the latter group we have only the authority of Josephus, the Talmud, and some other profane writers.

(a.) The high-priests of the first group who are distinctly made known to us as such, are: (1) Aaron; (2) Eleazar; (3) Phinehas; (4) Eli; (5) Ahitub (1 Chr. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11: 1 Sam. xiv. 3); (6) Ahiah; (7) Ahimelech. Phinehas the son of Eli, and father of Ahitub, died before his father, and so was not high-priest. Of the above the three first succeeded in regular order, Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's eldest sons, having died in the wilderness (Lev. x.). But Eli, the 4th, was of the line of Ithamar. What was the exact interval between the death of Phinehas and the accession of Eli, what led to the transference of the chief priesthood from the line of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, and whether any, or which, of the descendants of Eleazar between Phinehas and Zadok (seven in number, namely, Abishua, Bukki, Uzzi, Zerahiah, Meraioth, Amariah, Ahitub), were high-priests, we have no means of determining from Scripture. Judg. xx. 28, leaves Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, priest at Shiloh, and 1 Sam. i. 3, 9, finds Eli high-priest there, with two grown-up sons priests under him. The only clew is to be found in the genealogies, by which it appears that Phinehas was 6th in succession from Levi, while Eli, supposing him to be the same generation as Samuel's grandfather, would be 10th. If, however, Phinehas lived, as is probable, to a great old age, and Eli, as his age admits, be placed about half a generation backward, a very small interval will remain. Josephus asserts (Ant. viii. 1, § 3) that the father of Bukki — whom he calls Joseph, and (Ant. v. 11, § 5) Abiezer, i. e., Abishua — was the last high-priest of Phinehas's line, before Zadok. This is probably a true tradition, though Josephus, with characteristic levity, does not adhere to it in the above passage of his 5th book, where he makes Bukki and Uzzi to have been both high-priests, and Eli to have succeeded Uzzi; or in bk. xx. 10, where he reckons the high-priests before Zadok and Solomon to have been 13 (a reckoning which includes apparently all Eleazar's descendants down to Ahitub), and adds Eli and his son Phinehas, and Abiathar, whom he calls Eli's grandson. If Abishua died, leaving a son or grandson under age, Eli, as head of the line of Ithamar, might have become high-priest as a matter of course, or he might have been appointed by the elders. His having judged Israel 40 years (1 Sam. v. 18) marks him as a man of ability. If Ahiah and Ahimelech are not variations of the name of the same person, they must have been brothers since both were sons of Ahitub. The high-priests then before David's reign may be set down as eight in number, of whom seven are said in Scripture to have been high-priests, and one by Josephus alone. The bearing of this on the chronology of the times from the Exodus to David, tallying as it does with the number of the ancestors of David, is too important to be passed over in silence. It must also be noted that the tabernacle of God, during the high-priesthood of Aaron's successors of this first group, was pitched at Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim, a fact which marks the strong influence which the temporal power already had in ecclesiastical affairs, since Ephraim was Joshua's tribe, as Judah was David's (Josh. xxiv. 30, 33; Judg. xx. 27, 28, xxi. 21; 1 Sam. i. 3, 9, 24, iv. 3, 4, xiv. 3, &c.; Ps. lxxviii. 60). This strong influence and interference of the secular power is manifest throughout the subsequent history. This first period was also marked by the calamity which befell the high-priests as the guardians of the ark, in its capture by the Philistines. This probably suspended all inquiries by Urim and Thummim, which were made before the ark (1 Chr. xiii. 3; comp Judg. xx. 27; 1 Sam. vii. 2. xiv. 18), and must have greatly diminished the influence of the high-priests, on whom the largest share of the humiliation expressed in the name Ichabod would naturally fall. The rise of Samuel as a prophet at this very time, and his paramount influence and importance in the state, to the entire eclipsing of Ahiah the priest, coincides remarkably with the absence of the ark, and the means of inquiring by Urim and Thummim.

(b.) Passing to the second group, we begin with the unexplained circumstance of there being two priests in the reign of David, apparently of nearly equal authority, namely, Zadok and Abiathar (1 Chr. xv. 11; 2 Sam. viii. 17). Indeed, it is only from the deposition of Abiathar, and the placing of Zadok in his room, by Solomon (1 K. ii. 35), that we learn certainly that Abiathar was the high-priest, and Zadok the second. Zadok was son of Ahitub, of the line of Eleazar (1 Chr. vi. 8), and the first mention of him is in 1 Chr. xii. 28, as "a young man, mighty in valor," who joined David in Hebron after Saul's death, with 22 captains of his father's house. It is therefore not unlikely that after the death of Ahimelech and the secession of Abiathar to David, Saul may have made Zadok priest, as far as it was possible for him to do so in the absence of the ark and the high-priest's robes, and that David may have avoided the difficulty of deciding between the claims of his faithful friend Abiathar, and his new and important ally Zadok (who perhaps was the means of attaching to David's cause the 4600 Levites and the 3700 priests who came under Jehoiada their captain, vv. 26, 27), by appointing them to a joint priesthood: the first place, with the Ephod, and Urim and Thummim, remaining with Abiathar, who was in actual possession of them. Certain it is that from this time Zadok and Abiathar are constantly named together, and singularly Zadok always first, both in the book of Samuel and that of Kings. We can, however, trace very clearly up to a certain point the division of the priestly offices and dignities between them, coinciding, as it did, with the divided state of the Levitical worship in David's time. For we learn from 1 Chr. xvi. 1–7, 37, compared with 39, 40, and yet more distinctly from 2 Chr. i. 3, 4, 5, that the tabernacle and the brazen altar made by Moses and Bezaleel in the wilderness were at this time at Gibeon, while the ark was at Jerusalem, in the separate tent made for it by David. [GIBEON, p. 693.] Now Zadok the priest and his brethren the priests were left "before the tabernacle at Gibeon" to offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord morning and evening, and to do according to all that is written in the law of the Lord (1 Chr. xvi. 39, 40). It is therefore obvious to conclude that Abiathar had special charge of the ark and the services connected with it, which agrees exactly with the possession of the ephod by Abiathar, and his previous position with David before he became king of Israel, as well as with what we are told 1 Chr. xxvii. 34, that Jehoiada and Abiathar were the king's counsellors next to Ahithophel. Residence at Jerusalem with the ark, and the privilege of inquiring of the Lord before the ark, both well suit his office of counsellor. Abiathar, however, forfeited his place by taking part with Adonijah against Solomon, and Zadok was made high-priest in his place. The pontificate was thus again consolidated and transferred permanently from the line of Ithamar to that of Eleazar. This is the only instance recorded of the deposition of a high-priest (which became common in later times, especially under Herod and the Romans) during this second period. It was the fulfillment of the prophetic denunciations of the sin of Eli's sons (1 Sam. ii., iii.).

The first considerable difficulty that meets us in the historical survey of the high-priests of the second group is to ascertain who was high-priest at the dedication of Solomon's Temple — Josephus (Ant. x. 8, § 6) asserts that Zadok was, and the Seder Olam makes him the high-priest in the reign of Solomon. But first it is very improbable that Zadok, who must have been very old at Solomon's accession (being David's contemporary), should have lived to the 11th year of his reign; and next, 1 K. iv. 2 distinctly asserts that Azariah the son of Zadok was priest under Solomon, and 1 Chr. vi. 10 tells us of Azariah,[a] "he it is that executed the priest's office in the Temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem," obviously meaning at its first completion. We can hardly therefore be wrong in saying that Azariah the son of Ahimaaz was the first high-priest of Solomon's Temple. The nonmention of him in the account of the dedication of the Temple, even where one would most have expected it (as 1 K. viii. 3, 6, 10, 11, 62; 2 Chr. v. 7, 11, &c.), and the prominence given to Solomon — the civil power — are certainly remarkable. Compare also 2 Chr. viii. 14, 15. The probable inference is that Azariah had no great personal qualities or energy. In constructing the list of the succession of priests of this group, our method must be to compare the genealogical list in 1 Chr. vi. 8–15 (A. V.) with the notices of high-priests in the sacred history, and with the list given by Josephus, who, it must be remembered, had access to the lists preserved in the archives at Jerusalem: testing the whole by the application of the ordinary rules of genealogical succession. Now as regards the genealogy, it is seen at once that there is something defective; for whereas from David to Jeconiah there are 20 kings, from Zadok to Jehozadak there are but 13 priests. Moreover the passage in question is not a list of high-priests, but the pedigree of Jehozadak. Then again, while the pedigree in its six first generations from Zadok, inclusive, exactly suits the history — for it makes Amariah the sixth priest, while the history (2 Chr. xix. 11) tells us he lived in Jehoshaphat's reign, who was the sixth king from David, inclusive; and while the same pedigree in its five last generations also suits the history — inasmuch as it places Hilkiah the son of Shallum fourth from the end, and the history tells us he lived in the reign of Josiah, the fourth king from the end — yet is there a great gap in the middle. For between Amariah, the high-priest in Jehoshaphat's reign, and Shallum the father of Hilkiah, the high-priest in Josiah's reign — an interval of about 240 years — there are but two names, Ahitub and Zadok, and those liable to the utmost suspicion from their reproducing the same sequence which occurs in the earlier part of the same genealogy — Amariah, Ahitub, and Zadok. Besides which they are not mentioned by Josephus. This part, therefore, of the pedigree is useless for our purpose. But the historical books supply us with four or five names for this interval, namely, Jehoiada in the reigns of Athaliah and Joash, and probably still earlier; Zechariah his son; Azariah in the reign of Uzziah; Urijah in the reign of Ahaz; and Azariah in the reign of Hezekiah. If, however, in the genealogy of 1 Chr. vi. Azariah and Hilkiah have been accidentally transposed, as is not unlikely, then the Azariah who was high-priest in Hezekiah's reign will be the Azariah of 1 Chr. vi. 13, 14. Putting the additional historical names at four, and deducting the two suspicious names from the genealogy, we have 15 high-priests indicated in Scripture as contemporary with the 20 kings, with room, however, for one or two more in the history. Turning to Josephus, we find his list of 17 high-priests (whom he reckons as 18 (Ant. xx. 10), as do also the Rabbins) in places exceedingly corrupt, a corruption sometimes caused by the end of one name sticking on to the beginning of the following (as in Axioramus), sometimes apparently by substituting the name of the contemporary king or prophet for that of the high-priest, as Joel and Jotham. Perhaps, however, Sudeas, who corresponds to Zedekiah in the reign of Amaziah in the Seder Olam, and Odeas, who corresponds to Hoshaiah in the reign of Manasseh, according to the same Jewish chronicle, may really represent high-priests whose names have not been preserved in Scripture. This would bring up the number to 17, or, if we retain Azariah as the father of Seraiah to 18, which agrees with the 20 kings.

Reviewing the high-priests of this second group, the following are some of the most remarkable incidents: — (1) The transfer of the seat of worship from Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim to Jerusalem in the tribe of Judah, effected by David,[b] and consolidated by the building of the magnificent Temple of Solomon. (2.) The organization of the temple service under the high-priests, and the division of the priests and Levites into courses, who resided at the Temple during their term of service — all which necessarily put great power into the hands of an able high-priest. (3.) The revolt of the ten tribes

[a] It appears from 1 Chr. vi. 9 that Azariah was grandson to Zadok, being the son of Ahimaaz. The notice in ver. 10 seems to belong to him, and not to the son of Johanan.

[b] * Its transfer by David was not immediate, for the ark, after its capture by the Philistines at the time of Eli's death, was kept at several other places before its ultimate removal to Jerusalem. [SHILOH; TABERNACLE, History.]

from the dynasty of David and from the worship at Jerusalem, and the setting up of a schismatical priesthood at Dan and Beer-sheba (1 K. xii. 31; 2 Chr. xiii. 9, &c.). (4.) The overthrow of the usurpation of Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, by Jehoiada the high-priest, whose near relationship to king Joash, added to his zeal against the idolatries of the house of Ahab, stimulated him to head the revolution with the force of priests and Levites at his command. (5.) The boldness and success with which the high-priest Azariah withstood the encroachments of the king Uzziah upon the office and functions of the priesthood. (6.) The repair of the temple by Jehoiada, in the reign of Joash, the restoration of the temple services by Azariah in the reign of Hezekiah, and the discovery of the book of the law, and the religious reformation by Hilkiah in the reign of Josiah. [Hilkiah.] (7.) In all these great religious movements, however, excepting the one headed by Jehoiada, it is remarkable how the civil power took the lead. It was David who arranged all the temple service, Solomon who directed the building and dedication of the temple, the high-priest being not so much as named; Jehoshaphat who sent the priests about to teach the people, and assigned to the high-priest Amariah his share in the work; Hezekiah who headed the reformation, and urged on Azariah and the priests and Levites; Josiah who encouraged the priests in the service of the house of the Lord. On the other hand we read of no opposition to the idolatries of Manasseh by the high-priest, and we know how shamefully subservient Urijah the high-priest was to king Ahaz, actually building an altar according to the pattern of one at Damascus, to displace the brazen altar, and joining the king in his profane worship before it (2 K. xvi. 10–16). The preponderance of the civil over the ecclesiastical power, as an historical fact, in the kingdom of Judah, although kept within bounds by the hereditary succession of the high-priests, seems to be proved from these circumstances.

The priests of this series ended with Seraiah, who was taken prisoner by Nebuzar-adan, and slain at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar, together with Zephaniah the second priest or sagan, after the burning of the temple and the plunder of all the sacred vessels (2 K. xxv. 18). His son Jehozadak or Josedech was at the same time carried away captive (1 Chr. vi. 15).

The time occupied by these (say) eighteen high-priests who ministered at Jerusalem, was about 454 years, which gives an average of something more than twenty-five years to each high-priest. It is remarkable that not a single instance is recorded after the time of David of an inquiry by Urim and Thummim as a means of inquiring of the Lord. The ministry of the prophets seems to have superseded that of the high-priests (see e. g. 2 Chr. xv., xviii., xx. 14, 15; 2 K. xix. 1, 2, xxii. 12–14; Jer. xxi. 1, 2). Some think that Urim and Thummim ceased with the theocracy; others with the division of Israel into two kingdoms. Nehemiah seems to have expected the restoration of it (Neh. vii. 65), and so perhaps did Judas Maccabæus, 1 Macc. iv. 46; comp. xiv. 41, while Josephus affirms that it had been exercised for the last time 200 years before he wrote, namely, by John Hyrcanus (Whiston, Note on Ant. iii. 8, and Prid. Connect. i. 150, 151). It seems therefore scarcely true to reckon Urim and Thummim as one of the marks of God's presence with Solomon's Temple, which was wanting to the second Temple (Prid. i. 138, 144 ff.). This early cessation of answers by Urim and Thummim, though the high-priest's office and the wearing of the breastplate continued in force during so many centuries, seems to confirm the notion that such answers were not the fundamental, but only the accessory uses of the breastplate of judgment.

(c) An interval of about fifty-two years elapsed between the high-priests of the second and third group, during which there was neither temple, nor altar, nor ark, nor priest. Jehozadak, or Josedech, as it is written in Haggai (i. 1, 14, &c.), who should have succeeded Seraiah, lived and died a captive at Babylon. The pontifical office revived in his son Jeshua, of whom such frequent mention is made in Ezra and Nehemiah, Haggai, and Zechariah, 1 Esdr. and Ecclus.; and he therefore stands at the head of this third and last series, honorably distinguished for his zealous co[illegible]peration with Zerubbabel in rebuilding the Temple, and restoring the dilapidated commonwealth of Israel. His successors, as far as the O. T. guides us, were Joiakim, Eliashib, Joiada, Johanan (or Jonathan), and Jaddua. Of these we find Eliashib hindering rather than seconding the zeal of the devout Tirshatha Nehemiah for the observance of God's law in Israel (Neh. xiii. 4, 7); and Johanan, Josephus tells us, murdered his own brother Jesus or Joshua in the Temple, which led to its further profanation by Bagoses, the general of Artaxerxes Mnemon's army (Ant. xi. 7). Jaddua was high-priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Concerning him Josephus relates the story that he went out to meet Alexander at Sapha (probably the ancient Mizpeh) at the head of a procession of priests; and that when Alexander saw the multitude clothed in white, and the priests in their linen garments, and the high-priest in blue and gold, with the mitre on his head, and the gold plate, on which was the name of God, he stepped forward alone and adored the Name, and hastened to embrace the high-priest (Ant. xi. 8, § 5). Josephus adds among other things that the king entered Jerusalem with the high-priest, and went up to the Temple to worship and offer sacrifice; that he was shown the prophecies of Daniel concerning himself, and at the high-priest's intercession granted the Jews liberty to live according to their own laws, and freedom from tribute on the Sabbatical years. The story, however, has not obtained credit. It was the brother of this Jaddua, Manasseh, who, according to the same authority, was at the request of Sanballat made the first high-priest of the Samaritan temple by Alexander the Great.

Jaddua was succeeded by Onias I., his son, and he again by Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue, as the Jews speak, and to whom is usually ascribed the completion of the Canon of the O. T. (Prideaux, Conn. i. 545). Of him Jesus, the son of Sirach, speaks in terms of most glowing eulogy in Ecclus. i., and ascribing to him the repair and fortification of the Temple, with other works. The passage (1–21) contains an interesting account of the ministrations of the high-priest. Upon Simon's death, his son Onias being under age, Eleazar, Simon's brother, succeeded him. The high-priesthood of Eleazar is memorable as being that under which the LXX. version of the Scriptures was made at Alexandria for Ptolemy Philadelphus, according to the account of Josephus taken from Aristeas (Ant. xii. 2). This translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, valuable as it was with reference to the wider interests of religion, and marked as was the Providence which gave it to the world at this time as a preparation for the approaching advent of Christ, yet viewed in its relation to Judaism and the high-priesthood, was a sign, and perhaps a helping cause of their decay. It marked a growing tendency to Hellenize, utterly inconsistent with the spirit of the Mosaic economy. Accordingly in the high-priesthood of Eleazar's rival nephews, Jesus and Onias, we find their very names changed into the Greek ones of Jason and Menelaus, and with the introduction of this new feature of rival high-priests we find one of them, Menelaus, strengthening himself and seeking support from the Syro-Greek kings against the Jewish party, by offering to forsake their national laws and customs, and to adopt those of the Greeks. The building of a gymnasium at Jerusalem for the use of these apostate Jews, and their endeavor to conceal their circumcision when stripped for the games (1 Macc. i. 14, 15; 2 Macc. iv. 12–15; Jos. Ant. xii. 5, § 1), show the length to which this spirit was carried. The acceptance of the spurious priesthood of the temple of Onion from Ptolemy Philometor by Onias (the son of Onias the high-priest), who would have been the legitimate high-priest on the death of Menelaus, his uncle, is another striking indication of the same degeneracy. By this flight of Onias into Egypt the succession of high-priests in the family of Jozadak ceased; for although the Syro-Greek kings had introduced much uncertainty into the succession, by deposing at their will obnoxious persons, and appointing whom they pleased, yet the dignity had never gone out of the one family. Alcimus, whose Hebrew name was Jakim (1 Chr. xxiv. 12), or perhaps Jachin (1 Chr. ix. 10, xxiv. 17), or, according to Ruffinus (ap. Selden), Joachim, and who was made high-priest by Antiochus Eupator on Menelaus being put to death by him, was the first who was of a different family. One, says Josephus, that "was indeed of the stock of Aaron, but not of this family" of Jozadak.

What, however, for a time saved the Jewish institutions, infused a new life and consistency into the priesthood and the national religion, and enabled them to fulfill their destined course till the advent of Christ, was the cruel and impolitic persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. This thoroughly aroused the piety and national spirit of the Jews, and drew together in defense of their temple and country all who feared God and were attached to their national institutions. The result was that after the high-priesthood had been brought to the lowest degradation by the apostasy and crimes of the last Onias or Menelaus, and after a vacancy of seven years had followed the brief pontificate of Alcimus, his no less infamous successor, a new and glorious succession of high-priests arose in the Asmonean family, who united the dignity of civil rulers, and for a time of independent sovereigns, to that of the high-priesthood. Josephus, who is followed by Lightfoot, Selden, and others, calls Judas Maccabæus "high-priest of the nation of Judah" (Ant. xii. 10, § 6), but, according to the far better authority of 1 Macc. x. 20, it was not till after the death of Judas Maccabæus that Alcimus himself died, and that Alexander, king of Syria, made Jonathan, the brother of Judas, high-priest. Josephus himself too calls Jonathan "the first of the sons of Asamonæus, who was high-priest" (Vita, § 1). It is possible, however, that Judas may have been elected by the people to the office of high-priest, though never confirmed in it by the Syrian kings. The Asmonean family were priests of the course of Joiarib, the first of the twenty-four courses (1 Chr. xxiv. 7), and whose return from captivity is recorded 1 Chr. ix. 10 Neh. xi. 10. They were probably of the house of Eleazar, though this cannot be affirmed with certainty; and Josephus tells us that he himself was related to them, one of his ancestors having married a daughter of Jonathan, the first high-priest of the house. This Asmonean dynasty lasted from B. C. 153 till the family was damaged by intestine divisions, and then destroyed by Herod the Great. Aristobulus, the last high-priest of his line, brother of Mariamne, was murdered by order of Herod, his brother-in-law, B. C. 35. The independence of Judæa, under the priest-kings of this race, had lasted till Pompey took Jerusalem, and sent king Aristobulus II. (who had also taken the high-priesthood from his brother Hyrcanus) a prisoner to Rome. Pompey restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, but forbad him to wear the diadem. Everything Jewish was now, however, hastening to decay. Herod made men of low birth high-priests, deposed them at his will, and named others in their room. In this he was followed by Archelaus, and by the Romans when they took the government of Judæa into their own hands; so that there were no fewer than twenty-eight high-priests from the reign of Herod to the destruction of the Temple by Titus, a period of 107 years.[a] The N. T. introduces us to some of these later, and oft-changing high-priests, namely, Annas and Caiaphas — the former, high-priest at the commencement of John Baptist's ministry, with Caiaphas as second priest; and the latter high-priest himself at our Lord's crucifixion — and Ananias, thought to be the same as Ananus who was murdered by the Zealots just before the siege of Jerusalem, before whom St. Paul was tried, as we read Acts xxiii., and of whom he said "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall." Theophilus, the son of Ananus, was the high-priest from whom Saul received letters to the synagogue at Damascus (Acts ix. 1, 14, Kuinoel). Both he and Ananias seem certainly to have presided in the Sanhedrim, and that officially, nor is Lightfoot's explanation (viii. 450, and 484) of the mention of the high-priest, though Gamaliel and his son Simeon were respectively presidents of the Sanhedrim, at all probable or satisfactory (see Acts v. 17, &c.). The last high-priest was appointed by lot by the Zealots from the course of priests called by Josephus Eniachim (probably a corrupt reading for Jachim). He is thus described by the Jewish historian. "His name was Phanias: he was the son of Samuel of the village of Aphtha, a man not only not of the number of the chief priests, but who, such a mere rustic was he, scarcely knew what the high-priesthood meant. Yet did they drag him reluctant from the country, and setting him forth in a borrowed character as on the stage, they put the sacred vestments on him, and instructed him how to act on the occasion. This shocking impiety, which to them was a subject of merriment and sport, drew tears from the other priests, who beheld from a distance their law turned into ridicule, and groaned over the subversion of the sacred honors" (B. J. iv. 3, § 8). Thus ignominiously ended the series of high-priests which had stretched in a scarcely broken line, through nearly fourteen, or, according to the common chronology, sixteen centuries. The Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires, which the Jewish high-priests had seen in turn overshadowing the world, had each, except the last, one by one withered away and died — and now the last successor of Aaron was stripped of his sacerdotal robes, and the temple which he served laid level with the ground to rise no more. But this did not happen till the true High-priest and King of Israel, the Minister of the sanctuary and of the true Tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man, had offered His one sacrifice, once for all, and had taken His place at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, bearing on His breast the judgment of His redeemed people, and continuing a Priest forever, in the Sanctuary which shall never be taken down!

[a] Josephus tells us of one Ananus and his five sons who all filled the office of high-priest in turn. One of these, Ananus the younger, was deposed by king Agrippa for the part he took in causing "James the brother of Jesus who was called Christ" to be stoned (Ant xx. 9, § 1).

The subjoined table shows the succession of high-priests, as far as it can be ascertained, and of the contemporary civil rulers.

* HIGHWAY. [HEDGES; WAY.]

HI'LEN (חִילֶן [perh. fortress, Fürst]: 4

Σελνδ; Alex. Νηλων:[a] Helon), the name of a city of Judah allotted with its "suburbs" to the priests (1 Chr. vi. 58); and which in the corresponding lists of Joshua is called HOLON. G.

HILKI'AH (חִלְקִיָּהוּ and חִלְקִיָּה, the Lord [Jehovah] is my portion: Χελκίας: [in 2 K. xviii. 18, Alex. Χαλκίας; 26, 37, Vat. Alex. -κει-: Helcias). 1. HILKIA'HU, father of Eliakim (2 K. xviii. [18, 26,] 37; Is. xxii. 20, xxxvi. [3,] 22). [ELIAKIM.]

2. [Vat. genr. Χελκειας: in Ezr. vii. 1, Vat. Ελκειας, Alex. Χελκειας; in Neh. xi. 11, Rom. Ἐλχία, Vat. FA. Ελκεια.] High-priest in the reign of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 4 ff.; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 9 ff.; 1 Esdr. i. 8). According to the genealogy in 1 Chr. vi. 13 (A. V.) he was son of Shallum, and from Ezr. vii. 1, apparently the ancestor of Ezra the scribe. His high-priesthood was rendered particularly illustrious by the great reformation effected under it by king Josiah, by the solemn Passover kept at Jerusalem in the 18th year of that king's reign, and above all by the discovery which he made of the book of the law of Moses in the Temple. With regard to the latter, Kennicott (Heb. Text, ii. 299) is of opinion that it was the original autograph copy of the Pentateuch written by Moses which Hilkiah found. He argues from the peculiar form of expression in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 14, סֵפֶר תּוֹרַת יְהוָה בְּיַד מֹשֶׁה, "the book of the law of Jehovah by the hand of Moses;" whereas in the fourteen other places in the O. T. where the law of Moses or the book of Moses are mentioned, it is either "the book of Moses," or "the law of Moses," or "the book of the law of Moses." But the argument is far from conclusive, because the phrase in question may quite as properly signify "the book of the law of the Lord given through Moses." Compare the expression ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου (Gal. iii. 19), and בְּיַד מֹשֶׁה (Ex. ix. 35, xxxv. 29; Neh. x. 29; 2 Chr. xxxv. 6; Jer. l. 1). Though, however, the copy cannot be proved to have been Moses' autograph from the words in question, it seems probable that it was, from the place where it was found, namely, in the Temple; and, from its not having been discovered before, but being only brought to light on the occasion of the repairs which were necessary, and from the discoverer being the high-priest himself, it seems natural to conclude that the particular part of the Temple where it was found was one not usually frequented, or ever by any but the high-priest. Such a place exactly was the one where we know the original copy of the law was deposited by command of Moses, namely, by the side of the ark of the covenant within the vail, as we learn from Deut. xxxi. 9, 26. A difficult and interesting question arises, What was the book found by Hilkiah? Was it the whole Pentateuch, as Le Clerc, Keil, Ewald, etc., suppose, or the three middle books, as Bertheau, or the book of Deuteronomy alone, as De Wette, Gesenius, Rosenmüller, etc.? Our means of answering this question seem to be limited, (1) to an examination of the terms in which the depositing the book of the law by the ark was originally enjoined; (2) to an examination of the contents of the book discovered by Hilkiah, as far as they transpire; (3) to any indications which may be gathered from the contemporary writings of Jeremiah, or from any other portions of Scripture. As regards the first, a comparison of Deut. i. 5 with xxxi. 9; the consideration how exactly suited Deuteronomy is for the purpose of a public recital, as commanded Deut. xxxi. 10–13, whereas the recital of the whole Pentateuch is scarcely conceivable; and perhaps even the smaller bulk of a copy of Deuteronomy compared with that of the whole law, considered with reference to its place by the ark, point strongly to the conclusion that "the book of the law" ordered to be put "in the side of the ark of the covenant" was the book of Deuteronomy alone, whether or no exactly in its present form is a further question. As regards the second, the 28th and 29th chapters of Deut. seem to be those especially referred to in 2 K. xxii. 13, 16, 17, and 2 K. xxiii. 2, 3 seem to point directly to Deut. xxix. 1, in the mention of the covenant, and ver. 3 of the former to Deut. xxx. 2, in the expression with all their heart and all their soul. The words in 2 Chr. xxxv. 3, "The Levites that taught all Israel," seem also to refer to Deut. xxxiii. 10. All the actions of Josiah which followed the reading of the book found, the destruction of all idolatrous symbols, the putting away of wizards and workers with familiar spirits, and the keeping of the Passover, were such as would follow from hearing the 16th, 18th, and other chapters of Deuteronomy, while there is not one that points to any precept contained in the other books, and not in Deuteronomy. If there is any exception to this statement it is to be found in the description of the Passover in ch. xxxv. The phrases "on the fourteenth day of the first month," in ver. 1: "Sanctify yourselves, and prepare your brethren, that they may do according to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses," ver. 6; "The priests sprinkled the blood," ver. 11; and perhaps the allusion in ver. 12, may be thought to point to Lev. xxiii. 5, or Num. ix. 3; to Lev. xxii. and Num. viii. 20–22; to Lev. i. 5; iii. 2, &c.: and to Lev. iii. 3–5, &c. respectively. But the allusions are not marked, and it must be remembered that the Levitical institutions existed in practice, and that the other books of Moses were certainly extant, though they were not kept by the side of the ark. As regards the third, it is well known how full the writings of Jeremiah are of direct references and of points of resemblance to the book of Deuteronomy. Now this is at once accounted for on the supposition of the law thus found by Hilkiah being that book, which would thus naturally be an object of special curiosity and study to the prophet, and as naturally influence his own writings. Moreover, in an undated prophecy of Jeremiah's (ch. xi.[b]), which seems to have been occasioned by the finding of this covenant — for he introduces the mention of "the words of this covenant" quite abruptly — he quotes word for word from Deut. xxvii. 26, answering AMEN himself, as the people are there directed to do, with reference to the curse for disobedience (see ver. 3, 5); a very strong confirmation of the preceding arguments which tend to prove that Deuteronomy was the book found by Hilkiah. But again: in Josh. viii. we have the account of the first execution by Joshua and the Israelites of that which Moses had commanded relative to writing the law upon stones to be set upon Mount Ebal; and it is added in ver. 34, "and afterwards he read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law." In ver. 32 he had said "he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses." Now not only is it impossible to imagine that the whole Pentateuch was transcribed on these stones, but all the references which transpire are to the book of Deuteronomy. The altar of whole stones untouched by iron tool, the peace-offerings, the blessings and the cursings, as well as the act itself of writing the law on stones and setting them on Mount Ebal, and placing half the tribes on Mount Ebal, and the other half on Mount Gerizim, all belong to Deuteronomy. And therefore when it is added in ver. 35, "There was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel," we seem constrained to accept the words with the limitation to the book of Deuteronomy, as that which alone was ordered by Moses to be thus publicly read. And this increases the probability that here too the expression is limited to the same book.

[a] In the LXX. this name appears in ver. 59. having changed places with Jattir.

[b] Hitzig, on Jer. xi., also supposes the expressions in this chapter to have been occasioned by the finding of the book of the law.

The only discordant evidence is that of the book of Nehemiah. In the 8th chapter of that book, and ix. 3, we have the public reading by Ezra of "the book of the law of Moses" to the whole congregation at the feast of Tabernacles, in evident obedience to Deut. xxxi. 10–13. But it is quite certain, from Neh. viii. 14–17, that on the second day they read out of Leviticus, because the directions about dwelling in booths are found there only, in ch. xxiii. Moreover in the prayer of the Levites which follows Neh. ix. 5, and which is apparently based upon the previous reading of the law, reference is freely made to all the books of Moses, and indeed to the later books also. It is, however, perhaps not an improbable inference that, Ezra having lately completed his edition of the Holy Scriptures, more was read on this occasion than was strictly enjoined by Deut. xxxi., and that therefore this transaction does not really weaken the foregoing evidence.

But no little surprise has been expressed by critics at the previous non-acquaintance with this book on the part of Hilkiah, Josiah, and the people generally, which their manner of receiving it plainly evidences; and some have argued from hence that "the law of Moses" is not of older date than the reign of Josiah; in fact that Josiah and Hilkiah invented it, and pretended to have found a copy in the Temple in order to give sanction to the reformation which they had in hand. The following remarks are intended to point out the true inferences to be drawn from the narrative of this remarkable discovery in the books of Kings and Chronicles. The direction in Deut. xxxi. 10–13 for the public reading of the law at the feast of Tabernacles on each seventh year, or year of release, to the whole congregation, as the means of perpetuating the knowledge of the law, sufficiently shows that at that time a multiplication of copies and a multitude of readers was not contemplated. The same thing seems to be implied also in the direction given in Deut. xvii. 18, 19, concerning the copy of the law to be made, for the special use of the king, distinct from that in the keeping of the priests and Levites. And this paucity of copies and of readers is just what one would have expected in an age when the art of reading and writing was confined to the professional scribes, and the very few others who, like Moses had learnt the art in Egypt (Acts vii. 22). The troublous times of the Judges were obviously more likely to obliterate than to promote the study of letters. And whatever occasional revival of sacred learning may have taken place under such kings as David, Solomon, Jehoshaphat, Uzziah, Jotham, and Hezekiah, yet on the other hand such reigns as that of Athaliah, the last years of Joash, that of Ahaz, and above all the long reign of Manasseh, with their idolatries and national calamities, must have been most unfavorable to the study of "the sacred letters." On the whole, in the days of Josiah irreligion and ignorance had overflowed all the dykes erected to stay their progress. In spite of such occasional acts as the public reading of the law to the people, enjoined by Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 9), and such insulated evidences of the king's reading the law, as commanded by Moses, as the action recorded of Amaziah affords (2 K. xiv. 6) — where by the way the reference is still to the book of Deuteronomy — and the yet more marked acquaintance with the law attributed to Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 5, 6) [GENEALOGY], everything in Josiah's reign indicates a very low state of knowledge. There were indeed still professional scribes among the Levites (2 Chr. xxxiv. 13), and Shaphan was the king's scribe. But judging from the narrative, 2 K. xxii. 8, 10: 2 Chr. xxxiv., it seems probable that neither Hilkiah nor Josiah could read. The same may perhaps be said of Jeremiah, who was always attended by Baruch the scribe, who wrote down the words of Jeremiah from his mouth (Jer. xxxvi. 2, 4, 6, 8, 18, 28, 32. xlv., &c.). How then can we wonder that under such circumstances the knowledge of the law had fallen into desuetude? or fail to see in the incident of the startling discovery of the copy of it by Hilkiah one of those many instances of simple truthfulness which impress on the Scripture narrative such an unmistakable stamp of authenticity, when it is read in the same guileless spirit in which it is written? In fact, the ignorance of the law of Moses which this history reveals is in most striking harmony with the prevalent idolatry disclosed by the previous history of Judæa, especially since its connection with the house of Ahab, as well as with the low state of education which is apparent from so many incidental notices.

The story of Hilkiah's discovery throws no light whatever upon the mode in which other portions of the Scriptures were preserved, and therefore this is not the place to consider it. But Thenius truly observes that the expression in 2 K. xxii. 8 clearly implies that the existence of the law of Moses was a thing well known to the Jews. It is interesting to notice the concurrence of the king with the high-priest in the restoration of the Temple, as well as the analogy of the circumstances with what took place in the reign of Joash, when Jehoiada was high-priest, as related 2 Chr. xxiv. (Bertheau, ad loc.; Prideaux, Connect. i. 43, 315; Lewis, Orig. Heb. bk. viii. ch. 8, &c.) [CHELCIAS.]

4. [Vat. omits; Alex. Χελκειας.] HILKIA'HU; another Merarite Levite, second son of Hosah; among the doorkeepers of the tabernacle in the time of king David (1 Chr. xxvi. 11).

He may be identical with the Hilkiah who came up in the expedition with Jeshua and Zerubbabel (xii. 7), and whose descendant Hashabiah is commemorated as living in the days of Joiakim (xii. 21).

6. HILKIA'HU; a priest, of Anathoth, father of the prophet JEREMIAH (Jer. i. 1).

7. HILKI'AH, father of Gemariah, who was one of Zedekiah's envoys to Babylon (Jer. xxix. 3).

HIL'LEL (חִלֵּל [rich in praise, Fürst]; Ἐλλήλ; Alex. Σελημι; Joseph. Ἔλληλος: Illel), a native of Pirathon in Mount Ephraim, father of ABDON, one of the judges of Israel (Judg. xii. 13, 15).

HILLS. The structure and characteristics of the hills of Palestine will be most conveniently noticed in the general description of the features of the country. [PALESTINE.] But it may not be unprofitable to call attention here to the various Hebrew terms for which the word "hill" has been employed in the Auth. Version.

1. Gibeah, גִּבְעָה, from a root akin to גָּבַב, which seems to have the force of curvature or humpishness. A word involving this idea is peculiarly applicable to the rounded hills of Palestine, and from it are derived, as has been pointed out under GIBEAH, the names of several places situated on hills. Our translators have been consistent in rendering gibeah by "hill;" in four passages only qualifying it as "little hill," doubtless for the more complete antithesis to "mountain" (Ps. lxv. 12, lxxii. 3, cxiv. 4, 6).

2. But they have also employed the same English word for the very different term har, הַר, which has a much more extended sense than gibeah, meaning a whole district rather than an individual eminence, and to which our word "mountain" answers with tolerable accuracy. This exchange is always undesirable, but it sometimes occurs so as to confuse the meaning of a passage where it is desirable that the topography should be unmistakable. For instance, in Ex. xxiv. 4, the "hill" is the same which is elsewhere in the same chapter (12, 13, 18, &c.) and book, consistently and accurately rendered "mount" and "mountain." In Num. xiv. 44, 45, the "hill" is the "mountain" of ver. 40, as also in Deut. i. 41, 43, compared with 24, 44. In Josh. xv. 9, the allusion is to the Mount of Olives, correctly called "mountain" in the preceding verse; and so also in 2 Sam. xvi. 13. The country of the "hills," in Deut. i. 7; Josh. ix. 1, x. 40, xi. 16, is the elevated district of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, which is correctly called "the mountain" in the earliest descriptions of Palestine (Num. xiii. 29), and in many subsequent passages. The "holy hill" (Ps. iii. 4), the "hill of Jehovah" (xxiv. 3), the "hill of God" (lxviii. 15), are nothing else than "Mount Zion." In 2 K. i. 9 and iv. 27, the use of the word "hill" obscures the allusion to Carmel, which in other passages of the life of the prophet (e. g. 1 K. xviii. 19; 2 K. iv. 25) has the term "mount" correctly attached to it. Other places in the historical books in which the same substitution weakens the force of the narrative, are as follows: Gen. vii. 19; Deut. viii. 7: Josh. xiii. 6, xviii. 13, 14; Judg. xvi. 3; 1 Sam. xxiii. 14; xxv. 20; xxvi. 13; 2 Sam. xiii. 34; 1 K xx. 23, 28, xxii. 17, &c.

3. On one occasion the word Ma'aleh, מַעֲלֵה is rendered "hill," namely, 1 Sam. ix. 11, where it would be better to employ "ascent" or some similar term.

4. In the N. T. the word "hill" is employed to render the Greek word βουνός; but on one occasion it is used for ὄρος, elsewhere "mountain," so as to obscure the connection between the two parts of the same narrative. The "hill" from which Jesus was coming down in Luke ix. 37, is the same as "the mountain" into which He had gone for His transfiguration the day before (comp. ver. 28). In Matt. v. 14, and Luke iv. 29, ὄρος is also rendered "hill," but not with the inconvenience just noticed. In Luke i. 39 [and 65] the "hill country" (ἡ ὀρεινή) is the same "mountain of Judah" [sing. = collective] to which frequent reference is made in the O. T. G.

HIN. [MEASURES.]

HIND (אַיָּלָה: ἔλαφος: cervus), the female of the common stag or cervus elaphus. It is frequently noticed in the poetical parts of Scripture as emblematic of activity (Gen. xlix. 21; 2 Sam xxii. 34; Ps. xviii. 33; Hab. iii. 19), gentleness (Prov. v. 19), feminine modesty (Cant. ii. 7, iii. 5), earnest longing (Ps. xlii. 1), and maternal affection (Jer. xiv. 5). Its shyness and remoteness from the haunts of men are also noticed (Job xxxix. 1), and its timidity, causing it to cast its young at the sound of thunder (Ps. xxix. 9). The conclusion which some have drawn from the passage last quoted that the hind produces her young with great difficulty, is not in reality deducible from the words, and is expressly contradicted by Job xxxix. 3. The LXX. reads אַיָּלָה in Gen. xlix. 21, rendering it στρέλεχος ἀνειμένον, "a luxuriant terebinth:" Lowth has proposed a similar change in Ps. xxix., but in neither case can the emendation be accepted: Naphtali verified the comparison of himself to a "graceful or tall hind" by the events recorded in Judg. iv. 6–9, v. 18. The inscription of Ps. xxii., "the hind of the morning," probably refers to a tune of that name. [AIJELETH-SHAHAR.]

HINGE. 1. צִיר, στρόφιγξ, cardo, with the notion of turning (Ges. p. 1165). 2. דֶּלֶת, θύρωμα, cardo, with the notion of insertion (Ges. p. 1096). Both ancient Egyptian and modern Oriental doors were and are hung by means of pivots turning in sockets both on the upper and lower sides. In Syria, and especially the Haurân, there are many ancient doors consisting of stone slabs with pivots carved out of the same piece, inserted in sockets above and below, and fixed during the building of the house. The allusion in Prov. xxvi. 14 is thus clearly explained. The hinges mentioned in 1 K. vii. 50 were probably of the Egyptian kind, attached to the upper and lower sides of the door (Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 177; Porter, Damascus, ii. 22, 192; Maundrell, Early Travels, pp. 447, 448 (Bohn); Shaw, Travels, p. 210; Lord Lindsay, Letters, p. 292; Wilkinson, *Anc. HINNOM, VALLEY [more strictly RAVINE] OF, otherwise called "the valley of the son" or "children [sons] of Hinnom" (גֵּי־הִנֹּם, or גֵּי בֶן הִנֹּם, or גֵּי בְנֵי הִנֹּם, variously rendered by LXX. φάραγξ Ἐννόμ [Vat. Ονομ, Josh. xv. 8], or υἱοῦ Ἐννόμ [2 K. xxiii. 10, Jer. vii. 29, 30, xxxii. 35], or Γαίεννα, Josh. xviii. 16 [also νάπη Σοννάμ (Alex. ναπη υιου Εννομ), and Γαϊ Ονομ (Alex. for Γαίεννα)]; ἐν γῇ Βενεννόμ [Alex. ἐν γη Βεεννομ], 2 Chr. xxviii. 3, xxxiii. 6: τὸ πολυάνδριον υἱῶν τῶν τέκνων αὐτῶν, Jer. xix. 2, [πολυάνδριον υἱοῦ Ἐννόμ (Vat. Alex. FA. Εννομ), ver.] 6),[a] a deep and narrow ravine, with steep, rocky sides to the S. and W. of Jerusalem, separating Mount Zion to the N. from the "Hill of Evil Counsel," and the sloping rocky plateau of the "plain of Rephaim" to the S., taking its name, according to Professor Stanley, from "some ancient hero, the son of Hinnom" having encamped in it (Stanley, S. & P. p. 172). The earliest mention of the Valley of Hinnom in the sacred writings is Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16, where the boundary line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin is described with minute topographical accuracy, as passing along the bed of the ravine. On the southern brow, overlooking the valley at its eastern extremity, Solomon erected high places for Molech (1 K. xi. 7), whose horrid rites were revived from time to time in the same vicinity by the later idolatrous kings. Ahaz and Manasseh made their children "pass through the fire" in this valley (2 K. xvi. 3; 2 Chr. xxviii. 3, xxxiii. 6), and the fiendish custom of infant sacrifice to the fire-gods seems to have been kept up in Tophet, at its S. E. extremity for a considerable period (Jer. vii. 31: 2 K. xxiii. 10). [TOPHET.] To put an end to these abominations the place was polluted by Josiah, who rendered it ceremonially unclean by spreading over it human bones, and other corruptions (2 K. xxiii. 10, 13, 14; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 4, 5), from which time it appears to have become the common cesspool of the city, into which its sewage was conducted, to be carried off by the waters of the Kidron, as well as a laystall, where all its solid filth was collected. Most commentators follow Buxtorf, Lightfoot, and others, in asserting that perpetual fires were here kept up for the consumption of bodies of criminals, carcases of animals, and whatever else was combustible; but the Rabbinical authorities usually brought forward in support of this idea appear insufficient, and Robinson declares (i. 274) that "there is no evidence of any other fires than those of Molech having been kept up in this valley," referring to Rosenmüller, Biblisch. Geogr. II. i. 156, 164. For the more ordinary view, see Hengstenburg, Christol. ii. 454, iv. 41; Keil on Kings ii. 147, Clark's edit.; and cf. Is. xxx. 33, lxvi. 24.

From its ceremonial defilement, and from the detested and abominable fire of Molech, if not from the supposed everburning funeral piles, the later Jews applied the name of this valley Ge Hinnom, Gehenna, to denote the place of eternal torment, and some of the Rabbins here fixed the "door of hell;" a sense in which it is used by our Lord. [GEHENNA.] It is called, Jer. ii. 23, "the valley," κατ' ἐξοχήν, and perhaps "the valley of dead bodies," xxxi. 40, and "the valley of vision," Is. xxii. 1, 5 (Stanley, Syr. and Pal. pp. 172, 482).

The name by which it is now known is (in ignorance of the meaning of the initial syllable) Wâdy Jehennam, or Wâdy er Rubêb (Williams, Holy City, i. 56, suppl.), though in Mohammedan traditions the name Gehenna is applied to the Valley of Kedron (Ibn Batutah, 12, 4; Stanley, ut sup.).

The valley commences in a broad sloping basin to the W. of the city, S. of the Jaffa road (extending nearly to the brow of the great Wady, on the W.), in the centre of which, 700 yards from the Jaffa gate, is the large reservoir, supposed to be the "upper pool," or "Gihon" [GIHON] (Is. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2; 2 Chr. xxxii. 30), now known as Birket-el-Mamilla. After running about three quarters of a mile E. by S. the valley takes a sudden bend to the S. opposite the Jaffa gate, but in less than another three quarters of a mile it encounters a rocky hill-side which forces it again in an eastern direction, sweeping round the precipitous S. W. corner of Mount Zion almost at a right angle. In this part of its course the valley is from 50 to 100 yards broad, the bottom everywhere covered with small stones, and cultivated. At 290 yards from the Jaffa gate it is crossed by an aqueduct on nine very low arches, conveying water from the "pools of Solomon" to the Temple Mount, a short distance below which is the "lower pool" (Is. xxii. 9), Birket-es-Sultân. From this point the ravine narrows and deepens, and descends with great rapidity between broken cliffs, rising in successive terraces, honeycombed with innumerable sepulchral recesses, forming the northern face of the "Hill of Evil Counsel," to the S., and the steep, shelving, but not precipitous southern slopes of Mount Zion, which rise to about the height of 150 feet, to the N. The bed of the valley is planted with olives and other fruit trees, and when practicable is cultivated. About 400 yards from the S. W. angle of Mount Zion the valley contracts still more, becomes quite narrow and stony, and descends with much greater rapidity towards the "valley of Jehoshaphat," or "of the brook Kidron," before joining which it opens out again, forming an oblong plot, the site of Tophet, devoted to gardens irrigated by the waters of Siloam. Towards the eastern extremity of the valley is the traditional site of "Aceldama," authenticated by a bed of white clay still worked by potters (Williams, Holy City, ii. 495),[b] opposite to which, where the cliff is thirty or forty feet high, the tree on which Judas hanged himself was placed during the Frankish kingdom (Barclay, City of Great King, p. 208). Not far from Aceldama is a conspicuously situated tomb with a Doric pediment, sometimes known as the "whited sepulchre," near which a large sepulchral recess with a Doric portal hewn in the native rock is known as the "Latibulum apostolorum," where the Twelve are said to have concealed themselves during the time between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. The tombs continue quite down to the corner of the mountain, where it bends off to the S. along the valley of Jehoshaphat. None of the sepulchral recesses in the vicinity of Jerusalem are so well preserved; most of them are very old [see infra] — small gloomy caves, with narrow, rock-hewn doorways.

Robinson places "the valley gate," [which had ts name from this ravine], Neh. ii. 13 15; 2 Chr. xxvi. 9, at the N. W. corner of Mount Zion in the upper part of this valley (Robinson, i. 220, 239, 274, 320, 353; Williams, Holy City, i. suppl. 56, ii. 495; Barclay, City of Great King, 205, 208). [But see JERUSALEM.] E. V.

* The group of tombs in th Valley of Hinnom and on the southern hill-side above the ravine are somewhat fully described in the Ordnance Survey of Jerusalem, pp. 67, 68 (1865). They are regarded "as having been made or modified at a later period than those on the north side of the city." Many of them have an inscription or scattered letters, but nothing that can be well deciphered. Closer inspection shows some of these to be much more elaborate than has been generally supposed. "Close to the building of Aceldama the rock is perforated by seven 'loculi,' through one of which a chamber containing several more 'loculi' is reached; and one of these again, on the right-hand side, gives access to a second chamber with 'loculi;' from that there is an opening to a third, and thence down a flight of steps to a fourth and last one, all the chambers having 'loculi;' most of them are filled with rubbish, and many have the appearance of leading to other chambers." Sketches were taken of some of the appurtenances of these tombs, which accompany the text of the work referred to. Tobler states the results of a special examination of these rock sepulchres in Hinnom (Dritte Wanderung, p. 348 ff.).

A very noticeable feature of this ravine is the precipitous wall of rocks which overhangs the gorge in its deepest part, on the left, as one goes westward and nearly opposite to Aceldama on the height above. The rocky ledges here are almost perpendicular, and are found to be at different points forty, thirty-six, thirty-three, thirty, and twenty feet high. A few trees still grow along the margin of the overhanging brow, and trees here must anciently have been still more numerous when the land was better cultivated. Aside from this peculiarity of the valley, regarded as one of its aspects, it has some additional interest from its having been connected by some with the death of Judas. It has been thought that he may have hung himself on the limb of a tree near the edge of one of these precipices, and that the rope or limb breaking, he fell to the bottom and was dashed to pieces. This latter result would have been the more certain, in the event of his having so fallen, on account of the sharp edges projecting from the sides of the cliff, as well as the rocky ground below. Dr. Robinson (Harmony of the Greek Gospels, § 151) supposes that some such relation as this may have existed between the traitor's "bursting asunder" and the suicide, though he does not assign the occurrence to any particular place. Tholuck (MS. Notes) is one of those who think of Hinnom as the scene of the event. See on this point the Life of our Lord, by Andrews, p. 510 ff. (1867). We cannot indeed rely very much on such minute specifications, because so little being related, so little is really known especting the manner of Judas's death. [JUDAS.]

It may not be useless to correct more distinctly a somewhat prevalent idea that the Valley of Hinnom lies wholly on the south of Jerusalem. This name belongs also to the valley on the west of the city, though the latter is often called from the reservoirs there the Valley of Gihon. They are both parts of one and the same valley, which sweeps around the city on two sides. As a topographical description, the reader will find Robinson's concise account of this locality (Phys. Geogr., pp. 97–100) very distinct and accurate. H.

HIPPOPOTAMUS. There is hardly a doubt that the Hebrew behemoth (בְּהֵמוֹת) describes the hippopotamus: the word itself bears the strongest resemblance to the Coptic name pehemout, "the water-ox," and at the same time expresses in its Hebrew form, as the plural of בְּהֵמָה, the idea of a very large beast. Though now no longer found in the lower Nile, it was formerly common there (Wilkinson, i. 239). The association of it with the crocodile in the passage in which it is described (Job. xl. 15 ff.), and most of the particulars in that passage are more appropriate to the hippopotamus than to any other animal. Behemoth "eateth grass as an ox" (Job xl. 15) — a circumstance which is noticed as peculiar in an animal of aquatic habits; this is strictly true of the hippopotamus, which leaves the water by night, and feeds on vegetables and green crops. Its strength is enormous, vv. 16, 18, and the notice of the power of the muscles of the belly, "his force is in the navel of his belly," appears to be strictly correct. The tail, however, is short, and it must be conceded that the first part of ver. 17, "he moveth his tail like a cedar," seems not altogether applicable.[a] His mode of attack is with his mouth, which is armed with a formidable array of teeth, projecting incisors, and enormous curved canines; thus "his creator offers him a sword," for so the words in ver. 19 may be rendered. But the use of his sword is mainly for pacific purposes, "the beasts of the field playing" about him as he feeds; the hippopotamus being a remarkably inoffensive animal. His retreat is among the lotuses (tzeelim; A. V. "shady trees") which abounded about the Nile, and amid the reeds of the river. Thoroughly at home in the water, "if the river riseth, he doth not take to flight; and he cares not if a Jordan (here an appellative for a "stream") press on his mouth." Ordinary means of capture were ineffectual against the great strength of this animal. "Will any take him before his eyes?" (i. e. openly, and without cunning), "will any bore his nose with a gin?" as was usual with large fish. The method of killing it in Egypt was with a spear, the animal being in the first instance secured by a lasso, and repeatedly struck until it became exhausted (Wilkinson, i. 240); the very same method is pursued by the natives of South Africa at the present day (Livingstone, p. 73; instances of its great strength are noticed by the same writer, pp. 231, 232, 497). a * That depends on the explanation. Dr. Conant remarks on the passage: "Like a cedar; namely, as a cedar is bent, which is not easily done. The allusion is to the strength and stiffness of the tail, the smallest and weakest of all the members of the animal's body" (Book of Job, with a Revised Version, p. 156). See also Hirzel's Hiob erklart, p. 240. There are several expressions in this celebrated description of the water-ox of the Nile which the present philology represents somewhat differently from the A. V. Εἰράς: Hiram), an Adullamite, the friend (רֵעַ) of Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12; and see 20). For "friend" the LXX. and Vulg. have "shepherd," probably reading רֹעֵהוּ.

HI'RAM or HU'RAM (חִירָם, or חוּרָם [noble born = חֹר Ges.]: [Rom. Χιράμ, exc. 2 Sam. v. 11, 1 Chr. xiv. 1, Χειράμ; Vat. Alex. Χειραμ: Hiram] on the different forms of the name see HURAM). 1. The King of Tyre who sent workmen and materials to Jerusalem, first (2 Sam. v. 11, 1 Chr. xiv. 1) to build a palace for David whom he ever loved (1 K. v. 1), and again (1 K. v. 10, vii. 13, 2 Chr. ii. 14, 16) to build the Temple for Solomon, with whom he had a treaty of peace and commerce (1 K. v. 11, 12). The contempt with which he received Solomon's present of CABUL (1 K. ix. 12) does not appear to have caused any breach between the two kings. He admitted Solomon's ships, issuing from Joppa, to a share in the profitable trade of the Mediterranean (1 K. x. 22); and Jewish sailors, under the guidance of Tyrians, were taught to bring the gold of India (1 K. ix. 26) to Solomon's two harbors on the Red Sea (see Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 345–347).

Eupolemon (ap. Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 30) states that David, after a war with Hiram, reduced him to the condition of a tributary prince. Dius, the Phœnician historian, and Menander of Ephesus (ap. Joseph. c. Ap. i. 17, 18) assign to Hiram a prosperous reign of 34 years; and relate that his father was Abibal, his son and successor Baleazar; that he rebuilt various idol-temples, and dedicated some splendid offerings; that he was successful in war; that he enlarged and fortified his city; that he and Solomon had a contest with riddles or dark sayings (compare Samson and his friends, Judg. xiv. 12), in which Solomon, after winning a large sum of money from the king of Tyre, was eventually outwitted by Abdemon, one of his subjects. The intercourse of these great and kindred-minded kings was much celebrated by local historians. Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 8) states that the correspondence between them with respect to the building of the Temple was preserved among the Tyrian archives in his days. With the letters in 1 K. v. and 2 Chr. ii. may be compared not only his copies of the letters, but also the still less authentic letters between Solomon and Hiram, and between Solomon and Vaphres (Apries?), which are preserved by Eupolemon (ap. Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 30), and mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor (ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 21, p. 332). Some Phœnician historians (ap. Tatian. cont. Græc. § 37) relate that Hiram, besides supplying timber for the Temple, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon. Jewish writers, in less ancient times cannot overlook Hiram's uncircumcision in his services towards the building of the Temple. Their legends relate (ap. Eisenm. Ent. Jud. i. 868) that because he was a God-fearing man and built the Temple he was received alive into Paradise; but that, after he had been there a thousand years, he sinned by pride, and was thrust down into hell.

2. [Χιράμ: Vat. Alex. Χειραμ: Hiram.] Hiram was the name of a man of mixed race (1 K. vii. 13, 40, [45]), the principal architect and engineer sent by king Hiram to Solomon; also called Huram in the Chronicles. * At the distance of 1½ hours on the hill-side east of Tyre, is a remarkable tomb known as Kabr Hairân, i. e. Tomb of Hiram. "It stands all alone, apart alike from human habitation and ancient ruin — a solitary, venerable relic of remote antiquity. In fact it is one of the most singular monuments in the land. It is an immense sarcophagus of limestone hewn out of a single block — 12 feet long, 8 wide, and 6 high; covered by a lid slightly pyramidal, and 5 feet in thickness; — the whole resting on a massive pedestal, about 10 feet high, composed of three layers of large hewn stones, the upper layer projecting a few inches. The monument is perfect, though weather-beaten. The only entrance to it is an aperture broken through the eastern end. A tradition, now received by all classes and sects in the surrounding country, makes this the tomb of Hiram, Solomon's friend and ally; and the tradition may have come down unbroken from the days of Tyre's grandeur. We have at least no just ground for rejecting it." (Porter, Handbook, ii. 395.)

The people there also connect Hiram's name with a copious fountain over which a massive stone structure has been raised, which the traveller passes on the south shortly before coming to the site of Tyre (see Tristram's Land of Israel, p. 55, 2d ed.). Such traditions, whether they cleave rightfully or not to these particular places, have their interest. They come down to us through Phœnician channels, and indirectly authenticate the history of Hiram as recorded by the Hebrew writers. H.

HIRCA'NUS (Ὑρκανός [Hyrcanian, from Ὑρκανία, a province on the Caspian Sea]: Hircanus), "a son of Tobias," who had a large treasure placed for security in the treasury of the Temple at the time of the visit of Heliodorus (c. 187 B. C.; 2 Macc. iii. 11). Josephus also mentions "children of Tobias" (Ant. xii. 5, § 1, παῖδες Τωβίου), who, however, belonged to the faction of Menelaus, and notices especially a son of one of them (Joseph) who was named Hyrcanus (Ant. xii. 4, § 2 ff.). But there is no sufficient reason for identifying the Hyrcanus of 2 Macc. with this grandson of Tobias either by supposing that the ellipse (τοῦ Τωβίου) is to be so filled up (Grotius, Calmet), or that the sons of Joseph were popularly named after their grandfather (Ewald, Gesch. iv. 309), which could scarcely have been the case in consequence of the great eminence of their father.

The name appears to be simply a local appellative, and became illustrious afterwards in the Maccabean dynasty, though the circumstances which led to its adoption are unknown (yet comp. Joseph. Ant. xiii. 8, § 4). [MACCABEES.] B. F. W.

* HIS is used throughout the A. V. instead of its, which does not occur in the original edition of 1611, though it has been introduced in one place in later editions. [IT.] This use sometimes occasions ambiguity, as in Matt. vi. 33, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness," where Eastwood and Wright (Bible Word-Book, p. 252) erroneously refer the "his" to "kingdom" instead of to "God," the Greek being τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐτοῦ, not αὐτῆς. "His righteousness" here means "the righteousness which He requires."

A.

HITTITES, THE, the nation descended from Cheth (A. V. 'Heth"), the second son of Canaan (1.) With five exceptions, noticed below, the word is חִתִּי = the Chittite [ὁ Χετταῖος, οἱ Χεττᾶιοι: Hethæus, Hethæi: in Ezr. ix. 1, ὁ Εθί, Vat. Εθει, Alex. Εθθι], in the singular number, according to the common Hebrew idiom. It is occasionally rendered in the A. V. in the singular number, "the Hittite" (Ex. xxiii. 28, xxxiii. 2, xxxiv. 11; Josh. ix. 1, xi. 3), but elsewhere plural (Gen. xv. 20; Ex. iii. 8, 17, xiii. 5, xxiii. 23; Num. xiii. 29; Deut. vii. 1, xx. 17; Josh. iii. 10, xii. 8, xxiv. 11; Judg. iii. 5; 1 K. ix. 20; 2 Chr. viii. 7; Ezr. ix. 1; Neh. ix. 8; 1 Esdr. viii. 69, Χεττᾶοι). (2.) The plural form of the word is חִתִּים = the Chittim, or Hittites [Χεττίν (Vat. -τειν, Alex. Χεττιειμ), Χεττιιν (Vat. -ειν), οἱ Χεττᾶοι: Hetthim, Hethæi] (Josh. i. 4; Judg. i. 26; 1 K. x. 29; 2 K. vii. 6; 2 Chr. i. 17). (3.) "A Hittite [woman]" is חִתִּית [Χεττᾶία: Cethæa] (Ez. xvi. 3, 45). In 1 K. xi. 1, the same word is rendered "Hittites."

1. Our first introduction to the Hittites is in the time of Abraham, when he bought from the Bene-Cheth, "Children of Heth" — such was then their title — the field and the cave of Machpelah, belonging to Ephron the Hittite. They were then settled at the town which was afterwards, under its new name of Hebron, to become one of the most famous cities of Palestine, then bearing the name of Kirjath-arba, and perhaps also of Mamre (Gen. xxiii. 19, xxv. 9). The propensities of the tribe appear at that time to have been rather commercial [a] than military. The "money current with the merchant," and the process of weighing it, were familiar to them; the peaceful assembly "in the gate of the city" was their manner of receiving the stranger who was desirous of having a "possession" "secured" to him among them. The dignity and courtesy of their demeanor also come out strongly in this narrative. As Ewald well says, Abraham chose his allies in warfare from the Amorites, but he goes to the Hittites for his grave. But the tribe was evidently as yet but small, not important enough to be noticed beside "the Canaanite and the Perizzite" who shared the bulk of the land between them (Gen. xii. 6, xiii. 7). In the southern part of the country they remained for a considerable period after this, possibly extending as far as Gerar and Beer-sheba, a good deal below Hebron (xxvi. 17, xxviii. 10). From their families Esau married his two first wives; and her fear lest Jacob should take the same course is the motive given by Rebekah for sending Jacob away to Haran. It was the same feeling that had urged Abram to send to Mesopotamia for a wife for Isaac. The descendant of Shem could not wed with Hamites — "with the daughters of the Canaanites among whom I dwell . . . wherein I am a stranger," but "go to my country and thy kindred" is his father's command, "to the house of thy mother's father, and take thee a wife from thence" (Gen. xxviii. 2, xxiv. 4).

2. Throughout the book of Exodus the name of the Hittites occurs only in the usual formula for the occupants of the Promised Land. Changes occur in the mode of stating this formula [CANAAN, p. 354 a], but the Hittites are never omitted (see Ex. xxiii. 28). In the report of the spies, however, we have again a real historical notice of them: "the Hittite, the Jebusite, and the Amorite dwell in the mountain" (Num. xiii. 29). Whatever temporary circumstances may have attracted them so far to the south as Beer-sheba, a people having the quiet commercial tastes of Ephron the Hittite and his companions can have had no call for the roving, skirmishing life of the country bordering on the desert; and thus, during the sojourn of Israel in Egypt, they had withdrawn themselves from those districts, retiring before Amalek (Num. xiii. 29) to the more secure mountain country in the centre of the land. Perhaps the words of Ezekiel (xvi. 3, 45) may imply that they helped to found the city of Jebus.

From this time, however, their quiet habits vanish, and they take their part against the invader, in equal alliance with the other Canaanite tribes (Josh. ix. 1, xi. 3, &c.).

3. Henceforward the notices of the Hittites are very few and faint. We meet with two individuals, both attached to the person of David. (1.) "Ahimelech the Hittite," who was with him in the hill of Hachilah, and with Abishai accompanied him by night to the tent of Saul (1 Sam. xxvi. 6). He is nowhere else mentioned, and was possibly killed in one of David's expeditions, before the list in 2 Sam. xxiii. was drawn up. (2.) "Uriah the Hittite," one of "the thirty" of David's body-guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 39; 1 Chr. xi. 41), the deep tragedy of whose wrongs forms the one blot in the life of his master. In both these persons, though warriors by profession, we can perhaps detect traces of those qualities which we have noticed as characteristic of the tribe. In the case of the first, it was Abishai, the practical, unscrupulous "son of Zeruiah," who pressed David to allow him to kill the sleeping king: Ahimelech is clear from that stain. In the case of Uriah, the absence from suspicion and the generous self-denial which he displayed are too well known to need more than a reference (2 Sam. xi. 11, 12).

4. The Egyptian annals tell us of a very powerful confederacy of Hittites in the valley of the Orontes, with whom Sethos I., or Sethos, waged war about B. C. 1340, and whose capital, Ketesh, situate near Emesa, he conquered. [EGYPT, p. 511.]

5. In the Assyrian inscriptions, as lately deciphered, there are frequent references to a nation of Khatti, who "formed a great confederacy ruled by a number of petty chiefs," whose territory also lay in the valley of the Orontes, and who were sometimes assisted by the people of the sea-coast, probably the Phœnicians (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 463). "Twelve kings of the Southern Khatti are mentioned in several places." If the identification of these people with the Hittites should prove to be correct, it agrees with the name Chat, as noticed under HETH, and affords a clew to the meaning of some passages which are otherwise puzzling. These are (a) Josh. i. 4, where the expression "all the land of the Hittites" appears to mean all the land of Canaan, or at least the northern part thereof. (b) Judg. i. 26. Here nearly the same expression recurs. [LUZ.] (c) 1 K. x. 29; 2 Chr. i. 17: "All the kings of the Hittites and kings of Aram" (probably identical with the "kings on this side Euphrates," 1 K. iv. 24) are mentioned as purchasing chariots and horses from Egypt, for the possession of which they were so notorious, that

[a] "Canaanite" has in many places the force of "merchant" or "trafficker." See among others the examples in vol. i. p. 351 b

(d) it would seem to have become at a later date almost proverbial in allusion to an alarm of an attack by chariots (2 K. vii. 6).

6. Nothing is said of the religion or worship of the Hittites. Even in the enumeration of Solomon's idolatrous worship of the gods of his wives — among whom were Hittite women (1 K. xi. 1) — no Hittite deity is alluded to. (See 1 K. xi. 5, 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13.)

7. The names of the individual Hittites mentioned in the Bible are as follow. They are all susceptible of interpretation as Hebrew words, which would lead to the belief either that the Hittites spoke a dialect of the Aramaic or Hebrew language, or that the words were Hebraized in their transference to the Bible records.

ADAH (woman), Gen. xxxvi. 2.
AHIMELECH, 1 Sam. xxvi. 6.
BASHEMATH, accur. BAS'MATH (woman); possibly a second name of Adah, Gen. xxvi. 34.
BEERI (father of Judith, below), Gen. xxvi. 34.
ELON (father of Basmath), Gen. xxvi. 34.
EPHRON, Gen. xxiii. 10, 13, 14, &c.
JUDITH (woman), Gen. xxvi. 34.
URIAH, 2 Sam. xi. 3, &c., xxiii. 39, &c.
ZOHAR (father of Ephron), Gen. xxiii. 8.

In addition to the above, SIBBECHAI, who in the Hebrew text is always denominated a Hushathite, is by Josephus (Ant. vii. 12, § 2) styled a Hittite.

G.

HIVITES, THE (הַחִוִּי [perh. the villager, Ges.], i. e. the Chivrite: ὁ Εὐαῖος: [in Josh. ix. 7, Χορραῖος, and so Alex. in Gen. xxxiv. 2:] Hevæus). The name is, in the original, uniformly found in the singular number. It never has, like that of the Hittites, a plural, nor does it appear in any other form. Perhaps we may assume from this that it originated in some peculiarity of locality or circumstance, as in the case of the Amorites — "mountaineers;" and not in a progenitor, as did that of the Ammonites, who are also styled Bene-Ammon — children of Ammon — or the Hittites, Bene-Cheth — children of Heth. The name is explained by Ewald (Gesch. i. 318) as Binnenländer, that is, "Midlanders;" by Gesenius (Thes. 451) as pagani, "villagers." In the following passages the name is given in the A. V. in the singular — THE HIVITE: — Gen. x. 17; Ex. xxiii. 28, xxxiii. 2, xxxiv. 11; Josh. ix. 1, xi. 3; 1 Chr. i. 15: also Gen. xxxiv. 2, xxxvi. 2. In all the rest it is plural.

1. In the genealogical tables of Genesis, "the Hivite" is named as one of the descendants — the sixth in order — of Canaan, the son of Ham (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chr. i. 15). In the first enumeration of the nations who, at the time of the call of Abraham, occupied the promised land (Gen. xv. 19–21), the Hivites are omitted from the Hebrew text (though in the Samaritan and LXX. their name is inserted). This has led to the conjecture, amongst others, that they are identical with the KADMONITES, whose name is found there and there only (Reland, Pal. 140; Bochart, Phal. iv. 36; Can. i. 19). But are not the Kadmonites rather, as their name implies, the representatives of the Bene-kedem, or "children of the East"? The name constantly occurs in the formula by which the country is designated in the earlier books (Ex. iii. 8, 17, xiii. 5, xxiii. 23, 28, xxxiii. 2, xxxiv. 11; Deut. vii. 1, xx. 17; Josh. iii. 10, ix. 1, xii. 8, xxiv. 11), and also in the later ones (1 K. ix. 20; 2 Chr. viii. 7; but comp. Ezr. ix. 1, and Neh. ix. 8). It is, however, absent in the report of the spies (Num. xiii. 29), a document which fixes the localities occupied by the Canaanite nations at that time. Perhaps this is owing to the then insignificance of the Hivites, or perhaps to the fact that they were indifferent to the special locality of their settlements.

2. We first encounter the actual people of the Hivites at the time of Jacob's return to Canaan. Shechem was then (according to the current Hebrew text) in their possession, Hamor the Hivite being the "prince (נָשִׂיא) of the land" (Gen. xxxiv. 2). They were at this time, to judge of them by their rulers, a warm and impetuous people, credulous, and easily deceived by the crafty and cruel sons of Jacob. The narrative further exhibits them as peaceful and commercial, given to "trade" (10, 21), and to the acquiring of "possessions" of cattle and other "wealth" (10, 23, 28, 29). Like the Hittites they held their assemblies or conferences in the gate of their city (20). We may also see a testimony to their peaceful habits in the absence of any attempt at revenge on Jacob for the massacre of the Shechemites. Perhaps a similar indication is furnished by the name of the god of the Shechemites some generations after this — Baal-berith — Baal of the league, or the alliance (Judg. viii. 33, ix. 4, 46); by the way in which the Shechemites were beaten by Abimelech (40); and by the unmilitary character, both of the weapon which caused Abimelech's death and of the person who discharged it (ix. 53).

The Alex. MS., and several other MSS. of the LXX., in the above narrative (Gen. xxxiv. 2) substitute "Horite" for "Hivite." The change is remarkable from the usually close adherence of the Alex. Codex to the Hebrew text, but it is not corroborated by any other of the ancient versions, nor is it recommended by other considerations. No instances occur of Horites in this part of Palestine, while we know, from a later narrative, that there was an important colony of Hivites on the highland of Benjamin at Gibeon, etc., no very great distance from Shechem. On the other hand, in Gen. xxxvi. 2, where Aholibamah, one of Esau's wives, is said to have been the daughter of [Anah] the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite, all considerations are in favor of reading "Horite" for "Hivite." In this case we fortunately possess a detailed genealogy of the family, by comparison of which little doubt is left of the propriety of the change (comp. verses 20, 24, 25, 30, with 2), although no ancient version has suggested it here.

3. We next meet with the Hivites during the conquest of Canaan (Josh. ix. 7, xi. 19). Their character is now in some respects materially altered. They are still evidently averse to fighting, but they have acquired — possibly by long experience in traffic — an amount of craft which they did not before possess, and which enables them to turn the tables on the Israelites in a highly successful manner (Josh. ix. 3–27). The colony of Hivites,[a] who made Joshua and the heads of the tribes their dupes on this occasion, had four cities — Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim — situated, if our present knowledge is accurate, at considerable distances asunder. It is not certain whether the three last were destroyed by Joshua or not (xi. 19);

[a] Here again the LXX. (both MSS.) have Horites for Hivites; but we cannot accept the change without further consideration.

Gibeon certainly was spared. In ver. 11 the Gibonites speak of the "elders" of their city, a word which does not necessarily point to any special form of government, as is assumed by Winer (Heviter), who uses the ambiguous expression that they "lived under a republican constitution" (in republicanischer Verfassung)! See also Ewald (Gesch. i. 318, 319).

4. The main body of the Hivites, however, were at this time living on the northern confines of western Palestine — "under Hermon, in the land of Mizpeh" (Josh. xi. 3) — "in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal-Hermon to the entering in of Hamath" (Judg. iii. 3). Somewhere in this neighborhood they were settled when Joab and the captains of the host, in their tour of numbering, came to "all the cities of the Hivites" near Tyre (2 Sam. xxiv. 7). In the Jerusalem Targum on Gen. x. 17, they are called Tripolitans (טַרְיפּוֹלָאֵי), a name which points to the same general northern locality.

5. In speaking of the AVIM, or Avvites, a suggestion has been made by the writer that they may have been identical with the Hivites. This is apparently corroborated by the fact that, according to the notice in Deut. ii., the Avites seem to have been dispersed before the Hivites appear on the scene of the sacred history. G.

HIZKI'AH (חִזְקִיָּה [strength of Jehovah]: Ἐζεκίας: Ezechias), an ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

HIZKI'JAH (חִזְקִיָּה [as above]: Ἐζεκία: Hezechia), according to the punctuation of the A. V. a man who sealed the covenant of reformation with Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. x. 17). But there is no doubt that the name should be taken with that preceding it, as "Ater-Hizkijah," a name given in the lists of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. It appears also extremely likely that the two names following these in x. 17, 18 (Azzur, Hodijah) are only corrupt repetitions of them.

This and the preceding name are identical, and are the same with that given in the A. V. as HEZEKIAH.

HO'BAB (חֹבָב [love, beloved]: ὁ Ὀβάβ, Alex. Ωβαβ; in Judg. Ἰωβάβ: Hobab). This name is found in two places only (Num. x. 29; Judg. iv. 11), and it seems doubtful whether it denotes the father-in-law of Moses, or his son. (1.) In favor of the latter are (a.) the express statement that Hobab was "the son of Raguel" (Num. x. 29); Raguel or Reuel — the Hebrew word in both cases is the same — being identified with Jethro, not only in Ex. ii. 18 (comp. iii. 1, &c.), but also by Josephus, who constantly gives him that name. (b.) The fact that Jethro had some time previously left the Israelite camp to return to his own country (Ex. xviii. 27). The words "the father-in-law of Moses" in Num. x. 29, though in most of the ancient versions connected with Hobab, will in the original read either way, so that no argument can be founded on them. (2.) In favor of Hobab's identity with Jethro are (a.) the words of Judg. iv. 11; but it should be remembered that this is (ostensibly) of later date than the other, and altogether a more casual statement. (b.) Josephus in speaking of Raguel remarks once (Ant. ii. 12, § 1) that he "had Iothor, i. e. Jethro) for a surname" (τοῦτο γὰρ ἦν ἐπίκλημα τῷ Ῥαγούηλ). From the absence of the article here, it is inferred by Whiston and others that Josephus intends that he had more than one surname, but this seems hardly safe.

The Mohammedan traditions are certainly in favor of the identity of Hobab with Jethro. He is known in the Koran and elsewhere, and in the East at the present day, by the name of Sho eib (شعيب), doubtless a corruption of Hobab. According to those traditions he was the prophet of God to the idolaters of Medyen (Midian), who not believing his message were destroyed (Lane's Koran, 179–181); he was blind (ib. 180 note); the rod of Moses was his gift, it had once been the rod of Adam, and was of the myrtle of Paradise, etc. (Ib. 190: Weil's Bibl. Legends, 107–109). The name of Sho'eib still remains attached to one of the wadies on the east side of the Jordan, opposite Jericho, through which, according to the tradition of the locality (Seetzen, Reisen, 1854, ii. 319, 376), the children of Israel descended to the Jordan. [BETH-NIMRAH.] According to this tradition, therefore, he accompanied the people as far as the Promised Land, though whatever weight that may possess is, when the statement of Ex. xviii. 27 is taken into account, against his identity with Jethro. Other places bearing his name and those of his two daughters are shown at Sinai and on the Gulf of Akaba (Stanley, S. & P. p. 33).

But whether Hobab was the father-in-law of Moses or not, the notice of him in Num. x. 29–32, though brief, is full of point and interest. While Jethro is preserved to us as the wise and practiced administrator, Hobab appears as the experienced Bedouin sheikh, to whom Moses looked for the material safety of his cumbrous caravan in the new and difficult ground before them. The tracks and passes of that "waste howling wilderness" were all familiar to him, and his practiced sight would be to them "instead of eyes" in discerning the distant clumps of verdure which betokened the wells or springs for the daily encampment, and in giving timely warning of the approach of Amalekites or other spoilers of the desert. [JETHRO.] G.

HO'BAH [or HO'BA, A. V. ed. 1611] (חוֹבָה [concealed, Ges.; lurking-hole, Fürst]: Χοβά: Hoba), the place to which Abraham pursued the kings who had pillaged Sodom (Gen. xiv. 15). It was situated "to the north of Damascus" (מִשְּׂמֹאל לְדַמָּשֶׂק). Josephus mentions a tradition concerning Abraham which he takes from Nicolaus of Damascus: — "Abraham reigned at Damascus, being a foreigner . . . and his name is still famous in the country; and there is shown a village called from him The Habitation of Abraham" (Ant. i. 7, § 2). It is remarkable that in the village of Burzeh, three miles north of Damascus, there is a wely held in high veneration by the Mohammedans, and called after the name of the patriarch, Masjad Ibrahim, "the prayer-place of Abraham." The tradition attached to it is that here Abraham offered thanks to God after the total discomfiture of the eastern kings. Behind the wely is a cleft in the rock, in which another tradition represents the patriarch as taking refuge on one occasion from the giant Nimrod. It is remarkable that the word Hobah signifies "a hiding-place."

The Jews of Damascus affirm that the village of Jóbar, not far from Burzeh, is the Hobah of Scripture. They have a synagogue there dedicated to Elijah, to which they make frequent pilgrimages (see p. 720 b, note; also Handb. for Syr. and Pal. pp. 491, 492). J. L. P.

HOD (הוֹד [splendor, ornament]: Ὡδ; [Vat.] Alex. Ωδ: Hod), one of the sons of Zophah, among the descendants of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 37).

HODA'IAH [3 syl.] (Chetib, הוֹדַוְיָהוּ, altered in the Keri to הוֹדַוְיָהוּ, i. e. HODAVIA'HU [splendor of Jehovah]: Ὀδολία; Alex. Ωδουια: Oduia), son of Elioënai, one of the last members of the royal line of Judah; mentioned 1 Chr. iii. 24.

HODAVI'AH (הוֹדַוְיָה [as above]: Ὡδουία: Odoia). 1. A man of Manasseh, one of the heads of the half-tribe on the east of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).

2. [Vat. Οδυια: Oduia.] A man of Benjamin, son of Has-senuah (1 Chr. ix. 7).

3. [Vat. Σοδουια: Odavia.] A Levite, who seems to have given his name to an important family in the tribe — the Bene Hodaviah (Ezr. ii. 40). In Nehemiah the name appears as HODEVAH. Lord A. Hervey has called attention to the fact that this name is closely connected with Judah (Genealogies, p. 119). This being the case, we probably find this Hodaviah mentioned again in iii. 9.

HO'DESH (חֹדֶשׁ [new moon, or time of the new moon]: Ἀδά; [Comp. Χόδες:] Hodes), a woman named in the genealogies of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 9) as the wife of a certain Shaharaim, and mother of seven children. Shaharaim had two wives besides Hodesh, or possibly Hodesh was a second name of one of those women (ver. 8). The LXX. by reading Baara, Βααδά, and Hodesh, Ἀδά, seem to wish to establish such a connection.

HODE'VAH (הוֹדְוָה, Keri הוֹדִיה [perh. brightness, ornament of Jehovah]: Οὐδουία: [Vat. Θουδουια:] Alex. Ουδουιδ: Oduia), Bene-Hodevah [sons of H.], a Levite family, returned from Captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 43). In the parallel lists it is given as HODAVIAH (No. 3) and SUDIAS.

HODI'AH (הוֹדִיָה [splendor of Jehovah]: ἡ Ἰδουία; Alex. Ιουδαια: [Comp. Ὡδία:] Odaia), one of the two wives of Ezra, a man of Judah, and mother to the founders of Keilah and Eshtemoa (1 Chr. iv. 19). She is doubtless the same person as Jehudijah (in verse 18, that is "the Jewess"), in fact, except the article, which is disregarded in the A. V., the two names are identical [comp. HODAVIAH, No. 3]. Hodiah is exactly the same name as HODIJAH, under which form it is given more than once in the A. V.

HODI'JAH (הוֹדִיָּה [as above]: Ὡδουΐα: Odia, Odaia). This is in the original precisely the same name as the preceding, though spelt differently in the A. V. It occurs —

1. A Levite in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. viii. 7; and probably also ix. 5; x. 10). The name with others is omitted in the two first of these passages in the LXX.

2. [Ὡδουμ; Alex. Ωδουα: Odaia.] Another Levite at the same time (Neh. x. 13).

3. [Ὡδονία; Vat. Alex. FA. Οδουια: Odaia.] A layman; one of the "heads" of the people at the same time (Neh. x. 18).

HOG'LAH (חָגְלָה [partridge]: Ἐγλά; Alex. Αγλα, Αγλαμ: Hegla), the third of the five daughters of Zelophehad, in whose favor the law of inheritance was altered so that a daughter could inherit her father's estate when he left no sons (Num. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11, Josh. xvii. 3).

The name also occurs in BETH-HOGLAH, which see.

HO'HAM (הוֹהָם [whom Jehovah incites, Ges.]: Ἐλάμ; Alex. Αιλαμ;[a] Oham), king of Hebron at the time of the conquest of Canaan (Josh. x. 3); one of the five kings who were pursued by Joshua down the pass of Beth-horon, and who were at last captured in the cave at Makkedah and there put to death. As king of Hebron he is frequently referred to in Josh. x., but his name occurs in the above passage only.

HOLM-TREE (πρῖνος: ilex) occurs only in the apocryphal story of Susanna (ver. 58). The passage contains a characteristic play on the names of the two trees mentioned by the elders in their evidence. That on the mastich (σχῖνον . . . ἄγγελος σκίσει σε) has been noticed under that head [MASTICH-TREE, note]. That on the holm-tree (πρῖνον) is "the angel of God waiteth with the sword to cut thee in two" (ἵνα πρίσαι σε). For the historical significance of these puns see SUSANNA. The πρῖνος of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. iii. 7, § 3, and 16, § 1, and elsewhere) and Dioscorides (i. 144) denotes, there can be no doubt, the Quercus coccifera, the Q. pseudo-coccifera, which is perhaps not specifically distinct from the first-mentioned oak. The ilex of the Roman writers was applied both to the holm-oak (Quercus ilex) and to the Q. coccifera or kermes oak. See Pliny (H. N. xvi. 6).

For the oaks of Palestine, see a paper by Dr. Hooker in the Transactions of the Linnæan Society, vol. xxiii. pt. ii. pp. 381–387. [OAK.] W. H.

HOLOFER'NES, or, more correctly, OLOFERNES (Ὀλοφέρνης: [Holofernes]),[b] was, according to the book of Judith, a general of Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians (Jndg. ii. 4), who was slain by the Jewish heroine Judith during the siege of Bethulia. [JUDITH.] The name occurs twice in Cappadocian history, as borne by the brother of Ariarathes I. (c. B. C. 350), and afterwards by a pretender to the Cappadocian throne, who was at first supported and afterwards imprisoned by Demetrius Soter (c. B. C. 158). The termination (Tissaphernes, etc.) points to a Persian origin, but the meaning of the word is uncertain. B. F. W.

HO'LON (חֹלֹן [abode, halting-place, Sim.]: Χαλοὺ καὶ Χαννά, Alex. Χιλουων; ἡ Γελλά, Alex. Ωλων: Olon, Holon). 1. A town in the mountains of Judah; one of the first group, of which Debir was apparently the most considerable. It is named between GOSHEN and GILOH (Josh. xv. 51), and

[a] In each MS. the same equivalent as the above has been given for HORAM

[b] * In the A. V. ed. 1611 the name is generally printed "Olofernes," though "Holofernes" also occurs. A.

was allotted with its "suburbs" to the priests (xxi. 15). In the list of priest's cities of 1 Chr. vi. the name appears as HILEN. In the Onomasticon ("Helon" and "Olon") it is mentioned, but not so as to imply its then existence. Nor has the name been since recognized by travellers.

2. חֹלֹן [as above]: Χελών: Helon), a city of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21, only). It was one of the towns of the Mishor, the level downs (A. V. "plain country") east of Jordan, and is named with Jahazah, Dibon, and other known places; but no identification of it has yet taken place, nor does it appear in the parallel lists of Num. xxxii. and Josh. xiii. G.

HO'MAM (הוֹמָם [extermination, Ges.]: Αἰμάν: Homan), the form under which in 1 Chr. i. 39 an Edomite name appears, which in Gen. xxxvi. is given HEMAM. Homam is assumed by Gesenius to be the original form (Thes. p. 385 a). By Knobel (Genesis, p. 254), the name is compared with that of Homaima (حميمة), a town now ruined, though once important, half-way between Petra and Ailath, on the ancient road at the back of the mountain. See Laborde, Journey, p. 207, Ameimé; also the Arabic authorities mentioned by Knobel. G.

HOMER. [MEASURES.]

* HONEST. [HONESTY.]

* HONESTY, for σεμνότης (A. V.), 1 Tim. ii. 2, is more restricted in its idea than the Greek word σεμνότης. The latter designates generally dignity of character, including of course probity, but also other qualities allied to self-control and decorum. The same word is rendered "gravity," 1 Tim. iii. 4, and Tit. ii. 7. It may be added that "honest" (which in the N. T. usually represents καλός, once σεμνός) is often to be taken as equivalent to "good" or "reputable." Like the Latin honestus, it describes what is honorable, becoming, or morally beautiful in character and conduct. "Honestly" is used in the A. V. in a similar manner as the rendering of εὐσχημόνως and καλῶς (Rom. xiii. 13; 1 Thess. iv. 12; Heb. xiii. 18). H.

HONEY. We have already noticed [FOOD] the extensive use of honey as an article of ordinary food among the Hebrews: we shall therefore in the present article restrict ourselves to a description of the different articles which passed under the Hebrew name of d'bash (דְּבַשׁ). In the first place it applies to the product of the bee, to which we exclusively apply the name of honey. All travellers agree in describing Palestine as a land "flowing with honey" (Ex. iii. 8), bees being abundant even in the remote parts of the wilderness, where they deposit their honey in the crevices of the rocks or in hollow trees. In some parts of northern Arabia the hills are so well stocked with bees, that no sooner are hives placed than they are occupied (Wellsted's Travels, ii. 123). The Hebrews had special expressions to describe the exuding of the honey from the comb, such as nôpheth (נֹפֶת), dropping" (Cant. iv. 11; Prov. v. 3, xxiv. 13, tsûph (צוּף), "overflowing" (Ps. xix. 10; Prov. xvi. 24), and ya'ar (יַעַר) or ya'árah (יַעֲרָה) (1 Sam. xiv. 27; Cant. v. 1) — expressions which answer to the mel acetum of Pliny (xi. 15): the second of these terms approaches nearest to the sense of "honey comb," inasmuch as it is connected with nopheth in Ps. xix. 10, "the droppings of the comb." (2.) In the second place, the term d'bash applies to a decoction of the juice of the grape, which is still called dibs, and which forms an article of commerce in the East; it was this, and not ordinary bee-honey, which Jacob sent to Joseph (Gen. xliii. 11), and which the Tyrians purchased from Palestine (Ez. xxvii. 17). The mode of preparing it is described by Pliny (xiv. 11): the must was either boiled down to a half (in which case it was called defrutum), or to a third (when it was called siracum. or sapa, the σίραιος οἶνος, and ἕψημα of the Greeks): it was mixed either with wine or milk (Virg. Georg. i. 296; Ov. Fast. iv. 780): it is still a favorite article of nutriment among the Syrians, and has the appearance of coarse honey (Russell, Aleppo, i. 82). (3.) A third kind has been described by some writers as "vegetable" honey, by which is meant the exudations of certain trees and shrubs, such as the Tamarix mannifera, found in the peninsula of Sinai, or the stunted oaks of Luristan and Mesopotamia. The honey which Jonathan ate in the wood (1 Sam. xiv. 25), and the "wild honey" which supported St. John (Matt. iii. 4), have been referred to this species. We do not agree to this view: the honey in the wood was in such abundance that Jonathan took it up on the end of a stick; but the vegetable honey is found only in small globules, which must be carefully collected and strained before being used (Wellsted, ii. 50). The use of the term ya'ar in that passage is decisive against this kind of honey. The μέλι ἄγριον of Matthew need not mean anything else than the honey of the wild bees, which we have already stated to be common in Palestine, and which Josephus (B. J. iv. 8, § 3) specifies among the natural productions of the plain of Jericho: the expression is certainly applied by Diodorus Siculus (xix. 94) to honey exuded from trees; but it may also be applied like the Latin mel silvestre (Plin. xi. 16) to a particular kind of bee-honey. (4.) A fourth kind is described by Josephus (l. c.), as being manufactured from the juice of the date.

The prohibition against the use of honey in meat offerings (Lev. ii. 11) appears to have been grounded on the fermentation produced by it, honey soon turning sour, and even forming vinegar (Plin. xxi. 48). This fact is embodied in the Talmudical word hidbish = "to ferment," derived from d'bash. Other explanations have been offered, as that bees were unclean (Philo de Sacrif. c. 6, App. ii. 255), or that the honey was the artificial dibs (Bähr, Symbol. ii. 323). W. L. B.

HOOK, HOOKS. Various kinds of hooks are noticed in the Bible, of which the following are the most important.

1. Fishing-hooks (סִיר, עֲנָדָה, Am. iv. 2; חַחָה, Job xli. 2; Is. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15). The two first of these Hebrew terms mean primarily thorns, and secondarily fishing-hooks, from the similarity in shape, or perhaps from thorns having been originally used for the purpose; in both cases the LXX. and Vulg. are mistaken in their renderings, giving ὅπλοις and contis for the first, λέβηras and ollis for the second; the third term refers to the contraction of the mouth by the hook.

2 חוֹחַ (A. V. "thorn"), properly a ring (ψέλλιον, circulus) placed through the mouth of a large fish and attached by a cord (אַגְמוֹן) to a stake for the purpose of keeping it alive in the water (Job xli. 2); the word meaning the cord is rendered "hook" in the A. V. and = σχοῖνος.

3. חָח and חוֹחַ, generally rendered "hook" in the A. V. after the LXX. ἄγκιστρον, but properly a ring (circulus), such as in our country is placed through the nose of a bull, and similarly used in the east for leading about lions (Ez. xix. 4, where the A. V. has "with chains"), camels, and other animals. A similar method was adopted for leading prisoners, as in the case of Manasseh who was led with rings (2 Chr. xxxiii. 11; A. V. "in the thorns"). An illustration of this practice is found in a bas-relief discovered at Khorsabad (Layard, ii. 376). The expression is used several times in this sense (2 K. xix. 28; Is. xxxvii. 29; Ez. xxix. 4, xxxviii. 4). The term מוֹקֵשׁ is used in a similar sense in Job xl. 24 (A. V. "bore his nose with a gin," margin).

Hook. (Layard's Nineveh.)

4. וָוִים, a term exclusively used in reference to the Tabernacle, rendered "hooks" in the A. V. The LXX. varies in its rendering, sometimes giving κεφαλίς, i. e. the capital of the pillars, sometimes κρίκος and ἀγκύλη; the expenditure of gold, as given in Ex. xxxviii. 28, has led to this doubt; they were, however, most probably hooks (Ex. xxvi. 32, 37, xxvii. 10 ff., xxxviii. 10 ff.); the word seems to have given name to the letter ו in the Hebrew alphabet, possibly from a similarity of the form in which the latter appears in the Greek Digamma, to that of a hook.

5. מַזְמֵרָה, a vine-dresser's pruning-hook (Is. ii. 4, xviii. 5; Mic. iv. 3; Joel iii. 10).

6. מַזְלֵג and מִזְלָגָה (κρεάγρα), a flesh-hook for getting up the joints of meat out of the boiling pot (Ex. xxvii. 3; 1 Sam. ii. 13–14).

7. שַׁפַּתַּיִם (Ez. xl. 43), a term of very doubtful meaning, probably meaning "hooks" (as in the A. V.), used for the purpose of hanging up animals to flay them (puxilli bifurci, Ges. Thes. p. 1470): other meanings given are — ledges (labia, Vulg.), or caves, as though the word were שְׂפָתַיִם; pens for keeping the animals previous to their being slaughtered; hearth-stones, as in the margin of the A. V.; and lastly, gutters to receive and carry off the blood from the slaughtered animals.

HOPH'NI (חָפְנִי, a fighter [a pugilist, boxer, Ges.; one strong, powerful, Fürst]: Ὀφνί [Vat. -νει; Alex. in 1 Sam. ii. 34, Εφνει, iv. 4 11, 17, Οφνει: Ophni]) and PHINEHAS (פִּינְחָס, Φινεές [Vat. Φεινεες]), the two sons of Eli, who fulfilled their hereditary sacerdotal duties at Shiloh. Their brutal rapacity and lust, which seemed to acquire fresh violence with their father's increasing years (1 Sam. ii. 22, 12–17), filled the people with disgust and indignation, and provoked the curse which was denounced against their father's house first by an unknown prophet (vv. 27–36), and then by Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 11–14). They were both cut off in one day in the flower of their age, and the ark which they had accompanied to battle against the Philistines was lost on the same occasion (1 Sam. iv. 10, 11). The predicted ruin and ejectment of Eli's house were fulfilled in the reign of Solomon. [ELI; ZADOK.] The unbridled licentiousness of these young priests gives us a terrible glimpse into the fallen condition of the chosen people (Ewald, Gesch. ii. 538–638).[a] The Scripture calls them "sons of Belial" (1 Sam. ii. 12); and to this our great poet alludes in the words —

> —— "To him no temple stood
> Or altar smoked; yet who more oft than he
> In temples and at altars, when the priest
> Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons, who filled
> With lust and violence the house of God?"

HOR, MOUNT (הֹר הָהָר, = Hor the mountain, remarkable as the only case in which the name comes first). 1. (Ὄρ τὸ ὄρος: Mons Hor), the mountain in which Aaron died (Num. xx. 25, 27). The word Hor is regarded by the lexicographers as an archaic form of Har, the usual Hebrew term for "mountain" (Gesenius, Thes. p. 391 b; Fürst, Handwb. ad voc., etc.), so that the meaning of the name is simply "the mountain of mountains," as the LXX. have it in another case (see below, No. 2) τὸ ὄρος τὸ ὄρος: Vulg. mons altissimus; and Jerome (Ep. ad Fabiolam) "non in monte simpliciter sed in montis monte."

The few facts given us in the Bible regarding Mount Hor are soon told. It was "on the boundary line" (Num. xx. 23) or "at the edge" (xxxiii. 37) of the land of Edom. It was the next halting-place of the people after Kadesh (xx. 22, xxxiii. 37), and they quitted it for Zalmonah (xxxiii. 41) in the road to the Red Sea (xxi. 4). It was during the encampment at Kadesh that Aaron was gathered to his fathers. At the command of Jehovah, he, his brother, and his son ascended the mountain, in the presence of the people, "in the eyes of all the congregation." The garments, and with the garments the office, of high-priest were taken from Aaron and put upon Eleazar, and Aaron died there in the top of the mountain. In the circumstances of the ascent of the height to die, and in the marked exclusion from the Promised Land, the end of the one brother resembled the end of the other: but in the presence of the two survivors, and of the gazing crowd below, there is a striking difference between this event and the solitary death of Moses.

Mount Hor "is one of the very few spots connected with the wanderings of the Israelites which admit of no reasonable doubt" (Stanley, Syr. and Pal. p. 86). It is almost unnecessary to state that it is situated on the eastern side of the great valley of the Arabah, the highest and most conspicuous of the whole range of the sandstone mountains of Edom, having close beneath it on its eastern side — though strange to say the two are not visible to each other — the mysterious city of Petra. The tradition has existed from the earliest date. Josephus does not mention the name of Hor (Ant. iv. 4, § 7), but he describes the death of Aaron as taking place "on a very high mountain which surrounded the metropolis of the Arabs," which latter "was formerly called Arke, but now Petra." In the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome it is Or mons — "a mountain in which Aaron died, close to the city of Petra." When it was visited by the Crusaders (see the quotations in Rob. 521), the sanctuary was already on its top, and there is little doubt that it was then what it is now — the Jebel Nebi-Harûn, "the mountain of the Prophet Aaron."

[a] Dean Stanley finds a lesson also for other and later times in that "great and instructive wickedness" which the names of Phinehas and Hophni recall to us. See his remarks, History of the Jewish Church i. 418.

Of the geological formation of Mount Hor we have no very trustworthy accounts. The general structure of the range of Edom, of which it forms the most prominent feature, is new red sandstone, displaying itself to an enormous thickness. Above that is the Jura limestone, and higher still the cretaceous beds, which latter in Mount Seir are reported to be 3,500 feet in thickness (Wilson, Lands, i. 194). Through these deposited strata longitudinal dykes of red granite and porphyry have forced their way, running nearly north and south, and so completely silicifying the neighboring sandstone as often to give it the look of a primitive rock. To these combinations are due the extraordinary colors for which Petra is so famous. Mount Hor itself is said to be entirely sandstone, in very horizontal strata (Wilson, i. 290). Its height, according to the latest measurements, is 4,800 feet (Eng.) above the Mediterranean, that is to say about 1,700 feet above the town of Petra, 4,000

above the level of the Arabah, and more than 6,000 above the Dead Sea (Roth, in Petermann's Mittheil. 1858, i. 3). The mountain is marked, far and near, by its double top, which rises like a huge castellated building from a lower base and is surmounted by the circular dome of the tomb of Aaron, a distinct white spot on the dark red surface of the mountain (Stanley, 86; Laborde, 143; Stephens, Incidents). This lower base is the "plain of Aaron," beyond which Burckhardt was, after all his toils, prevented from ascending. "Out of this plain, culminating in its two summits, springs the red sandstone mass, from its base upwards rocky and naked, not a bush or a tree to relieve the rugged and broken corners of the sandstone blocks which compose it. On ascending this mass a little plain is found to lie between the two peaks, marked by a white cypress, and not unlike the celebrated plain of the cypress under the summit of Jebel Mûsa, traditionally believed to be the scene of Elijah's vision. The southernmost of the two, on approaching, takes a conical form. The northernmost is truncated, and crowned by the chapel of Aaron's tomb." The chapel or mosk is a small square building, measuring inside about 28 feet by 13 (Wilson, 295), with its door in the S. W. angle. It is built of rude stones, in part broken columns, all of sandstone, but fragments of granite and marble lie about. Steps lead to the flat roof of the chapel, from which rises a white dome as usual over a saint's tomb. The interior of the chapel consists of two chambers, one below the other. The upper one has four large pillars and a stone chest, or tombstone, like one of the ordinary slabs in churchyards, but larger and higher, and rather bigger at the top than the bottom. At its head is a high round stone, on which sacrifices are made, and which retained, when Stephens saw it, the marks of the smoke and blood of recent offerings. "On the slab are Arabic inscriptions, and it is covered with shawls chiefly red. One of the pillars is hung with votive offerings of beads, etc., and two ostrich eggs are suspended over the chest. Steps in the N. W. angle lead down to the lower chamber, which is partly in the rock, but plastered. It is perfectly dark. At the end, apparently under the stone chest above, is a recess guarded by a grating. Within this is a rude protuberance, whether of stone or plaster was not ascertainable, resting on wood, and covered by a ragged pall. This lower recess is no doubt the tomb, and possibly ancient. What is above is only the artificial monument and certainly modern." [a] In one of the walls of the upper chamber is a "round polished black stone," one of those mysterious stones of which the prototype is the Kaaba at Mecca, and which, like that, would appear to be the object of great devotion (Martineau, 419, 420).

The impression received on the spot is that Aaron's death took place in the small basin between the two peaks, and that the people were stationed either on the plain at the base of the peaks, or at that part of the Wady Abu-Kusheybeh from which the top is commanded. Josephus says that the ground was sloping downwards (κατάντες ἦν τὸ χωρίον; Ant. iv. 4, § 7). But this may be the mere general expression of a man who had never been on the spot. The greater part of the above information has been kindly communicated to the writer by Professor Stanley.

The chief interest of Mount Hor will always consist in the prospect from its summit — the last view of Aaron — "that view which was to him what Pisgah was to his brother." It is described at length by Irby (134), Wilson (i. 292–9), Martineau (420), and is well summed up by Stanley in the following words: "We saw all the main points on which his eye must have rested. He looked over the valley of the Arabah counterscted by its hundred watercourses, and beyond, over the white mountains of the wilderness they had so long traversed; and at the northern edge of it there must have been visible the heights through which the Israelites had vainly attempted to force their way into the Promised Land. This was the western view. Close around him on the east were the rugged mountains of Edom, and far along the horizon the wide downs of Mount Seir, through which the passage had been denied by the wild tribes of Esau who hunted over their long slopes." On the north lay the mysterious Dead Sea gleaming from the depths of its profound basin (Stephens, Incidents). "A dreary moment, and a dreary scene — such it must have seemed to the aged priest. . . . The peculiarity of the view is the combination of wide extension with the scarcity of marked features. Petra is shut out by intervening rocks. But the survey of the Desert on one side, and the mountains of Edom on the other, is complete; and of these last the great feature is the mass of red bald-headed sandstone rocks, intersected not by valleys but by deep seams" (S. & P. p. 87). Though Petra itself is entirely shut out, one outlying building — if it may be called a building — is visible, that which goes by the name of the Deir, or Convent. Professor Stanley has thrown out a suggestion on the connection between the two which is well worth further investigation.

Owing to the natural difficulties of the locality and the caprices of the Arabs, Mount Hor and Petra are more difficult of access than any other places which Europeans usually attempt to visit. The records of these attempts — not all of them successes — will be found in the works of Burckhardt, Irby and Mangles, Stephens, Wilson, Robinson, Martineau, and Stanley. They are sufficient to invest the place with a secondary interest, hardly inferior to that which attaches to it as the haltingplace of the children of Israel, and the burial-place of Aaron.

2. (τὸ ὄρος τὸ ὄρος: mons altissimus.) A mountain, entirely distinct from the preceding, named, in Num. xxxiv. 7, 8, only, as one of the marks of the northern boundary of the land which the children of Israel were about to conquer. The identification of this mountain has always been one of the puzzles of Sacred Geography. The Mediterranean was the western boundary. The northern boundary started from the sea; the first point in it was Mount Hor, and the second the entrance of Hamath. Since Sidon was subsequently allotted to the most northern tribe — Asher — and was, as far as we know, the most northern town so allotted, it would seem probable that the northern boundary would commence at about that point; that is, opposite to where the great range of Lebanon breaks down to the sea. The next landmark, the entrance to Hamath, seems to have been determined by Mr. Porter as the pass at Kulât el-Husn, close to Hums, the ancient Hamath — at the other end of the range of Lebanon. [HAMATH, Amer. ed.] Surely "Mount Hor" then can be nothing else than the great chain of Lebanon itself. Looking at the massive character and enormous height of the range, it is very difficult to suppose that any individual peak or mountain is intended and not the whole mass, which takes nearly a straight course between the two points just named, and includes below it the great plain of the Buka'a and the whole of Palestine properly so called.

The Targum Pseudojon. renders Mount Hor by Umanos, probably intending Amana. The latter is also the reading of the Talmud (Gittin 8, quoted by Fürst, sub voce), in which it is connected with the Amana named in Cant. iv. 8. But the situation of this Amana is nowhere indicated by them. It cannot have any connection with the Amana or Abana river which flowed through Damascus, as that is quite away from the position required in the passage. By the Jewish geographers Schwarz (24, 25) and Parchi (Benj. of Tudela, 413, &c.), for various traditional and linguistic reasons, a mountain is fixed upon very far to the north, between Tripoli and Hamath, in fact, though they do not say so, very near the Mons Amanus of the classical geographers. But this is some 200 miles north of Sidon, and 150 above Hamath, and is surely an unwarranted extension of the limits of the Holy Land. The great range of Lebanon is so clearly the natural northern boundary of the country, that there seems no reason to doubt that the whole range is intended by the term Hor. G.

* Dr. Robinson (Phys. Geogr. p. 345) would limit this Hor either to "the northern end of Lebanon Proper or a Hor connected with it." Porter also (Giant Cities of Bashan, etc., p. 316) fixes on the northern peak of Lebanon as the point of departure in tracing the northern boundary, which peak he represents as sufficiently conspicuous to be thus singled out. The entire Lebanon range, stretching so far from north to south, would certainly be very indefinite if assigned as the starting-point for running the line in that direction. In other respects this description of the Land of Promise (Num. xxxiv. 3–12) may be said to be remarkably specific in the designation of places. H.

Whether the Gezer which he governed was that commonly mentioned, or another place further south, is not determinable.

Μαγδαλ-ωραμ, both by inclusion of the preceding name: Horem), one of the fortified places in the territory of Naphtali; named with Iron and Migdal-el (Josh. xix. 38). Van de Velde (i. 178–9; Memoir, 322) suggests Hurah as the site of Horem. It is an ancient site in the centre of the country, half-way between the Ras en-Nâkhûra and the Lake Merom, on a Tell at the southern end of the Wady el-'Ain, one of the natural features of the country. It is also in favor of this identification that Hurah is near Yarûn, probably the representative of the ancient IRON, named with Horem. G.

HOR HAGID'GAD (הֹר הַגִּדְגָּד [mountain of the cleft, Fürst]: ὄρος Γαδγάδ: Mons Gadgad—both reading דָּר for הֹר), the name of a desert station where the Israelites encamped (Num. xxxiii. 32), probably the same as Gudgodah (Deut. x. 7). In both passages it stands in sequence with three others, Moserah or Moseroth, (Beeroth) Bene-Jaakan, and Jotbath or Jotbathah; but the order is not strictly preserved. Hengstenberg (Genuineness of the Pentateuch, ii. 356) has sought to account for this by supposing that they were in Deut. x. 7 going the opposite way to that in Num. xxxiii. 32. For the consideration of this see WILDERNESS OF WANDERING. Gedged (Arab. جِدْجِد) means a hard and level tract. We have also Guddyud (Arab. جُدْجُد), which has among other meanings that of a well abounding in water. The plural of either of these might closely approximate in sound to Gudâgid. It is observable that on the west side of the Arabah Robinson (vol. i., map) has a Wady Ghûdâghidh, which may bear the same meaning; but as that meaning might be perhaps applied to a great number of localities, it would be dangerous to infer identity. The junction of this wady with the Arabah would not, however, be unsuitable for a station between Mount Hor, near which Moserah lay (comp. Num. xx. 28, Deut. x. 6), and Ezion-Geber. Robinson also mentions a shrub growing in the Arabah itself, which he calls غضا. Ghûdâh (ii. 121 comp. 119), which may also possibly suggest a derivation for the name. H. H.

HO'RI. 1. (חֹרִי, but in Chron. חוֹרִי [inhabitant of caves, troglodyte, Ges., Fürst]: Χορρεί, Alex. Χορρει, in Chron. Χορρί [Vat. -ει]: Hori), a Horite, as his name betokens: son of Lotan the son of Seir, and brother to Hemam or Homam (Gen. xxxvi. 22; 1 Chr. i. 39). No trace of the name appears to have been met with in modern times.

2. (Χορρί; Alex. Χορρει: Horrœorum.) In Gen. xxxvi. 30, the name has in the original the definite article prefixed — הַחֹרִי = the Horite; and is in fact precisely the same word with that which in the preceding verse, and also in 21, is rendered in the A. V. "the Horites."

3. (חוֹרִי: [a] Σουρί in both MSS. [rather, Rom., Alex.; Vat. Σουρει:] Huri.) A man of Simeon; father of Shaphat, who represented that tribe among the spies sent up into Canaan by Moses (Num. xiii. 5).

HO'RITES and HO'RIMS (חֹרִי, Gen. xiv. 6, and חֹרִים, Deut. ii. 12: Χορραῖοι: Corræi [Horrœi, Horrhæi; also HO'RITE in the sing., Gen. xxxvi. 20, Χορραῖος: Horrœus]), the aboriginal inhabitants of Mount Seir (Gen. xiv. 6), and probably allied to the Emims and Rephaims. The name Horite (חֹרִי, a troglodyte, from חֹר, "a hole" or "cave") appears to have been derived from their habits as "cave-dwellers." Their excavated dwellings are still found in hundreds in the sandstone cliffs and mountains of Edom, and especially in Petra. [EDOM and EDOMITES.] It may, perhaps, be to the Horites Job refers in xxx. 6, 7. They are only three times mentioned in Scripture: first, when they were smitten by the kings of the East (Gen. xiv. 6); then when their genealogy is given in Gen. xxxvi. 20–30 and 1 Chr. i. 38–42; and lastly when they were exterminated by the Edomites (Deut. ii. 12, 22). It appears probable that they were not Canaanites, but an earlier race, who inhabited Mount Seir before the posterity of Canaan took possession of Palestine (Ewald, Geschichte, vol. i. 304, 305). HOR'MAH (חָרְמָה [devotement to destruction, anathema: Rom. Vat. Alex. commonly Ἑρμᾶ or Ἑρμά, but Num. xxi. 3 and Judg. i. 17, Ἀνάθεμα, 1 Sam. xxx. 30, Ἱερμούθ (Vat. -ρει-); Rom. Vat. Num. xiv. 45, Ἑρμάν, Josh. xii. 14, Ἑρμάθ; Alex. Josh. xv. 30, Ερμαλ: Horma, Herma, Harma, Arama (al. Haramu)]; its earlier name Zephath, צְפָת, is found Judg. i. 17) was the chief town of a "king" of a Canaanitish tribe on the south of Palestine, reduced by Joshua (Josh. xii. 14), and became a city of the territory of Judah (Josh. xv. 30; 1 Sam. xxx. 30), but apparently belonged to Simeon, whose territory is reckoned as parcel of the former (Josh. xix. 4; comp. Judg. i. 17; 1 Chr. iv. 30). The seeming inconsistency between Num. xxi. 3 and Judg. i. 17 may be relieved by supposing that the vow made at the former period was fulfilled at the latter, and the name (the root of which, חָרַם, constantly occurs in the sense of to devote to destruction, or utterly to destroy) given by anticipation. Robinson (ii. 181) identifies the pass Es-Sûfa, الصفاة, with Zephath, in respect both of the name, which is sufficiently similar, and of the situation, which is a probable one, namely, the gap in the mountain barrier, which, running about S. W. and N. E., completes the plateau of Southern Palestine, and rises above the less elevated step —

HORN. I. LITERAL. (Josh. vi. 4, 5; comp. Ex. xix. 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 K. i. 39; Job xlii. 14). — Two purposes are mentioned in the Scriptures to which the horn seems to have been applied. Trumpets were probably at first merely horns perforated at the tip, such as are still used upon mountain-farms for calling home the laborers at meal-time. If the A. V. of Josh. vi. 4, 5 ("rams' horns," קַרְנֵי הַיּוֹבֵל) were correct, this would settle the question: but the fact seems to be that יוֹבֵל has nothing to do with ram, and that קֶרֶן, horn, serves to indicate an instrument which originally was made of horn, though afterwards, no doubt, constructed of different materials (comp. Varr. L. L. v. 24, 33, "cornua quod ea quæ nunc sunt ex ære tunc fiebant bubulo e cornu"). [CORNET.] The horns which were thus made into trumpets were probably those of oxen rather than of rams: the latter would scarcely produce a note sufficiently imposing to suggest its association with the fall of Jericho.

The word horn is also applied to a flask, or vessel made of horn, containing oil (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 K. i. 39), or used as a kind of toilet-bottle, filled with the preparation of antimony with which women tinged their eye-lashes (Keren-happuch = paint-horn, name of one of Job's daughters, Job xlii. 14). So in English, drinking-horn (commonly called a horn). In the same way the Greek κέρας sometimes signifies bugle, trumpet (Xen. An. ii. 2, § 4), and sometimes drinking-horn (vii. 2, § 23). In like manner the Latin cornu means trumpet, and also oil-cruet (Hor. Sat. ii. 2, 61), and funnel (Virg. Georg. iii. 509).

II. METAPHORICAL. — 1. From similarity of form. — To this use belongs the application of the word horn to a trumpet of metal, as already mentioned. Horns of ivory, that is, elephants' teeth, are mentioned in Ez. xxvii. 15; either metaphorically from similarity of form; or, as seems more probable, from a vulgar error. The horns of the altar (Ex. xxvii. 2) are not supposed to have been made of horn, but to have been metallic projections from the four corners (γωνίαι κερατοειδεῖς, Joseph. B. J. v. 5, § 6). [ALTAR, p. 74 b.] The peak or summit of a hill was called a horn (Is. v. 1, where hill = horn in Heb.; comp. κέρας, Xen. An. v. 6, § 7, and cornu, Stat. Theb. v. 532; Arab. Kurûn Hattin [Horns of Hattin], Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 370; Germ. Schreckhorn, Wetterhorn, Aerhorn; Celt. cairn). In Hab. iii. 4 ("he had horns coming out of his hand") the context implies rays of light.[a]

The denominative קָרַן = to emit rays, is used of Moses' face (Ex. xxxiv. 29, 30, 35); so all the versions except Aquila and the Vulgate, which have the translations κερατώδης ἦν, cornuta erat. This curious idea has not only been perpetuated by paintings, coins, and statues (Zornius, Biblioth. Antiq. i. 121), but has at least passed muster with Grotius (Annot. ad loc.), who cites Aben-Ezra's identification of Moses with the horned Mnevis of Egypt, and suggests that the phenomenon was intended to remind the Israelites of the golden calf! Spencer (Leg. Hebr. iii. Diss. i. 4) tries a reconciliation of renderings upon the ground that cornua = radii lucis; but Spanheim (Diss. vii. 1), not content with stigmatizing the efforts of art in this direction as "præpostera industria," distinctly attributes to Jerome a belief in the veritable horns of Moses. Bishop Taylor, in all good faith, though of course rhetorically, compares the "sun's golden horns" to those of the Hebrew Lawgiver.

2. From similarity of position and use. — Two principal applications of this metaphor will be found — strength and honor. Of strength the horn of the unicorn [UNICORN] was the most frequent representative[b] (Deut. xxxiii. 17, &c.), but not always; comp. 1 K. xxii. 11, where probably horns of iron, worn defiantly and symbolically on the head, are intended. Expressive of the same idea, or perhaps merely a decoration, is the oriental military ornament mentioned by Taylor (Calmet's Frag. cxiv.), and the conical cap observed by Dr. Livingstone among the natives of S. Africa, and not improbably suggested by the horn of the rhinoceros, so abundant in that country (see Living-stone's Travels, pp. 365, 450, 557; comp. Taylor, l. c.). Among the Druses upon Mount Lebanon the married women wear silver horns on their heads. The spiral coils of gold wire projecting on either side from the female head-dress of some of the Dutch provinces are evidently an ornament borrowed from the same original idea.

In the sense of honor, the word horn stands for a * So Dr. Noyes translates, Rays stream forth from his hand, and remarks, "May not this denote that lightnings were in his hands? See Job xxxvi. 32, He covereth his hands with lightning. Also xxxvii. 3, 11, 15. A.

b * In this sense David speaks of God (Ps. xviii. 2) as "the horn of his salvation," i. e. his mighty, effectual deliverer (comp. Am. vi. 13). Hence we see the import of this same figure and language (κέρας σωτηρίας ἡμῖν) as applied by Zacharias to the Saviour (Luke i 69). H.

the abstract (my horn, Job xvi. 15; all the horns of Israel, Lam. ii. 3), and so for the supreme authority (comp. the story of Cippus, Ovid, Met. xv. 565; and the horn of the Indian Sachem mentioned in Clarkson's Life of Penn). It also stands for concrete, whence it comes to mean king, kingdom (Dan. viii. 3, &c.; Zech. i. 18; comp. Tarquin's dream in Accius, ap. Cic. Div. i. 22); hence on coins Alexander and the Seleucidæ wear horns (see drawings on p. 61), and the former is called in Arab. two horned (Kor. xviii. 85 ff.), not without reference to Dan. viii.

Out of either or both of these two last metaphors sprang the idea of representing gods with horns. Spanheim has discovered such figures on the Roman denarius, and on numerous Egyptian coins of the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines (Diss. v. p. 353). The Bacchus ταυροκέρως, or cornutus, is mentioned by Euripides (Bacch. 100), and among other pagan absurdities Arnobius enumerates "Dii cornuti" (c. Gent. vi.). In like manner river-gods are represented with horns ("tauriformis Aufidus," Hor. Od. iv. 14, 25; ταυρόμορφον ὕμμα Κηφισοῦ, Eur. Ion. 1261). For various opinions on the ground-thought of this metaphor, see Notes and Queries, i. 419, 456. Manx legends speak of a tarroo-ushtey, i. e. water-bull (see Creegeen's Manx Dict.). (See Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 288; and, for an admirable compendium, with references, Zornius, Bibliotheca Antiquaria, ii. 106 ff.). T. E. B.

HORNET (צִרְעָה : σφηκία: crabro). That the Hebrew word tsir'ah describes the hornet, may be taken for granted on the almost unanimous authority of the ancient versions. Not only were bees exceedingly numerous in Palestine, but from the name Zoreah (Josh. xv. 33) we may infer that hornets in particular infested some parts of the country: the frequent notices of the animal in the Talmudical writers (Lewysohn, Zool. § 405) lead to the same conclusion. In Scripture the hornet is referred to only as the means which Jehovah employed for the extirpation of the Canaanites (Ex. xxiii. 28; Deut. vii. 20; Josh. xxiv. 12; Wisd. xii. 8). Some commentators regard the word as used in its literal sense, and adduce authenticated instances, where armies have been seriously molested by hornets (Ælian, xi. 28, xvii. 35; Ammian. Marcellin. xxiv. 8). But the following arguments seem to decide in favor of a metaphorical sense: (1) that the word "hornet" in Ex. xxiii. 28 is parallel to "fear" in ver. 27; (2) that similar expressions are undoubtedly used metaphorically, e. g. "to chase as the bees do" (Deut. i. 44; Ps. cxviii. 12); (3) that a similar transfer from the literal to the metaphorical sense may be instanced in the classical œstrus, originally a "gad-fly," afterwards terror and madness; and lastly (4), that no historical notice of such intervention as hornets occur in the Bible. We may therefore regard it as expressing under a vivid image the consternation with which Jehovah would inspire the enemies of the Israelites, as declared in Deut. ii. 25, Josh. ii. 11. W. L. B.

HORONA'IM (חֹרֹנַיִם = two caverns: [in Is.,] Ἀρωνιείμ, Alex. Αδωνιειμ; [in Jer.,] Ὠρωναΐμ, [Ὀρωναΐμ, etc.:] Oronaim), a town of Moab named with Zoar and Luhith (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 3, 5, 34), but to the position of which no clew is afforded either by the notices of the Bible or by mention in other works. It seems to have been on an eminence, and approached (like Beth-horon) by a road which is styled the "way" (מוֹרָד, Is. xv. 5), or the "descent" (הֹרֶד, Jer. xlviii. 5). From the occurrence of a similar expression in reference to LUHITH, we might imagine that these two places were sanctuaries, on the high places to which the eastern worship of those days was so addicted. If we accept the name as Hebrew, we may believe the dual form of it to arise, either from the presence of two caverns in the neighborhood, or from there having been two towns, possibly an upper and a lower, as in the case of the two Beth-horons, connected by the ascending road.

From Horonaim possibly came Sanballat the Horonite. G.

HOR'ONITE, THE (הַחֹרֹנִי [patr. from חֹרֹן]: ὁ Ἀρωνί; [Vat. FA. -νει, exc. xiii. 28, where Rom. ὁ Οὐρανίτης, Vat. Alex. FA. omit:] Horonites), the designation of Sanballat, who was one of the principal opponents of Nehemiah's works of restoration (Neh. ii. 10, 19; xiii. 28). It is derived by Gesenius (Thes. 459) from Horonaim the Moabite town, but by Fürst (Handwb.) from Horon, i. e. [Upper-] Beth-horon. Which of these is the more accurate is quite uncertain. The former certainly accords well with the Ammonite and Arabian who were Sanballat's comrades; the latter is perhaps more etymologically correct. G.

HORSE. The most striking feature in the Biblical notices of the horse is the exclusive application of it to warlike operations; in no instance is that useful animal employed for the purposes of ordinary locomotion or agriculture, if we except Is. xxviii. 28, where we learn that horses (A. V. "horsemen") were employed in threshing, not however in that case put in the gears, but simply driven about wildly over the strewed grain. This remark will be found to be borne out by the historical passages hereafter quoted; but it is equally striking in the poetical parts of Scripture. The animated description of the horse in Job xxxix. 19–25, applies solely to the war-horse; the mane streaming in the breeze (A. V. "thunder") which "clothes his neck;" his lofty bounds "as a grasshopper;" his hoofs "digging in the valley" with excitement; his terrible snorting — are brought before us, and his ardor for the strife —

> He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage;
> Neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet.
> He saith among the trumpets Ha, ha!
> And he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

So again the bride advances with her charms to an immediate conquest "as a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots" (Cant. i. 9); and when the prophet Zechariah wishes to convey the idea of perfect peace, he represents the horse, no more mixing in the fray as before (ix. 10), but bearing on his bell (which was intended to strike terror into the foe) the peaceable inscription "Holiness unto the Lord" (xiv. 20). Lastly, the characteristic of the horse is not so much his speed or his utility, but his strength (Ps. xxxiii. 17, cxlvii. 10), as shown in the special application of the term abbîr (אַבִּיר), i. e. strong, as an equivalent for a horse (Jer. viii. 16, xlvii. 3, l. 11).

The terms under which the horse is described in the Hebrew language are usually sûs and pârâsh (סוּס, פָּרָשׁ). The origin of these terms is not satisfactorily made out; Pott (Etym. Forsch. i. 60) connects them respectively with Susa and Pares, or Persia, as the countries whence the horse was derived; and it is worthy of remark that sûs was also employed in Egypt for a mare, showing that it was a foreign term there, if not also in Palestine. There is a marked distinction between the sûs and the parash; the former were horses for driving in the war chariot, of a heavy build, the latter were for riding, and particularly for cavalry. This distinction is not observed in the A. V. from the circumstance that pârâsh also signifies horseman; the correct sense is essential in the following passages — 1 K. iv. 26, "forty thousand chariot-horses and twelve thousand cavalry-horses;" Ez. xxvii. 14, "driving-horses and riding-horses;" Joel ii. 4, "as riding-horses, so shall they run;" and Is. xxi. 7, "a train of horses in couples." In addition to these terms we have recesh (רֶכֶשׁ), of undoubted Hebrew origin) to describe a swift horse, used for the royal post (Esth. viii. 10, 14) and similar purposes (1 K. iv. 28; A. V. "dromedary" as also in Esth.), or for a rapid journey (Mic. i. 13); rammâc (רַמָּךְ), used once for a mare (Esth. viii. 10); and sûsâh (סוּסָה) in Cant. i. 9, where it is regarded in the A. V. as a collective term, "company of horses;" it rather means, according to the received punctuation, "my mare," but still better, by a slight alteration in the punctuation, "mares."

The Hebrews in the patriarchal age, as a pastoral race, did not stand in need of the services of the horse, and for a long period after their settlement in Canaan they dispensed with it, partly in consequence of the hilly nature of the country, which only admitted of the use of chariots in certain localities (Judg. i. 19), and partly in consequence of the prohibition in Deut. xvii. 16, which would be held to apply at all periods. Accordingly they hamstrung the horses of the Canaanites (Josh. xi. 6, 9). David first established a force of cavalry and chariots after the defeat of Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 4), when he reserved a hundred chariots, and, as we may infer, all the horses: for the rendering "houghed all the chariot-horses," is manifestly incorrect. Shortly after this Absalom was possessed of some (2 Sam. xv. 1). But the great supply of horses was subsequently effected by Solomon through his connection with Egypt; he is reported to have had "40,000 stalls of horses for his chariots, and 12,000 cavalry horses" (1 K. iv. 26), and it is worthy of notice that these forces are mentioned parenthetically to account for the great security of life and property noticed in the preceding verse. There is probably an error in the former of these numbers: for the number of chariots is given in 1 K. x. 26; 2 Chr. i. 14, as 1,400, and consequently if we allow three horses for each chariot, two in use and one as a reserve, as was usual in some countries (Xen. Cyrop. vi. 1, § 27), the number required would be 4,200, or, in round numbers, 4,000, which is probably the correct reading. Solomon also established a very active trade in horses, which were brought by dealers out of Egypt and resold at a profit to the Hittites, who lived between Palestine and the Euphrates. The passage in which this commerce is described (1 K. x. 28, 29), is unfortunately obscure; the tenor of ver. 28 seems to be that there was a regularly established traffic, the Egyptians bringing the horses to a mart in the south of Palestine and handing them over to the Hebrew dealers at a fixed tariff. The price of a horse was fixed at 150 shekels of silver, and that of a chariot at 600; in the latter we must include the horses (for an Egyptian war-chariot was of no great value) and conceive, as before, that three horses accompanied each chariot, leaving the value of the chariot itself at 150 shekels. In addition to this source of supply, Solomon received horses by way of tribute (1 K. x. 25). The force was maintained by the succeeding kings, and frequent notices occur both of riding horses and chariots (2 K. ix. 21, 33, xi. 16), and particularly of war-chariots (1 K. xxii. 4; 2 K. iii. 7; Is. ii. 7). The force seems to have failed in the time of Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 23) in Judah, as it had previously in Israel under Jehoahaz (2 K. xiii. 7). The number of horses belonging to the Jews on their return from Babylon is stated at 736 (Neh. vii. 68).

In the countries adjacent to Palestine, the use of the horse was much more frequent. It was introduced into Egypt probably by the Hyksos, as it is not represented on the monuments before the 18th dynasty (Wilkinson, i. 386, abridgm.). At the period of the Exodus horses were abundant there (Gen. xlvii. 17, l. 9; Ex. ix. 3, xiv. 9, 23; Deut. xvii. 16), and subsequently, as we have already seen, they were able to supply the nations of Western Asia. The Jewish kings sought the assistance of the Egyptians against the Assyrians in this respect (Is. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 8; Ez. xvii. 15). The Canaanites were possessed of them (Deut. xx. 1; Josh. xi. 4; Judg. iv. 3, v. 22, 28), and likewise the Syrians (2 Sam. viii. 4; 1 K. xx. 1; 2 K. vi. 14, vii. 7, 10) — notices which are confirmed by the pictorial representations on Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, i. 393, 397, 401), and by the Assyrian inscriptions relating to Syrian expeditions. But the cavalry of the Assyrians themselves and other eastern nations was regarded as most formidable; the horses themselves were highly bred, as the Assyrian sculptures still testify, and fully merited the praise bestowed on them by Habakkuk (i. 8), "swifter than leopards, and more fierce than the evening wolves;" their riders "clothed in blue, captains and rulers, all of them desirable young men" (Ez. xxiii. 6), armed with "the bright sword and glittering spear" (Nah. iii. 3), made a deep impression on the Jews, who, plainly clad, went on foot: as also did their regular array as they proceeded in couples, contrasting with the disorderly troops of asses and camels which followed with the baggage (Is. xxi. 7. receb in this passage signifying rather a train than a single chariot). The number employed by the eastern potentates was very great, Holofernes possessing not less than 12,000 (Jud. ii. 15). At a later period we have frequent notices of the cavalry of the Græco-Syrian monarchs (1 Macc. i. 17, iii. 39, &c.).

With regard to the trappings and management of the horse, we have little information; the bridle (resen) was placed over the horse's nose (Is. xxx. 28), and a bit or curb (metheg) is also noticed (2 K. xix. 28; Ps. xxxii. 9; Prov. xxvi. 3; Is. xxxvii 29; in the A. V. it is incorrectly given "bridle," with the exception of Ps. xxxii.). The harness of the Assyrian horses was profusely decorated, the bits being gilt (1 Esdr. iii. 6), and the bridles adorned with tassels; on the neck was a collar terminating in a bell, as described by Zechariah (xiv. 20). Saddles were not used until a late period; only one is represented on the Assyrian sculptures (Layard, ii. 357). The horses were not shod, and therefore hoofs as hard "as flint" (Is. v. 28) were regarded as a great merit. The chariot-horses were covered with embroidered trappings — the "precious clothes" manufactured at Dedan (Ez. xxvii. 20): these were fastened by straps and buckles, and to this perhaps reference is made in Prov. xxx. 31, in the term zarzîr, "one girded about the loins" (A. V. "greyhound"). Thus adorned, Mordecai rode in state through the streets of Shushan (Esth. vi. 9). White horses were more particularly appropriate to such occasions, as being significant of victory (Rev. vi. 2, xix. 11, 14). Horses and chariots were used also in idolatrous processions, as noticed in regard to the sun (2 K. xxiii. 11).

HORSELEECH (עֲלוּקָה, 'alûkâh: βδέλλα: sanguisuga) occurs once only, namely, Prov. xxx. 15, "The horseleech hath two daughters, crying, Give, give." There is little if any doubt that 'alûkâh denotes some species of leech, or rather is the generic term for any bloodsucking annelid, such as Hirudo (the medicinal leech), Hæmopis (the horseleech), Limnatis, Trochetia, and Aulastoma, if all these genera are found in the marshes and pools of the Bible-lands. Schultens (Comment. in Prov. l. c.) and Bochart (Hieroz. iii. 785) have endeavored to show that 'alûkâh is to be understood to signify "fate," or "impending misfortune of any kind" (fatum unicuique impendens); they refer the Hebrew term to the Arabic 'alûk, res appensa, affixa homini. The "two daughters" are explained by Bochart to signify Hades (שְׁאוֹל) and the grave, which are never satisfied. This explanation is certainly very ingenious, but where is the necessity to appeal to it, when the important old versions are opposed to any such interpretation? The bloodsucking leeches, such as Hirudo and Hæmopis, were without a doubt known to the ancient Hebrews, and as the leech has been for ages the emblem of rapacity and cruelty, there is no reason to doubt that this annelid is denoted by 'alûkâh. The Arabs to this day denominate the Limnatis Nilotica, 'aluk. As to the expression "two daughters," which has been by some writers absurdly explained to allude to "the double tongue" of a leech — this animal having no tongue at all — there can be no doubt that it is figurative, and is intended, in the language of oriental hyperbole, to denote its bloodthirsty propensity, evidenced by the tenacity with which a leech keeps its hold on the skin (if Hirudo), or mucous membrane (if Hæmopis). Comp. Horace, Ep. ad Pis. 476; Cicero, Ep. ad Atticum, i. 16; Plautus, Epid. act iv. sc. 4. The etymology of the Hebrew word, from an unused root which signifies "to adhere," is eminently suited to a "leech." Gesenius (Thes. p. 1038) reminds us that the Arabic 'alûk is explained in Camus by ghûl, "a female monster like a vampire, which sucked human blood." The passage in question, however, has simply reference to a "leech." The valuable use of the leech (Hirudo) in medicine, though undoubtedly known to Pliny and the later Roman writers, was in all probability unknown to the ancient Orientals; still they were doubtless acquainted with the fact that leeches of the above named genus would attach themselves to the skin of persons going barefoot in ponds; and they also probably were cognizant of the propensity horse-leeches (Hæmopis) have of entering the mouth and nostrils of cattle, as they drink from the waters frequented by these pests, which are common enough in Palestine and Syria. HOSAH (חֹסָה [place of refuge, protection]: [Rom. Ἰασίφ, Vat. -σειφ;] Alex. Σουσα; [Ald. Σωσα; Comp. Ὡσά:] Hosa), a city of Asher (Josh. xix. 29), the next landmark on the boundary to Tyre. G.

HOSAH (חֹסָה [as above]: Ὀσά; [Vat Οσσα, Ιοσσα;] Alex. Ωσηε and Ωσα: Hosa), a man who was chosen by David to be one of the first doorkeepers (A. V. "porters") to the ark after its arrival in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xvi. 38). He was a Merarite Levite (xxvi. 10), with "sons and brethren" thirteen, of whom four were certainly sons (10, 11); and his charge was especially the "gate Shallecheth," and the causeway, or raised road which ascended (16, מְסִלַּה הָעֲלֹלָה).

HOSANNA (ὡσαννά; Heb. הוֹשַׁע נָא, "Save, we pray;" σῶσον δή, as Theophylact correctly interprets it), the cry of the multitudes as they thronged in our Lord's triumphal procession into Jerusalem (Matt. xxi. 9, 15; Mar. xi. 9, 10; John xii. 13). The Psalm from which it was taken, the 118th, was one with which they were familiar from being accustomed to recite the 25th and 26th verses at the Feast of Tabernacles. On that occasion the Great Hallel, consisting of Psalms cxiii.–cxviii., was chanted by one of the priests, and at certain intervals the multitudes joined in the responses, waving their branches of willow and palm, and shouting as they waved them, Hallelujah, or Hosanna, or "O Lord, I beseech thee, send now prosperity" (Ps. cxviii. 25). This was done at the recitation of the first and last verses of Ps. cxviii.; but, according to the school of Hillel, at the words "Save now, we beseech thee" (ver. 25). The school of Shammai, on the contrary, say it was at the words "Send now prosperity" of the same verse. Rabban Gamaliel and R. Joshua were observed by R. Akiba to wave their branches only at the words "Save now, we beseech thee" (Mishna, Succah, iii. 9). On each of the seven days during which the feast lasted the people thronged in the court of the Temple, and went in procession about the altar, setting their boughs bending towards it; the trumpets sounding as they shouted Hosanna. But on the seventh day they marched seven times round the altar, shouting meanwhile the great Hosanna to the sound of the trumpets of the Levites (Lightfoot, Temple Service, xvi. 2). The very children who could wave the palm branches were expected to take part in the solemnity (Mishna, Succah, iii. 15; Matt. xxi. 15). From the custom of waving the boughs of myrtle and willow during the service the name Hosanna was ultimately transferred to the boughs themselves, so that according to Elias Levita (Thisbi, s. v.), "the bundles of the willows of the brook which they carry at the Feast of Tabernacles are called Hosannas." The term is frequently applied by Jewish writers to denote the Feast of Tabernacles, the seventh day of the feast being distinguished as the great Hosanna (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. הוֹשַׁע). It was not uncommon for the Jews in later times to employ the observances of this feast, which was preëminently a feast of gladness, to express their feelings on other occasions of rejoicing (1 Macc. xiii. 51; 2 Macc. x. 6, 7), and it is not, therefore, matter of surprise that they should have done so under the circumstances recorded in the Gospels. HOSE'A (הוֹשֵׁעַ [help, deliverance, Ges.; or, God is help, Fürst]: Ὡσηέ, LXX.; Ὡσηέ, N. T. [in Tisch. ed. 7, but Ὡσηέ, Elz., Lachm.]: Osee), son of Beeri, and first of the Minor Prophets as they appear in the A. V. The name is precisely the same as HOSHEA, which is more nearly equivalent to the Hebrew.

Time. — This question must be settled, as far as it can be settled, partly by reference to the title, partly by an inquiry into the contents of the book. (a.) As regards the title, an attempt has been made to put it out of court by representing it as a later addition (Calmet, Rosenmüller, Jahn). But it can easily be shown that this is unnecessary; and Eichhorn, suspicious as he ordinarily is of titles, lets that of Hosea pass without question. It has been most unreasonably inferred from this title that it intends to describe the prophetic life of Hosea as extending over the entire reigns of the monarchs whom it mentions as his contemporaries. Starting with this hypothesis, it is easy to show that these reigns, including as they do upwards of a century, are an impossible period for the duration of a prophet's ministry. But the title does not necessarily imply any such absurdity; and interpreted in the light of the prophecy itself it admits of an obvious and satisfactory limitation. For the beginning of Hosea's ministry the title gives us the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, but limits this vague definition by reference to Jeroboam II., king of Israel. The title therefore gives us Uzziah, and more definitely gives us Uzziah as contemporary with Jeroboam; it therefore yields a date not later than B. C. 783. The question then arises how much further back it is possible to place the first public appearance of Hosea. To this question the title gives no answer; for it seems evident that the only reason for mentioning Jeroboam at all may have been to indicate a certain portion of the reign of Uzziah. (b.) Accordingly it is necessary to refer to the contents of the prophecy; and in doing this Eichhorn has clearly shown that we cannot allow Hosea much ground in the reign of Jeroboam (823–783). The book contains descriptions which are utterly inapplicable to the condition of the kingdom of Israel during this reign (2 K. xiv. 25 ff.). The pictures of social and political life which Hosea draws so forcibly are rather applicable to the interregnum which followed the death of Jeroboam (782–772), and to the reign of the succeeding kings. The calling in of Egypt and Assyria to the aid of rival factions (x. 3, xiii. 10) has nothing to do with the strong and able government of Jeroboam. Nor is it conceivable that a prophet who had lived long under Jeroboam should have omitted the mention of that monarch's conquests in his enumeration of Jehovah's kindnesses to Israel (ii. 8). It seems then almost certain that very few at least of his prophecies were written until after the death of Jeroboam (783).

So much for the beginning; as regards the end of his career the title leaves us in still greater doubt. It merely assures us that he did not prophesy beyond the reign of Hezekiah. But here again the contents of the book help us to reduce the vagueness of this indication. In the sixth year of Hezekiah the prophecy of Hosea was fulfilled, and it is very improbable that he should have permitted this triumphant proof of his Divine mission to pass unnoticed. He could not therefore have lived long into the reign of Hezekiah; and as it does not seem necessary to allow more than a year of each reign to justify his being represented as a contemporary on the one hand of Jeroboam, on the other of Hezekiah, we may suppose that the life, or rather the prophetic career of Hosea, extended from 784 to 725, a period of fifty-nine years.

The Hebrew reckoning of ninety years (Corn. à Lap.) was probably limited by the fulfillment of the prophecy in the sixth of Hezekiah, and by the date of the accession of Uzziah, as apparently indicated by the title: 809–720, or 719 = 90 years.

Place. — There seems to be a general impression among commentators that the prophecies contained in this collection were delivered in the kingdom of Israel, for whose warning they were principally intended. Eichhorn does not attempt to decide this question (iv. 284). He thinks it possible that they may have been primarily communicated to Judah, as an indirect appeal to the conscience of that kingdom; but he evidently leans toward the opposite supposition that having been first published in Israel they were collected, and a copy sent into Judah. The title is at least an evidence that at a very early period these prophecies were supposed to concern both Israel and Judah, and, unless we allow them to have been transmitted from the one to the other, it is difficult to account for their presence in our canon. As a proof of their northern origin Eichhorn professes to discover a Samaritanism in the use of אַךְ as masc. suff. of the second person.

Tribe and Parentage. — Tribe quite unknown. The Pseudo-Epiphanius, it is uncertain upon what ground, assigns Hosea to the tribe of Issachar. His father, Beeri, has by some writers been confounded with Beerah, of the tribe of Reuben (1 Chr. v. 6): this is an anachronism. The Jewish fancy that all prophets whose birth-place is not specified are to be referred to Jerusalem (R. David, Vatab.) is probably nothing more than a fancy (Corn. à Lap.). Of his father Beeri we know absolutely nothing. Allegorical interpretations of the name, marvelous for their frivolous ingenuity, have been adduced to prove that he was a prophet (Jerome ad Zeph. init.; Basil ad Is. i.); but they are as little trustworthy as the Jewish dogma, which decides that, when the father of a prophet is mentioned by name, the individual so specified was himself a prophet.

Order in the Prophetic series. — Most ancient and mediæval interpretators make Hosea the first of the prophets; their great argument being an old rendering of i. 2, according to which "the beginning of the word by Hosea" implies that the streams of prophetic inspiration began with him, as distinct from the other prophets. Modern commentators have rejected this interpretation, and substituted the obvious meaning that the particular prophecy which follows was the first communicated by God to Hosea. The consensus for some time seems to have been for the third place. Wall (Crit. Not. O. T.) gives Jonah, Joel, Hosea; Horne's Table gives Jonah, Amos, Hosea; Gesenius writes Joel, Amos, Hosea. The order adopted in the Hebrew and the Versions is of little consequence.

In short, there is great difficulty in arranging these prophets: as far as titles go, Amos is Hosea's only rival; but 2 K. xiv. 25 goes far to show that they must both yield to Jonah. It is perhaps more important to know that Hosea must have been more or less contemporary with Isaiah, Amos, Jonah, Joel, and Nahum.

Division of the Book. — It is easy to recognize two great divisions, which accordingly have been generally adopted: (1.) chap. i. to iii.; (2.) iv. to end.

The subdivision of these several parts is a work of greater difficulty: that of Eichhorn will be found to be based upon a highly subtle, though by no means precarious criticism.

(1.) According to him the first division should be subdivided into three separate poems, each originating in a distinct aim, and each after its own fashion attempting to express the idolatry of Israel by imagery borrowed from the matrimonial relation. The first, and therefore the least elaborate of these is contained in chap. iii., the second in i. 2–11, the third in i. 2–9, and ii. 1–23. These three are progressively elaborate developments of the same reiterated idea. Chap. i. 2–9 is common to the second and third poems, but not repeated with each severally (iv. 273 ff.). (2.) Attempts have been made by Wells, Eichhorn, etc., to subdivide the second part of the book. These divisions are made either according to reigns of contemporary kings, or according to the subject-matter of the poem. The former course has been adopted by Wells, who gets five, the latter by Eichhorn, who gets sixteen poems out of this part of the book.

These prophecies — so scattered, so unconnected that Bishop Lowth has compared them with the leaves of the Sibyl — were probably collected by Hosea himself towards the end of his career.

Hosea's marriage with Gomer. — This passage (i. 2 foll.) is the vexata quæstio of the book. Of course it has its literal and its allegorical interpreters. For the literal view we have the majority of the fathers, and of the ancient and mediæval commentators. There is some little doubt about Jerome, who speaks of a figurative and typical interpretation: but he evidently means the word typical in the proper sense as applied to a factual reality figuratively representative of something else (Corn. à Lap.) At the period of the Reformation the allegorical interpreters could only boast the Chaldee Paraphrase, some few Rabbins, and the Hermeneutic school of Origen. Soon afterwards the theory obtained a vigorous supporter in Junius, and more recently has been adopted by the bulk of modern commentators. Both views are embarrassed by serious inconveniences, though it would seem that those which beset the literal theory are the more formidable. One question which sprang out of the literal view was whether the connection between Hosea and Gomer was marriage, or fornication. Another question which followed immediately upon the preceding was "an Deus possit dispensare ut fornicatio sit licita." This latter question was much discussed by the schoolmen, and by the Thomists it was avowed in the affirmative. But, notwithstanding the difficulties besetting the literal interpretation, Bishops Horsley and Lowth have declared in its favor. Eichhorn sees all the weight on the side of the literal interpretation, and shows that marrying a harlot is not necessarily implied by אֵשֶׁת זְנוּנִים, which may very well imply a wife who after marriage becomes an adulteress, though chaste before. In favor of the literal theory, he also observes the unfitness of a wife unchaste before marriage to be a type of Israel.

Style. — "Commaticus," Jerome. "Osea quanto profundius loquitur, tanto operosius penetratur," August. Obscure brevity seems to be the characteristic quality of Hosea; and all commentators agree that "of all the prophets he is, in point of language, the most obscure and hard to be understood" (Henderson, Minor Prophets, p. 2). Eichhorn is of opinion that he has never been adequately translated, and in fact could not be translated into any European language. He compares him to a bee flying from flower to flower, to a painter reveling in strong and glaring colors, to a tree that wants pruning. Horsley detects another important specialty in pointing out the excessively local and individual tone of these prophecies, which above all others he declares to be intensely Jewish.

Hosea's obscurity has been variously accounted for. Lowth attributes it to the fact that the extant poems are but a sparse collection of compositions scattered over a great number of years (Præl. xxi.) Horsley (Pref.) makes this obscurity individual and peculiar; and certainly the heart of the prophet seems to have been so full and fiery that it might well burst through all restraints of diction (Eichhorn).

T. E. B.

* That Hosea exercised the prophetic office in Israel, and in all probability was born there and not in Judah, is the general view of scholars at present. The almost exclusive reference of his messages to that kingdom is a sufficient ground for this opinion: for the prophets very seldom after the separation of the ten tribes left their own part of the country for another, as appears the more strongly from the exceptional character which the mission, for example, of Elijah and Amos to both kingdoms is represented as having in their respective histories. But though we are to rely on this as the main argument, we may concede someth ing to other considerations. Hosea shows, undeniably, a special familiarity with localities in the territory of Ephraim, as Gilead, Mizpah, Tabor, Gibeah, Gilgal, Beth-Aven, Samaria, and others (see iv. 15, v. 18, vi. 8, x. 5, 7, xii. 11, &c.). His diction also partakes of the roughness, and here and there of the Aramæan coloring, of the north-Palestine writers. For a list of words or forms of words more or less peculiar to Hosea see Keil's Einleitung in das A. T. p. 276. Hävernick has shown that the grounds for ascribing to him a south-Palestine extraction are wholly untenable (Handb. der Einl. in das A. Test. ii. 277 ff.). It may excite surprise, it is true, that Hosea mentions in the title of his book (the genuineness of which there is no reason for doubting) four kings of Judah, and only one of Israel. It is a possible explanation of this that the prophet after the termination of his more public ministry may have withdrawn from Ephraim to Judah, and there collected and published his writings (see Bleek, Einl. in das A. Test. p. 523). Dr. Pusey finds a deeper reason for this preëminence given to the Judæan dynasty. "The kingdom of Judah was the kingdom of the theocracy, the line of David to which the promises of God were made. As Elisha . . . . turned away from Jehoram (2 K. iii. 13, 14) saying 'Get thee to the prophets of thy father and to the prophets of thy mother,' and owned Jehoshaphat king of Judah only, so in the title of his prophecy Hosea at once expresses that the kingdom of Judah was legitimate" (Hosea, p. 7). The book at all events was soon known among the people of Judah; for the kingdom of Israel did not continue long after the time of Hosea, and Jeremiah certainly had a knowledge of Hosea, as is evident from various expressions and illustrations common to him and that prophet. (On this latter point see especially Kueper, Jeremias Libr. Sacr. Interpres atque Vindex, pp. 67–71).

No portion of this difficult writer has occasioned so much discussion as that relating to Hosea's marriage with Gomer, "a wife of whoredoms" and the names of the children Jezreel and Lo-ruhamah, the fruit of that marriage (i. 2 ff.). From the earliest period some have maintained the literal and others the figurative interpretation of this narrative. For a history of the different opinions, the student may consult Marck's Dietribe de Uxore Fornicationum qua exponitur fere integrum cap. i. Hoseæ (Leyden, 1696), and reprinted in his Comm. in XII. Prophetas Minores (Tübing. 1734). It is difficult to see how the transaction can be defended on grounds of morality, if it be understood as an outward one. It has been said that when "Scripture relates that a thing was done, and that with the names of persons," we must conclude that it is "to be taken as literally true." The principle thus stated is not a correct one: for in the parable acts are related and names often applied to the actors, and yet the literal sense is not the true one. The question in reality is not whether we are to accept the prophet's meaning in this instance, but what the meaning is which the prophet intended to convey, and which he would have us accept as the intended meaning. Further, aside from this question of the morality or immorality of the proceeding, it is impossible to see in it any adaptation to the prophet's object above that of the parabolic representation of a case assumed for the purpose of illustration. The circumstances, if they occurred in a literal sense, must extend over a series of years; they could have been known to the people only by the prophet's own rehearsal of them, and hence could have had the force only of his own personal testimony and explanation of their import. Hengstenberg (Christology, i. 177, Edinburgh, 1854) has stated very forcibly the manifold difficulties, exegetical and moral, which lie against our supposing that Hosea was instructed to form a marriage so disreputable and repulsive, and at variance with explicit promulgations of the Mosaic code (e. g. Lev. xxi. 7). At the same time this writer, while he denies that the marriage, the wife's adultery and the birth of the "children of whoredoms" (ii. 4) took place outwardly and literally, maintains that they took place inwardly and actually as a sort of vision; thus serving to impress the facts more strongly on the mind and enabling him to describe them with greater effect. He is very earnest to make something of the difference between this view and that of a symbolic or parabolic use of marriage as a type both in the sacredness of its relations and the criminality of its violations of the covenant between Jehovah and his people; but the line of distinction is not a very palpable one. To regard the acts as mentally performed in a sense different from that of their being objects of thought simply, would be going altogether too far. The idea of the ingenious writer may be that the vision, which is subjective as distinguished from an outward occurrence, is at the same time objective to the prophet as that which he inwardly beholds. Prof. Cowles offers two or three suggestions to relieve this difficult question of some of its embarrassment (according to the literal theory) in his Minor Prophets, pp. 3, 4, 413–415.

Dr. Pusey assigns 70 years to the period of Hosea's ministry. He draws a fearful picture of the corruption of the times in which the prophet lived, derived partly from Hosea's own declarations, and partly from those of his contemporary, Amos. "The course of iniquity had been run. The stream had become darker and darker in its downward flow. . . . Every commandment of God was broken, and that, habitually. All was falsehood, adultery, bloodshedding; deceit to God produced faithlessness to man; excess and luxury were supplied by secret or open robbery, oppression, false dealing, perversion of justice, grinding of the poor. Blood was shed like water, until one stream met another, and overspread the land with one defiling deluge. Adultery was consecrated as an act of religion. Those who were first in rank were first in excess. People and king vied in debauchery, and the sottish king joined and encouraged the free-thinkers and blasphemers of his court. The idolatrous priest loved and shared in the sins of the people; nay, they seem to have set themselves to intercept those on either side of Jordan, who would go to worship at Jerusalem, laying wait to murder them. Corruption had spread throughout the whole land; even the places once sacred through God's revelations or other mercies to their forefathers, Bethel, Gilgal, Gilead, Mizpah, Shechem, were especial scenes of corruption or of sin. Every holy memory was effaced by present corruption. Could things be worse? There was one aggravation more. Remonstrance was useless: the knowledge of God was willfully rejected; the people hated rebuke; the more they were called, the more they refused: they forbade their prophets to prophesy; and their false prophets hated God greatly. All attempts to heal all this disease only showed its incurableness" (Hosea, p. 3).

The same writer traces the obscurity which many have found in Hosea, to the "solemn pathos" for which he is distinguished. The expression of St. Jerome has often been repeated; "Hosea is concise, and speaketh, as it were, in detached sayings." The words of upbraiding, of judgment, of woe, burst out, as it were, one by one, slowly, heavily, condensed, abrupt, from the prophet's heavy and shrinking soul, as God commanded and constrained him, and put His words, like fire, in the prophet's mouth. An image of Him who said, 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, and ye would not,' he delivers his message, as though each sentence burst with a groan from his soul, and he had anew to take breath, before he uttered each renewed woe. Each verse forms a whole for itself, like one heavy toll in a funeral knell. The prophet has not been careful about order and symmetry, so that each sentence went home to the soul. And yet the unity of the prophecy is so evident in the main, that we cannot doubt that it is not broken, even when the connection is not apparent on the surface. The great difficulty consequently in Hosea is to ascertain that connection in places where it evidently exists, yet where the Prophet has not explained it. The easiest and simplest sentences are sometimes, in this respect, the most difficult."

Literature. — Some of the helps have been incidentally noticed in the addition which precedes. See under AMOS and HABAKKUK for the more important general works which include Hosea. Of the separate works on this prophet the following may be mentioned: Pocock, the celebrated orientalist and traveller, Comment. on Hosea, 1685; Manger, Comment. in Hoseam, 1782, perhaps unequaled for the tact and discrimination with which he unfolds the spirit and religious teachings of the prophet; Kuinoel, Hoseæ Oracula Hebr. et Lat. Annotatione illustravit, 1792; Bishop Horsley, Hosea, translated from the Hebrew, with Notes explanatory and critical, 2d ed., Lond. 1804; J. C. Stuck. Hoseas Prophetæ: Introductionem præmisit, vertit, commentatus est, 1828, who regards the symbolic acts in chaps. i. and iii. as real events or facts; Simson, Der Prophet Hosea erklärt u. übersetzt, with a copious history of the interpretation, 1851; Drake, Notes on Hosea, Cambr. (Eng.), 1853; and August Wünsche, Der Prophet Hosea übersetzt u. erklärt, 1868 (erste Hälfte, as far as chap. vii. 6, pp. i.–xxxii. and 1–288), in which he has made special use of the Targums, and of the Jewish interpreters Rashi, Aben Ezra, and David Kimchi. Dr. Pusey's Commentary on this prophet (in pt. i. of his Minor Prophets) deserves to be characterized as learned, devout, and practical. It contains passages of great beauty and suggestiveness. In his pages Hosea still lives, and his teachings are for our times as well as for his own. All that is Jewish is not found in Judaism, nor all that is heathenish found in heathendom.

Lübkert (Symbolische Handlung Hosea's in the Theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1835, pp. 647–656) maintains the parabolic view of the Gomer-marriage question. Umbreit's article Hosea (Herzog's Real-Encyk. vi. 267–275) is to some extent exegetical as well as biographical. Stanley's interesting sketch portrays Hosea as "the Jeremiah of Israel" and "the only individual character that stands out amidst the darkness of . . . nearly the whole of the last century of the northern kingdom" (Jewish Church, ii. 409 f.).

The Christology of Hosea is not without difficulties. One passage only, namely, that foretelling the conversion of the heathen (ii. 23 and comp. i 10) is cited in the N. T. as explicitly Messianic (Rom. ix. 25; 1 Pet. ii. 10). But it is a false principle of interpretation that only those portions of the O. T. refer to Christ which are expressly recognized as having that character in the New Testament. The N. T. writers represent the Redeemer as the great subject of the ancient economy; and if only those types and predictions relate to him which are cited and applied in that manner, it is difficult to see how the Hebrew Scriptures can justly have ascribed to them such a character of predominant reference to the Christian economy. In regard to such Gospel prophecies in Hosea, the reader may consult (in addition to the Commentaries) Hengstenberg's Christology of the O. T. i. 158–285 (Edinb. ed.); Hofmann's Weissagung u. Erfüllung, i. 206 f.; Tholuck's Die Propheten u. ihre Weissagungen, pp. 193, 197, 206; and Stähelin's Die Messianischen Weissagungen des A. T. p. 35 ff.

All these writers do not recognize the same passages as significant, nor the same as significant in the same degree. H.

* HOSEN (plural of hose) Dan. iii. 21 (A. V.), is the translation of a Chaldee word which signifies tunics [DRESS, p. 624 a]. Hosen formerly denoted any covering for the legs, short trowsers or trunk-hose as well as stockings. See examples of this usage in Eastwood and Wright's Bible Word-Book, p. 257. H.

HOSHA'IAH [3 syl.] (הוֹשַׁעְיָה [whom Jehovah saved]: Osaias). 1. (Ὡσαΐα.) A man who assisted in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem after it had been rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 32). He led the princes (שָׂרֵי) of Judah in the procession, but whether himself one of them we are not told.

2. (Μαασαίας; [Alex. Μασαιας; FA.[1] Ἀνναναιας, Μασεας.] The father of a certain Jezaniah, or Azariah, who was a man of note after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xlii. 1, xliii. 2).

HOSH'AMA (הוֹשָׁמָע [whom Jehovah hears]: Ὡσαμάθ; [Vat. -μαθ:] Alex. Ιωσαμώ; [Comp. Ὡσαμά:] Sama), one of the sons of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, the last king of Judah but one (1 Chr. iii. 18). It is worthy of notice that, in the narrative of the capture of Jeconiah by Nebuchadnezzar, though the mother and the wives of the king are mentioned, nothing is said about his sons (2 K. xxiv. 12, 15). In agreement with this is the denunciation of him as a childless man in Jer. xxii. 30. There is good reason for suspecting some confusion in the present state of the genealogy of the royal family in 1 Chr. iii.; and these facts would seem to confirm it.

HOSHE'A (הוֹשֵׁעַ [help, or God is help: see Fürst]: Ὡσηέ: Osee), the nineteenth, last, and best king of Israel. He succeeded Pekah, whom he slew in a successful conspiracy, thereby fulfilling a prophecy of Isaiah (Is. vii. 16). Although Josephus calls Hoshea a friend of Pekah (φίλος τινὸς ἐπιβουλεύσαντος αὐτῷ, Ant. ix. 13, § 1), we have no ground for calling this "a treacherous murder" (Prideaux, i. 16). It took place B. C. 737, "in the 20th year of Jotham" (2 K. xv. 30), i. e. "in the 20th year after Jotham became sole king," for he only reigned 16 years (2 K. xv. 33). But there must have been an interregnum of at least eight years before Hoshea came to the throne, which was not till B. C. 729, in the 12th year of Ahaz (2 K. xvii. 1: we cannot, with Clericus [Le Clerc], read 4th for 12th in this verse, because of 2 K. xviii. 9). This is the simplest way of reconciling the apparent discrepancy between the passages, and has been adopted by Ussher, Des Vignoles, Fiele, etc. (Winer, s. v. Hoseas). The other methods suggested by Hitzig, Lightfoot, etc., are mostly untenable (Keil on 2 K. xv. 30).

It is expressly stated (2 K. xvii. 2) that Hoshea was not so sinful as his predecessors. According to the Rabbis this superiority consisted in his removing from the frontier cities the guards placed there by his predecessors to prevent their subjects from worshipping at Jerusalem (Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 22, quoted by Prideaux, i. 16), and in his not hindering the Israelites from accepting the invitation of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxx. 10), nor checking their zeal against idolatry (ib. xxxi. 1). This encomium, however, is founded on the untenable supposition that Hezekiah's passover preceded the fall of Samaria [HEZEKIAH], and we must be content with the general fact that Hoshea showed a more theocratic spirit than the former kings of Israel. The compulsory cessation of the calf-worship may have removed his greatest temptation, for Tiglath-Pileser had carried off the golden calf from Dan some years before (Sed. Ol. Rab. 22), and that at Bethel was taken away by Shalmaneser in his first invasion (2 K. xvii. 3; Hos. x. 14; Prideaux, l. c.). But, whatever may have been his excellences, he still "did evil in the sight of the Lord," and it was too late to avert retribution by any improvements.

In the third year of his reign (B. C. 726) Shalmaneser, impelled probably by mere thirst of conquest, came against him, cruelly stormed the strong caves of Beth-arbel (Hos. x. 14), and made Israel tributary (2 K. xvii. 3) for three years. At the end of this period, encouraged perhaps by the revolt of Hezekiah, Hoshea entered into a secret alliance with So, king of Egypt (who was either the Σεύεχος of Manetho, and son of Σαβακῶς, Herod. ii. 137; Keil, Vitringa, Gesenius, etc.; Jahn, Hebr. Com. § xl.; or else Sabaco himself, Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 139; Ewald, Gesch. iii. 610), to throw off the Assyrian yoke. The alliance did him no good; it was revealed to the court of Nineveh by the Assyrian party in Ephraim, and Hoshea was immediately seized as a rebellious vassal, shut up in prison, and apparently treated with the utmost indignity (Mic. v. 1). If this happened before the siege (2 K. xvii. 4), we must account for it either by supposing that Hoshea, hoping to dissemble and gain time, had gone to Shalmaneser to account for his conduct, or that he had been defeated and taken prisoner in some unrecorded battle. That he disappeared very suddenly, like "foam upon the water," we may infer from Hos. xiii. 11, x. 7. The siege of Samaria lasted three years; for that "glorious and beautiful" city was strongly situated like "a crown of pride" among her hills (Is. xxviii. 1-5). During the course of the siege Shalmaneser must have died, for it is certain that Samaria was taken by his successor Sargon, who thus laconically describes the event in his annals: "Samaria I looked at, I captured; 27,280 men (families?) who dwelt in it I carried away. I constructed fifty chariots in their country . . . I appointed a governor over them, and continued upon them the tribute of th former people" (Botta, 145, 11, quoted by Dr Hincks, Journ. of Sacr. Lit. Oct. 1858; Layard, Nin. and Bab. i. 148). This was probably B. C. 721 or 720. For the future history of the unhappy Ephraimites, the places to which they were transplanted by the policy of their conqueror and his officer, "the great and noble Asnapper" (Ezr. iv. 10), and the nations by which they were superseded, see SAMARIA. Of the subsequent fortunes of Hoshea we know nothing. He came to the throne too late, and governed a kingdom torn to pieces by foreign invasion and intestine broils. Sovereign after sovereign had fallen by the dagger of the assassin; and we see from the dark and terrible delineations of the contemporary prophets [HOSEA, MICAH, ISAIAH], that murder and idolatry, drunkenness and lust, had eaten like "an inourable wound" (Mic. i. 9) into the inmost heart of the national morality. Ephraim was dogged to its ruin by the apostate policy of the renegade who had asserted its independence (2 K. xvii.; Joseph. Ant. ix. 14; Prideaux, i. 15 ff.; Keil, On Kings, ii. 50 ff., Engl. ed.; Jahn, Hebr. Com. § xl.; Ewald, Gesch. iii. 607-613; Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. chap. ix., Engl. transl.; Rawlinson, Herod. i. 149).

HOSHE'A (הוֹשֵׁעַ = help [see above]). The name is precisely the same as that of the prophet known to us as HOSEA. 1. The son of Nun, i. e. Joshua (Deut. xxxii. 44; and also in Num. xiii. 8, though there the A. V. has OSHEA). It was probably his original name, to which the Divine name of Jah was afterwards added — Jehoshua, Joshua — "Jehovah's help." The LXX. in this passage miss the distinction, and have Ἰησοῦς: Vulg. Josue.

2. (Ὡσή: Osee.) Son of Azaziah (1 Chr. xxvii. 20); like his great namesake, a man of Ephraim, ruler (nagid) of his tribe in the time of king David.

3. (Ὡσηέ; [Vat. FA. Ωσηθα:] Osee.) One of the heads of the "people" — i. e. the laymen — who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 23).

HOSPITALITY. The rites of hospitality are to be distinguished from the customs prevailing in the entertainment of guests [FOOD; MEALS], and from the laws and practices relating to charity, almsgiving, etc.; and they are thus separately treated, as far as possible, in this article.

Hospitality was regarded by most nations of the ancient world as one of the chief virtues, and especially by peoples of the Semitic stock; but that it was not characteristic of the latter alone is amply shown by the usages of the Greeks, and even the Romans. Race undoubtedly influences its exercise, and it must also be ascribed in no small degree to the social state of a nation. Thus the desert tribes have always placed the virtue higher in their esteem than the townsfolk of the same descent as themselves; and in our own day, though an Arab townsman is hospitable, he entertains different notions on the subject from the Arab of the desert (the Bedawee). The former has fewer opportunities of showing his hospitality; and when he does so, he does it not as much with the feeling of discharging an obligatory act as a social and civilized duty

With the advance of civilization the calls of hospitality become less and less urgent. The dweller in the wilderness, however, finds the entertainment of wayfarers to be a part of his daily life, and that to refuse it is to deny a common humanity. Viewed in this light, the notions of the Greeks and the Romans must be appreciated as the recognition of the virtue where its necessity was not of the urgent character that it possesses in the more primitive lands of the East. The ancient Egyptians resembled the Greeks; but, with a greater exclusiveness, they limited their entertainments to their own countrymen, being constrained by the national and priestly abhorrence and dread of foreigners. This exclusion throws some obscurity on their practices in the discharge of hospitality; but otherwise their customs in the entertainment of guests resembled those well known to classical scholars — customs probably derived in a great measure from Egypt.

While hospitality is acknowledged to have been a wide-spread virtue in ancient times, we must concede that it flourished chiefly among the race of Shem. The O. T. abounds with illustrations of the divine command to use hospitality, and of the strong national belief in its importance; so too the writings of the N. T.; and though the Eastern Jews of modern times dare not entertain a stranger lest he be an enemy, and the long oppression they have endured has begotten that greed of gain that has made their name a proverb, the ancient hospitality still lives in their hearts. The desert, however, is yet free; it is as of old a howling wilderness; and hospitality is as necessary and as freely given as in patriarchal times. Among the Arabs we find the best illustrations of the old Bible narratives, and among them see traits that might beseem their ancestor Abraham.

The laws respecting strangers (Lev. xix. 33, 34) and the poor (Lev. xxv. 14 ff.; Deut. xv. 7), and concerning redemption (Lev. xxv. 23 ff.), etc., are framed in accordance with the spirit of hospitality; and the strength of the national feeling regarding it is shown in the incidental mentions of its practice. In the Law, compassion to strangers is constantly enforced by the words, "for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (as Lev. xix. 34). And before the Law, Abraham's entertainment of the angels (Gen. xviii. 1 ff.), and Lot's (xix. 1), are in exact agreement with its precepts and with modern usage. So Moses was received by Jethro, the priest of Midian, who reproached his daughters, though he believed him to be an Egyptian, saying, "And where is he? why is it [that] ye have left the man? call him, that he may eat bread" (Ex. ii. 20). The story of Joseph's hospitality to his brethren, although he knew them to be such, appears to be narrated as an ordinary occurrence; and in like manner Pharaoh received Jacob with a liberality not merely dictated by his relationship to the savior of Egypt. Like Abraham, "Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord, I pray thee let us detain thee until we shall have made ready a kid for thee" (Judg. xiii. 15); and like Lot, the old man of Gibeah sheltered the Levite when he saw him, "a wayfaring man in the street of the city: and the old man said, Whither goest thou? and whence comest thou? . . Peace be with thee, howsoever [let] all thy wants [lie] upon me; only lodge not in the street. So he brought him into his house, and gave provender unto the asses; and they washed their feet, and did eat and drink" (Judg. xix. 17, 20, 21).

In the N. T. hospitality is yet more markedly enjoined; and in the more civilized state of society which then prevailed, its exercise became more a social virtue than a necessity of patriarchal life.[a] The good Samaritan stands for all ages as an example of Christian hospitality, embodying the command to love one's neighbor as himself; and our Lord's charge to the disciples strengthened that command: "He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. . . . And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water [only], in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in nowise lose his reward" (Matt. x. 42). The neglect of Christ is symbolized by inhospitality to our neighbors, in the words, "I was a stranger and ye took me not in" (Matt. xxv. 43). The Apostles urged the church to "follow after hospitality," using the forcible words τὴν φιλοξενίαν διώκοντες (Rom. xii. 13; cf. 1 Tim. v. 10); to remember Abraham's example, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares" (Heb. xiii. 2); to "use hospitality one to another without grudging" (1 Pet. iv. 9); while a bishop must be a "lover of hospitality" (Tit. i. 8, cf. 1 Tim. iii. 2). The practice of the early Christians was in accord with these precepts. They had all things in common, and their hospitality was a characteristic of their belief.

If such has been the usage of Biblical times, it is in the next place important to remark how hospitality was shown. In the patriarchal ages we may take Abraham's example as the most fitting, as we have of it the fullest account; and by the light of Arab custom we may see, without obscurity, his hasting to the tent door to meet his guests, with the words, "My lord, if now I have found favor in thy sight, pass not away, I pray thee, from thy servant: let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree, and I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts." "And," to continue the narrative in the vigorous language of the A. V., "Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead [it], and make cakes upon the hearth. And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good, and gave [it] unto a young man, and he hasted to dress it. And he took butter and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set [it] before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat." A traveller in the eastern desert may see, through the vista of ages, this far-off example in its living traces. Mr. Lane's remarks on this narrative and the general subject of this article are too apposite to be omitted: he says, "Hospitality is a virtue for which the natives of the East in general are highly and deservedly admired; and the people of Egypt are well entitled to commendation on this account. A word which signifies literally 'a person on a journey' (musáfir) is the term most commonly employed in this country in the sense of a visitor or guest. There are very few persons here who would think of sitting down to a meal, if there was a stranger in the house, without inviting him to partake of it, unless the latter were a menial, in which case he would be invited to eat with the servants. It would be considered a shameful violation of good manners if a Muslim abstained from ordering the table to be prepared at the usual time because a visitor happened to be present. Persons of the middle classes in this country [Egypt], if living in a retired situation, sometimes take their supper before the door of their house, and invite every passenger of respectable appearance to eat with them.[a] This is very commonly done among the lower orders. In cities and large towns claims on hospitality are unfrequent, as there are many *wekáleh*s or khans, where strangers may obtain lodging; and food is very easily procured: but in the villages travellers are often lodged and entertained by the Sheykh or some other inhabitant: and if the guest be a person of the middle or higher classes, or even not very poor, he gives a present to the host's servants, or to the host himself. In the desert, however, a present is seldom received from a guest. By a Sunneh law a traveller may claim entertainment, of any person able to afford it to him, for three days. The account of Abraham's entertaining the three angels, related in the Bible, presents a perfect picture of the manner in which a modern Bedawee sheykh receives travellers arriving at his encampment. He immediately orders his wife or women to make bread, slaughters a sheep or some other animal, and dresses it in haste, and bringing milk and any other provisions that he may have ready at hand, with the bread and the meat which he has dressed, sets them before his guests. If these be persons of high rank, he stands by them while they eat, as Abraham did in the case above alluded to. Most Bedawees will suffer almost any injury to themselves or their families rather than allow their guests to be ill-treated while under their protection. There are Arabs who even regard the chastity of their wives as not too precious to be sacrificed for the gratification of their guests (see Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins, etc., 8vo ed. i. 179, 180); and at an encampment of the Bisháreen, I ascertained that there are many persons in this great tribe (which inhabits a large portion of the desert between the Nile and the Red Sea) who offer their unmarried daughters (cf. Gen. xix. 8; Judg. xix. 24) to their guests, merely from motives of hospitality, and not for hire" (Mod. Egypt. ch. xiii.). Mr. Lane adds that there used to be a very numerous class of persons, called Tufeylees, who lived by spunging, presuming on the well-known hospitality of their countrymen, and going from house to house where entertainments were being given. The Arabs along the Syrian frontier usually pitch the sheykh's tent towards the west, that is, towards the inhabited country, to invite passengers and lodge them on their way (Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins, etc., 8vo ed. i. 33), it is held to be disgraceful to encamp in a place out of the way of travellers; and it is a custom of the Bedawees to light fires in their encampments to attract travellers, and to keep dogs who, besides watching against robbers, may in the night-time guide wayfarers to their tents. Hence a hospitable man is proverbially called "one whose dogs bark loudly."[b] Approaching an encampment, the traveller often sees several horsemen coming towards him, and striving who shall be first to claim him as a guest. The favorite national game of the Arabs before El-Islám illustrates their hospitality. It was called "Meysir," and was played with arrows, some notched and others without marks. A young camel was bought and killed, and divided into 24 portions; those who drew marked arrows had shares in proportion to the number of notches; those who drew blanks paid the cost of the camel among them. Neither party, however, ate of the flesh of the camel, which was always given to the poor, and "this they did out of pride and ostentation," says Sale, "it being reckoned a shame for a man to stand out, and not venture his money on such an occasion." Sale, however, is hardly philosophical in this remark, which concerns only the abuse of a practice originally arising from a national virtue: but Mohammed forbade the game, with all other games of chance, on the plea that it gave rise to quarrels, etc. (Sale's Preliminary Discourse, p. 96, ed. 1836, and Kur-án, ch. ii. and v.).

[a] * We see here why the inhospitality of the Samaritans excited such fierce indignation in the two disciples, James and John (Luke ix. 52 ff.). Jesus sent them at the close of the day into one of the Samaritan villages to procure a night's lodging for him; but the people refused to receive him, because he was journeying to Jerusalem. This act was not an inhospitality merely, or an inhumanity: it was an outrage against one of the most sacred of the recognized laws of oriental society. H

The oriental respect for the covenant of bread and salt, or salt alone, certainly sprang from the high regard in which hospitality was held. Even accidentally to taste another's salt imposes this obligation: and to so great an extent is the feeling carried that a thief has been known to give up his booty in obedience to it. Thus El-Leys Es-Saffár, when a robber, left his booty in the passage of the royal treasury of Sijistán; accidentally he stumbled over, and, in the dark, tasted a lump of rock-salt: his respect for his covenant gained his pardon, and he became the founder of a royal dynasty (Lane's Thousand and One Nights, ch. xv. note 21). The Arab peculiarity was carried into Spain by the so-called Moors.

For the customs of the Greeks and Romans in the entertainment of guests, and the exercise of hospitality generally, the reader is referred to the Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Hospitium. They are incidentally illustrated by passages in the N. T., but it is difficult to distinguish between those so derived, and the native oriental customs which, as we have said, are very similar. To one of the customs of classical antiquity a reference is supposed to exist in Rev. ii. 17: "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a

[a] "It is said to have been a custom of some of the Barmekees (the family so renowned for their generosity) to keep open house during the hours of meals, and to allow no one who applied at such times for admission to be repulsed" (Lane's Thousand and One Nights, ch. v. note 97).

[b] The time of entertainment, according to the precept of Mohammed, is three days, and he permitted a guest to take this right by force; although one day and one night is the period of the host's being "kind" to him (Mishkat el-Musábeeh, ii. 329, cited in Lane's Thousand and One Nights, Intr. note 13). Burckhardt (Notes on the Bedouins, etc., i. 178, 179, cite in the same note) says that a stranger without friend in a camp alights at the first tent, where the women, in the absence of the owner, provide for his refreshment. After the lapse of three days and four hours he must, if he would avoid censure, either assist in household duties, or claim hospitality at another tent.

new name written, which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth [it]." E. S. P.

* HOST (Luke x. 35). [HOSPITALITY; INN.]

* HOSTAGE. The practice of giving and receiving persons, to be retained as security for the observance of public treaties or engagements, is indicated in 2 Kings xiv. 14, and 2 Chr. xxv. 24. It is said there that Joash after his victory over Amaziah took with him hostages (בְּנֵי הַתַּעֲרֻבוֹת) upon his return to his own kingdom. D. S. T.

HOTHAM (חוֹתָם [signet-ring]: Χωθάν; Alex. [Ald.] Χωθάμ: Hotham), a man of Asher; son of Heber, of the family of Beriah (1 Chr. vii. 32).

HOTHAN (חוֹתָם, i. e. HOTHAM: Χωθάμ; [Vat.] Alex. Χωθαν; [FA. Κωθαν:] Hotham), a man of Aroer, father of Shama and Jehiel, two of the heroes of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 44). The substitution of Hothan for Hotham is an error which has been retained from the edition of 1611 [following the Bishops' Bible] till now. (Comp. the rendering of the LXX. both of this and the preceding name.)

HOTHIR (חוֹתִיר [fullness]: Ὠθηρί; Vat. Ωθηρει, Hθει; Alex. Ιωεθιρι, [Ιεθιρι:] Othir), the 13th son of HEMAN "the king's seer" (1 Chr. xxv. 4), and therefore a Kohathite Levite. He had the charge of the twenty-first course of the musicians in the service of the tabernacle (xxv. 28).

* Some think that this name and the names of four of Heman's other sons (Giddalti, Romamtiezer, Mallothi, Hothir, Mahazioth) formed a verse of some ancient prophetic saying. They follow each other in the list, 1 Chr. xxv. 4 (except the omission of Joshbekashah), so as to make this couplet: —

גִּדַּלְתִּי רוֹמַמְתִּי עֶזֶר
מַלּוֹתִי הוֹתִיר מַהֲזִיאוֹת

I have magnified and exalted help;
I have declared in abundance visions.

Fürst says (Hebr. u. Chald. Wörterb. i. 244), that the rhythm of the words favors this view. Ewald refers to this case as a remarkable illustration of the use of significant or symbolic personal names among the Hebrews (Lehrbuch der Hebr. Sprache, p. 502, 5te Ausg.). [NAMES, Amer. ed.] It should be said that according to this theory ezer belongs to both the preceding verbs, and makes of them two compound names, instead of one, as in the A. V. H.

* HOUGH (Josh. xi. 6, 9; 2 Sam. viii. 4) is an obsolete word from the Anglo-Saxon hoh, and means to hamstring, i. e. to cut the back sinews, and thus disable animals. H.

HOUR (שָׁעָה, שְׁעָתָא, Chald.). This word is first found in Dan. iii. 6, iv. 19, 33, v. 5; and it occurs several times in the Apocrypha (Jud. xiv. 3, 2 Esdr. ix. 44). It seems to be a vague expression for a short period, and the frequent phrase "in the same hour" means "immediately": hence we find כְּשָׁעָה, substituted in the Targum for כְּרֶגַע, "in a moment" (Num. xvi. 21, &c.). Ὥρα is frequently used in the same way by the N. T writers (Matt. viii. 13; Luke xii. 39, &c.). It occurs in the LXX. as a rendering for various words meaning time, just as it does in Greek writers long before it acquired the specific meaning of our word "hour." Sa'th is still used in Arabic both for an hour and a moment.

The ancient Hebrews were probably unacquainted with the division of the natural day into 24 parts. The general distinctions of "morning, evening, and noonday" (Ps. lv. 17), were sufficient for them at first, as they were for the early Greeks (Hom. Il. xxi. 111); afterwards the Greeks adopted five marked periods of the day (Jul. Pollux, Onom. i. 68; Dio Chrysost. Orat. ii. de Glor.), and the Hebrews parcelled out the period between sunrise and sunset into a series of minute divisions distinguished by the sun's course [DAY], as is still done by the Arabs, who have stated forms of prayers for each period (Lane's Mod. Eg. i. ch. 3).

The early Jews appear to have divided the day into four parts (Neh. ix. 3), and the night into three watches (Judg. vii. 19) [DAY; WATCHES], and even in the N. T. we find a trace of this division in Matt. xx. 1–5. There is however no proof of the assertion, sometimes made, that ὥρα in the Gospels may occasionally mean a space of three hours.

The Greeks adopted the division of the day into 12 hours from the Babylonians (Herod. ii. 109; comp. Rawlinson, Herod. ii. p. 334). At what period the Jews became first acquainted with this way of reckoning time is unknown, but it is generally supposed that they too learnt it from the Babylonians during the Captivity (Waehner, Ant. Hebr. § v. i. 8, 9). They may have had some such division at a much earlier period, as has been inferred from the fact that Ahaz erected a sun-dial in Jerusalem, the use of which had probably been learnt from Babylon. There is however the greatest uncertainty as to the meaning of the word מַעֲלוֹת (A. V. "degrees," Is. xxxviii. 8). [DIAL.] It is strange that the Jews were not acquainted with this method of reckoning even earlier, for, although a purely conventional one, it is naturally suggested by the months in a year. Sir G. Wilkinson thinks that it arose from a less obvious cause (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 334). In whatever way originated, it was known to the Egyptians at a very early period. They had 12 hours of the day and of the night (called Nau = hour), each of which had its own genius, drawn with a star on its head. The word is said by Lepsius to be found as far back as the 5th dynasty (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 135).

There are two kinds of hours, namely, (1.) the astronomical or equinoctial hour, i. e. the 24th part of a civil day, which although "known to astronomers, was not used in the affairs of common life till towards the end of the 4th century of the Christian era" (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Hora): and (2.) the natural hour (which the Rabbis called זמניות καιρικαί or temporales), i. e. the 12th part of the natural day, or of the time between sunrise and sunset. These are the hours meant in the N. T., Josephus, and the Rabbis (John xi. 9, &c.; Jos. Ant. xiv. 4, § 3), and it must be remembered that they perpetually vary in length, so as to be very different at different times of the year. Besides this, an hour of the day would always mean a different length of time from an hour of the night, except at the equinox. From the consequent uncertainty of the term where arose the proverbial expression "not all hours are equal" (R. Joshua ap. Carpzov, App. Crit. p. 345). At the equinoxes the third hour would correspond to 9 o'clock; the sixth would always be at noon. To find the exact time meant at other seasons of the year we must know when the sun rises in Palestine, and reduce the hours to our reckoning accordingly. [DAY.] (Winer, s. v. Tag, Uhren; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 101.) What horological contrivances the Jews possessed in the time of our Lord is uncertain; but we may safely suppose that they had gnomons, dials, and clepsydræ, all of which had long been known to the Persians and other nations with whom they had come in contact. Of course the two first were inaccurate and uncertain indications, but the water-clock by ingenious modifications, according to the season of the year, became a very tolerable assistance in marking time. Mention is also made of a curious invention called עָרוֹר שָׁעָה, by which a figure was constructed so as to drop a stone into a brazen basin every hour, the sound of which was heard for a great distance and announced the time (Otho, Lex. Rab. s. v. Hora).

For the purposes of prayer the old division of the day into 4 portions was continued in the Temple service, as we see from Acts ii. 15, iii. 1, x. 9. The Jews supposed that the 3d hour had been consecrated by Abraham, the 6th by Isaac, and the 9th by Jacob (Kimchi; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. on Acts iii. 1). It is probable that the canonical hours observed by the Romanists (of which there are 8 in the 24) are derived from these Temple hours (Godwyn, Moses and Aar. iii. 9).

The Rabbis pretend that the hours were divided into 1080 חֲלָקִים (minutes), and 56,848 רְגָעִים (seconds), which numbers were chosen because they are so easily divisible (Gem. Hier. Beracoth, 2, 4, in Reland Ant. Hebr. iv. 1, § 19). F. W. F.

* Besides the various points mentioned above as forming the beginning of the day, from which the hours were reckoned, Pliny testifies (H. N. ii. 79) that among the Romans the official, religious, and civil day was reckoned from midnight to midnight. His words are: "Ipsum diem alii aliter observavere . . . vulgus omne a luce ad tenebras: sacerdotes Romani, et qui diem diffiniere civilem, item Ægyptii, et Hipparchus, a media nocte in mediam." To the same purpose also Aulus Gellius (Noct. Att. iii. 2): "Populum autem Romanum ita, uti Varro dixit, dies singulos adnumerare a media nocte ad mediam proximam multis argumentis ostenditur." He then gives Varro's proofs.

If the passages in St. John's Gospel relating to the hour of the day be all examined, it will appear probable that he adopted this official Roman reckoning, — of course, numbering the hours from midday as well as from midnight, so as not to exceed the number twelve. In i. 40 the visit of the disciples to Jesus will thus have occurred about 10 A. M. instead of at 4 P. M. as often supposed, and this seems more agreeable to the statement "they abode with him that day." In iv. 6 the same mode of reckoning brings Jesus, "wearied with his journey," to the well of Samaria at six in the evening, a time when the woman would naturally come to draw water, instead of at noon. So in iv. 52 this computation makes "the seventh hour" when the fever left the nobleman's son, seven instead of one P. M., which agrees better with the circumstances and the probable distance between Cana and Capernaum.

The only remaining passage is xix. 14, the relation of which to Mark xv. 25 has been so much questioned. Here, too, this method of reckoning removes the seeming discrepancy, while the whole course of the narrative in all the Evangelists shows that the time indicated by St. John as that when Pilate sat upon his judgment-seat, could not have been later than between six and seven in the morning — "about the sixth hour." After this, the events which followed — the further ineffectual opposition and final yielding of Pilate to the will of the Jews, the leading of Jesus out to Golgotha after taking off his mock royal array, etc., the preparation for the crucifixion, and the crucifixion itself, must have consumed the two hours or more until our nine o'clock, called by St. Mark, according to Jewish usage, "the third hour." For a list, of the older writers who adopt this view, see Wolfius, Curæ Phil. on John xix. 14. Olshausen (who seems to prefer for himself a conjectural emendation of the text) yet well observes, "With this hypothesis admirably accords the fact that John wrote for the people of Asia Minor" — a remark which applies to all the passages above cited from his Gospel. F. G.

HOUSE (בַּיִת: οἶκος: domus; Chald. בּוּרְתָּא, to pass the night, Ges. Thes. 191 b), a dwelling in general, whether literally, as house, tent, palace, citadel, tomb; derivatively, as tabernacle, temple, heaven; or metaphorically, as family. Although in oriental language, every tent (see Ges. p. 32) may be regarded as a house (Harmer, Obs. i. 194), yet the distinction between the permanent dwelling-house and the tent must have taken rise from the moment of the division of mankind into dwellers in tents and builders of cities, i. e. of permanent habitations (Gen. iv. 17, 20; Is. xxxviii. 12). The Hebrews did not become dwellers in cities till the sojourn in Egypt and after the conquest of Canaan (Gen. xlvii. 3; Ex. xii. 7; Heb. vi. 9), while the Canaanites as well as the Assyrians were from an earlier period builders and inhabitants of cities, and it was into the houses and cities built by the former that the Hebrews entered to take possession after the conquest (Gen. x. 11, 19, xix. 1, xxiii. 10, xxxiv. 20; Num. xi. 27; Deut. vi. 10, 11). The private dwellings of the Assyrians and Babylonians have altogether perished, but the solid material of the houses of Syria, east of the Jordan, may perhaps have preserved entire specimens of the ancient dwellings, even of the original inhabitants of that region (Porter, Damascus, ii. 195, 196; C. C. Graham in Camb. Essays, 1859, p. 160, &c.; comp. Buckingham, Arab. Tribes, p. 171, 172).

In inferring the plan and arrangement of ancient Jewish or Oriental houses, as alluded to in Scripture, from existing dwellings in Syria, Egypt, and the East in general, allowance must be made for the difference in climate between Egypt, Persia, and Palestine, a cause from which would proceed differences in certain cases of material and construction, as well as of domestic arrangement.

1. The houses of the rural poor in Egypt, as well as in most parts of Syria, Arabia, and Persia, are for the most part mere huts of mud, or sun-burnt bricks. In some parts of Palestine and Arabia stone is used, and in certain districts caves in the rock are used as dwellings (Amos v. 11 Bartlett, Walks, p. 117; CAVES). The houses are usually of one story only, namely, the ground floor, and sometimes contain only one apartment. Sometimes a small court for the cattle is attached; and in some cases the cattle are housed in the same building, or the people live on a raised platform, and the cattle round them on the ground (1 Sam. xxviii. 24; Irby and Mangles, p. 70; Jolliffe, Letters, i. 43; Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 170; Burckhardt, Travels, ii. 119). In Lower Egypt the oxen occupy the width of the chamber farthest from the entrance; it is built of brick or mud, about four feet high, and the top is often used as a sleeping place in winter. The windows are small apertures high up in the walls, sometimes grated with wood (Burckhardt, Travels, i. 241, ii. 101, 119, 301, 329; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 44). The roofs are commonly but not always flat, and are usually formed of a plaster of mud and straw laid upon boughs or rafters; and upon the flat roofs, tents or "booths" of boughs or rushes are often raised to be used as sleeping-places in summer (Irby and Mangles, 71; Niebuhr, Descr. pp. 49, 53; Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 112; Nineveh, i. 176; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 280; Travels, i. 190; Van Egmont, ii. 32; Malan, Magdala and Bethany, p. 15). To this description the houses of ancient Egypt and also of Assyria, as represented in the monuments, in great measure correspond (Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, pt. ii. pl. 49, 50; bas-relief in Brit. Mus. Assyrian room, No. 49; first Egypt. room, case 17; Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 13; Martineau, East. Life, i. 19, 97). In the towns the houses of the inferior kind do not differ much from the above description, but they are sometimes of more than one story, and the roof-tern races are more carefully constructed. In Palestine they are often of stone (Jolliffe, i. 24).

2. The difference between the poorest houses and those of the class next above them is greater than between these and the houses of the first rank. The prevailing plan of eastern houses of this class presents, as was the case in ancient Egypt, a front of wall, whose blank and mean appearance is usually relieved only by the door and a few latticed and projecting windows (Views in Syria, ii. 25). Within this is a court or courts with apartments opening into them. Some of the finest houses in the East are to be found at Damascus, where in some of them are seven such courts. When there are only two, the innermost is the hareem, in which the women and children live, and which is jealously secluded from the entrance of any man but the master of the house (Burckhardt, Travels i. 188; Van Egmont ii. 246, 253; Shaw, p. 207; Porter, Damascus, i 34, 37, 60; Chardin. Voyages, vi. 6; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 179, 207). Over the door is a projecting window with a lattice more or less elaborately wrought, which, except in times of public celebrations, is usually closed (2 K. ix. 30; Shaw, Travels, p. 207; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 27). The doorway or door bears an inscription from the Kurán, as the ancient Egyptian houses had inscriptions over their doors, and as the Israelites were directed to write sentences from the Law over their gates. [GATE.] The entrance is usually guarded within from sight by a wall or some arrangement of the passages. In the passage is a stone seat for the porter and other servants (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 32; Shaw, Travels, p. 207; Chardin, Voyages, iv. 111) Beyond this passage is an open court like the Roman impluvium, often paved with marble. Into this the principal apartments look, and are either open to it in front, or are entered from it by doors. An awning is sometimes drawn over the court, and the floor strewed with carpets on festive occasions (Shaw, p. 208). On the ground floor there is generally an apartment for male visitors, called mandarah, having a portion of the floor sunk below the rest, called durká'ah. This is often paved with marble or colored tiles, and has in the centre a fountain. The rest of the floor is a raised platform called leewán, with a mattress and cushions at the back on each of the three sides. This seat or sofa is called deewán. Every person on entrance takes off his shoes on the durka'ah before stepping on the leewán (Ex. iii. 5; Josh. v. 15; Luke vii. 38). The ceilings over the leewán and durká'ah are often richly paneled and ornamented (Jer. xxii. 14). [CEILING.] The stairs to the upper apartments are in Syria usually in a corner of the court (Robinson, iii. 302). When there is no upper story the lower rooms are usually loftier. In Persia they are open from top to bottom, and only divided from the court by a low partition (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 10; Chardin, iv. 119; Burckhardt, Travels, i. 18, 19; Views in Syria, i. 56).

Around part, if not the whole, of the court is a verandah, often nine or ten feet deep, over which, when there is more than one floor, runs a second gallery of like depth with a balustrade (Shaw, p. 208). Bearing in mind that the reception room is raised above the level of the court (Chardin, iv. 118; Views in Syria, i. 56), we may, in explaining the circumstances of the miracle of the paralytic (Mark ii. 3; Luke v. 18), suppose, (1.) that our Lord was standing under the verandah, and the people in front in the court. The bearers of the sick man ascended the stairs to the roof of the house, and taking off a portion of the boarded covering of the verandah, or removing the awning over the impluvium, τὸ μέσον, in the former case let down the bed through the verandah roof, or in the latter, down by way of the roof, διὰ τῶν κεράμων, and deposited it before the Saviour (Shaw, p. 212).[a] (2.) Another explanation presents itself in considering the room where the company were assembled as the ὑπερῷον, and the roof opened for the bed to be the true roof of the house (Trench, Miracles, p. 199; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 39). (3.) And one still more simple is found in regarding the house as one of the rude dwellings now to be seen near the Sea of Galilee, a mere room "10 or 12 feet high and as many or more square," with no opening except the door. The roof, used as a sleeping-place, is reached by a ladder from the outside, and the bearers of the paralytic, unable to approach the door, would thus have ascended the roof, and having uncovered it (ἐξορύξαντες), let him down into the room where our Lord was (Malan, l. c.).[b] roof are often shaded by vines or creeping plants, and the courts, especially the inner ones, planted with trees. The court has often a well or tank in it (Ps. cxxviii. 3; 2 Sam. xvii. 18; Russell, Aleppo, a * See a full statement of this latter view in Norton's Genuineness of the Gospels, 2d ed., i. p. cxii. ff. (Addit. Notes), or in his Trans. of the Gospels, with Notes, ii. 218 f., 249 f. A.

b * Another view may be stated. Those who brought the paralytic, finding it impossible to reach the Saviour in the room where he was teaching (see especially Mark ii. 2), may have hastened at once to the court of an adjacent house. Taking advantage there of the stairs leading up thence to the roof of that next house, they could have crossed to the roof (separated from the other, if at all, by only a low parapet) which was over the room into which they let down the bed before Jesus, through the tiles, broken up for that purpose. Stairs on the outside of houses are almost unknown in Palestine at present, and would only expose the inmates to violence and pillage. The healing of the paralytic took place at Capernaum (Mark ii. 1) where the houses might be expected to be thus contiguous to each other. Thomson informs us (Land and Book, ii. 6 ff.) how the ordinary Arab houses are constructed in the East. H i. 24, 32; Wilkinson, i. 6, 8; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 32; Views in Syria, i. 56).

Besides the mandarah, there is sometimes a second room, either on the ground or the upper floor, called ká'ah, fitted with deewáns, and at the corners of these rooms portions taken off and inclosed form retiring rooms (Lane, i. 39; Russell, i. 31, 33).

When there is no second floor, but more than one court, the women's apartments, hareem, harem, or haram (חֲרֵם and חֵרֶם, secluded, or prohibited, with which may be compared the Hebrew Armon אַרְמוֹן (Stanley, S. & P. App. § 82), are usually in the second court; otherwise they form a separate building within the general inclosure, or are above on the first floor (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 179, 207; Views in Syria, i. 56). The entrance to the harem is crossed by no one but the master of the house and the domestics belonging to the female establishment. Though this remark would not apply in the same degree to Jewish habits, the privacy of the women's apartments may possibly be indicated by the "inner chamber" (חֶדֶר: ταμιεῖον: cubiculum) resorted to as a hiding-place (1 K. xx. 30, xxii. 25; see Judg. xv. 1). Solomon, in his marriage with a foreigner, introduced also foreign usage in this respect, which was carried further in subsequent times (1 K. vii. 8; 2 K. xxiv. 15). [Women.] The harem of the Persian monarch (בֵּית נָשִׁים: ὁ γυναικῶν: domus feminarum) is noticed in the book of Esther (ii. 3).

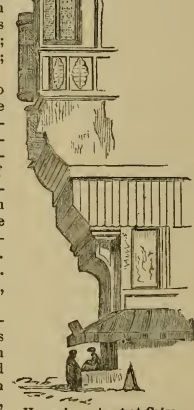
When there is an upper story, the ká'ah forms the most important apartment, and thus probably answers to the ὑπερῷον, which was often the "guest-chamber" (Luke xxii. 12 [ἀνάγαιον]; Acts i. 13, ix. 37, xx. 8; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 154).[a] The windows of the upper rooms often project one or two feet, and form a kiosk or latticed chamber, the ceilings of which are elaborately ornamented (Lane, i. 27; Russell, i. 102; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 190). [Window.] Such may have been the "chamber on the wall" (עֲלִיַּת: ὑπερῷον: cœnaculum; Ges. p. 1030) made, or rather set apart for Elisha, by the Shunammite woman (2 K. iv. 10, 11). So also the "summer parlor" of Eglon (Judg. iii. 20, 23, but see Wilkinson, i. 11), the "loft" of the widow of Zarephath (1 K. xvii. 19). The "lattice" (שְׁבָכָה: δικτυωτόν: cancelli) through which Ahaziah fell, perhaps belonged to an upper chamber of this kind (2 K. i. 2), as also the "third loft" (τρίστεγον) from which Eutychus fell (Acts xx. 9; comp. Jer. xxii. 13). There are usually no special bedrooms in eastern houses, and thus the room in which Ish-bosheth was murdered was probably an ordinary room with a deewán, on which he was sleeping during the heat of the day (2 Sam. iv. 5, 6; Lane, i. 41).

Sometimes the deewán is raised sufficiently to allow of cellars underneath for stores of all kinds (ταμιεῖα, Matt. xxiv. 26; Russell, i. 32).

The outer doors are closed with a wooden lock, but in some cases the apartments are divided from each other by curtains only (Lane, i. 42; Chardin, iv. 123; Russell, i. 21).

There are no chimneys, but fire is made when required with charcoal in a chafing-dish; or a fire of wood might be kindled in the open court of the house (Luke xxii. 55; Russell, i. 21; Lane, i. 41; Chardin, iv. 120). [Coal, Amer. ed.]



House in a street at Cairo. (From Roberts.)

Besides the mandarah, some houses in Cairo have an apartment called mak'ad, open in front to the court, with two or more arches, and a railing; and a pillar to support the wall above (Lane, i. 38). It was in a chamber of this kind, probably one of the largest size to be found in a palace, that our Lord was being arraigned before the high-priest, at the time when the denial of Him by St. Peter took place. He "turned and looked" on Peter as he stood by the fire in the court (Luke xxii. 56, 61; John xviii. 25), whilst He himself was in the "hall of Judgment," the mak'ad. Such was the "porch of judgment" built by Solomon (1 K. vii. 7), which finds a parallel in the golden alcove of Mohammed Uzbek (Ibn Batuta, Trav. 76, ed. Lee).

[a] * "At Ramleh," says Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii. 229, 2d ed.), we were "conducted to an 'upper room,' a large airy hall, forming a sort of third story, upon the flat roof of the house." The prophet's chamber at Shunem, 2 K. iv. 10 ("on the wall," A. V., but probably = wall-chamber, i. e. one surrounded with a wall, duly finished), was no doubt the modern 'alliyeh (the Hebrew word is the same). "It is the most desirable part of the establishment, is best fitted up, and is still given to guests who are to be treated with honor" (Thomson, Land and Book, i. 235). This is the name also of Elijah's room ("loft," A. V.) at Sarepta (1 K. xvii. 19). ‖

Before quitting the interior of the house we may observe that, on the dewcân, the corner is the place of honor, which is never quitted by the master of the house in receiving strangers (Russell, i. 27; Malan, Tyre and Sidon, p. 38).[a] The roofs of eastern houses are, as has been said, mostly flat, though there are sometimes domes over some of the rooms. The flat portions are plastered with a composition of mortar, tar, ashes, and sand, which in time becomes very hard, but when not laid on at the proper season is apt to crack in winter, and the rain is thus admitted. In order to prevent this, every roof is provided with a roller, which is set at work after rain. In many cases the terrace roof is little better than earth rolled hard. On ill-compacted roofs grass is often found springing into a short-lived existence (Prov. xix. 13, xxvii. 15; Ps. cxxix. 6, 7; Is. xxxvii. 27; Shaw, p. 210; Lane, i. 27; Robinson, iii. 39, 44, 60).

In no point do oriental domestic habits differ more from European than in the use of the roof. Its flat surface is made useful for various household purposes, as drying corn, hanging up linen, and preparing figs and raisins (Shaw, p. 211; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 191). The roofs are used as places of recreation in the evening, and often as sleeping-places at night (2 Sam. xi. 2, xvi. 22; Dan. iv. 29; 1 Sam. ix. 25, 26;[b] Job xxvii. 18; Prov. xxi. 9; Shaw, p. 211; Russell, i. 35; Chardin, iv. 116; Layard, Nineveh, i. 177). They were also used as places for devotion, and even idolatrous worship (Jer. xxxii. 29, xix. 13; 2 K. xxiii. 12; Zeph. i. 5; Acts x. 9). At the time of the Feast of Tabernacles booths were erected by the Jews on the tops of their houses, as in the present day huts of boughs are sometimes erected on the housetops as sleeping-places, or places of retirement from the heat in summer time (Neh. viii. 16; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 280). As among the Jews the seclusion of women was not carried to the extent of Mohammedan usage, it is probable that the housetop was made, as it is among Christian inhabitants, more a place of public meeting both for men and women, than is the case among Mohammedans, who carefully seclude their roofs from inspection by partitions (Burckhardt, Trav. i. 191; comp. Wilkinson, i. 23). The Christians at Aleppo, in Russell's time, lived contiguous, and made their housetops a means of mutual communication to avoid passing through the streets in time of plague (Russell, i. 35). In the same manner the housetop might be made a means of escape by the stairs [i. e. from the roof into the court] by which it was reached without entering any of the apartments of the house (Matt. xxiv. 17, x. 27; Luke xii. 3).

Both Jews and heathens were in the habit of wailing publicly on the housetops (Is. xv. 3, xxii. 1; Jer. xlviii. 38). Protection of the roof by parapets was enjoined by the Law (Deut. xxii. 8). The parapets thus constructed, of which the types may be seen in ancient Egyptian houses, were sometimes of open work, and it is to a fall through, or over one of these that the injury by which Ahaziah suffered is sometimes ascribed (Shaw, p. 211). To pass over roofs for plundering purposes, as well as for safety, would be no difficult matter (Joel ii. 9). In ancient Egyptian and also in Assyrian houses a sort of raised story was sometimes built above the roof, and in the former an open chamber, roofed or covered with awning, was sometimes erected on the housetop (Wilkinson, i. 9; Layard, Mon. of Nin. ii. pl. 49, 50).

There are usually no fire-places, except in the kitchen, the furniture of which consists of a sort of raised platform of brick with receptacles in it for fire, answering to the "boiling places" (מְבַשֶּׁלוֹת: μαγειρεῖα: culinæ) of Ezekiel (xlvi. 23; Lane, i. 41; Ges. p. 249).

Special apartments were devoted in larger houses to winter and summer uses (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Am. iii. 15; Chardin, iv. 119).

The ivory house of Ahab was probably a palace largely ornamented with inlaid ivory. [PALACE.]

The circumstance of Samson's pulling down the house by means of the pillars, may be explained by the fact of the company being assembled on tiers of balconies above each other, supported by central pillars on the basement; when these were pulled down the whole of the upper floors would fall also (Judg. xvi. 26; Shaw, p. 211).

Houses for jewels and armor were built and furnished under the kings (2 K. xx. 13). The draught-house (מֹחֲרָאוֹת: κοπρών: latrinæ) was doubtless a public latrine, such as exists in modern eastern cities (2 K. x. 27; Russell, i. 34).

Leprosy in the house was probably a nitrous efflorescence on the walls, which was injurious to the salubrity of the house, and whose removal was therefore strictly enjoined by the Law (Lev. xiv. 34, 55; Kitto, Phys. Geogr. of Pal. p. 112; Winer, s. v. Häuser).

The word בַּיִת is prefixed to words constituting a local name, as Bethany, Beth-horon, etc. In modern names it is represented by Beit, as Beit-lahm. H. W. P.

* HOUSEHOLD, CÆSAR'S. [CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD.]

* HOUSE OF GOD. This expression occurs in Judg. xx. 18 (A. V.), where no doubt בֵּית אֵל, instead of being translated, should be retained as a proper name, i. e. Bethel; so also, ver. 26 and xxi. 2. Bethel on the confines of Judah and Benjamin is the place there meant. The Ark of the Covenant having been brought to Bethel from Shiloh just at that time, for the purpose (it may be) of more convenient access, the other tribes went up thither to "ask counsel" of Jehovah in regard to the war on which they were about to enter against the Benjamites. The Ark of the Covenant is found again not long after this in its proper sanctuary at Shiloh (1 Sam. i. 3). That in Judg. xx. 18 Bethel denotes the place where the Ark then was, and not the Ark itself as called "the house of God," is evident from Judg. xx. 27, where the narrative distinguishes the two from each other, and recognizes HUK'KOK (חֻקֹּק [incision, rock-excavation, Dietr.; ditch, Fürst]: Ἰακανα; Alex. Ικωκ: Hucuca), a place on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34), named next to Aznoth-Tabor. It is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. "Icoc"), but in such a manner as to show that they knew nothing of it but from the Text. By hap-Parchi in 1320, and in our own times by Wolcott and by Robinson, Hukkok has been recovered in Yâkûk, a village in the mountains of Naphtali, west of the upper end of the Sea of Galilee, about 7 miles S. S. W. of Safed, and at the head of Wady-el-Amûd. An ancient Jewish tradition locates here the tomb of Habakkuk (Zunz, in B. Tudela, ii. 421; Schwarz, p. 182; Robinson, iii. 81, 82).

HU'KOK (חוּקֹק [perh. established, or engraved]: ἡ Ἀκάκ; [Vat. Ικακ;] Alex. Ιακακ; [Comp. Ald. Ικώκ:] Hucac), a name which in 1 Chr. vi. 75 is substituted for Helkath in the parallel list of the Gershonite cities in Asher, in Josh. xxi.

HUL (חוּל [circle, region, Fürst]: Ὀυλ; [in 1 Chr., Rom. Vat. omit, Alex. Ουδ: Iful]), the second son of Aram, and grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 23). The geographical position of the people whom he represents is not well decided. Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 4) and Jerome fix it in Armenia; Schulthess (Parad. p. 262) on etymological grounds (as though the name = חוֹל, sand) proposes the southern part of Mesopotamia; von Bohlen (Introd. to Gen. ii. 249) places it in the neighborhood of Chaldæa. The strongest evidence is in favor of the district about the roots of Lebanon, where the names Ard-el-Hûleh, a district to the north of Lake Merom; Οὐλαθα, a town noticed by Josephus (Ant. xv. 10, § 3), between Galilee and Trachonitis; Golan, and its modern form Djaulân, bear some affinity to the original name of Hul, or, as it should rather be written, Chul.

HUL'DAH (חֻלְדָּה [weasel, Fürst]: Ὀλδαν: [Holda,] Olda), a prophetess, whose husband Shallum was keeper of the wardrobe in the time of king Josiah, and who dwelt in the suburb (Rosenmüller, ad Zeph. i. 10) of Jerusalem. While Jeremiah was still at Anathoth, a young man unknown to fame, Huldah was the most distinguished person for prophetic gifts in Jerusalem; and it was to her that Josiah had recourse when Hilkiah found a book of the Law, to procure an authoritative opinion on it (2 K. xxii. 14; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 22).

HUM'TAH (חַמְתָּה [place of lizards, Ges.; fortress, Fürst]: Ἐὺμά; Alex. Χαμματα: Aththautha), a city of Judah, one of those in the mountain-district, the next to Hebron (Josh. xv. 54). It was not known to Eusebius and Jerome (see Onomasticon, "Ammatha"), nor has it since been identified. There is some resemblance between the name and that of Kimath (Κιμάθ), one of the places added in the Vat. LXX. to the list in the Hebrew text of 1 Sam. xxx. 27–31.

HUNTING. The objects for which hunting is practiced, indicate the various conditions of society and the progress of civilization. Hunting, as a matter of necessity, whether for the extermination of dangerous beasts, or for procuring sustenance, betokens a rude and semi-civilized state; as an amusement, it betokens an advanced state. In the former, personal prowess and physical strength are the qualities which elevate a man above his fellows and fit him for dominion, and hence one of the greatest heroes of antiquity is described as a "mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. x. 9), while Ishmael, the progenitor of a wild race, was famed as an archer (Gen. xxi. 20), and Esau, holding a similar position, was "a cunning hunter, a man of the field" (Gen. xxv. 27). The latter state may be exemplified, not indeed from Scripture itself, but from contemporary records. Among the accomplishments of Herod, his skill in the chase is particularly noticed; he kept a regular stud and a huntsman (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 10, § 3), followed up the sport in a wild country (Ant. xv. 7, § 7) which abounded with stags, wild asses, and bears, and is said to have killed as many as forty head in a day (B. J. i. 21, § 13). The wealthy in Egypt and Assyria followed the sports of the field with great zest; they had their preserves for the express purpose of preserving and hunting game (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. i. 215; Xen. Cyrop. i. 4, §§ 5, 14), and drew from hunting scenes subjects for decorating the walls of their buildings, and even the robes they wore on state occasions.

The Hebrews, as a pastoral and agricultural people, were not given to the sports of the field; the density of the population, the earnestness of their character, and the tendency of their ritual regulations, particularly those affecting food, all combined to discourage the practice of hunting; and perhaps the examples of Ishmael and Esau were recorded with the same object. There was no lack of game in Palestine; on their entrance into the land, the wild beasts were so numerous as to be dangerous (Ex. xxiii. 29); the utter destruction of them was guarded against by the provisions of the Mosaic law (Ex. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 7). Some of the fiercer animals survived to a late period, as lions (Judg. xiv. 5; 1 Sam. xvii. 34; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 K. xiii. 24, xx. 36), and bears (1 Sam. xvii. 34; 2 K. ii. 24); jackals (Judg. xv. 4) and foxes (Cant. ii. 15) were also numerous; hart, roebuck, and fallow deer (Deut. xii. 15; 1 K. iv. 23) formed a regular source of sustenance, and were possibly preserved in inclosures. The manner of catching these animals was either by digging a pitfall (שַׁחַת), which was the usual manner with the larger animals, as the lion (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ez. xix. 4, 8); or secondly by a trap (פַּח), which was set under ground (Job xviii. 10), in the run of the animal (Prov. xxii. 5), and caught it by the leg (Job xviii. 9); or lastly by the use of the net, of which there were various kinds, as for the gazelle (?) (Is. li. 20, A. V. "wild bull"), and other animals of that class. [Net.] The method in which the net was applied is familiar to us from the descriptions in Virgil (Æn. iv. 121, 151 ff., x. 707 ff.); it was placed across a ravine or narrow valley, frequented by the animals for the sake of water, and the game was driven in by the hunters and then dispatched either with bow and arrow, or spears (comp. Wilkinson, i. 214). The game selected was generally such as was adapted for food (Prov. xii. 27), and care was taken to pour out the blood of these as well as of tame animals (Lev. xvii 13).

Birds formed an article of food among the Hebrews (Lev. xvii. 13), and much skill was exercised in catching them. The following were the most approved methods. (1.) The trap (פַּח), which consisted of two parts, a net, strained over a frame, and a stick to support it, but so placed that it should give way at the slightest touch; the stick or springe was termed מוֹקֵשׁ (Am. iii. 5, "gin;" Ps. lxix. 22, "trap"); this was the most usual method (Job xviii. 9; Eccl. ix. 12; Prov. vii. 23). (2.) The snare (עֲצָמִים, from עָצַם, to braid; Job xviii. 9, A. V. "robber"), consisting of a cord (חֶבֶל, Job xviii. 10; comp. Ps. xviii. 5, cxvi. 3, cxl. 5), so set as to catch the bird by the leg. (3.) The net, which probably resembled those used in Egypt, consisting of two sides or frames, over which network was strained, and so arranged that they could be closed by means of a cord: the Hebrew names are various. [NET.] (4.) The decoy, to which reference is made in Jer. v. 26, 27 — a cage of a peculiar construction (כְּלוּב) — was filled with birds, which acted as decoys; the door of the cage was kept open by a piece of stick acting as a springe (מַשְׁחִית), and closed suddenly with a clap (whence perhaps the term c'lúb) on the entrance of a bird. The partridge appears to have been used as a decoy (Ecclus. xi. 30).

HU'PHAM (חוּפָם [protector, Fürst; coast-inhabitant, Ges.]: LXX. omit in both MSS.; [Comp. Ὀφάμ:] Hupham), a son of Benjamin, founder of the family (Mishpachah) of the HUPHAMITES (Num. xxvi. 39). In the lists of Gen. xlvi. and 1 Chr. vii. the name is given as HUPPIM, which see.

HU'PHAMITES, THE (הַחוּפָמִי: om. in LXX.; [Comp. ὁ Ὀφαμί:] Huphamitæ). Descendants of HUPHAM of the tribe of Benjamin (Num. xxvi. 39).

W. A. W.

HUP'PAH (חֻפָּה [covering, veiling]: ὁ Ὀπφά; [Vat. Οχχοφφα; Comp.] Alex. Ὀφφά: Hoppha), a priest in the time of David, to whom was committed the charge of the 13th of the 24 courses in the service of the house of God (1 Chr. xxiv. 13).

HUP'PIM (חֻפִּים [protection, screen, Fürst, Ges.]: Gen. xlvi. 21; 1 Chr. vii. 12; in Gen., omitted in LXX. [Rom. Vat.], but Cod. Alex. has Ὀφιμιν; in 1 Chr. vii. 12, Ἀφφίν, [Vat. Απφειν,] and in Cod. Alex. Αφειμ; [ver. 15, Vat. Αμφειν, Alex. Αφφειν;] the former is the correct form, if, as we read in Num. xxvi. 39, the name was Hupham: Ophim, [Hapham, Happhim]), head of a Benjamite family. According to the text of the LXX. in Gen., a son of Bela [BELA; BECHER]; but 1 Chr. vii. 12 tells us that he was son of Ir, or Iri (ver. 7), who was one of the five sons of Bela. According to Num. xxvi., the Huphamites were one of the original families of the tribe of Benjamin. The sister of Huppim married into the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. vii. 15).

HUR (חוּר [hole, hence a prison]: Hur). 1. (Ὦρ; Joseph. Ὦρος.) A man who is mentioned with Moses and Aaron on the occasion of the battle with Amalek at Rephidim (Ex. xvii. 10), when with Aaron he stayed up the hands of Moses (12). He is mentioned again in xxiv. 14, as being, with Aaron, left in charge of the people by Moses during his ascent of Sinai. It would appear from this that he must have been a person connected with the family of Moses and of some weight in the camp. The latter would follow from the former. The Jewish tradition, as preserved by Josephus (Ant. iii. 2, § 4), is that he was the husband of Miriam, and (iii. 6, § 1) that he was identical with —

2. (Ὦρ.) The grandfather of Bezaleel, the chief artificer of the tabernacle — "son of Uri, son of Hur — of the tribe of Judah" (Ex. xxxi. 2, xxxv. 30, xxxviii. 22), the full genealogy being given on each occasion (see also 2 Chr. i. 5). In the lists of the descendants of Judah in 1 Chr. the pedigree is more fully preserved. Hur there appears as one of the great family of Pharez. He was the son of Caleb ben-Hezron, by a second wife, Ephrath (ii. 19, 20; comp. 5, also iv. 1), the first fruit of the marriage (ii. 50, iv. 4), and the father, besides Uri (ver. 20), of three sons, who founded the towns of Kirjath-jearim, Beth-lehem, and Beth-gader (51). Hur's connection with Beth-lehem would seem to have been of a closer nature than with the others of these places, for he himself is emphatically called "Abi-Bethlehem" — the "father of Bethlehem" (iv. 4). Certainly Beth-lehem enjoyed, down to a very late period, a traditional reputation for the arts which distinguished his illustrious grandson. Jesse, the father of David, is said to have been a weaver of the vails of the sanctuary (Targ. Jonathan, 2 Sam. xxi. 19), and the dyers were still lingering there when Benjamin of Tudela visited Bethlehem in the 13th century.

In the Targum on 1 Chr. ii. 19 and iv. 4, Ephrath is taken as identical with Miriam: but this would be to contradict the more trustworthy tradition given above from Josephus.

In his comments on 1 Chr. iv. 1 (Quæst. Hebr. in Paralip.), Jerome overlooks the fact that the five persons there named as "sons" of Judah are really members of successive generations; and he attempts, as his manner is, to show that each of them is identical with one of the immediate sons of the patriarch. Hur he makes to be another name for Onan.

3. (Οὖρ; Joseph. Οὖρης.) The fourth of the five "kings" (כַּלְכֵּי: LXX. and Joseph. Ant. iv. 7, § 1, βασιλεῖς) of Midian, who were slain with Balaam after the "matter of Peor" (Num. xxxi. 8). In a later mention of them (Josh. xiii. 21) they are called "princes" (נְסִיכֵי) of Midian and "dukes" (נְסִיכֵי. not the word commonly rendered "duke," but probably with the force of dependence, see Keil ad loc.: LXX. ἔναρα) of Sihon king of the Amorites, who was killed at the same time with them. No further light can be obtained as to Hur.

4. (Σούρ: [Vat. Alex. FA. omit.]) Father of Rephaiah, who was ruler of half of the environs (פֶּלֶךְ. A. V. "part") of Jerusalem, and assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall (Neh. iii. 9).

5. The "son of Hur" — Ben-Chur — was commissariat officer for Solomon in Mount Ephraim (1 K. iv. 8). The LXX. (both MSS. [rather, Rom. and Alex.]) give the word Ben both in its original and its translated form (Βεέν — Alex. Βέν — υἱὸς Ὦρ [Vat. Βαιωρ for B. vl. Ὦρ; Comp. Alex Βενώρ]), a not infrequent custom with them. Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 3) has Οὔρης as the name of the officer himself. The Vulg. (Benhur) follows the Hebrew, and is in turn followed in the margin of the A. V. It is remarkable that the same form is observed in giving the names of no less than five out of the twelve officers in this list. G.

HU'RAI [2 syl.] (חוּרַי [free, noble, Fürst: or = חוּרִי, linen-weaver, Ges.]: Οὐρί; [Vat. FA. Ουρει:] Hurai), one of David's guard — Hurai of the torrents of Gaash — according to the list of 1 Chr. xi. 32. In the parallel catalogue of 2 Sam. xxiii. the R is changed to D, as is frequently the case, and the name stands as HIDDAI. Kennicott has examined the discrepancy, and, influenced by the readings of some of the MSS. of the LXX., decides in favor of Hurai as the genuine name (Dissert. p. 194).

HU'RAM (חוּרָם [noble-born]: Οὐράμ; [Vat. Ωιμ:] Alex. Ιωιμ: Huram). 1. A Benjamite; son of Bela, the first-born of the patriarch (1 Chr. viii. 5).

2. The form in which the name of the king of Tyre in alliance with David and Solomon — and elsewhere given as HIRAM — appears in Chronicles. (a.) At the time of David's establishment at Jerusalem (1 Chr. xiv. 1). In the A. V. the name is Hiram, in accordance with the Cetib or original Hebrew text (חירם); but in the marginal correction of the Masorets (Keri) it is altered to Huram (חורם), the form which is maintained in all its other occurrences in these books. The LXX. Χειράμ [FA. Χιραμ], Vulg. Hiram, and Targum, all agree with the Cetib. (b.) At the accession of Solomon (2 Chr. ii. 3, 11, 12, viii. 2, 18, ix. 10, 21: in each of these cases also the LXX. have Χιράμ, [Vat. and] Alex. Χειραμ, Vulg. Hiram).

3. The same change occurs in Chronicles in the name of Hiram the artificer, which is given as Huram in the following places: 2 Chr. ii. 13, iv. 11, 16. In the first and last of these a singular title is given him — the word Ab, "father" — "Huram my father," a and "Huram his father." No doubt this denotes the respect and esteem in which he was held, according to the similar custom of the people of the East at the present day.b There also the LXX. [Rom. Χιράμ, Vat. and Alex. Χειραμ] and Vulgate follow the form Hiram.

HU'RI (חוּרִי [linen-weaver]: [Οὐρί, Vat. Ουρει:] Huri), a Gadite; father of Abihail, a chief man in that tribe (1 Chr. v. 14).

HUSBAND. [MARRIAGE.]

HU'SHAH (הוּשָׁה [haste]: Ὡσάν; [Comp. Οὐσά: Ald. Ὡσά:] Hosa), a name which occurs in the genealogies of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 4) — "Ezer, father of Hushah." It may well be the name of a place, like Etam, Gedor, Beth-lehem, and others, in the preceding and succeeding verses; but we have no means of ascertaining the fact, since it occurs nowhere else. For a patronymic possibly derived from this name see HUSHATHITE.

HU'SHAI [2 syl.] (חוּשַׁי [quick, rapid]: Χουσί [Vat. -σει, and so often Alex.], LXX. and Joseph.: Chusai), an Archite, i. e. possibly an inhabitant of a place called Erec (2 Sam. xv. 32 ff., xvi. 16 ff.). He is called the "friend" of David (2 Sam. xv. 37; in 1 Chr. xxvii. 33, the word is rendered "companion;" comp. Joseph. Ant. vii. 9, § 2: the LXX. has a strange confusion of Archite and ἀρχιεταῖρος = chief friend). To him David confided the delicate and dangerous part of a pretended adherence to the cause of Absalom. His advice was preferred to that of Ahithophel, and speedily brought to pass the ruin which it meditated.

We are doubtless correct in assuming that the Hushai, whose son Baana was one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K. iv. 16), was the famous counsellor of his father. Hushai himself was probably no longer living; at any rate his office was filled by another (comp. ver. 5). [ARCHITE.]

HU'SHAM (חֻשָׁם, in Chron. חוּשָׁם [hasting, swift]: Ἀσώμ, [in 1 Chr.,] Ἀσόμ, [and so Alex. in Gen.:] Husam), one of the kings of Edom, before the institution of monarchy in Israel (Gen. xxxvi. 34, 35; 1 Chr. i. 45, 46). He is described as "Husham of the land of the Temanite;" and he succeeded Jobab, who is taken by the LXX. in their addition to the Book of Job as identical with that patriarch.

HU'SHATHITE, THE (הַחֻשָׁתִי, and twice in Chron. הַחֻשָׁתִי [patr. from חוּשָׁה, see above]: ὁ Ἀστατωθί, Οὐσαθί, Σουσαθί, [etc.:] de Husati, Husathites), the designation of two of the heroes of David's guard. 1. SIBBECHAI (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 29, xx. 4, xxvii. 11). In the last of these passages he is said to have belonged to the Zarhites, that is (probably) the descendants of Zerah of the tribe of Judah. So far this is in accordance with a connection between this and HUSHAH, a name, apparently of a place, in the genealogies of Judah. Josephus, however (Ant. vii. 12, § 2), mentions Sibbechai as a Hittite.

2. [Ἀνωθίτης; Vat. -θει-; Alex. Ασωθειτης: de Husati.] MEBUNNAI (2 Sam. xxiii. 27). There seems no doubt that this name is a mere corruption of SIBBECHAI.

HU'SHIM (חֻשִׁים [the hasting, Fürst; hastes (pl.) Ges.]: Ἀσόμ: Husim). 1. In Gen. xlvi. 23, "the children [sons] (בְּנֵי) of Dan" are said to have been Hushim. The name is plural, as if of a tribe rather than an individual, which perhaps is sufficient to account for the use of the plural c in "children." In the list of Num. xxvi. the name is changed to SHUHAM.

Hushim figures prominently in the Jewish tradi-a The A. V. of 2 Chr. ii. 13 renders the words "of Huram my father's," meaning the late king; but this is unnecessary, and the Hebrew will well bear the rendering given above.

b Analogous to this, though not exactly similar, is Joseph's expression (Gen. xlv. 8), "God hath made me a father unto Pharaoh." Compare also 1 Macc. xi. 32; where note the use of the two terms "cousin" (συγγενής, ver. 31, and "father" (32). Somewhat analogous, too, is the use of terms of relationship — "brother," "cousin" — in legal and official documents of our own and other countries.

c Gen. xxxvi. 25, adduced by Knobel ad loc. as a parallel case to this, is hardly so, since a daughter of Anah is given as well as his son, and the word Ben covers both.

tions of the recognition of Joseph, and of Jacob's burial at Hebron. See the quotations from the Midrash in Weil's Bib. Legends, p. 88 note, and the Targum Pseudojon. on Gen. l. 13. In the latter he is the executioner of Esau.

2. חָשִׁם (i. e. Chusshim: Ἀσώμ; Alex. Ασοβ: Hasim), a member of the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 12); and here again apparently (as the text now stands) the plural nature of the name is recognized, and Hushim is stated to be "the sons (Bene) of Aher." (See Bertheau in Exeg. Handb. ad loc.)

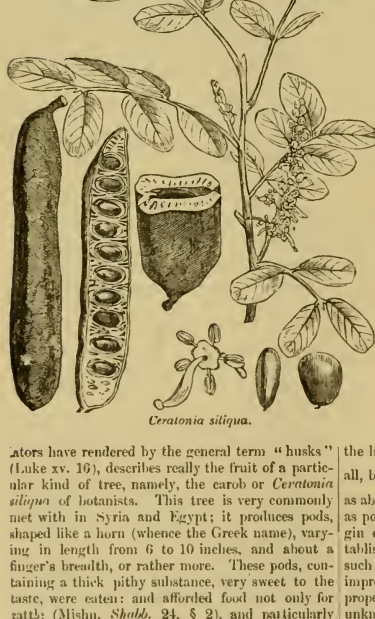
3. (הַחֻשִׁים, and חֻשִׁים: Ὡσίν; [Vat. Σωσιν, Ωσιμενι]; Alex. Ωσιμ: Husim, but in ver. 11 Mehusim, by inclusion of the Hebrew particle.) The name occurs again in the genealogy of Benjamin, but there as that of one of the two wives of Shaharaim (1 Chr. viii. 8), and the mother of two of his sons (11). In this case the plural significance of the name is not alluded to.

HUSKS. The word κεράτια, which our translators have rendered by the general term "husks" (Luke xv. 16), describes really the fruit of a particular kind of tree, namely, the carob or Ceratonia siliqua of botanists. This tree is very commonly met with in Syria and Egypt; it produces pods, shaped like a horn (whence the Greek name), varying in length from 6 to 10 inches, and about a finger's breadth, or rather more. These pods, containing a thick pithy substance, very sweet to the taste, were eaten: and afforded food not only for cattle (Mishn. Shabb. 24. § 2), and particularly pigs (Colum. R. R. vii. 9), but also for the poorer classes of the population (Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 123; Juv. xi. 58). The same uses of it prevail in the present day; as the tree readily sheds its fruit, it forms a convenient mode of feeding pigs. The tree is also named St. John's Bread, from a tradition that the Baptist lived upon its fruit in the wilderness.



Ceratonia siliqua.

W. L. B.

* The carob-tree is very common also in the Greek islands, and its fruit is still in great request there as a nutritious article for fattening swine. It may be seen exposed for sale in the markets at Smyrna and Athens. The writer has seen it as far north as Trieste, on the Gulf of Venice. The pod, though considerably larger, resembles very much that of our common locust-tree. It contains a sweetish pulp when tender, but soon becomes dry and hard, with small seeds, which rattle in the pod when shaken. It emits a slight odor when first gathered, not a little offensive to those unaccustomed to it.

The occasional use of this product for food (see above) is not at variance with the parable. It is not said there that the prodigal resorted to food eaten only by swine; but that in his wretchedness, having no friend to give him anything better, he was glad to share (ἐπεθύμει γεμίσαι) "the husks" which the swine were eating, which he was sent into the fields to watch. Yet the expression here (καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐδίδου αὐτῷ) some understand differently, namely, that no one gave the prodigal even so much as any of the husks, and if he obtained them, it was without permission and by stealth. This is Meyer's view (Lukas, p. 450, 4te Aufl.), and it appears to be that of Luther. The Greek does not require this interpretation; for the clause cited above (added in the Hebraistic way by καὶ = ὅτι) may assign a reason why (there being no other alternative) the prodigal must eat the husks to save himself from starvation. The ellipsis of τι after δίδωμι is very common (Matt. xix. 21, xxv. 8; Mark vi. 37; Luke vi. 30, &c.). In the other case we supply κεράτια as the object. H.

HUZ (עוּץ [perh., fruitful in trees, Dietr.], i. e. Uz, in which form the name is uniformly given elsewhere in the A. V.: Οὐζ, Alex. Ωξ: Hus), the eldest son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. xxii. 21). [Buz; Uz.]

HUZ'ZAB (חֻצָּב [Assyrian, Fürst: see infra]: ἡ ὑπόστασις: miles captivus), according to the general opinion of the Jews (Buxtorf's Lexicon ad voc. יצב), was the queen of Nineveh at the time when Nahum delivered his prophecy. This view appears to be followed in our version (Nah. ii. 7), and it has been recently defended by Ewald. Most modern expositors, however, incline to the belief that Huzzab here is not a proper name at all, but the Hophal of the verb יָצַב (see Buxtorf, as above; Gesenius, Lex. p. 903), and this is allowed as possible by the alternative rendering in the margin of our English Bible — "that which was established." Still there are difficulties in the way of such an understanding of the passage, and it is not improbable that after all Huzzab may really be a proper name. That a Ninevite queen otherwise unknown should suddenly be mentioned, is indeed exceedingly unlikely; for we cannot grant to Ewald that "the Ninevite queens were well nigh as powerful as the kings." But there is no reason why the word should not be a geographic term — an equivalent or representative of Assyria, which the prophet intends to threaten with captivity. Huzzab may mean "the Zab country," or the fertile tract east of the Tigris, watered by the upper and lower Zab rivers (Zab Ala and Zab Asfal), the A-diab-ênê of the geographers. This province — the most valuable part of Assyria — might well stand for Assyria itself, with which it is identified by Pliny (H. N. v. 12) and Ammianus (xxiii. 6). The name Zab, as applied to the rivers, is certainly very ancient, being found in the great inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I., which belongs to the middle of the twelfth century B. C. G. R.

HYÆNA. Authorities are at variance as to whether the term tzâbû'a (צְבוּעַ) in Jer. xii. 9 means a "hyæna," as the LXX. has it, or a "speckled bird," as in the A. V. The etymological force of the word is equally adapted to either, the hyæna being streaked. The only other instance in which it occurs is as a proper name, Zeboim (1 Sam. xiii. 18, "the valley of hyænas," Aquila; Neh. xi. 34). The Talmudical writers describe the hyæna by no less than four names, of which tzâbû'a is one (Lewysohn, Zoöl. § 119). The opinions of Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 163) and Gesenius (Thes. p. 1149) are in favor of the same view; nor could any room for doubt remain, were it not for the word ait (עַיִט; A. V. "bird") connected with it, which in all other passages refers to a bird. The hyæna was common in ancient as in modern Egypt, and is constantly depicted on monuments (Wilkinson, i. 213, 225): it must therefore have been well known to the Jews, if indeed not equally common in Palestine.[a] The sense of the passage in Jeremiah implies a fierce strong beast, not far below the lion in the parallel passage (v. 8); the hyæna fully answers to this description. Though cowardly in his nature, he is very savage when once he attacks, and the strength of his jaws is such that he can crunch the thigh-bone of an ox (Livingstone's Travels, p. 600). [ZEBOIM.] W. L. B.

* The etymological affinity of the Arabic ضبع ought to decide that the animal intended is the hyæna. This animal is common in Palestine and Syria. G. E. P.

HYDASPES (Ὑδάσπης: [Jadason]), a river noticed in Jud. i. 6, in connection with the Euphrates and Tigris. It is uncertain what river is referred to: the well-known Hydaspes of India (the Jelum of the Panjâ) is too remote to accord with the other localities noticed in the context. We may perhaps identify it with the Choaspes of Susiana. W. L. B.

HYMENÆUS [A. V. Hymene'us] (Ὑμέναιος), the name of a person occurring twice in the correspondence between St. Paul and Timothy; the first time classed with Alexander, and with him "delivered to Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme" (1 Tim. i. 20); and the second time classed with Philetus, and with him charged with having "erred concerning the truth, saying that the resurrection is past already," and thereby "overthrown the faith of some" (2 Tim. ii. 17, 18). These latter expressions, coupled with "the shipwreck of faith" attributed to Hymenæus in the context of the former passage (ver. 19), surely warrant our understanding both passages of the same person, notwithstanding the interval between the dates of the two letters. When the first was written he had already made one proselyte; before the second was penned he had seduced another: and if so, the only points further to be considered are, the error attributed to him, and the sentence imposed upon him.

I. The error attributed to him was one that had been in part appropriated from others, and has frequently been revived since with additions. What initiation was to the Pythagoreans, wisdom to the Stoics, science to the followers of Plato, contemplation to the Peripatetics, that "knowledge" (γνῶσις) was to the Gnostics. As there were likewise in the Greek schools those who looked forward to a complete restoration of all things (ἀποκατάστασις, v. Heyne ad Virg. Ecl. iv. 5, comp. Æn. vi. 745); so there was "a regeneration" (Tit. iii. 5; Matt. xix. 28), "a new creation" (2 Cor. v. 17, see Alford ad loc.; Rev. xxi. 1), "a kingdom of heaven and of Messiah or Christ" (Matt. xiii.; Rev. vii.) — and herein popular belief among the Jews coincided — unequivocally propounded in the N. T.; but here with this remarkable difference, namely, that in a great measure, it was present as well as future — the same thing in germ that was to be had in perfection eventually. "The kingdom of God is within you," said our Lord (Luke xvii. 21). "He that is spiritual judgeth all things," said St. Paul (1 Cor. ii. 15). "He that is born of God cannot sin," said St. John (1 Ep. iii. 9). There are likewise two deaths and two resurrections spoken of in the N. T.; the first of each sort, that of the soul to and from sin (John iii. 3–8), "the hour which now is" (ibid. v. 24, 25, on which see Aug. De Civ. Dei, xx. 6); the second, that of the body to and from corruption (1 Cor. xv. 36–44; also John v. 28, 29), which last is prospective. Now as the doctrine of the resurrection of the body was found to involve immense difficulties even in those early days (Acts xvii. 32; 1 Cor. xv. 35; how keenly they were pressed may be seen in St. Aug. De Civ. Dei, xxii. 12 ff.); while, on the other hand, there was so great a predisposition in the then current philosophy (not even extinct now) to magnify the excellence of the soul above that of its earthly tabernacle, it was at once the easier and more attractive course to insist upon and argue from the force of those passages of Holy Scripture which enlarge upon the glories of the spiritual life that now is, under Christ, and to pass over or explain away allegorically all that refers to a future state in connection with the resurrection of the body. In this manner we may derive the first errors of the Gnostics, of whom Hymenæus was one of the earliest. They were on the spread when St. John wrote; and his grand-disciple, St. Irenæus, compiled a voluminous work against them (Adv. Hær.). A good account of their full development is given by Gieseler, E. H., per. i. div. i. § 44 ff.

II. As regards the sentence passed upon him — it has been asserted by some writers of eminence (see Corn. à Lapide ad 1 Cor. v. 5), that the "delivering to Satan" is a mere synonym for ecclesiastical excommunication. Such can hardly be the case. The Apostles possessed many extraordinary prerogatives, which none have since arrogated. Even the title which they bore has been set apart to them ever since. The shaking off the dust of their feet against a city that would not receive them (St. Matt. x. 14), even though the same injunction was afterwards given to the Seventy (St. Luke x. 11), and which St. Paul found it necessary to act upon twice in the course of his ministry (Acts xiii. 51, and xviii. 6), has never been a practice since with Christian ministers. "Anathema," says Bingham, "is a word that occurs frequently in the ancient canons" (Antiq. xvi. 2, 16), but the form "Anathema Maranatha" is one that none have ever ventured upon since St. Paul (1 Cor. xvi. 22). As the Apostles healed all manner of bodily infirmities, so they seem to have possessed and exercised the same power in inflicting them — a power far too perilous to be continued when the manifold exigencies of the Apostolical age had passed away. Ananias and Sapphira both fell down dead at the rebuke of St. Peter (Acts v. 5 and 10); two words from the same lips, "Tabitha, arise," sufficed to raise Dorcas from the dead (ibid. ix. 40). St. Paul's first act in entering upon his ministry was to strike Elymas the sorcerer with blindness, his own sight having been restored to him through the medium of a disciple (ibid. ix. 17, and xiii. 11); while soon afterwards we read of his healing the cripple of Lystra (ibid. xiv. 8). Even apart from actual intervention by the Apostles, bodily visitations are spoken of in the case of those who approached the Lord's Supper unworthily, when as yet no discipline had been established: "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and a good number (ἱκανοί, in the former case it is πολλοί) sleep" (1 Cor. xi. 30).

On the other hand Satan was held to be the instrument or executioner of all these visitations. Such is the character assigned to him in the book of Job (i. 6–12, ii. 1–7). Similar agencies are described 1 K. xxii. 19–22, and 1 Chr. xxi. 1. In Ps. lxxviii. 49, such are the causes to which the plagues of Egypt are assigned. Even our Lord submitted to be assailed by him more than once (Matt. iv. 1–10: Luke iv. 13 says, "departed from Him for a season"); and "a messenger of Satan was sent to buffet" the very Apostle whose act of delivering another to the same power is now under discussion. At the same time large powers over the world of spirits were authoritatively conveyed by our Lord to his immediate followers (to the Twelve, Luke ix. 1; to the Seventy, as the results showed, ibid. x. 17–20).

It only remains to notice five particulars connected with its exercise, which the Apostle supplies himself. (1.) That it was no mere prayer, but a solemn authoritative sentence, pronounced in the name and power of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. v. 3–5). (2.) That it was never exercised upon any without the Church: "them that are without God judgeth" (ibid. v. 13), he says in express terms. (3.) That it was "for the destruction of the flesh," i. e. some bodily visitation. (4.) That it was for the improvement of the offender; that "his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (ibid. v. 5); and that "he might learn not to blaspheme" while upon earth (1 Tim. i. 20). (5.) That the Apostle could in a given case empower others to pass such sentence in his absence (1 Cor. v. 3, 4).

Thus, while the "delivering to Satan" may resemble ecclesiastical excommunication in some respects, it has its own characteristics likewise, which show plainly that one is not to be confounded or placed on the same level with the other. Nor again does St. Paul himself deliver to Satan all those in whose company he bids his converts "not even to eat" (1 Cor. v. 11). HYMN. This word is not used in the English version of the O. T., and only twice in the N. T. (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16); though in the original of the latter the derivative verb[a] occurs in three places (Matt. xxvi. 30: comp. Mark xiv. 26; Acts xvi. 25; Heb. ii. 12). The LXX., however, employ it freely in translating the Heb. names for almost every kind of poetical composition (Schleusn. Lex. ὕμνος). In fact the word does not seem to have had for the LXX. any very special meaning; and they called the Heb. book of Tehillim the book of psalms, not of hymns. Accordingly the word psalm had for the later Jews a definite meaning, while the word hymn was more or less vague in its application, and capable of being used as occasion should arise. If a new poetical form or idea should be produced, the name of hymn, not being embarrassed by a previous determination, was ready to associate itself with the fresh thought of another literature. And this seems to have been actually the case.

Among Christians the Hymn has always been something different from the Psalm; a different conception in thought, a different type in composition. There is some dispute about the hymn sung by our Lord and his Apostles on the occasion of the Last Supper; but even supposing it to have been the Hallel, or Paschal Hymn, consisting of Pss. cxiii.–cxviii., it is obvious that the word hymn is in this case applied not to an individual psalm, but to a number of psalms chanted successively, and altogether forming a kind of devotional exercise which is not unaptly called a hymn. The prayer in Acts iv. 24–30 is not a hymn, unless we allow non-metrical as well as metrical hymns. It may have been a hymn as it was originally altered; but we can only judge by the Greek translation, and this is without metre, and therefore not properly a hymn. In the jail at Philippi, Paul and Silas "sang hymns" (A. V. "praises") unto God, and so loud was their song that their fellow-prisoners heard them. This must have been what we mean by singing, and not merely recitation. It was in fact a veritable singing of hymns. And it is remarkable that the noun hymn is only used in reference to the services of the Greeks, and in the same passages is clearly distinguished from the psalm (Eph. v. 19, Col. iii. 16), "psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs."

It is probable that no Greek version of the Psalms, even supposing it to be accommodated to the Greek metres, would take root in the affections of the Gentile converts. It was not only a question of metre, it was a question of tune; and Greek tunes required Greek hymns. So it was in Syria. Richer in tunes than Greece, for Greece had but eight, while Syria had 275 (Benedict. Præf. vol. v. Op. Eph. Syr.), the Syrian hymnographers revelled in the varied luxury of their native music; and the result was that splendid development of the Hymn, as moulded by the genius of Bardesanes, Harmonius, and Ephrem Syrus. In Greece the eight tunes which seem to have satisfied the exigencies of church-music were probably accommodated to fixed metres, each metre being wedded to a particular tunes; an arrangement to which we can observe a tendency in the Directions about tunes and measures at the end of our English metrical version of the Psalms. This is also the case in the German hymnology, where certain ancient tunes are recognized as models for the metres of later compositions, and their names are always prefixed to the hymns in common use.

[a] Hymn occurs also in Matt. xxvi. 30, and Mark xiv. 26, where "when they had sung an hymn" (A. V.) stands for ὑμνήσαντες.

It is worth while inquiring what profane models the Greek hymnographers chose to work after. In the old religion of Greece the word hymn had already acquired a sacred and liturgical meaning, which could not fail to suggest its application to the productions of the Christian muse. So much for the name. The special forms of the Greek hymn were various. The Homeric and Orphic hymns were written in the epic style, and in hexameter verse. Their metre was not adapted for singing; and therefore, though they may have been recited, it is not likely that they were sung at the celebration of the mysteries. We turn to the Pindaric hymns, and here we find a sufficient variety of metre, and a definite relation to music. These hymns were sung to the accompaniment of the lyre; and it is very likely that they engaged the attention of the early hymn-writers. The dithyramb, with its development into the dramatic chorus, was sufficiently connected with musical traditions to make its form a fitting vehicle for Christian poetry; and there certainly is a dithyrambic savor about the earliest known Christian hymn, as it appears in Clem. Alex. pp. 312, 313, ed. Potter.

The first impulse of Christian devotion was to run into the moulds ordinarily used by the worshippers of the old religion. This was more than an impulse, it was a necessity, and a twofold necessity. The new spirit was strong; but it had two limitations: the difficulty of conceiving a new musico-poetical literature; and the quality so peculiar to devotional music, of lingering in the heart after the head has been convinced and the belief changed. The old tunes would be a real necessity to the new life; and the exile from his ancient faith would delight to hear on the foreign soil of a new religion the familiar melodies of home. Dean Trench has indeed labored to show that the reverse was the case, and that the early Christian shrank with horror from the sweet, but polluted, enchantments of his unbelieving state. We can only assent to this in so far as we allow it to be the second phase in the history of hymns. When old traditions died away, and the Christian acquired not only a new belief, but a new social humanity, it was possible, and it was desirable too, to break forever the attenuated thread that bound him to the ancient world. And so it was broken; and the trochaic and iambic metres, unassociated as they were with heathen worship, though largely associated with the heathen drama, obtained an ascendant in the Christian church. In 1 Cor. xiv. 26 allusion is made to improvised hymns, which being the outburst of a passionate emotion would probably assume the dithyrambic form. But attempts have been made to detect fragments of ancient hymns conformed to more obvious metres in Eph. v. 14; Jam. i. 17; Rev. i. 8 ff., xv. 3. These pretended fragments, however, may with much greater likelihood be referred to the swing of a prose composition unconsciously culminating into metre. It was in the Latin church that the trochaic and iambic metres became most deeply rooted, and acquired the greatest depth of tone and grace of finish. As an exponent of Christian feeling they soon superseded the accentual hexameters; they were used mnemonically against the heathen and the heretics by Commodianus and Augustine. The introduction of hymns into the Latin church is commonly referred to Ambrose. But it is impossible to conceive that the West should have been so far behind the East; similar necessities must have produced similar results: and it is more likely that the tradition is due to the very marked prominence of Ambrose as the greatest of all the Latin hymnographers.

The trochaic and iambic metres, thus impressed into the service of the church, have continued to hold their ground, and are in fact the 7's, S. M., C. M., and L. M. of our modern hymns; many of which are translations, or at any rate imitations, of Latin originals. These metres were peculiarly adapted to the grave and sombre spirit of Latin Christianity. Less ecstatic than the varied chorus of the Greek church, they did not soar upon the pinion of a lofty praise, so much as they drooped and sank into the depths of a great sorrow. They were subjective rather than objective; they appealed to the heart more than to the understanding; and if they contained less theology, they were fuller of a rich and Christian humanity. HYSSOP (אֵזוֹב, ézób: ὕσσωπος). Perhaps no plant mentioned in the Scriptures has given rise to greater differences of opinion than this. The question of the identification of the ézób of the Hebrews with any plant known to modern botanists was thought by Casaubon "adeo difficilis ad explicandum, ut videatur Esias expectandus, qui certi aliquid nos doceat." Had the botanical works of Solomon survived they might have thrown some light upon it. The chief difficulty arises from the fact that in the LXX. the Greek ὕσσωπος is the uniform rendering of the Hebrew ézób, and that this rendering is endorsed by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 19, 21), when speaking of the ceremonial observances of the Levitical law. Whether, therefore, the LXX. made use of the Greek ὕσσωπος as the word most nearly resembling the Hebrew in sound, as Stanley suggests (S. & P. 21, note), or as the true representative of the plant indicated by the latter, is a point which, in all probability, will never be decided. Botanists differ widely even with regard to the identification of the ὕσσωπος of Dioscorides. The name has been given to the Satureia Græca and the S. Juliana, to neither of which it is appropriate, and the hyssop of Italy and South France is not met with in Greece, Syria, or Egypt. Daubeny (Lect. on Rom. Husbandry, p. 313), following Sibthorpe, identifies the mountain-hyssop with the Thymbra spicata, but this conjecture is disapproved of by Kühn (Comm. in Diosc. iii. 27), who in the same passage gives it as his opinion that the Hebrews used the Origanum Ægyptiacum in Egypt, the O. Syriacum in Palestine, and that the hyssop of Dioscorides was the O. Smyrnæum. The Greek botanist describes two kinds of hyssop, ὀρεινή and κηπευτή and gives πεσαλέμ as the Egyptian equivalent.

The Talmudists make the same distinction between the wild hyssop and the garden-plant used for food.

The ézób was used to sprinkle the doorposts of the Israelites in Egypt with the blood of the paschal lamb (Ex. xii. 22); it was employed in the purification of lepers and leprous houses (Lev. xiv. 4, 51), and in the sacrifice of the red heifer (Num. xix. 6). In consequence of its detergent qualities, or from its being associated with the purificatory services, the Psalmist makes use of the expression, "purge me with ézób" (Ps. li. 7). It is described in 1 K. iv. 33 as growing on or near walls. In John xix. 29 the phrase ὑσσώπῳ περιθέντες corresponds to περιθεὶς καλάμῳ in Matt. xxvii. 48 and Mark xv. 36. If therefore καλάμῳ be the equivalent of ὑσσώπῳ, the latter must be a plant capable of producing a stick three or four feet in length.

Five kinds of hyssop are mentioned in the Talmud. One is called אזוב simply, without any epithet: the others are distinguished as Greek, Roman, wild hyssop, and hyssop of Cochali (Mishna, Negaim, xiv. 6). Of these the four last-mentioned were profane, that is, not to be employed in purifications (Mishna, Parah, xi. 7). Maimonides (de Vacca Rufa, iii. 2) says that the hyssop mentioned in the law is that which was used as a condiment. According to Porphyry (De Abstin. iv. 7), the Egyptian priests on certain occasions ate their bread mixed with hyssop; and the zaatar, or wild marjoram, with which it has been identified, is often an ingredient in a mixture called dukkah, which is to this day used as food by the poorer classes in Egypt (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 200). It is not improbable, therefore, that this may have been the hyssop of Maimonides, who wrote in Egypt; more especially as R. D. Kimchi (Lex. s. v.), who reckons seven different kinds, gives as the equivalent the Arabic زعتر, za'atar, origanum, or marjoram, and the German Dosten or Wohlgemuth (Rosenm. Handb.). With this agrees the Tanchum Hieros. MS. quoted by Gesenius. So in the Judæo-Spanish version, Ex. xii. 22 is translated "y tomarédes manojo de origano." But Dioscorides makes a distinction between origanum and hyssop when he describes the leaf of a species of the former as resembling the latter (cf. Plin. xx. 67), though it is evident that he, as well as the Talmudists, regarded them as belonging to the same family. In the Syriac of 1 K. iv. 33 hyssop is rendered by ܟܘܣܦܐ, kûfô, "housecleek," although in other passages it is represented by ܐܙܘܒ, zûfô, which the Arabic translation follows in Ps. li. 7 and Heb. ix. 19, while in the Pentateuch it has zaatar for the same. Patrick (on 1 K. iv. 33) was of opinion that ézób is the same with the Ethiopic azub, which represents the hyssop of Ps. li. 7, as well as ὑσσώπου, or mint, in Matt. xxiii. 23.

Bochart decides in favor of marjoram or some plant like it (Hieroz. i. b. 2, c. 50), and to this conclusion, it must be admitted, all ancient tradition points. The monks on Jebel Musa give the name of hyssop to a fragrant plant called ja'deh, which grows in great quantities on that mountain (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i. 157). Celsius (Hierobot. i. 423), after enumerating eighteen different plants, thyme, southernwood, rosemary, French lavender, wall rue, and the maidenhair fern among others, which have been severally identified with the hyssop of Scripture, concludes that we have no alternative but to accept the Hyssopus officinalis, "nisi velimus apostolum corrigere qui τὸ אזוב ὕσσωπον reddit Heb. ix. 19." He avoids the difficulty in John xix. 29 by supposing that a sponge filled with vinegar was wrapped round a bunch of hyssop, and that the two were then fastened to the end of a stick. Dr. Kitto conceived that he had found the peculiarities of the Hebrew ézób in the Phytolacca decandra, a native of America. Tremellius and Ben Zeb render it by "moss." It has been reserved for the ingenuity of a German to trace a connection between Æsop, the Greek fabulist, and the ézób of 1 K. iv. 33 (Hitzig, Die Sprüche Salomo's, Einl. § 2).

An elaborate and interesting paper by the late Dr. J. Forbes Royle, On the Hyssop of Scripture, in the Journ. of the Roy. As. Soc. viii. 193–212, goes far to throw light upon this difficult question. Dr. R., after a careful investigation of the subject, arrived at the conclusion that the hyssop is no other than the caper-plant, or capparis spinosa of Linnæus. The Arabic name of this plant, asuf, by which it is sometimes, though not commonly, described, bears considerable resemblance to the Hebrew. It is found in Lower Egypt (Forskål, Flor. Eg.-Arab.; Plin. xiii. 44). Burckhardt (Trav. in Syr., p. 536) mentions the aszef as a tree of frequent occurrence in the valleys of the peninsula of Sinai, "the bright green creeper which climbs out of the fissures of the rocks" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 21, &c.), and produces a fruit of the size of a walnut, called by the Arabs Felfel Jibbel, or mountain-pepper (Shaw, Spec. Phytogr. Afr. p. 39). Dr. R. thought this to be undoubtedly a species of capparis, and probably the caper-plant. The capparis spinosa was found by M. Bové (Rel. d'un Voy. Botan. en Eg., etc.) in the desert of Sinai, at Gaza, and at Jerusalem. Lynch saw it in a ravine near the convent of Mar Saba (Exped., p. 388). It is thus met with in all the localities where the ézób is mentioned in the Bible. With regard to its habitat, it grows in dry and rocky places, and on walls: "quippe quum capparis quoque seratur siccis maxime" (Plin. xix. 48). De Candolle describes it as found "in muris et rupestribus." The caper-plant was believed to be possessed of detergent qualities. According to Pliny (xx. 59) the root was applied to the cure of a disease similar to the leprosy. Lamarck (Enc. Botan. art. Caprier) says, "les capriers . . . sont regardés comme . . . antiscorbutiques." Finally, the caper-plant is capable of producing a stick three or four feet in length. Pliny (xiii. 44) describes it in Egypt as "firmioris ligni frutex," and to this property Dr. Royle attaches great importance, identifying as he does the ὑσσώπῳ of John xix. 29 with the καλάμῳ of Matthew and Mark. He thus concludes: "A combination of circumstances, and some of them apparently too improbable to be united in one plant, I cannot believe to be accidental, and have therefore considered myself entitled to infer, what I hope I have succeeded in proving to the satisfaction of others, that the caper-plant is the hyssop of Scripture." Whether his conclusion is sound or not, his investigations are well worthy of attention; but it must be acknowledged that, setting aside the passage in John xix., which may possibly admit of another solution, there seems no reason for supposing that the properties of the ézób of the Hebrews may not be found in some one of the plants with which the tradition of centuries has identified it. That it may have been possessed of some detergent qualities which led to its significant employment in the purificatory service is possible; but it does not appear from the narrative in Leviticus that its use was such as to call into action any medicinal properties by which it might have been characterized. In the present state of the evidence, therefore, there does not seem sufficient reason for departing from the old interpretation, which identified the Greek ὕσσωπος with the Hebrew אֵזוֹב. W. A. W.

* I. I design to give reasons, conclusive in my mind, against the supposition that the Capparis spinosa is the hyssop. (1.) It is a thorny plant highly unsuitable to the use intended; i. e. the being formed into a sort of wisp or brush, or bunch, suitable for sprinkling. Its branches are straggling and quite incapable of assuming the required form, and its harsh thorns would make it impossible to hold it in the hand. Can it be supposed that it was stripped of these to prepare it for use? (2.) It has no affinity with the زوفا, which is one of the Labiatæ, and which from its etymological identity with אֵזוֹב is entitled to be considered the plant referred to in the Scriptures.

II. I desire to present the evidence which satisfies my mind that the Origanum maru is the plant intended.

(1.) The definition of زوفا in Arabic is "a plant growing on a slender square stem" (a characteristic of the Labiatæ) "with a leaf like the slender صعق." This definition makes it certain that the Arabic Zûpha is very near the Origanum maru, for the latter is one of the numerous species included by the Arabs under the indefinite term صعق: in fact, it is the most common of them all.

(2.) It grows on the walls of all the terraces throughout Palestine and Syria.

(3.) It is free from thorns, and its slender stem, free from spreading branches, and ending in a cluster of heads, having a highly aromatic odor, exactly fits it to be made into a bunch for purposes of sprinkling. No plant growing in the East is so well fitted for the purpose. These considerations have long persuaded me that this is the plant intended.[a]

Origanum maru. (G. E. Post fecit.)

Its leaves are commonly eaten in Syria with bread, and as a seasoning, as we use summer savory, which it resembles in taste. Its effects on sheep and goats are very salutary. G. E. P.

IB'HAR (יִבְחָר [whom God chooses]: Ἐβεάρ, Ἐβαάρ, Βαάρ; [Vat. Βααρ in 1 Chr.;] Alex. Ιεβαρ, Ιεβααρ: Syr. Jucobor: Jebahar, Jebaar), one of the sons of David, mentioned in the lists next after Solomon and before Elishua (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chr. iii. 6, xiv. 5). Ibhar was born in Jerusalem, and from the second of these passages it appears that he was the son of a wife and not of a concubine. He never comes forward in the history in person, nor are there any traditions concerning him. For the genealogy of David's family see DAVID.

IB'LEAM (יִבְלְעָם [conqueror or devourer of the people]: [in Josh., Rom. Vat. Alex. omit, Comp. Ἰαβλαάμ: in Judg.,] Ἰεβλαάμ, Alex. Βαλααμ; [in 2 K., Vat. Εκβλααμ, Rom. Alex. Ἰεβλαάμ:] Jeblaam), a city of Manasseh, with villages or towns (Hebrew "daughters") dependent on it (Judg. i. 27). Though belonging to Manasseh, it appears not to have lain within the limits allotted to that tribe, but to have been situated in the territory of either Issachar or Asher (Josh. xvii. 11). It is not said which of the two, though there is no doubt from other indications that it was the former. The ascent of GUR, the spot at which Ahaziah received his death wound from the soldiers of Jehu, was "at (בְּ) Ibleam" (2 K. ix. 27), somewhere near the present Jenin, probably to the north of it, about where the village Jelama now stands.

In the list of cities given out of Manassch to the Kohathite Levites (1 Chr. vi. 70), BILEAM is mentioned, answering to Gathrimmon in the list of Josh. xxi. Bileam is probably a mere alteration of Ibleam (comp. the form given in the Alex. LXX. above), though this is not certain. G.

IBNE'IAH [3 syl.] (יִבְנֵיָהוּ [Jehovah builds]: Ἰεμναά; [Vat. Βανααμ; Comp. Ald.] Alex. Ἰεβναά: Jobunia), son of Jeroham, a Benjamite, who was a chief man in the tribe apparently at the time of the first settlement in Jerusalem (1 Chr. ix. 8).

IBNI'JAH (יִבְנִיָּה [as above]: Ἰεμναί, [Vat. Βανααι:] Alex. Ιεβανααι: Jebunia), a Benjamite (1 Chr. ix. 8).

IB'RI (עִבְרִי [Hebrew]: Ἀβαΐ; Alex. Ωβδι; [Comp. Ἀβαρί:] Hebri), a Merarite Levite of the family of Jaaziah (1 Chr. xxiv. 27), in the time of king David, concerned in the service of the house of Jehovah.

The word is precisely the same as that elsewhere rendered in the A. V. "Hebrew," which see.

IB'ZAN (אִבְצָן) [swift, fleet, Dietr.; splendid, beautiful, Fürst]: Ἀβαισσάν; [Vat. Ἀβισσαν:] Alex. Εσεβων: Joseph. Ἀψάνης: Abesan), a native of Bethlehem, who judged Israel for seven years after Jephthah (Judg. xii. 8, 10). He had 30 sons and 30 daughters, and took home 30 wives for his sons, and sent out his daughters to as many husbands abroad. He was buried at Bethlehem. From the non-addition of "Ephratah," or "Judah," after Bethlehem, and from Ibzan having been succeeded by a Zebulonite, it seems pretty certain that the Bethlehem here meant is that in the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15: see Joseph. Ant. v. 7, § 73). There is not a shadow of probability in the notion which has been broached as to the identity of Ibzan with Boaz (בֹּעַז). The history of his large family is singularly at variance with the impression of Boaz given us in the book of Ruth.

ICO'NIUM (Ἰκόνιον), the modern Konieh, is situated in the western part of an extensive plain, on the central table-land of Asia Minor, and not far to the north of the chain of Taurus. This level district was anciently called LYCAONIA. Xenophon (Anab. i. 2, 19) reckons Iconium as the most easterly town of PHRYGIA; but all other writers speak of it as being in Lycaonia, of which it was practically the capital. It was on the great line of communication between Ephesus and the western coast of the peninsula on one side, and Tarsus, Antioch, and the Euphrates on the other. We see this indicated by the narrative of Xenophon

Iconium (Konieh). (Laborde, Voyage en Orient.)

(l. c.) and the letters of Cicero (ad Fam. iii. 8, v. 20, xv. 4). When the Roman provincial system was matured, some of the most important roads intersected one another at this point, as may be seen from the map in Leake's Asia Minor. These circumstances should be borne in mind, when we trace St. Paul's journeys through the district. Iconium was a well-chosen place for missionary operations. The Apostle's first visit was on his first circuit, in company with Barnabas; and on this occasion he approached it from Antioch in Pisidia, which lay to the west. From that city he had been driven by the persecution of the Jews (Acts xiii. 50, 51). There were Jews in Iconium also; and St. Paul's first efforts here, according to his custom, were made in the synagogue (xiv. 1). The results were considerable both among the Hebrew and Gentile population of the place (ibid.). We should notice that the working of miracles in Iconium is emphatically mentioned (xiv. 3). The intrigues of the Jews again drove him away; he was in danger of being stoned, and he withdrew to LYSTRA and DERBE in the eastern and wilder part of Lycaonia (xiv. 6). Thither also the enmity of the Jews of Antioch and Iconium pursued him; and at Lystra he was actually stoned and left for dead (xiv. 19). After an interval, however, he returned over the old ground, revisiting Iconium and encouraging the church which he had founded there (xiv. 21, 22). These sufferings and difficulties are alluded to in 2 Tim. iii. 11; and this brings us to the consideration of his next visit to this neighborhood, which was the occasion of his first practically associating himself with TIMOTHY. Paul left the Syrian Antioch, in company with Silas (Acts xv. 40), on his second missionary circuit; and travelling through CILICIA (xv. 41), and up through the passes of Taurus into Lycaonia, approached Iconium from the east, by Derbe and Lystra (xvi. 1, 2). Though apparently a native of Lystra, Timothy was evidently well known to the Christians of Iconium (xvi. 2); and it is not improbable that his circumcision (xvi. 3) and ordination (1 Tim. . 18, iv. 14 vi. 12; 2 Tim. i. 6) took place there. On leaving Iconium St. Paul and his party travelled to the N. W.; and the place is not mentioned again in the sacred narrative: though there is little doubt that it was visited by the Apostle again in the early part of his third circuit (Acts xviii. 23). From its position it could not fail to be an important centre of Christian influence in the early ages of the church. The curious apocryphal legend of St. Thècla, of which Iconium is the scene, must not be entirely passed by. The "Acta Pauli et Theclae" are given in full by Grabe (Spicil. vol. i.), and by Jones (On the Canon, vol. ii. pp. 353–411). It is natural here to notice one geographical mistake in that document, namely, that Lystra is placed on the west instead of the east. In the declining period of the Roman empire, Iconium was made a colonia. In the middle ages it became a place of great consequence, as the capital of the Seljukian sultans. Hence the remains of Saracenic architecture, which are conspicuous here, and which are described by many travellers. Konieh is still a town of considerable size. J. S. H.

* The origin of the name is obscure. Some find it allied to εἰκών or εἰκόνιον (="place of images") while others derive it from a Semitic root (see Pauly's Real-Encykl. iv. 51). It was situated on one of the largest plains in Asia Minor, and, like Damascus, formed an oasis in the desert. "The rills that flowed from mountain ranges on the west of the city irrigated, for a little distance, the low grounds which stretched away towards the east, and gardens and orchards were seen in luxuriance, but soon the water, the source of vegetation, was exhausted, and then commenced the dry barren plain of Lycaonia." (See Lewin's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 158.) The eyes of Paul and Barnabas must have rested for hours on the city both before reaching it from Antioch and after leaving it for Lystra. "We travelled," says Ainsworth, "three hours along the plain of Koniyeh, always in sight of the city, before we reached it" (Travels in Asia Minor, ii. 65). Leake says, "We saw the city with its mosques and ancient walls still at the distance of 12 or 14 miles from us" (Travels in Asia Minor, p. 45).

Luke's statement that Paul found there "a great multitude both of Jews and Greeks" (Acts xiv. 1), accords with the extent and variety of the ruins still found on the spot. It accords also with the geographical position of the place so well situated for trade and intercourse with other regions. The Greeks and Jews were the commercial factors of that period, as they are so largely at the present time; and hence the narrative mentions them as very numerous precisely here. The bulk of the population belonged to a different stock. The possession of a common language gave the missionaries access at once to the Greek-speaking foreigners.

The Apostle's narrow escape from being stoned at Iconium (Acts xiv. 5) recalls to us a passage in one of the epistles. Paul was actually stoned at Lystra (Acts xiv. 19), soon after his departure from Iconium, and referring to that instance when he wrote to the Corinthians, he says (2 Cor. xi. 25): "Once was I stoned." Hence, says Paley (Horæ Paulinæ), "had this meditated assault at Iconium been completed, had the history related that a stone was thrown, as it relates that preparations were made both by Jews and Gentiles to stone Paul and his companions, or even had the account of this transaction stopped, without going on to inform us that Paul and his companions were 'aware of the danger and fled,' a contradiction between the history and the epistles would have ensued Truth is necessarily consistent: but it is scarcely possible that independent accounts, not having truth to guide them, should thus advance to the very brink of contradiction without falling into it." ID'ALAH (יִדְאָלָה) [memorial stone of El (God), Fürst]: Ἰεριχώ [Vat. -ρει-]; Alex. Ἰαδηλα: Jedila and Jerati), one of the cities of the tribe of Zebulun, named between Shimron and Bethlehem (Josh. xix. 15). Schwarz (p. 172), without quoting his authority, but probably from one of the Talmudical books, gives the name as "Yidalah or Chirii," and would identify it with the village "Kellah al-Chiré, 6 miles S. W. of Semunii." Semuniyeh is known and marked on many of the maps, rather less than 3 miles S. of Beit-lahm; but the other place mentioned by Schwarz has evaded observation. It is not named in the Onomasticon. G.

ID'BASH (יִדְבָּשׁ) [stout, corpulent]: Ἰεβδάς; [Vat. Ιαβας; Comp. Ἰεδεβάς;] Alex. Ιγαβης: Jedebus), one of the three sons of Abi-Etam—"the father of Etam"—among the families of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3). The Tzelelpouite is named as his sister. This list is probably a topographical one, a majority of the names being those of places.

ID'DO 1. (עִדּוֹ: Σαδδώ; [Vat. corrupt;] Alex. Σαδωκ: Addo.) The father of Abinadab, one of Solomon's monthly purveyors (1 K. iv. 14).

2. (עִדּוֹ: Ἀδδί; [Vat. Αδει; Comp. Ald. Ἀδδώ:] Addo.) A descendant of Gershom, son of Levi (1 Chr. vi. 21). In the reversed genealogy (ver. 41) the name is altered to UDAIAH, and we there discover that he was one of the forefathers of Asaph the seer.

3. (יְדוֹ [favorite]: Ἰαδαΐ; [Vat. Ιαδδαι;] Alex. Ιαδδαΐ: Jaddo.) Son of Zechariah, ruler (nâgîd) of the tribe of Manasseh east of Jordan in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 21).

4. (יֶעְדּוֹ, i. e. Ye'doi [born on a festival, Fürst]; but in the correction of the Keri יִעְדּוֹ, Ye'do: Ἰωήλ, Ἀδδώ [Vat. Αδω]: Addo.) A seer (חֹזֶה) whose "visions" (חָזוֹת) against Jeroboam incidentally contained some of the acts of Solomon (2 Chr. ix. 29). He also appears to have written a chronicle or story (Midrash, Ges. p. 357) relating to the life and reign of Abijah (2 Chr. xiii. 22), and also a book "concerning genealogies," in which the acts of Rehoboam were recorded (xii. 15). These books are lost, but they may have formed part of the foundation of the existing books of Chronicles (Bertheau, On Chron. Introd. § 3). The mention of his having prophesied against Jeroboam probably led to his identification in the ancient Jewish traditions (Jerome, Quæst. Heb. in 2 Chr. xii. 15, Jaddo; Joseph. Ant. viii. 3, § 5, Ἰαδώη) with the "Man of God" out of Judah, who denounced the altar of that king (1 K. xiii. 1). He is also identified with Oded (see Jerome on 2 Chr. xv. 1).

5. (עִדּוֹא; in Zech. [i. 7,] עִדּוֹ: Ἀδδώ; [in Ezr., Vat. Αδω; in Neh., Vat. Alex. FA. omit, and so Rom. in xii. 4:] Addo.) The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i. 1, 7), although in other places Zechariah is called "the son of Iddo" (Ezr. v. 1, vi. 14). Iddo returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 4), and in the next generation—the "days of Joiakim" son of Jeshua (vv. 10, 12)—his house was represented by Zechariah (ver. 14). In 1 Esdr. vi. 1 the name is ADDO.

6. (Ἀδδεί: [LXX. omit, exc. Comp. once Ἀδδαεί:] Eddo.) The chief of those who assembled at Casiphia, at the time of the second caravan from Babylon, in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus B. C. 458. He was one of the Nethinim, of whom 220 responded to the appeal of Ezra to assist in the return to Judæa (Ezr. viii. 17; comp. 20). In the Apocr. Esdras the name is SADDEUS and DADDEUS. G.

IDOL, IMAGE. As no less than twenty-one different Hebrew words have been rendered in the A. V. either by idol or image, and that by no means uniformly, it will be of some advantage to attempt to discriminate between them, and assign, as nearly as the two languages will allow, the English equivalents for each. But, before proceeding to the discussion of those words which in themselves indicate the objects of false worship, it will be necessary to notice a class of abstract terms, which, with a deep moral significance, express the degradation associated with it, and stand out as a protest of the language against the enormities of idolatry. Such are —

1. אָוֶן, âven, rendered elsewhere "nought," "vanity," "iniquity," "wickedness," "sorrow," etc., and once only "idol" (Is. lxvi. 3). The primary idea of the root seems to be emptiness, nothingness, as of breath or vapor; and, by a natural transition, in a moral sense, wickedness in its active form of mischief, and then, as the result, sorrow and trouble. Hence âven denotes a vain, false, wicked thing, and expresses at once the essential nature of idols, and the consequences of their worship. The character of the word may be learnt from its associates. It stands in parallelism with אֶפֶס, ephes (Is xli. 29), which, after undergoing various modifications, comes at length to signify "nothing;" with הֶבֶל, hebel, "breath" or "vapor," itself applied as a term of contempt to the objects of idolatrous reverence (Deut. xxxii. 21; 1 K. xvi. 13; Ps. xxxi. 6; Jer. viii. 19, x. 8); with שָׁוְא, shâv, "nothingness," "vanity;" and with שֶׁקֶר, sheker, "falsehood" (Zech. x. 2): all indicating the utter worthlessness of the idols to whom homage was paid, and the false and delusive nature of their worship. It is employed in an abstract sense to denote idolatry in general in 1 Sam. xv. 23. There is much significance in the change of name from Beth-el to Beth-aven, the great centre of idolatry in Israel (Hos. iv. 15).

2. אֱלִיל, ĕlil, is thought by some to have a sense akin to that of שֶׁקֶר, sheker, "falsehood," with which it stands in parallelism in Job xiii. 4, and would therefore much resemble âven, as applied to an idol. Delitzsch (on Hab. ii. 18) derives it from the negative particle אַל, al, "die Nichtigen." But according to Fürst (Handw. s. v.) it is a diminutive of אֵל, "god," the additional syllable indicating the greatest contempt. In this case the signification above mentioned is a subsidiary one. The same authority asserts that the word denotes a small image of the god, which was consulted as an oracle among the Egyptians and Phœnicians (Is. xix. 3; Jer. xiv. 14). It is certainly used of the idols of Noph or Memphis (Ez xxx. 13). In strong contrast with Jehovah it appears in Ps. xcvi. 5, xcvii. 7: the contrast probably being heightened by the resemblance between ĕlîlim and ĕlôhîm. A somewhat similar play upon words is observable in Hab. ii. 18, אֲלִילִים אֶלְמִים, ĕlîlim illĕmîm "dumb idols," A. V.).

3. אִימָה, êmâh, "horror" or "terror," and hence an object of horror or terror (Jer. l. 38), in reference either to the hideousness of the idols or to the gross character of their worship. In this respect it is closely connected with —

4. מִפְלֶצֶת, miphletseth, a "fright," "horror," applied to the idol of Maachah, probably of wood, which Asa cut down and burned (1 K. xv. 13; 2 Chr. xv. 16), and which was unquestionably the Phallus, the symbol of the productive power of nature (Movers, Phœn. i. 571; Selden, de Dis Syr. ii. 5), and the nature-goddess Ashera. Allusion is supposed to be made to this in Jer. x. 5, and Epist. of Jer. 70 [in the Apocrypha]. In 2 Chr. xv. 16 the Vulg. render "simulacrum Priapi" (cf. Hor., "furum aviumque maxima formido"). The LXX. had a different reading, which it is not easy to determine. They translate in 1 K. xv. 13 the same word both by σύνοδος (with which corresponds the Syr. ܟܢܘܫܐ, 'idô. "a festival," reading perhaps עֲשֵׁרֶת, 'âtsereth, as in 2 K. x. 20; Jer. ix. 2) and καταδύσεις, while in Chronicles it is εἴδωλον. Possibly in 1 K. xv. 13 they may have read מִפְלַצְתָּה, m'tsullâthâh, for מִפְלַטְתָּה, miphlatstâh, as the Vulg. specum, of which "simulacrum turpissimum" is a correction. With this must be noticed, though not actually rendered, "image" or "idol."

5. בֹּשֶׁת, bôsheth, "shame," or "shameful thing" (A. V. Jer. xi. 13; Hos. ix. 10), applied to Baal or Baal-Peor, as characterizing the obscenity of his worship. With ĕlîl is found in close connection —

6. גִּלּוּלִים, gillûlim, also a term of contempt, but of uncertain origin (Ez. xxx. 13). The Rabbinical authorities, referring to such passages as Ez. iv. 12, Zeph. i. 17, have favored the interpretation given in the margin of the A. V. to Deut. xxix. 17, "dungy gods" (Vulg. "sordes," "sordes idolorum," 1 K. xv. 12). Jahn connects it with גָּלַל, gâlal, "to roll," and applies it to the stocks of trees of which idols were made, and in mockery called gillûlîm, "rolling things" (a volvendo, he says, though it is difficult to see the point of his remark). Gesenius, repudiating the derivation from the Arab. جَلَّ, jalla, "to be great, illustrious," gives his preference to the rendering "stones, stone gods," thus deriving it from גַּל, gal, "a heap of stones;" and in this he is followed by Fürst, who translates gillûl by the Germ. "Steinhaufe." The expression is applied, principally in Ezekiel, to false gods and their symbols (Deut. xxix. 17; Ez. viii. 10, &c.). It stands side by side with other contemptuous terms in Ez. xvi. 36, xx. 8; as for example שִׁקּוּץ, shekets, "filth," "abomination (Ez. viii. 10), and —

7. The cognate שִׁקּוּץ, shikkûts, "filth," "impurity," especially applied, like shekets, to that which produced ceremonial uncleanness (Ez. xxxvii. 23; Nah. iii. 6), such as food offered in sacrifice to idols (Zech. ix. 7; comp. Acts xv. 20, 29). As referring to the idols themselves, it primarily denotes the obscene rites with which their worship was associated, and hence, by metonymy, is applied both to the objects of worship and also to their worshippers, who partook of the impurity, and thus "became loathsome like their love," the foul Baal-Peor (Hos. ix. 10).

We now come to the consideration of those words which more directly apply to the images or idols, as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshipped through them. These may be classified according as they indicate that the images were made in imitation of external objects, and to represent some idea, or attribute; or as they denote the workmanship by which they were fashioned. To the first class belong —

8. כְּמֶל, semel, or כְּמֵל, sêmel, with which Gesenius compares as cognate מָשָׁל, mâshâl, and צֶלֶם, tselem, the Lat. similis and Greek ὁμαλός, signifies a "likeness," "semblance." The Targ. in Deut. iv. 16 gives צוּרְיָא, tsûrâ, "figure," as the equivalent; while in Ez. viii. 3, 5, it is rendered by צֶלֶם, ts'lam, "image." In the latter passages the Syriac has ܩܛܡܐ, koimtô, "a statue" (the στήλη of the LXX.), which more properly corresponds to mutstsebâh (see No. 15 below); and in Deut. ܓܢܣ, genês, "kind" (=γένος).

The passage in 2 Chr. xxxiii. 7 is rendered "images of four faces," the latter words representing the one under consideration.[a] In 2 Chr. xxxiii. 15 it appears as "carved images," following the LXX. τὸ γλυπτόν. On the whole the Greek εἰκών of Deut. iv. 16, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 7, and the "simulacrum" of the Vulgate (2 Chr. xxxiii. 15) most nearly resemble the Hebrew semel.

9. צֶלֶם, tselem (Ch. id. and צְלֶם, tselam) is by all lexicographers, ancient and modern, connected with צֵל, tsêl, "a shadow." It is the "image" of God in which man was created (Gen. i. 27; cf. Wisd. ii. 23), distinguished from דְּמוּת, demûth, or "likeness," as the "image" from the "idea" which it represents (Schmidt, de Imag. Dei in Hom. p. 84), though it would be rash to insist upon this distinction. In the N. T. εἰκών appears to represent the latter (Col. iii. 10; cf. LXX. of Gen. v. 1), as ὁμοίωμα the former of the two words (Rom. i. 23, viii. 29; Phil. ii. 7), but in Heb. x. 1 εἰκών is opposed to σκία as the substance to the unsubstantial form, of which it is the perfect representative. The LXX. render demûth by ὁμοίωσις, ὁμοίωμα, εἰκών, ὅμοιος, and tselem most frequently by εἰκών, though ὁμοίωμα, εἴδωλον, and τύπος also occur. But whatever abstract term may best define the meaning of tselem, it is unquestionably used to denote the visible forms of external objects, and is applied to figures of gold and silver (1 Sam. vi. 5; Num. xxxiii. 52; Dan iii. 1), such as the golden image of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as to those painted upon walls (Ez. xxiii. 14). "Image" perhaps most nearly represents it in all passages. Applied to the human countenance (Dan. iii. 19) it signifies the "expression," and corresponds to the εἰδέα of Matt. xxviii. 3, though demûth agrees rather with the Platonic usage of the latter word.

10. תְּמוּנָה, temûnâh, rendered "image" in Job iv. 16; elsewhere "similitude" (Deut. iv. 12), "likeness" (Deut. v. 8): "form," or "shape" would be better. In Deut. iv. 16 it is in parallelism with תַּבְנִית, tabnîth, literally "build;" hence "plan," or "model" (2 K. xvi. 10; cf. Ex. xx. 4; Num. xii. 8).

11. עָצָב, 'âtsâb, 12. עֶצֶב, 'etseb (Jer. xxii. 28), or 13. עֹצֶב, 'ôtseb (Is. xlviii. 5), "a figure," all derived from a root עָצַב, 'âtsab, "to work," or "fashion" (akin to חָצַב, châtsab, and the like), are terms applied to idols as expressing that their origin was due to the labor of man. The verb in its derived senses indicates the sorrow and trouble consequent upon severe labor, but the latter seems to be the radical idea. If the notion of sorrow were most prominent the words as applied to idols might be compared with ἄνεν above. Is. lvii. 3 is rendered in the Peshito Syriac "idols" (A. V. "labors"), but the reading was evidently different. In Ps. cxxxix. 24, דֶּרֶךְ עֹצֶב, derec-ôtseb, is "idolatry."

14. צִיר, tsîr, once only applied to an idol (Is. xlv. 16; LXX. νῆσοι, as if אִיִּים, iyyîm). The word usually denotes "a pang," but in this instance is probably connected with the roots צוּר, tsûr, and יָצַר, yâtsar, and signifies "a shape," or "mould," and hence an "idol."

15. מַצֵּבָה, mutstsebâh, anything set up, a "statue" (= נְצִיב, n'tsîb, Jer. xliii. 13), applied to a memorial stone like those erected by Jacob on four several occasions (Gen. xxviii. 18, xxxi. 45, xxxv. 14, 15) to commemorate a crisis in his life, or to mark the grave of Rachel. Such were the stones set up by Joshua (Josh. iv. 9) after the passage of the Jordan, and at Shechem (xxiv. 26), and by Samuel when victorious over the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 12). When solemnly dedicated they were anointed with oil, and libations were poured upon them. The word is applied to denote the obelisks which stood at the entrance to the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis (Jer. xliii. 13), two of which were a hundred cubits high and eight broad, each of a single stone (Her. ii. 111). It is also used of the statues of Baal (2 K. iii. 2), whether of stone (2 K. x. 27) or wood (id. 26), which stood in the innermost recess of the temple at Samaria. Movers (Phœn. i. 674) conjectures that the latter were statues or columns distinct from that of Baal, which was of stone and conical (673), like the "meta" of Paphos (Tac. H. ii. 3), and probably therefore

[a] There are many passages in the Syr. of Chronicles which it is impossible to reconcile with the received Hebrew text; and the translation of these books is on the whole inferior in accuracy to that of the rest of the O. T belonging to other deities who were his πάρεδροι or σύμβωμοι. The Phœnicians consecrated and anointed stones like that at Bethel, which were called, as some think, from this circumstance Bætylia. Many such are said to have been seen on the Lebanon, near Heliopolis, dedicated to various gods, and many prodigies are related of them (Damascius in Photius, quoted by Bochart, Canaan, ii 2). The same authority describes them as aërolites, of a whitish and sometimes purple color, spherical in shape, and about a span in diameter. The Palladium of Troy, the black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca, said to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel, and the stone at Ephesus "which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts xix. 35), are examples of the belief, anciently so common, that the gods sent down their images upon earth. In the older worship of Greece stones, according to Pausanias (vii. 22, § 4), occupied the place of images. Those at Pharæ, about thirty in number, and quadrangular in shape, near the statue of Hermes, received divine honors from the Pharians, and each had the name of some god conferred upon it. The stone in the temple of Jupiter Ammon (umbilico maxime similis), enriched with emeralds and gems (Curt. iv. 7, § 31); that at Delphi, which Saturn was said to have swallowed (Paus. Phoc. 24, § 6); the black stone of pyramidal shape in the temple of Juggernaut, and the holy stone at Pessinus in Galatia, sacred to Cybele, show how widely spread and almost universal were these ancient objects of worship. Closely connected with these "statues" of Baal, whether in the form of obelisks or otherwise, were —

16. חַמָּנִים, chammânîm, rendered in the margin of most passages "sun-images." The word has given rise to much discussion. In the Vulgate it is translated thrice simulacra, thrice delubra, and once fana. The LXX. give τεμένη twice, εἴδωλα twice. ξύλινα χειροποίητα, βδελύγματα, and τὰ ὑψηλα. With one exception (2 Chr. xxxiv. 4, which is evidently corrupt) the Syriac has vaguely either "fears," i. e. objects of fear, or "idols." The Targum in all passages translates it by חֲנִיסְכָּיָא, chănisn'sayyâ, "houses for star-worship" (Fürst compares the Arab. خُنَّس, Chunnas, the planet Mercury or Venus), a rendering which Rosenmüller supports. Gesenius preferred to consider these chănisn'sayyâ as "veils" or "shrines surrounded or shrouded with hangings" (Ez. xvi. 16; Targ. on Is. iii. 19), and scouted the interpretation of Buxtorf — "statuæ solares" — as a mere guess, though he somewhat paradoxically assented to Rosenmüller's opinion that they were "shrines dedicated to the worship of the stars." Kimchi, under the root חמן, mentions a conjecture that they were trees like the Asherim, but (s. v. חמם) elsewhere expresses his own belief that the Nun is epenthetic, and that they were so called "because the sun-worshippers made them." Aben Ezra (on Lev. xxvi. 30) says they were "houses made for worshipping the sun," which Bochart approves (Canaan, ii. 17), and Jarchi, that they were a kind of idol placed on the roofs of houses. Vossius (de Idol. ii. 353), as Scaliger before him, connects the word with Amanus, or Omanus, the sacred fire, the symbol of the Persian sun-god, and renders it pyræa (cf. Selden. ii. 8). Adelung (Mithrid. i. 159, quoted by Gesen. on Is. xvii. 8) suggested the same, and compared it with the Sanskrit hona. But to such interpretations the passage in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 4, is inimical (Vitringa on Is. xvii. 8). Gesenius' own opinion appears to have fluctuated considerably. In his notes on Isaiah (l. c.) he prefers the general rendering "columns" to the more definite one of "sun-columns," and is inclined to look to a Persian origin for the derivation of the word. But in his Thesaurus he mentions the occurrence of Chammon as a synonym of Baal in the Phœnician and Palmyrene inscriptions in the sense of "Dominus Solaris," and its after application to the statues or columns erected for his worship. Spencer (de Legg. Hebr. ii. 25), and after him Michaelis (Suppl. ad Lex. Hebr. s. v.), maintained that it signified statues or lofty columns, like the pyramids or obelisks of Egypt. Movers (Phœn. i. 441) concludes with good reason that the sun-god Baal and the idol "Chamman" are not essentially different. In his discussion of Chammânîm, he says, "These images of the fire-god were placed on foreign or non-Israelitish altars, in conjunction with the symbols of the nature-goddess Asherah, as σύμβωμοι (2 Chr. xiv. 3, 5, xxxiv. 4, 7; Is. xvii. 9, xxvii. 9), as was otherwise usual with Baal and Asherah." They are mentioned with the Asherim, and the latter are coupled with the statues of Baal (1 K. xiv. 23; 2 K. xxiii. 14). The chammânîm and statues are used promiscuously (cf. 2 K. xxiii. 14, and 2 Chr. xxxiv. 4; 2 Chr. xiv. 3 and 5), but are never spoken of together. Such are the steps by which he arrives at his conclusion. He is supported by the Palmyrene inscription at Oxford, alluded to above, which has been thus rendered: "This column (חמנא, Chammânîm), and this altar, the sons of Malchu, etc. have erected and dedicated to the Sun." The Veneto-Greek Version leaves the word untranslated in the strange form ἀκάβαντες. From the expressions in Ez. vi. 4, 6, and Lev. xxvi. 30, it may be inferred that these columns, which perhaps represented a rising flame of fire and stood upon the altar of Baal (2 Chr. xxxiv. 4), were of wood or stone.

17. מַשְׂכִּית, mascîth, occurs in Lev. xxvi. 1; Num. xxxiii. 52; Ez. viii. 12: "device" most nearly suits all passages (cf. Ps. lxxiii. 7; Prov. xviii. 11, xxv. 11). This word has been the fruitful cause of as much dispute as the preceding.

The general opinion appears to be that אֶבֶן מַ֫, eben mascîth, signifies a stone with figures graven upon it. Ben Zeb explains it as "a stone with figures or hieroglyphics carved upon it," and so Michaelis; and it is maintained by Movers (Phœn. i. 105) that the bætylia, or columns with painted figures, the "lapides effigiati" of Minucius Felix (c. 3), are these "stones of device," and that the characters engraven on them are the ἱερὰ στοιχεῖα, or characters sacred to the several deities. The invention of these characters, which is ascribed to Taaut, he conjectures originated with the Seres. Gesenius explains it as a stone with the image of an idol, Baal or Astarte, and refers to his Mon. Phœn. 21–24 for others of similar character. Rashi (on Lev. xxxi. 1) derives it from the root שׂכך, to cover, "because they cover the floor with a pavement of stones." The Targum and Syr. Lev. xxvi. 1, give "stone of devotion," and the former in Num. xxxiii. 52, has "house of their devotion," where the Syr. only renders "their objects of devotion." For the former the LXX. have λίθος σκοπός, and for the latter τὰς σκοπιὰς αὐτῶν, connecting the word with the root שָׁקַד, "to look," a circumstance which has induced Saalschütz (Mos. Recht, pp. 382–385) to conjecture that eben mascith was originally a smooth elevated stone employed for the purpose of obtaining from it a freer prospect, and of offering prayer in prostration upon it to the deities of heaven. Hence, generally, he concludes it signifies a stone of prayer or devotion, and the "chambers of imagery" of Ez. viii. 7, are "chambers of devotion." The renderings of the last-mentioned passage in the LXX. and Targum, are curious as pointing to a various reading מְשַׁכְּרוֹ, or more probably מְשַׁכְּבוֹ.

18. תְּרָפִים, terâphim. [TERAPHIM.]

The terms which follow have regard to the material and workmanship of the idol rather than to its character as an object of worship.

19. פֶּסֶל, pesel, and 20. פְּסִילִים, pesîlim, usually translated in the A. V. "graven or carved images." In two passages the latter is ambiguously rendered "quarries" (Judg. iii. 19, 26) following the Targum, but there seems no reason for departing from the ordinary signification. In the majority of instances the LXX. have γλυπτόν, once γλύμμα. The verb is employed to denote the finishing which the stone received at the hands of the masons, after it had been rough-hewn from the quarries (Ex. xxxiv. 4; 1 K. v. 18). It is probably a later usage which has applied pesel[a] to a figure cast in metal, as in Is. xl. 19, xlix. 10. These "sculptured" images were apparently of wood, iron, or stone, covered with gold or silver (Deut. vii. 25; Is. xxx. 22; Hab. ii. 19), the more costly being of solid metal (Is. xl. 19). They could be burnt (Deut. vii. 5; Is. xlv. 20; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 4), cut down (Deut. xii. 3) and pounded (2 Chr. xxxiv. 7), or broken in pieces (Is. xxi. 9). In making them, the skill of the wise iron-smith (Deut. xxvii. 15; Is. xl. 20) or carpenter, and of the goldsmith, was employed (Judg. xvii. 3, 4; Is. xli. 7), the former supplying the rough mass of iron beaten into shape on his anvil (Is. xliv. 12), while the latter overlaid it with plates of gold and silver, probably from Tarshish (Jer. x. 9), and decorated it with silver chains. The image thus formed received the further adornment of embroidered robes (Ez. xvi. 18), to which possibly allusion may be made in Is. iii. 19. Brass and clay were among the materials employed for the same purpose (Dan. ii. 33, v. 23).[b] A description of the three great images of Babylon on the top of the temple of Belus will be found in Diod. Sic. ii. 9 (comp. Layard, Nin. ii. 433). The several stages of the process by which the metal or wood became the "graven image" are so vividly described in Is. xliv. 10–20, that it is only necessary to refer to that passage, and we are at once introduced to the mysteries of idol manufacture, which, as at Ephesus, "brought no small gain unto the craftsmen."

21. נֶסֶךְ, nesec, or נְסֵךְ, nésec, and 22. מַסֵּכָה, massêcâh, are evidently synonymous (Is. xli. 29, xlviii. 5; Jer. x. 14) in later Hebrew, and denote a "molten" image. Massêcâh is frequently used in distinction from pesel or pesîlim (Deut. xxvii. 15; Judg. xvii. 3, &c.). The golden calf which Aaron made was fashioned with "the graver" (חֶרֶט, cheret), but it is not quite clear for what purpose the graver was used (Ex. xxxii. 4). The cheret (cf. Gr. χαράττω) appears to have been a sharp-pointed instrument, used like the stylus for a writing implement (Is. viii. 1). Whether then Aaron, by the help of the cheret, gave to the molten mass the shape of a calf, or whether he made use of the graver for the purpose of carving hieroglyphics upon it, has been thought doubtful. The Syr. has ܛܦܣܐ, túpsô (τύπος), "the mould," for cheret. But the expression וַיָּצַר, vayyâtsâr, decides that it was by the cheret, in whatever manner employed, that the shape of a calf was given to the metal.

In N. T. εἰκών is the "image" or head of the emperor on the coinage (Matt. xxii. 20).

Among the earliest objects of worship, regarded as symbols of deity, were, as has been said above, the meteoric stones which the ancients believed to have been the images of the gods sent down from heaven. From these they transferred their regard to rough unhewn blocks, to stone columns or pillars of wood, in which the divinity worshipped was supposed to dwell, and which were consecrated, like the sacred stone at Delphi, by being anointed with oil, and crowned with wool on solemn days (Paus. Phoc. 24, § 6). Tavernier (quoted by Rosenmüller, Alt. & N. Morgenland, i. § 89) mentions a black stone in the pagoda of Benares which was daily anointed with perfumed oil, and such are the "Lingams" in daily use in the Siva worship of Bengal (cf. Arnobius, i. 39; Min. Fel. c. 3). Such customs are remarkable illustrations of the solemn consecration by Jacob of the stone at Bethel, as showing the religious reverence with which these memorials were regarded. And not only were single stones thus honored, but heaps of stone were, in later times at least, considered as sacred to Hermes (Hom. Od. xvi. 471; cf. Vulg. Prov. xxvi. 8, "sicut qui mittit lapidem in acervum Mercurii"), and to these each passing traveller contributed his offering (Creuzer, Symb. i. 24). The heap of stones which Laban erected to commemorate the solemn compact between himself and Jacob, and on which he invoked the gods of his fathers, is an instance of the intermediate stage in which such heaps were associated with religious observances before they became objects of worship. Jacob, for his part, dedicated a single stone as his memorial, and called Jehovah to witness, thus holding himself aloof from the rites employed by Laban, which may have partaken of his ancestral idolatry. [JEGAR-SAHADUTHA.]

Of the forms assumed by the idolatrous images we have not many traces in the Bible. Dagon, the fish-god of the Philistines, was a human figure terminating in a fish [DAGON]; and that the Syrian deities were represented in later times in a symbolical human shape we know for certainty

[a] More probably still pesel denotes by anticipation the molten image in a later stage after it had been trimmed into shape by the caster.

[b] Images of glazed pottery have been found in Egypt (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. iii. 90; comp. Wisd. xv. 8).

The Hebrews imitated their neighbors in this respect as in others (Is. xliv. 13; Wisd. xiii. 13), and from various allusions we may infer that idols in human forms were not uncommon among them, though they were more anciently symbolized by animals (Wisd. xiii. 14), as by the calves of Aaron and Jeroboam, and the brazen serpent which was afterwards applied to idolatrous uses (2 K. xviii. 4; Rom. i. 23). When the image came from the hands of the maker it was decorated richly with silver and gold, and sometimes crowned (Epist. Jer. 9 [or Bar. vi. 9]); clad in robes of blue and purple (Jer. x. 9), like the draped images of Pallas and Hera (Müller, Handb. d. Arch. d. Kunst, § 69), and fastened in the niche appropriated to it by means of chains and nails (Wisd. xiii. 15), in order that the influence of the deity which it represented might be secured to the spot. So the Ephesians, when besieged by Crœsus, connected the wall of their city by means of a rope to the temple of Aphrodite, with the view of ensuring the aid of the goddess (Her. i. 26); and for a similar object the Tyrians chained the stone image of Apollo to the altar of Hercules (Curt. iv. 3, § 15). Some images were painted red (Wisd. xiii. 14), like those of Dionysus and the Bacchantes of Hermes, and the god Pan (Paus. ii. 2, § 5; Müller, Handb. d. Arch. d. Kunst, § 69). This color was formerly considered sacred. Pliny relates, on the authority of Verrius, that it was customary on festival days to color with red-lead the face of the image of Jupiter, and the bodies of those who celebrated a triumph (xxxiii. 36). The figures of Priapus, the god of gardens, were decorated in the same manner ("ruber custos" Tibull. i. 1, 18). Among the objects of worship enumerated by Arnobius (i. 39) are bones of elephants, pictures, and garlands suspended on trees, the "rami coronati" of Apuleius (de Mag. c. 56).

When the process of adorning the image was completed, it was placed in a temple or shrine appointed for it (οἰκία, Epist. Jer. 12, 19 [or Bar. vi. 12, 19]; οἴκημα, Wisd. xiii. 15; εἰδωλεῖον, 1 Cor. viii. 10; see Stanley's note on the latter passage). In Wisd. xiii. 15, οἴκημα is thought to be used contemptuously, as in Tibull. i. 10, 19, 20 — "cum paupere cultu Stabat in exigua ligneus æde deus" (Fritzsche and Grimm, Handb.), but the passage quoted is by no means a good illustration. From these temples the idols were sometimes carried in procession (Epist. Jer. 4, 26 [or Bar. vi. 4, 26]) on festival days. Their priests were maintained from the idol treasury, and feasted upon the meats which were appointed for the idols' use (Bel and the Dragon, 3, 13). These sacrificial feasts formed an important part of the idolatrous ritual [IDOLATRY], and were a great stumbling-block to the early Christian converts. They were to the heathen, as Prof. Stanley has well observed, what the observance of circumcision and the Mosaic ritual were to the Jewish converts, and it was for this reason that St. Paul especially directed his attention to the subject, and laid down the rules of conduct contained in his first letter to the Corinthians (viii.–x.). W. A. W.

IDOLATRY (תְּרָפִים, t'râphim, "teraphim," once only, 1 Sam. xv. 23: εἰδωλολατρεία), strictly speaking, denotes the worship of deity in a visible form, whether the images to which homage is paid are symbolical representations of the true God, or of the false divinities which have been made the objects of worship in his stead. With its origin and progress the present article is not concerned. The former is lost amidst the dark mists of antiquity, and ... ter is rather the subject of speculation than of history. But under what aspect it is presented to us in the Scriptures, how it affected the Mosaic legislation, and what influence it had on the history of the Israelites, are questions which may be more properly discussed, with some hope of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. Whether, therefore, the deification of the powers of nature, and the representation of them under tangible forms, preceded the worship of departed heroes, who were regarded as the embodiment of some virtue which distinguished their lives, is not in this respect of much importance. Some Jewish writers, indeed, grounding their theory on a forced interpretation of Gen. iv. 26, assign to Enos, the son of Seth, the unenviable notoriety of having been the first to pay divine honors to the host of heaven, and to lead others into the like error (Maimon. de Idol. i. 1). R. Solomon Jarchi, on the other hand, while admitting the same verse to contain the first account of the origin of idolatry, understands it as implying the deification of men and plants. Arabic tradition, according to Sir W. Jones, connects the people of Yemen with the same apostasy. The third in descent from Joktan, and therefore a contemporary of Nahor, took the surname of Abdu Shems, or "servant of the sun," whom he and his family worshipped, while other tribes honored the planets and fixed stars (Hales, Chronol. ii. 59, 4to ed.). Nimrod, again, to whom is ascribed the introduction of Zabianism, was after his death transferred to the constellation Orion, and on the slender foundation of the expression "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi. 31) is built the fabulous history of Abraham and Nimrod, narrated in the legends of the Jews and Mussulmans (Jellinek, Bet ha-Midrash, i. 23; Weil, Bibl. Leg. pp. 47–74; Hyde, Rel. Pers. c. 2).

I. But, descending from the regions of fiction to sober historic narrative, the first undoubted allusion to idolatry or idolatrous customs in the Bible is in the account of Rachel's stealing her father's teraphim (Gen. xxxi. 19), a relic of the worship of other gods, whom the ancestors of the Israelites served "on the other side of the river, in old time" (Josh. xxiv. 2). By these household deities Laban was guided, and these he consulted as oracles (obs. נִחַשְׁתִּי Gen. xxx. 27, A. V. "learned by experience"), though without entirely losing sight of the God of Abraham and the God of Nahor, to whom he appealed when occasion offered (Gen. xxxi. 53), while he was ready, in the presence of Jacob, to acknowledge the benefits conferred upon him by Jehovah (Gen. xxx. 27). Such, indeed, was the character of most of the idolatrous worship of the Israelites. Like the Cuthean colonists in Samaria, who "feared Jehovah and served their own gods" (2 K. xvii. 33), they blended in a strange manner a theoretical belief in the true God with the external reverence which, in different stages of their history, they were led to pay to the idols of the nations by whom they were surrounded. For this species of false worship they seem, at all times, to have had an incredible propension. On their journey from Shechem to Bethel, the family of Jacob put away from among them "the gods of the foreigner:" not the teraphim of Laban, but the gods of the Canaanites through whose land they passed, and the amulets and charms which were worn as the appendages of their worship (Gen. xxxv. 2, 4). And this marked feature of the Hebrew character is traceable throughout the entire history of the people. During their long residence in Egypt, the country of symbolism, they defiled themselves with the idols of the land, and it was long before the taint was removed (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ez. xx. 7). To these gods Moses, as the herald of Jehovah, flung down the gauntlet of defiance (Kurtz, Gesch. d. Alt. B. ii. 86), and the plagues of Egypt smote their symbols (Num. xxxiii. 4). Yet, with the memory of their deliverance fresh in their minds, their leader absent, the Israelities clamored for some visible shape in which they might worship the God who had brought them up out of Egypt (Ex. xxxii.). Aaron lent himself to the popular cry, and chose as the symbol of deity one with which they had long been familiar — the calf — embodiment of Apis, and emblem of the productive power of nature. But, with a weakness of character to which his greater brother was a stranger, he compromised with his better impulses by proclaiming a solemn feast to Jehovah (Ex. xxxii. 5). How much of the true God was recognized by the people in this brutish symbol it is impossible to conceive; the festival was characterized by all the shameless licentiousness with which idolatrous worship was associated (ver. 25), and which seems to have constituted its chief attraction. But on this occasion, as on all others, the transgression was visited by swift vengeance, and three thousand of the offenders were slain. For a while the erection of the tabernacle, and the establishment of the worship which accompanied it, satisfied that craving for an outward sign which the Israelites constantly exhibited; and for the remainder of their march through the desert, with the dwelling-place of Jehovah in their midst, they did not again degenerate into open apostasy. But it was only so long as their contact with the nations was of a hostile character that this seeming orthodoxy was maintained. The charms of the daughters of Moab, as Balaam's bad genius foresaw, were potent for evil: the Israelites were "yoked to Baal-Peor" in the trammels of his fair worshippers, and the character of their devotions is not obscurely hinted at (Num. xxv.). The great and terrible retribution which followed left so deep an impress upon the hearts of the people that, after the conquest of the promised land, they looked with an eye of terror upon any indications of defection from the worship of Jehovah, and denounced as idolatrous a memorial so slight as the altar of the Reubenites at the passage of Jordan (Josh. xxii. 16).

During the lives of Joshua and the elders who outlived him, they kept true to their allegiance; but the generation following, who knew not Jehovah, nor the works he had done for Israel, swerved from the plain path of their fathers, and were caught in the toils of the foreigner (Judg. ii.). From this time forth their history becomes little more than a chronicle of the inevitable sequence of offense and punishment. "They provoked Jehovah to anger . . . and the anger of Jehovah was hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them" (Judg. ii. 12, 14). The narratives of the book of Judges, contemporaneous or successive, tell of the fierce struggle maintained against their hated foes, and how women forgot their tenderness and forsook their retirement to sing the song of victory over the oppressor. By turns each conquering nation strove to establish the worship of its national god. During the rule of Midian, Joash the father of Gideon had an altar to Baal, and an Asherah (Judg. vi. 25), though he proved but a lukewarm worshipper (ver. 31). Even Gideon himself gave occasion to idolatrous worship yet the ephod which he made from the spoils of the Midianites was perhaps but a votive offering to the true God (Judg. viii. 27). It is not improbable that the gold ornaments of which it was composed were in some way connected with idolatry (cf. Is. iii. 18–24), and that from their having been worn as amulets, some superstitious virtue was conceived to cling to them even in their new form. But though in Gideon's lifetime no overt act of idolatry was practised, he was no sooner dead than the Israelites again returned to the service of the Baalim, and, as if in solemn mockery of the covenant made with Jehovah, chose from among their Baal Berith, "Baal of the Covenant" (cf. Ζεὺς ὅρκιος), as the object of their special adoration (Judg. viii. 33). Of this god we know only that his temple, probably of wood (Judg. ix. 49), was a stronghold in time of need, and that his treasury was filled with the silver of the worshippers (ix. 4). Nor were the calamities of foreign oppression confined to the land of Canaan. The tribes on the east of Jordan went astray after the idols of the land, and were delivered into the hands of the children of Ammon (Judg. x. 8). But they put away from among them "the gods of the foreigner," and with the baseborn Jephthah for their leader gained a signal victory over their oppressors. The exploits of Samson against the Philistines, though achieved within a narrower space and with less important results than those of his predecessors, fill a brilliant page in his country's history. But the tale of his marvelous deeds is prefaced by that ever-recurring phrase, so mournfully familiar, "the children of Israel did evil again in the eyes of Jehovah, and Jehovah gave them into the hand of the Philistines." Thus far idolatry is a national sin. The episode of Micah, in Judg. xvii. xviii., sheds a lurid light on the secret practices of individuals, who without formally renouncing Jehovah, though ceasing to recognize him as the theocratic King (xvii. 6), linked with his worship the symbols of ancient idolatry. The house of God, or sanctuary, which Micah made in imitation of that at Shiloh, was decorated with an ephod and teraphim dedicated to God, and with a graven and molten image consecrated to some inferior deities (Selden, de Dis Syris, Synt. i. 2). It is a significant fact, showing how deeply rooted in the people was the tendency to idolatry, that a Levite, who, of all others, should have been most sedulous to maintain Jehovah's worship in its purity, was found to assume the office of priest to the images of Micah; and that this Levite, priest afterwards to the idols of Dan, was no other than Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses. Tradition says that these idols were destroyed when the Philistines defeated the army of Israel and took from them the ark of the covenant of Jehovah (1 Sam. iv.). The Danites are supposed to have carried them into the field, as the other tribes bore the ark, and the Philistines the images of their gods, when they went forth to battle (2 Sam. v. 21; Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v. 9). But the Seder Olam Rabba (c. 24) interprets "the captivity of the land" (Judg. xviii. 30), of the captivity of Manasseh: and Benjamin of Tudela mistook the remains of later Gentile worship for traces of the altar or statue which Micah had dedicated, and which was worshipped by the tribe of Dan (Selden, de Dis Syr. Synt. i. c. 2; Stanley, S. & P. p. 398). In later times the practice of secret idolatry was carried to greater lengths. Images were set up on the corn-floors, in the wine-vats, and behind the doors of private houses (Is. lvii. 8; Hos. ix. 1, 2); and to check this tendency the statute in Deut. xxvii. 15 was originally promulgated.

Under Samuel's administration a fast was held, and purificatory rites performed, to mark the public renunciation of idolatry (1 Sam. vii. 3–6). But in the reign of Solomon all this was forgotten. Each of his many foreign wives brought with her the gods of her own nation; and the gods of Ammon, Moab, and Zidon, were openly worshipped. Three of the summits of Olivet were crowned with the high-places of Ashtoreth, Chemosh, and Molech (1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13), and the fourth, in memory of his great apostasy, was branded with the opprobrious title of the "Mount of Corruption." Rehoboam, the son of an Ammonite mother, perpetuated the worst features of Solomon's idolatry (1 K. xiv. 22–24); and in his reign was made the great schism in the national religion: when Jeroboam, fresh from his recollections of the Apis worship of Egypt, erected golden calves at Bethel and at Dan, and by this crafty state-policy severed for ever the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (1 K. xii. 26–33). To their use were temples consecrated, and the service in their honor was studiously copied from the Mosaic ritual. High-priest himself, Jeroboam ordained priests from the lowest ranks (2 Chr. xi. 15); incense and sacrifices were offered, and a solemn festival appointed, closely resembling the feast of tabernacles (1 K. xii. 32, 33; cf. Am. iv. 4, 5). [JEROBOAM.] The worship of the calves, "the sin of Israel" (Hos. x. 8), which was apparently associated with the goat-worship of Mendes (2 Chr. xi. 15; Herod. ii. 46) or of the ancient Zabii (Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v. 3), and the Asherim (1 K. xiv. 15; A. V. "groves"), ultimately spread to the kingdom of Judah, and centred in Beer-sheba (Am. v. 5, vii. 9). At what precise period it was introduced into the latter kingdom is not certain. The Chronicles tell us how Abijah taunted Jeroboam with his apostasy, while the less partial narrative in 1 Kings represents his own conduct as far from exemplary (1 K. xv. 3). Asa's sweeping reform spared not even the idol of his grandmother Maachah, and, with the exception of the high-places, he removed all relics of idolatrous worship (1 K. xv. 12–14), with its accompanying impurities. His reformation was completed by Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 6).

The successors of Jeroboam followed in his steps, till Ahab, who married a Zidonian princess, at her instigation (1 K. xxi. 25) built a temple and altar to Baal, and revived all the abominations of the Amorites (1 K. xxi. 26). For this he attained the bad preëminence of having done "more to provoke Jehovah, the God of Israel, to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him" (1 K. xvi. 33). Compared with the worship of Baal, the worship of the calves was a venial offense, probably because it was morally less detestable and also less anti-national (1 K. xii. 28; 2 K. x. 28–31). [ELIJAH, vol. i. p. 703 b.] Henceforth Baal-worship became so completely identified with the northern kingdom that it is described as walking in the way or statutes of the kings of Israel (2 K. xvi. 3, xvii. 8), as distinguished from the sin of Jeroboam, which ceased not till the Captivity (2 K. xvii. 23), and the corruption of the ancient inhabitants of the land. The idolatrous priests became a numerous and important caste (1 K. xviii. 19), living under the patronage of royalty, and fed at the royal table. The extirpation of Baal's priests by Elijah, and of his followers by Jehu (2 K. x.), in which the royal family of Judah shared (2 Chr. xxii. 7), was a death-blow to this form of idolatry in Israel, though other systems still remained (2 K. xiii. 6). But while Israel thus sinned and was punished, Judah was more morally guilty (Ez. xvi. 51). The alliance of Jehoshaphat with the family of Ahab transferred to the southern kingdom, during the reigns of his son and grandson, all the appurtenances of Baal-worship (2 K. viii. 18, 27). In less than ten years after the death of that king, in whose praise it is recorded that he "sought not the Baalim," nor walked "after the deed of Israel" (2 Chr. xvii. 3, 4), a temple had been built for the idol, statues and altars erected, and priests appointed to minister in his service (2 K. xi. 18). Jehoiada's vigorous measures checked the evil for a time, but his reform was incomplete, and the high-places still remained, as in the days of Asa, a nucleus for any fresh system of idolatry (2 K. xii. 3). Much of this might be due to the influence of the king's mother, Zibiah of Beer-sheba, a place intimately connected with the idolatrous defection of Judah (Am. viii. 14). After the death of Jehoiada, the princes prevailed upon Joash to restore at least some portion of his father's idolatry (2 Chr. xxiv. 18). The conquest of the Edomites by Amaziah introduced the worship of their gods, which had disappeared since the days of Solomon (2 Chr. xxv. 14, 20). After this period even the kings who did not lend themselves to the encouragement of false worship had to contend with the corruption which still lingered in the hearts of the people (2 K. xv. 35; 2 Chr. xxvii. 2). Hitherto the temple had been kept pure. The statues of Baal and the other gods were worshipped in their own shrines, but Ahaz, who "sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus, which smote him" (2 Chr. xxviii. 23), and built altars to them at every corner of Jerusalem, and high-places in every city of Judah, replaced the brazen altar of burnt-offering by one made after the model of "the altar" of Damascus, and desecrated it to his own uses (2 K. xvi. 10–15).[a]

The conquest of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser was for them the last scene of the drama of abominations which had been enacted uninterruptedly for upwards of 250 years. In the northern kingdom no reformer arose to vary the long line of royal apostates; whatever was effected in the way of reformation, was done by the hands of the people (2 Chr. xxxi. 1). But even in their captivity they

[a] The Syr. supports the rendering of לְבַקֵּר in v. 15, which the A. V. has adopted — "to enquire by": but Keil translates the clause, "it will be for me to consider," i. e. what shall be done with the altar, in order to support his theory that this altar erected by Ahaz was not directly intended to profane the temple by idolatrous worship. But it is clear that something of an idolatrous nature had been introduced into the temple, and was afterwards removed by Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 5; cf. Ezr. vi. 21, ix. 11). It is possible that this might have reference to the brazen serpent helped to perpetuate the corruption. The colonists, whom the Assyrian conquerors placed in their stead in the cities of Samaria, brought with them their own gods, and were taught at Bethel by a priest of the captive nation "the manner of the God of the land," the lessons thus learnt resulting in a strange admixture of the calf-worship of Jeroboam with the homage paid to their national deities (2 K. xvii. 24–41). Their descendants were in consequence regarded with suspicion by the elders who returned from the Captivity with Ezra, and their offers of assistance rejected (Ezr. iv. 3).

The first act of Hezekiah on ascending the throne was the restoration and purification of the Temple, which had been dismantled and closed during the latter part of his father's life (2 Chr. xxviii. 24; xxix. 3). The multitudes who flocked to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover, so long in abeyance, removed the idolatrous altars of burnt-offering and incense erected by Ahaz (2 Chr. xxx. 14). The iconoclastic spirit was not confined to Judah and Benjamin, but spread throughout Ephraim and Manasseh (2 Chr. xxxi. 1), and to all external appearance idolatry was extirpated. But the reform extended little below the surface (Is. xxix. 13). Among the leaders of the people there were many in high position who conformed to the necessities of the time (Is. xxviii. 14), and under Manasseh's patronage the false worship, which had been merely driven into obscurity, broke out with tenfold virulence. Idolatry of every form, and with all the accessories of enchantments, divination, and witchcraft, was again rife; no place was too sacred, no associations too hallowed, to be spared the contamination. If the conduct of Ahaz in erecting an altar in the temple court is open to a charitable construction, Manasseh's was of no doubtful character. The two courts of the temple were profaned by altars dedicated to the host of heaven, and the image of the Asherah polluted the holy place (2 K. xxi. 7; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 7, 15; cf. Jer. xxxii. 34). Even in his late repentance he did not entirely destroy all traces of his former wrong. The people, easily swayed, still burned incense on the high places; but Jehovah was the ostensible object of their worship. The king's son sacrificed to his father's idols, but was not associated with him in his repentance, and in his short reign of two years, restored all the altars of the Baalim, and the images of the Asherah. With the death of Josiah ended the last effort to revive among the people a purer ritual, if not a purer faith. The lamp of David, which had long shed but a struggling ray, flickered for a while and then went out in the darkness of Babylonian captivity.

But foreign exile was powerless to eradicate the deep inbred tendency to idolatry. One of the first difficulties with which Ezra had to contend, and which brought him well nigh to despair, was the haste with which his countrymen took them foreign wives of the people of the land, and followed them in all their abominations (Ezr. ix.). The priests and rulers, to whom he looked for assistance in his great enterprise, were among the first to fall away (Ezr. ix. 2, x. 18; Neh. vi. 17, 18, xiii. 23). Even during the Captivity the devotees of false worship plied their craft as prophets and diviners (Jer. xxix. 8; Ez. xiii.), and the Jews who fled to Egypt carried with them recollections of the material prosperity which attended their idolatrous sacrifices in Judah, and to the neglect of which they attributed their exiled condition (Jer. xliv. 17, 18). The conquests of Alexander in Asia caused Greek influence to be extensively felt, and Greek idolatry to be first tolerated, and then practiced, by the Jews (1 Macc. i. 43–50, 54). The attempt of Antiochus to establish this form of worship was vigorously resisted by Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 23–26), who was joined in his rebellion by the Assidæans (ver. 42), and destroyed the altars at which the king commanded them to sacrifice (1 Macc. ii. 25, 45). The erection of synagogues has been assigned as a reason for the comparative purity of the Jewish worship after the Captivity (Prideaux, Connect. i. 374), while another cause has been discovered in the hatred for images acquired by the Jews in their intercourse with the Persians.

It has been a question much debated whether the Israelites were ever so far given up to idolatry as to lose all knowledge of the true God. It would be hard to assert this of any nation, and still more difficult to prove. That there always remained among them a faithful few, who in the face of every danger adhered to the worship of Jehovah, may readily be believed, for even at a time when Baal worship was most prevalent there were found seven thousand in Israel who had not bowed before his image (1 K. xxix. 18). But there is still room for grave suspicion that among the masses of the people, though the idea of a supreme Being — of whom the images they worshipped were but the distorted representatives — was not entirely lost, it was so obscured as to be but dimly apprehended. And not only were the ignorant multitude thus led astray, but the priests, scribes, and prophets became leaders of the apostasy (Jer. ii. 8). Warburton, indeed, maintained that they never formally renounced Jehovah, and that their defection consisted "in joining foreign worship and idolatrous ceremonies to the ritual of the true God" (Div. Leg. bk. v. § 3). But one passage in their history, though confessedly obscure, seems to point to a time when, under the rule of the judges, "Israel for many days had no true God, and no teaching priest, and no law" (2 Chr. xv. 3). The correlative argument of Cudworth, who contends from the teaching of the Hebrew doctors and rabbis "that the pagan nations, anciently, at least the intelligent amongst them, acknowledged one supreme God of the whole world; and that all other gods were but creatures and inferior ministers," is controverted by Mosheim (Intell. Syst. i. 4, § 30, and notes). There can be no doubt that much of the idolatry of the Hebrews consisted in worshipping the true God under an image, such as the calves at Bethel and Dan (Joseph. Ant. viii. 8, § 5: δαμάλεις ἐπωνύμους τῷ θεῷ), and in associating his worship with idolatrous rites (Jer. xli. 5), and places consecrated to idols (2 K. xviii. 22). From the peculiarity of their position they were never distinguished as the inventors of a new pantheon, nor did they adopt any one system of idolatry so exclusively as ever to become identified with it.[a] But they no sooner came in contact with other nations than they readily adapted themselves to their practices, the old spirit of antagonism died rapidly away, and intermarriage was one step to idolatry.

II. The old religion of the Semitic races consisted, in the opinion of Movers (Phön. i. c. 5), in the deification of the powers and laws of nature; these powers being considered either as distinct and independent, or as manifestations of one supreme and all-ruling being. In most instances the two ideas were co-existent. The deity, following human analogy, was conceived as male and female: the one representing the active, the other the passive principle of nature: the former the source of spiritual, the latter of physical life. The transference of the attributes of the one to the other resulted either in their mystical conjunction in the hermaphrodite, as the Persian Mithra and Phœnician Baal, or the two combined to form a third, which symbolized the essential unity of both.[a] With these two supreme beings all other deities are identical; so that in different nations the same nature-worship appears under different forms, representing the various aspects under which the idea of the power of nature is presented. The sun and moon were early selected as outward symbols of this all-pervading power, and the worship of the heavenly bodies was not only the most ancient but the most prevalent system of idolatry. Taking its rise, according to a probable hypothesis, in the plains of Chaldæa, it spread through Egypt, Greece, Scythia, and even Mexico and Ceylon. It was regarded as an offense amenable to the civil authorities in the days of Job (xxxi. 26–28), and one of the statutes of the Mosaic law was directed against its observance (Deut. iv. 19; xvii. 3); the former referring to the star-worship of Arabia, the latter to the concrete form in which it appeared among the Syrians and Phœnicians. It is probable that the Israelites learnt their first lessons in sun-worship from the Egyptians, in whose religious system that luminary, as Osiris, held a prominent place. The city of On (Beth-shemesh or Heliopolis) took its name from his temple (Jer. xliii. 13), and the wife of Joseph was the daughter of his priest (Gen. xli. 45). The Phœnicians worshipped him under the title of "Lord of heaven," בַּעַל שָׁמַיִם, Baal-shâmayim (Βεελσάμην, acc. to Sanchoniatho in Philo Byblius), and Adon, the Greek Adonis, and the Thammuz of Ezekiel (viii. 14). [Thammuz.] As Moloch or Milcom, the sun was worshipped by the Ammonites, and as Chemosh by the Moabites. The Hadad of the Syrians is the same deity, whose name is traceable in Benhadad, Hadadezer, and Hadad or Adad, the Edomite. The Assyrian Bel or Belus, is another form of Baal. According to Philo (de Vit. Cont. § 3) the Essenes were wont to pray to the sun at morning and evening (Joseph. B. J. ii. 8, § 5). By the later kings of Judah, sacred horses and chariots were dedicated to the sun-god, as by the Persians (2 K. xxiii. 11; Bochart, Hieroz. pt. 1, bk. ii. c. xi.; Selden, de Dis Syr. ii. 8); to march in procession and greet his rising (R. Sol. Jarchi on 2 K. xxiii. 11). The Massagetæ offered horses in sacrifice to him (Strabo, xi. p. 513), on the principle enunciated by Macrobius (Sat. vii. 7), "like rejoiceth in like" ("similibus similia gaudent;" cf. Her. i. 216), and the custom was common to many nations.

The moon, worshipped by the Phœnicians under the name of Astarte (Lucian, de Dea Syra, c. 4), or Baaltis, the passive power of nature, as Baal was the active (Movers, i. 149), and known to the Hebrews as Ashtaroth or Ashtoreth, the tutelary goddess of the Zidonians, appears early among the objects of Israelitish idolatry. But this Syro-Phœnician worship of the sun and moon was of a grosser character than the pure star-worship of the Magi, which Movers distinguishes as Upper Asiatic or Assyro-Persian, and was equally removed from the Chaldæan astrology and Zabianism of later times. The former of these systems tolerated no images or altars, and the contemplation of the heavenly bodies from elevated spots constituted the greater part of its ritual.

But, though we have no positive historical account of star-worship before the Assyrian period, we may infer that it was early practiced in a concrete form among the Israelites from the allusions in Amos v. 26, and Acts vii. 42, 43. Even in the desert they are said to have been given up to worship the host of heaven, while Chiun and Remphan, or Rephan, have on various grounds been identified with the planet Saturn. It was to counteract idolatry of this nature that the stringent law of Deut. xvii. 3 was enacted, and with the view of withdrawing the Israelites from undue contemplation of the material universe, Jehovah, the God of Israel, is constantly placed before them as Jehovah Zebaoth, Jehovah of Hosts, the king of heaven (Dan. iv. 35, 37), to whom the heaven and heaven of heavens belong (Deut. x. 14). However this may be, Movers (Phön. i. 65, 66) contends that the later star-worship, introduced by Ahaz and followed by Manasseh, was purer and more spiritual in its nature than the Israelito-Phœnician worship of the heavenly bodies under symbolical forms as Baal and Asherah: and that it was not idolatry in the same sense that the latter was, but of a simply contemplative character. He is supported, to some extent, by the fact that we find no mention of any images of the sun or moon or the host of heaven, but merely of vessels devoted to their service (2 K. xxiii. 4). But there is no reason to believe that the divine honors paid to the "Queen of Heaven" (or as others render, "the frame" or "structure of the heavens")[b] were equally dissociated from image worship. Mr. Layard (Nin. ii. 451) discovered a bas-relief at Nimrond, which represented four idols carried in procession by Assyrian warriors. One of these figures he identifies with Hera the Assyrian Astarte, represented with a star on her head (Am. v. 26), and with the "queen of heaven," who appears on the rock-tablets of Pterium "standing erect on a lion, and crowned with a tower, or mural coronet," as in the Syrian temple of Hierapolis (Id. p. 456; Lucian, de Dea Syra, 31, 32). But, in his remarks upon a figure which resembles the Rhea of Diodorus, Mr. Layard adds, "the representation in a human form of the celestial bodies, themselves originally but a type, was a corruption which appears to have crept at a later period into the mythology of Assyria; for, in the more ancient bas-reliefs, figures with caps surmounted by stars do not occur, and the sun, moon, and planets stand alone" (Id. pp. 457, 458).

[a] This will explain the occurrence of the name of Baal with the masculine and feminine articles in the LXX.; cf. Hos. xi. 2; Jer. xix. 5; Rom. xi. 4. Philochorus, quoted by Macrobius (Sat. iii. 8), says that men and women sacrified to Venus or the Moon, with the garments of the sexes interchanged, because she was regarded both as masculine and feminine (see Selden, de Dis Syr. ii. 2). Hence Lunus and Luna.

[b] Jer. vii. 18; xliv. 19. In the former passage some MSS. have מלאכת for מלכת, a reading supported by the LXX., τῇ στρατιᾷ, as well as by the Syr. ܦܠܟܐ, pûlchôa, its equivalent. But in the latter they both agree in the rendering "queen."

The allusions in Job xxxviii. 31, 32, are too obscure to allow any inference to be drawn as to the mysterious influences which were held by the old astrologers to be exercised by the stars over human destiny, nor is there sufficient evidence to connect them with anything more recondite than the astronomical knowledge of the period. The same may be said of the poetical figure in Deborah's chant of triumph, "the stars from their highways warred with Sisera" (Judg. v. 20). In the later times of the monarchy, Mazzaloth, the planets, or the zodiacal signs, received, next to the sun and moon, their share of popular adoration (2 K. xxiii. 5); and the history of idolatry among the Hebrews shows at all times an intimate connection between the deification of the heavenly bodies, and the superstition which watched the clouds for signs, and used divination and enchantments. It was but a step from such culture of the sidereal powers to the worship of Gad and Meni, Babylonian divinities, symbols of Venus or the moon, as the goddess of luck or fortune. Under the latter aspect, the moon was reverenced by the Egyptians (Macrob. Sat. i. 19); and the name Baal Gad is possibly an example of the manner in which the worship of the planet Jupiter as the bringer of luck was grafted on the old faith of the Phœnicians. The false gods of the colonists of Samaria were probably connected with eastern astrology: Adrammelech, Movers regards as the sun-fire — the Solar Mars, and Anammelech the Solar Saturn (Phön. i. 410, 411). The Vulgate rendering of Prov. xxvi. 8, "sicut qui mittit lapidem in acervum Mercurii," follows the Midrash on the passage quoted by Jarchi, and requires merely a passing notice (see Selden, de Dis Syris, ii. 15; Maim. de Idol. iii. 2; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. מרקוליס).

Beast-worship, as exemplified in the calves of Jeroboam and the dark hints which seem to point to the goat of Mendes, has already been alluded to. There is no actual proof that the Israelites ever joined in the service of Dagon,[a] the fish-god of the Philistines, though Ahaziah sent stealthily to Baal-zebub, the fly-god of Ekron (2 K. i.), and in later times the brazen serpent became the object of idolatrous homage (2 K. xviii. 4). But whether the latter was regarded with superstitious reverence as a memorial of their early history, or whether incense was offered to it as a symbol of some power of nature, cannot now be exactly determined. The threatening in Lev. xxvi. 30, "I will put your carcasses upon the carcasses of your idols," may fairly be considered as directed against the tendency to regard animals, as in Egypt, as the symbols of deity. Tradition says that Nergal, the god of the men of Cuth, the idol of fire, according to Leusden (Phil. Hebr. Mixt. Diss. 43), was worshipped under the form of a cock; Ashima as a he-goat, the emblem of generative power; Nibhaz as a dog; Adrammelech as a mule or peacock; and Anammelech as a horse or pheasant.

Of pure hero-worship among the Semitic races we find no trace. Moses indeed seems to have entertained some dim apprehension that his countrymen might, after his death, pay him more honour than were due to man; and the anticipation of this led him to review his own conduct in terms of strong reprobation (Deut. iv. 21, 22). The expression in Ps. cvi. 28, "the sacrifices of the dead," is in all probability metaphorical, and Wisd. xiv. 15 refers to a later practice due to Greek influence. The rabbinical commentators discover in Gen. xlviii. 16, an allusion to the worshipping of angels (Col. ii. 18), while they defend their ancestors from the charge of regarding them in any other light than mediators, or intercessors with God (Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v. 3). It is needless to add that their inference and apology are equally groundless. With like probability has been advanced the theory of the demon-worship of the Hebrews, the only foundation for it being two highly poetical passages (Deut. xxxii. 17; Ps. cvi. 37). It is possible that the Persian dualism is hinted at in Is. xlv. 7.

But if the forms of the false gods were manifold, the places devoted to their worship were almost equally numerous. The singular reverence with which trees have in all ages been honored is not without example in the history of the Hebrews. The terebinth at Mamre, beneath which Abraham built an altar (Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 18), and the memorial grove planted by him at Beer-sheba (Gen. xxi. 33), were intimately connected with patriarchal worship, though in after-ages his descendants were forbidden to do that which he did with impunity, in order to avoid the contamination of idolatry.[b] As a symptom of their rapidly degenerating spirit, the oak of Shechem, which stood in the sanctuary of Jehovah (Josh. xxiv. 26), and beneath which Joshua set up the stone of witness perhaps appears in Judges (ix. 37), as "the oak (not 'plain,' as in A. V.) of soothsayers" or "augurs."[c] Mountains and high places were chosen spots for offering sacrifice and incense to idols (1 K. xi. 7, xiv. 23); and the retirement of gardens and the thick shade of woods offered great attractions to their worshippers (2 K. xvi. 4; Is. i. 29; Hos. iv. 13). It was the ridge of Carmel which Elijah selected as the scene of his contest with the priests of Baal, fighting with them the battle of Jehovah, as it were, on their own ground. [CARMEL.] Carmel was regarded by the Roman historians as a sacred mountain of the Jews (Tac. H. ii. 78; Suet. Vesp. 7) The host of heaven was worshipped on the housetop (2 K. xxiii. 12; Jer. xix. 13, xxxii. 29; Zeph. i. 5). In describing the sun-worship of the Nabatæi, Strabo (xvi. p. 784) mentions two characteristics which strikingly illustrate the worship of Baal. They built their altars on the roofs of houses, and offered on them incense and libations daily. On the wall of his city, in the sight of the besieging armies of Israel and Edom, the king of Moab offered his eldest son as a burnt-offering.

[a] Some have explained the allusion in Zeph. i. 9, as referring to a practice connected with the worship of Dagon; comp. 1 Sam. v. 5. The Syrians, on the authority of Xenophon (Anab. i. 4, § 9), paid divine honors to fish.

[b] Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Drys) mentions an oak near Hebron which existed in his infancy, and was the traditional tree beneath which Abraham dwelt. It was regarded with great reverence, and was made an object of worship by the heathen. Modern Palestine abounds with sacred trees. They are found "all over the land covered with bits of rags from the garments of passing villagers, hung up as acknowledgments or as deprecatory signals and charms: and we find beautiful clumps of oak-trees sacred to a kind or beings called Jacob's daughters" (Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 151). [See GROVE.]

[c] Unless, indeed, this be a relic of the ancien Canaanitish worship; an older name associated with idolatry, which the conquering Hebrews were commanded and endeavored to obliterate (Deut. xii. 3;

The Persians, who worshipped the sun under the name of Mithra (Strabo, xv. p. 732), sacrificed on an elevated spot, but built no altars or images.

The priests of the false worship are sometimes designated Chemarim, a word of Syriac origin, to which different meanings have been assigned. It is applied to the non-Levitical priests who burnt incense on the high-places (2 K. xxiii. 5) as well as to the priests of the calves (Hos. x. 5); and the corresponding word is used in the Peshito (Judg. xviii. 30) of Jonathan and his descendants, priests to the tribe of Dan, and in Targ. Onkelos (Gen. xlvii. 22) of the priests of Egypt. The Rabbis, followed by Gesenius, have derived it from a root signifying "to be black," and without any authority assert that the name was given to idolatrous priests from the black vestments which they wore. But white was the distinctive color in the priestly garments of all nations from India to Gaul, and black was only worn when they sacrificed to the subterranean gods (Bähr, Symb. ii. 87, &c.). That a special dress was adopted by the Baal-worshippers, as well as by the false prophets (Zech. xiii. 4), is evident from 2 K. x. 22 (where the rendering should be "the apparel"): the vestments were kept in an apartment of the idol temple, under the charge probably of one of the inferior priests. Micah's Levite was provided with appropriate robes (Judg. xvii. 10). The "foreign apparel," mentioned in Zeph. i. 8, refers doubtless to a similar dress, adopted by the Israelites in defiance of the sumptuary law in Num. xv. 37–40.

In addition to the priests there were other persons intimately connected with idolatrous rites, and the impurities from which they were inseparable. Both men and women consecrated themselves to the service of idols: the former as קְדֵשִׁים, kedêshim, for which there is reason to believe the A. V. (Deut. xxiii. 17, &c.) has not given too harsh an equivalent; the latter as קְדֵשׁוֹת, kedêshôth, who wove shrines for Astarte (2 K. xxiii. 7), and resembled the ἑταῖραι of Corinth, of whom Strabo (viii. p. 378) says there were more than a thousand attached to the temple of Aphrodite. Egyptian prostitutes consecrated themselves to Isis (Juv. vi. 489, ix. 22–24). The same class of women existed among the Phœnicians, Armenians, Lydians, and Babylonians (Her. i. 93, 199; Strabo, xi. p. 532; Epist. of Jerem. ver. 43). They are distinguished from the public prostitutes (Hos. iv. 14) and associated with the performances of sacred rites, just as in Strabo (xii. p. 559) we find the two classes coexisting at Comana, the Corinth of Pontus, much frequented by pilgrims to the shrine of Aphrodite.[a] The wealth thus obtained flowed into the treasury of the idol temple, and against such a practice the injunction in Deut xxiii. 18 is directed. Dr. Maitland, anxious to defend the moral character of Jewish women, has with much ingenuity attempted to show that a meaning foreign to their true sense has been attached to the words above mentioned; and that, though closely associated with idolatrous services, they do not indicate such foul corruption (Essay on False Worship). But if, as Movers, with great appearance of probability, has conjectured (Phön. i. 679), the class of persons alluded to was composed of foreigners, the Jewish women in this respect need no such advocacy. That such customs existed among foreign nations there is abundant evidence to prove (Lucian, de Syra Dea, c. 5); and from the juxtaposition of prostitution and the idolatrous rites against which the laws in Lev. xix. are aimed, it is probable that next to its immorality, one main reason why it was visited with such stringency was its connection with idolatry (comp. 1 Cor. vi. 9).

But besides these accessories there were the ordinary rites of worship which idolatrous systems had in common with the religion of the Hebrews. Offering burnt sacrifices to the idol gods (2 K. v. 17), burning incense in their honor (1 K. xi. 8), and bowing down in worship before their images (1 K. xix. 18) were the chief parts of their ritual; and from their very analogy with the ceremonies of true worship were more seductive than the grosser forms. Nothing can be stronger or more positive than the language in which these ceremonies were denounced by Hebrew law. Every detail of idol-worship was made the subject of a separate enactment, and many of the laws, which in themselves seem trivial and almost absurd, receive from this point of view their true significance. We are told by Maimonides (Mor. Neb. c. 12) that the prohibitions against sowing a field with mingled seed, and wearing garments of mixed material, were directed against the practices of idolaters, who attributed a kind of magical influence to the mixture (Lev. xix. 19; Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. ii. 18). Such too were the precepts which forbade that the garments of the sexes should be interchanged (Deut. xxii. 5; Maimon. de Idol. xii. 9). According to Macrobius (Sat. iii. 8) other Asiatics when they sacrificed to their Venus changed the dress of the sexes. The priests of Cybele appeared in women's clothes, and used to mutilate themselves (Creuzer, Symb. ii. 34, 42): the same custom was observed "by the Ithyphalli in the rites of Bacchus, and by the Athenians in their Ascophoria" (Young, Idol. Cor. in Rel. i. 105; cf. Lucian, de Dea Syra, c. 15). To preserve the Israelites from contamination, they were prohibited for three years after their conquest of Canaan from eating of the fruit-trees of the land, whose cultivation had been attended with magical rites (Lev. xix. 23). They were forbidden to "round the corner of the head," and to "mar the corner of the beard" (Lev. xix. 27), as the Arabians did in honor of their gods (Her. iii. 8, iv. 175). Hence, the phrase קְצוּצֵי פֵאָה, ketsûtsê phêâh, (literally) "shorn of the corner," is especially applied to idolaters (Jer. ix. 26, xxv. 23). Spencer (de Leg. Hebr. ii. 9, § 2) explains the law forbidding the offering of honey (Lev. ii. 11) as intended to oppose an idolatrous practice. Strabo describes the Magi as offering in all their sacrifices libations of oil mingled with honey and milk (xv. p. 733). Offerings in which honey was an ingredient were made to the inferior deities and the dead (Hom. Od. x. 519; Porph. de Antr. Nymph. c. 17). So also the practice of eating the flesh of sacrifices "over the blood" (Lev. xix. 26; Ez. xxxiii. 25, 26) was, according to Maimonides, common among the Zabii. Spencer gives a double reason for the pro hibition: that it was a rite of divination, and divination of the worst kind, a species of necromancy by which they attempted to raise the spirits of the dead (comp. Hor. Sat. i. 8). There are supposed to be allusions to the practice of necromancy in Is. lxv. 4, or at any rate to superstitious rites in connection with the dead. The grafting of one tree upon another was forbidden, because among idolaters the process was accompanied by gross obscenity (Maim. Mor. Neb. c. 12). Cutting the flesh for the dead (Lev. xix. 28; 1 K. xviii. 28), and making a baldness between the eyes (Deut. xiv. 1) were associated with idolatrous rites: the latter being a custom among the Syrians (Sir G. Wilkinson in Rawlinson's Herod. ii. p. 158, note). The thrice repeated and much-vexed passage, "Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk" (Ex. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Deut. xiv. 21), interpreted by some as a precept of humanity, is explained by Cudworth in a very different manner. He quotes from a Karaite commentary which he had seen in MS.: "It was a custom of the ancient heathens, when they had gathered in all their fruit, to take a kid and boil it in the dam's milk, and then in a magical way go about and besprinkle with it all the trees and fields and gardens and orchards; thinking by this means they should make them fructify, and bring forth again more abundantly the following year" (On the Lord's Supper, c. 2).[a] The law which regulated clean and unclean meats (Lev. xx. 23–26) may be considered both as a sanitary regulation, and also as having a tendency to separate the Israelites from the surrounding idolatrous nations. It was with the same object, in the opinion of Michaelis, that while in the wilderness they were prohibited from killing any animal for food without first offering it to Jehovah (Laws of Moses, trans. Smith, art. 203). The mouse, one of the unclean animals of Leviticus (xi. 29), was sacrificed by the ancient Magi (Is. lxvi. 17; Movers, Phön. i. 219). It may have been some such reason as that assigned by Lewis (Orig. Hebr. v. 1), that the dog was the symbol of an Egyptian deity, which gave rise to the prohibition in Deut. xxiii. 18. Movers says the dog was offered in sacrifice to Moloch (i. 404), as swine to the moon and Dionysus by the Egyptians, who afterwards ate of the flesh (Her. iii. 47; Is. lxv. 4). Eating of the things offered was a necessary appendage to the sacrifice (comp. Ex. xviii. 12, xxxii. 6, xxxiv. 15; Num. xxv. 2, &c.). Among the Persians the victim was eaten by the worshippers, and the soul alone left for the god (Strabo, xv. 732). "Hence it is that the idolatry of the Jews in worshipping other gods is so often described synecdochically under the notion of feasting. Is. lvii. 7, 'Upon a high and lofty mountain thou hast set thy bed, and thither wentest thou up to offer sacrifice;' for in those ancient times they were not wont to sit at feasts, but lie down on beds or couches. Ez. xxiii. 41: Amos ii. 8, 'They laid themselves down upon clothes laid to pledge by every altar,' i. e. laid themselves down to eat of the sacrifice that was offered on the altar: comp. Ez. xviii. 11" (Cudworth, ut supra, c. 1; cf. 1 Cor. viii. 10). The Israelites were forbidden 'to print any mark upon them" (Lev. xix. 28), because it was a custom of idolaters to brand upon their flesh some symbol of the deity they worshipped, as the ivy-leaf of Bacchus (3 Macc. ii. 29). According to Lucian (de Dea Syra, 59), all the Assyrians wore marks of this kind on their necks and wrists (comp. Is. xliv. 5; Gal. vi. 17; Rev. xiv. 1, 11). Many other practices of false worship are alluded to, and made the subjects of rigorous prohibition but none are more frequently or more severely denounced than those which peculiarly distinguished the worship of Molech. It has been attempted to deny that the worship of this idol was polluted by the foul stain of human sacrifice, but the allusions are too plain and too pointed to admit of reasonable doubt (Deut. xii. 31; 2 K. iii. 27; Jer. vii. 31; Ps. cvi. 37; Ez. xxiii. 39). Nor was this practice confined to the rites of Molech; it extended to those of Baal (Jer. xix. 5), and the king of Moab (2 K. iii. 27) offered his son as a burnt-offering to his god Chemosh. The Phœnicians, we are told by Porphyry (de Abstin. ii. c. 56), on occasions of great national calamity sacrificed to Kronos one of their dearest friends. Some allusion to this custom may be seen in Micah vi. 7. Kissing the images of the gods (1 K. xix. 18; Hos. xiii. 2), hanging votive offerings in their temples (1 Sam. xxxi. 10), and carrying them to battle (2 Sam. v. 21), as the Jews of Maccabæus' army did with the things consecrated to the idols of the Jamnites (2 Macc. xii. 40), are usages connected with idolatry which are casually mentioned, though not made the objects of express legislation. But soothsaying, interpretation of dreams, necromancy, witchcraft, magic, and other forms of divination, are alike forbidden (Deut. xviii. 9; 2 K. i. 2: Is. lxv. 4: Ez. xxi. 21). The history of other nations — and indeed the too common practice of the lower class of the population of Syria at the present day — shows us that such a statute as that against bestiality (Lev. xviii. 23) was not unnecessary (cf. Her. ii. 46: Rom. i. 26). Purificatory rites in connection with idolworship, and eating of forbidden food, were visited with severe retribution (Is. lxvi. 17). It is evident, from the context of Ez. viii. 17, that the votaries of the sun, who worshipped with their faces to the east (v. 16), and "put the branch to their nose," did so in observance of some idolatrous rite. Movers (Phön. i. 66), unhesitatingly affirms that the allusion is to the branch Barsom, the holy branch of the Magi (Strabo, xv. p. 733), while Hävernick (Comm. zu Ezech. p. 117), with equal confidence, denies that the passage supports such an inference, and renders, having in view the lament of the women for Thammuz, "sie entsenden den Trauergesang zu ihren Zorn." The waving of a myrtle branch, says Maimonides (de Idol. vi. 2), accompanied the repetition of a magical formula in incantations. An illustration of the usage of boughs in worship will be found in the Greek ἱκετηρία (Æsch. Eum. 43; Suppl. 192; Schol. on Aristoph. Plut. 383; Porphyr. de Ant. Nymph. c. 33). For detailed accounts of idolatrous ceremonies, reference must be made to the articles upon the several idols.

[a] An illustration, though not an example, of this is found in the modern history of Europe. At a period of great profligacy and corruption of morals, licentiousness was carried to such an excess in Strasburg that the public prostitutes received the appellation of the swallows of the cathedral (Miller, Phil. of Hist. ii 441).

III. It remains now briefly to consider the light in which idolatry was regarded in the Mosiac code, and the penalties with which it was visited. If one main object of the Hebrew polity was to teach the unity of God, the extermination of idolatry was but a subordinate end. Jehovah, the God of the Israelites, was the civil head of the State. He was the theocratic king of the people, who had delivered them from bondage, and to whom they had taken a willing oath of allegiance. They had entered into a solemn league and covenant with him as their chosen king (comp. 1 Sam. viii 7), by whom obedience was requited with temporal blessings, and rebellion with temporal punishment. This original contract of the Hebrew government, as it has been termed, is contained in Ex. xix. 3–8, xx. 2–5; Deut. xxix. 10–xxx.: the blessings promised to obedience are enumerated in Deut. xxviii. 1–14, and the withering curses on disobedience in verses 15–68. That this covenant was faithfully observed it needs but slight acquaintance with Hebrew history to perceive. Often broken and often renewed on the part of the people (Judg. x. 10; 2 Chr. xv. 12, 13; Neh. ix. 38), it was kept with unwavering constancy on the part of Jehovah. To their kings he stood in the relation, so to speak, of a feudal superior: they were his representatives upon earth, and with them, as with the people before, his covenant was made (1 K. iii. 14, xi. 11). Idolatry, therefore, to an Israelite, was a state offence (1 Sam. xv. 23),[a] a political crime of the gravest character, high treason against the majesty of his king. It was a transgression of the covenant (Deut. xvii. 2), "the evil" preëminently in the eyes of Jehovah (1 K. xxi. 25, opp. to הַיָּשָׁר, "the right," 2 Chr. xxvii. 2). But it was much more than all this. While the idolatry of foreign nations is stigmatized merely as an abomination in the sight of God, which called for his vengeance, the sin of the Israelites is regarded as of more glaring enormity, and greater moral guilt. In the figurative language of the prophets, the relation between Jehovah and his people is represented as a marriage bond (Is. liv. 5; Jer. iii. 14), and the worship of false gods with all its accompaniments (Lev. xx. 56) becomes then the greatest of social wrongs (Hos. ii.; Jer. iii. etc.). This is beautifully brought out in Hos. ii. 16, where the heathen name Baali, my master, which the apostate Israel has been accustomed to apply to her foreign possessor, is contrasted with Ishi, my man, my husband, the native word which she is to use when restored to her rightful husband, Jehovah. Much of the significance of this figure was unquestionably due to the impurities of idolaters, with whom such corruption was of no merely spiritual character (Ex. xxxiv. 16; Num. xxv. 1, 2, &c.), but manifested itself in the grossest and most revolting forms (Rom. i. 26–32).

Regarded in a moral aspect, false gods are called "stumbling blocks" (Ez. xiv. 3), "lies" (Am. ii. 4; Rom. i. 25), "horrors" or "frights" (1 K. xv. 13; Jer. l. 38), "abominations" (Deut. xxix. 17, xxxii. 16; 1 K. xi. 5; 2 K. xxiii. 13), "guilt" (abstract for concrete, Am. viii. 14, אַשְׁמָה, ashmâh, comp. 2 Chr. xxix. 18, perhaps with a play on Ashima, 2 K. xvii. 30), and with a profound sense of the degradation consequent upon their worship, they are characterized by the prophets, whose mission it was to warn the people against them (Jer. xliv. 4), as "shame" (Jer. xi. 13; Hos. ix. 10). As considered with reference to Jehovah, they are "other gods" (Josh. xxiv. 2, 16), "strange gods" (Deut. xxxii. 16), "new gods" (Judg. v. 8), "devils, — not God" (Deut. xxxii. 17; 1 Cor. x. 20, 21); and, as denoting their foreign origin, "gods of the foreigner" (Josh. xxiv. 14, 15).[b] Their powerlessness is indicated by describing them as "gods that cannot save" (Is. xlv. 20), "that made not the heavens" (Jer. x. 11), "nothing" (Is. xli. 24; 1 Cor. viii. 4), "wind and emptiness" (Is. xli. 29), "vanities of the heathen" (Jer. xiv. 22; Acts xiv. 15); and yet, while their deity is denied, their personal existence seems to have been acknowledged (Kurtz, Gesch. d. A. B. ii. 86, &c.), though not in the same manner in which the pretentions of local deities were reciprocally recognized by the heathen (1 K. xx. 23, 28; 2 K. xvii. 26). Other terms of contempt are employed with reference to idols, אֱלִילִים, ĕlîlîm (Lev. xix. 4), and גִּלּוּלִים, gillûlîm (Deut. xxix. 17), to which different meanings have been assigned, and many which indicate ceremonial uncleanness. [IDOL, p. 1118 b.]

Idolatry, therefore, being from one point of view a political offense, could be punished without infringement of civil rights. No penalties were attached to mere opinions. For aught we know, theological speculation may have been as rife among the Hebrews as in modern times, though such was not the tendency of the Semitic mind. It was not, however, such speculations, heterodox though they might be, but overt acts of idolatry, which were made the subjects of legislation (Michaelis, Laws of Moses, arts. 245, 246). The first and second commandments are directed against idolatry of every form. Individuals and communities were equally amenable to the rigorous code. The individual offender was devoted to destruction (Ex. xxii. 20); his nearest relatives were not only bound to denounce him and deliver him up to punishment (Deut. xiii. 2–10), but their hands were to strike the first blow when, on the evidence of two witnesses at least, he was stoned (Deut. xvii. 2–5). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (Deut. xiii. 6–10). An idolatrous nation shared a similar fate. No facts are more strongly insisted on in the O. T. than that the extermination of the Canaanites was the punishment of their idolatry (Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16; Deut. vii., xii. 29–31, xx. 17), and that the calamities of the Israelites were due to the same cause (Jer. ii. 17). A city guilty of idolatry was looked upon as a cancer of the state; it was considered to be in rebellion, and treated according to the laws of war. Its inhabitants and all their cattle were put to death. No spoil was taken, but everything it contained was burnt with itself; nor was it allowed to be rebuilt (Deut. xiii. 13–18; Josh. vi. 26). Saul lost his kingdom, Achan his life, and Hiel his family, for transgressing this law (1 Sam. xv.; Josh. vii.; 1 K. xvi. 34). The silver and gold with which the idols were covered were accursed (Deut. vii. 25, 26). And not only were the Israelites forbidden to serve the gods of Canaan (Ex. xxiii. 24), but even to mention their names, that is, to call upon them in prayer or any form of worship (Ex. xxiii.

[a] The point of this verse is lost in the A. V.: it should be "for the sin of witchcraft (is) rebellion; and idolatry (lit vanity) and teraphim (are) stubbornness." The Israelites, contrary to command, had spared of the spoil of the idolatrous Amalekites to offer to Jehovah, and thus associated his worship with that of idols.

[b] In the A. V. the terms זָר, zâr, "strange," and נֵכָר or נָכְרִי, nêcâr or nâcrî, "foreign," are not uniformly distinguished, and the point of a passage is frequently lost by the interchange of one with the other, or by rendering both by the same word. So Ps lxxxi. 9 should be, "There shall not be in thee a strange god, nor shalt thou worship a foreign god."

13; Josh xxiii. 7). On taking possession of the land they were to obliterate all traces of the existing idolatry; statues, altars, pillars, idol-temples, every person and everything connected with it, were to be swept away (Ex. xxiii. 24, 32, xxxiv. 13; Deut. vii. 5, 25, xii. 1–3, xx. 17), and the name and worship of the idols blotted out. Such were the precautions taken by the framer of the Mosaic code to preserve the worship of Jehovah, the true God, in its purity. Of the manner in which his descendants have "put a fence" about "the law" with reference to idolatry, many instances will be found in Maimonides (de Idol.). They were prohibited from using vessels, scarlet garments, bracelets, or rings, marked with the sign of the sun, moon, or dragon (vii. 10); trees planted or stones erected for idol-worship were forbidden (viii. 5, 10); and, to guard against the possibility of contamination, if the image of an idol were found among other images intended for ornament, they were all to be cast into the Dead Sea (vii. 11).

IV. Much indirect evidence on this subject might be supplied by an investigation of proper names. Mr. Layard has remarked, "According to a custom existing from time immemorial in the East, the name of the Supreme Deity was introduced into the names of men. This custom prevailed from the banks of the Tigris to the Phœnician colonies beyond the Pillars of Hercules; and we recognize in the Sardanapalus of the Assyrians, and the Hannibal of the Carthaginians, the identity of the religious system of the two nations, as widely distinct in the time of their existence as in their geographical position" (Nin. ii. 450). The hint which he has given can be but briefly followed out here. Traces of the sun-worship of the ancient Canaanites remain in the nomenclature of their country. Beth-shemesh, "house of the sun," En-shemesh, "spring of the sun," and Ir-shemesh, "city of the sun," whether they be the original Canaanitish names, or their Hebrew renderings, attest the reverence paid to the source of light and heat, the symbol of the fertilizing power of nature. Samson, the Hebrew national hero, took his name from the same luminary, and was born in a mountain-village above the modern 'Ain Shems (En-shemesh: Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 361). The name of Baal, the sun-god, is one of the most common occurrence in compound words, and is often associated with places consecrated to his worship, and of which perhaps he was the tutelary deity. Bamoth-baal, "the high-places of Baal:" Baal-hermon, Beth-Baal-meon, Baal-gad, Baal-hamon, in which compound the names of the sun-god of Phœnicia and Egypt are associated, Baal-Tamar, and many others, are instances of this.[a] Nor was the practice confined to the names of places: proper names are found with the same element. Esh baal, Ish-baal, etc., are examples. The Amorites, whom Joshua did not drive out, dwelt on Mount Heres, in Aijalon, "the mountain of the sun" [TIMNATH-HERES]. Here and there we find traces of the attempt made by the Hebrews, on their conquest of the country, to extirpate idolatry. Thus Baalah or Kirjath-baal, "the town of Baal," became Kirjath-jearim, "the town of forests" (Josh. xv. 60). The Moon, Astarte or Ashtaroth, gave her name to a city of Bashan (Josh. xiii. 12, 31), and it is not improbable that the name Jericho may have been derived from being associated with the worship of this goddess. [JERICHO.] Nebo, whether it be the name under which the Chaldæans worshipped the Moon or the planet Mercury, enters into many compounds: Nebu-zaradan, Sangar-nebo, and the like. Bel is found in Belshazzar, Belteshazzar, and others. Were Baladan of Semitic origin, it would probably be derived from Baal-Adon, or Adonis, the Phœnician deity to whose worship Jer. xxii. 18 seems to refer: but it has more properly been traced to an Indo-Germanic root. Hadad, Hadadezer, Benhadad, are derived from the tutelar deity of the Syrians, and in Nergalsharezer we recognize the god of the Cushites. Chemosh, the fire-god of Moab, appears in Carchemish, and Peor in Beth-peor. Malcom, a name which occurs but once, and then of a Moabite by birth, may have been connected with Molech and Milcom, the abomination of the Ammonites. A glimpse of star-worship may be seen in the name of the city Chesil, the Semitic Orion, and the month Chisleu, without recognizing in Rahab "the glittering fragments of the sea-snake trailing across the northern sky." It would perhaps be going too far to trace in En-gedi, "spring of the kid," any connection with the goat-worship of Mendes, or any relics of the wars of the giants in Rapha and Rephaim. First, indeed, recognizes in Gedi, Venus or Astarte, the goddess of fortune, and identical with Gad (Hendiv. s. v.). But there are fragments of ancient idolatry in other names in which it is not so palpable. Ish-bosheth is identical with Esh-baal, and Jerubbesheth with Jerubbaal, and Mephibosheth and Meribbaal are but two names for one person (cf. Jer. xi. 13). The worship of the Syrian Rimmon appears in the names Hadad-rimmon, and Tabrimmon; and if, as some suppose, it be derived from רִמּוֹן, Rimmôn, "a pomegranate-tree," we may connect it with the towns of the same name in Judah and Benjamin, with En-Rimmon and the prevailing tree-worship. It is impossible to pursue this investigation to any length: the hints which have been thrown out may prove suggestive. W. A. W.

IDU'EL (Ἰδουήλος: Eccelon), 1 Esdr. viii. 43. [ARIEL, 1.]

IDUME'A [or IDUMÆ'A] (אֱדֹם less frequently אֲדֹם, red]: ἡ Ἰδουμαία: Idumæa, Edom), Is. xxxiv. 5, 6; Ez. xxxv. 15, xxxvi. 5; 1 Macc. iv. 15, 29, 61, v. 3, vi. 31; 2 Macc. xii. 32 Mark iii. 8. [EDOM.]

I'GAL (יִגְאָל [whom God redeems or avenges]). 1. (Ἰαλάλ; Alex. Ιγαλ: Igal.) Son of Joseph, of the tribe of Issachar, chosen by Moses to represent that tribe among the spies who went up from Kadesh to search the Promised Land (Num. xiii. 7).

[a] That temples in Syria, dedicated to the several divinities, did transfer their names to the places where they stood, is evident from the testimony of Lucian, an Assyrian himself. His derivation of Hiera from the temple of the Assyrian Hera shows that he was familiar with the circumstance (de Dea Syr. c. 1). Baisampsa (= Beth-shemesh), a town of Arabia, derived its name from the sun-worship (Vossius, de Theol. Gent. ii. c. 8), like Kir Heres (Jer. xlviii 31 of Moab.

2. [Γάαλ: Igaal.] One of the heroes of David's guard, son of Nathan of Zobah (2 Sam. xxiii. 36, Γάαλ). In the parallel list of 1 Chr. the name is given as "Joel the brother of Nathan" (xi. 38, Ἰωήλ). Kennicott, after a minute examination of the passage both in the original and in the ancient versions, decides in favor of the latter as most like the genuine text (Dissertation, pp. 212–214).

This name is really identical with IGEAL.

IGDALI'AH (יִגְדַּלְיָהוּ), i. e. Igdalia'hu [Jehovah is great, Fürst; whom Jehovah makes great, Ges.]: Γοδολίας; [FA. omits:] Jegedelias), a prophet or holy man — "the man of God" — named once only (Jer. xxxv. 4), as the father of Hanan, in the chamber of whose sons, the Bene-Hanan, in the house of Jehovah, Jeremiah had that remarkable interview with the Rechabites which is recorded in that chapter.

IG'EAL (יִגְאָל [see IGAL]: Ἰωήλ: Jegaal), a son of Shemaiah; a descendant of the royal house of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 22). Aecording to the present state of the text of this difficult genealogy, he is fourth in descent from Zerubbabel; but, accord-ing to Lord A. Hervey's plausible alteration, he is the son of Shimei, brother to Zerubbabel, and therefore but one generation distant from the latter (Genealogy of our Lord, pp. 107–109). The name is identical with IGAL [2 Sam. xxiii. 36]; and, as in that case, the LXX. give it as Joel.

I'IM (עִיִּים [ruins, stone-heaps]). 1. (Γαΐ: Iieabarim). The partial or contracted form of the name IJE-ABARIM, one of the later stations of the Israelites on their journey to Palestine (Num. xxxiii. 45). In the Samaritan version Iim is rendered by Cephrani, "villages;" and in the Targum Pseudojon. by Gizzeh, גִּזָּה, possibly pointing to sheep-shearing in the locality. But in no way do we gain any clew to the situation of the place.

2. (Βακώκ; Alex. Ανειμ: Iim), a town in the extreme south of Judah, named in the same group with Beer-sheba, Hormah, etc. (Josh. xv. 29). The Peshito Syriac version has Elin, ܐܠܝܢ. No trace of the name has yet been discovered in this direction. G.

IJE-AB'ARIM (עִיֵּי הָעֲבָרִים, with the definite article, Iye ha-Abarim — the heaps, or ruins, of the further regions: Jerome ad Fabiolam, acervos lapidum transeuntium: Ἀχαλγαί [Vat. Χαλγλει, Alex. Αχελγαϊ], and Γαΐ: Jeabarim, and Ieabarim), one of the later halting places of the children of Israel as they were approaching Palestine (Num. xxi. 11; xxxiii. 44). It was next beyond Oboth, and the station beyond it again was the Wady Zared — the torrent of the willows — probably one of the streams which run into the S. E. angle of the Dead Sea. Between Ije-abarim and Dibon-gad, which succeeds it in Num. xxxiii., the Zared and the Arnon have to be inserted from the parallel accounts of xxi. and Deut. ii., Dibon-gad and Almon-Diblathaim, which lay above the Arnon, having in their turn escaped from the two last-named narratives. Ije-abarim was on the boundary — the S. E. boundary — of the territory of Moab; not on the pasture-downs of the Mishor, the modern Belka, but in the midbar, the waste uncultivated "wilderness" on its skirts (xxi. 11). Moal they were expressly forbidden to molest (Deut. ii. 9–12), but we may perhaps be allowed to conclude from the terms of ver. 13, "now rise up" (קוּמוּ), that they had remained on his frontier in Ije-Abarim for some length of time. No identification of its situation has been attempted, nor has the name been found lingering in the locality, which, however, has yet to be explored. If there is any connection between the Ije-Abarim and the Har-Abarim, the mountain-range opposite Jericho, then Abarim is doubtless a general appellation for the whole of the highland east of the Dead Sea. [ABARIM.]

The rendering given by the LXX. is remarkable. Γαΐ is no doubt a version of Iye — the Ain being converted into G: but whence does the Ἀχάλ come? Can it be the vestige of a nachal — "torrent" or "wady" — once attached to the name? The Targum Pseudojon. has Meshre Megiztha — the plain of shearing — which is equally puzzling.

In Num. xxxiii. 45 it is given in the shorter form of IIM. G.

I'JON (עִיּוֹן, ruin: Ἀϊν and Ἀϊών; [in 1 K., Alex. Ναϊν; in 2 Chr., Vat. Ιω:] Ahion, [Aion]), a town in the north of Palestine, belonging to the tribe of Naphtali. It was taken and plundered by the captains of Benhadad, along with Dan and other store-cities of Naphtali (1 K. xv. 20; 2 Chr. xvi. 4). It was plundered a second time by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. xv. 29). We find no further mention of it in history. At the base of the mountains of Naphtali, a few miles N. W. of the site of Dan, is a fertile and beautiful little plain called Merj 'Ayûn (مرج عيون; the Arabic word عيون, though different in meaning, is radically identical with the Heb. עִיּוֹן); and near its northern end is a large mound called Tell Dibbin. The writer visited it some years ago, and found there the traces of a strong and ancient city. This, in all probability, is the site of the long-lost Ijon (Robinson's Bibl. Res., iii. 375). J. L. P.

IK'KESH (עֵקֵשׁ [perverse, perverted]: Ἴσκα, Ἐκκίς, Ἐκκῆς; Alex. Εκκας, [Εκκης; Vat. FA. in 1 Chr., Εκτης:] Acces), the father of IRA the Tekoite, one of the heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 28, xxvii. 9).

I'LAI [2 syl.] (עֵילַי [most high, exalted]: Ἠλί; [Vat. FA. Ηλει:] Ilai), an Ahohite, one of the heroes of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 29). In the list of 2 Sam. xxiii. the name is given ZALMON. Kennicott (Dissertation, pp. 187–9) examines the variations at length, and decides in favor of Ilai as the original name.

ILLYRICUM (Ἰλλυρικόν), an extensive district lying along the eastern coast of the Adriatic from the boundary of Italy on the north to Epirus on the south, and contiguous to Mœsia and Macedonia on the east: it was divided by the river Drilo into two portions, Illyris Barbara, the northern, and Illyris Græca, the southern. Within these limits was included Dalmatia, which appears to have been used indifferently with Illyricum for a portion, and ultimately for the whole of the district. St. Paul records that he preached the Gospel "round about unto Illyricum" (Rom. xv. 19): he probably uses the term in its most extensive sense, and the part visited (if indeed he crossed the boundary at all) would have been about Dyrrachium. W. L. B.

* In Rom. xv. 19 Paul speaks of his having preached the gospel "from Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum." We have no account in the Acts of the Apostles of any journey to that province. It is a question of interest whether we can insert this journey in the history so as to bring the Acts and the Epistles into accordance with each other on this point. Illyricum lay on the Adriatic, west of Macedonia. Paul now was in Macedonia only three times during his ministry. He could not have gone to Illyricum when he was there first: for the course of his journey at that time is minutely traced in the Acts from his landing at Neapolis to his leaving Corinth on his return by sea to Palestine. In going south on that occasion he moved along the eastern side of the peninsula, and was kept at a distance from Illyricum (Acts xvi. 12 ff.). Nor, again, could it have been when he passed through Macedonia on his return thither from Greece at the time of his last journey to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 1 ff.); for the excursion to Illyricum must have preceded this return. He had then written the Epistle to the Romans, in which he speaks of having already been to Illyricum; and that epistle he wrote at Corinth just before his departure thence for Macedonia (see Rom. xvi. i. 23, and comp. 1 Cor. i. 14). His only other visit to Macedonia was the intermediate one when he came to that region from Troas on the way to southern Greece (Acts xx. I, 2). No mention is made of Illyricum at that time, but in describing the circuit of the Apostle's labors here, Luke employs the comprehensive expression, "those parts" (τὰ μέρη ἐκεῖνα). We may assume, therefore, that one of the "parts," or regions, was Illyricum, which was adjacent to Macedonia; and so much the more, because the chronology of this portion of Paul's life allows us to assign the ample time of three or four months to just these labors in Northern Greece before he proceeded to Achaia or Corinth. Thus the epistle and the history, so incomplete and obscure apart from each other, form a perfect whole when brought together, and that by a combination of circumstances, of which the two writers could have had no thought when they penned their different accounts. Lardner pronounces this geographical and historical coincidence sufficiently important to authenticate the entire narrative of Paul's travels as related in the Acts of the Apostles. H.

IMAGE. [IDOL.]

* IMAGERY, CHAMBERS OF, or chambers of images (Ezek. viii. 12). The Hebrew is אִישׁ בַּחַדְרֵי מִשְׂכִּיתוֹ, and of this a literal translation would be: "Each one in the chamber or apartment of his imagery." Many of the commentators transfer the suffix pronoun to the first noun, and render: "Each one in his apartment of images" (see Rosenmüller, Maurer, and others). But the pronoun may perhaps be added to the last noun to show that different persons had different objects of worship. The whole passage (vv. 7–12 inclusive) represents a scene of idolatrous worship which was disclosed to the prophet as through a secret door of entrance (vv. 7, 8). On the walls of the apartment were portrayed "every form of creeping thing and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel" (ver. 10); and seventy men of the elders of the house of Israel (according to the number of the Sanhedrim), with their president (Jaazaniah) stood before these pictures, each with his censer in his hand, and offered incense (ver. 11). That this idol worship was introduced from Egypt is plain from the kind of objects portrayed, as indicated in ver. 10; whilst in subsequent verses idolatrous practices which had crept in from Phœnicia (ver. 14) and Persia (ver. 16), are brought to view. A similar chamber of imagery is referred to in Ez. xxiii. 14: "Where she saw men portrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldæans portrayed with vermilion," etc. Representations found among the ruins of Nineveh, as well as in Egypt, furnish good illustrations of the practices here referred to. R. D. C. R.

IM'LA (יִמְלָא [filled, full; or fulfiller]: Ἰεμβλά; [Vat. Ιεμβλααs, Ιεμβλαα;] Alex. Ιεμλα: Jemla), father or progenitor of Micaiah, the prophet of Jehovah, who was consulted by Ahab and Jehoshaphat before their fatal expedition to Ramoth-gilead (2 Chr. xviii. 7, 8). The form—

IM'LAH (יִמְלָה. Ἰεμβλαά: [Vat. Ιεμιας, Ιεμια;] Alex. Ιεμαα: Jemla) is employed in the parallel narrative (1 K. xxii. 8, 9).

IMMAN'UEL (עִמָּנוּאֵל [with us God], or in two words in many MSS. and editions עִמָּנוּ אֵל: Ἐμμανουήλ: Emmanuel), the symbolical name given by the prophet Isaiah to the child who was announced to Ahaz and the people of Judah, as the sign which God would give of their deliverance from their enemies (Is. vii. 14). It is applied by the Apostle Matthew to the Messiah, born of the Virgin (Matt. i. 23). By the LXX. in one passage (Is. vii. 14), and in both passages by the Vulg., Syr., and Targ., it is rendered as a proper name; but in Is. viii. 8 the LXX. translate it literally μεθ' ἡμῶν ὁ θεός. The verses in question have been the battle-field of critics for centuries, and in their discussions there has been no lack of the odium theologicum. As early as the times of Justin Martyr the Christian interpretation was attacked by the Jews, and the position which they occupied has of late years been assumed by many continental theologians. Before proceeding to a discussion, or rather to a classification of the numerous theories of which this subject has been the fruitful source, the circumstances under which the prophecy was delivered claim especial consideration.

In the early part of the reign of Ahaz the kingdom of Judah was threatened with annihilation by the combined armies of Syria and Israel. A hundred and twenty thousand of the choice warriors of Judah, all "sons of might," had fallen in one day's battle. The Edomites and Philistines had thrown off the yoke (2 Chr. xxviii.). Jerusalem was menaced with a siege; the hearts of the king and of the people "shook, as the trees of a forest shake before the wind" (Is. vii. 2). The king had gone to "the conduit of the upper pool," probably to take measures for preventing the supply of water from being cut off or falling into the enemy's hand, when the prophet met him with the message of consolation. Not only were the designs of the hostile armies to fail, but within sixty-five years the kingdom of Israel would be overthrown. In confirmation of his words, the prophet bids Ahaz ask a sign of Jehovah, which the king, with pretended humility, refused to do. After administering a severe rebuke to Ahaz for his obstinacy, Isaiah announces the sign which Jehovah himself would give unasked: "behold! the virgin (הָעַלְמָה; hâ'almâh)[a] is with child and beareth a son, and she shall call his name Immanuel."

The interpreters of this passage are naturally divided into three classes, each of which admits of subdivisions, as the differences in detail are numerous. The first class consists of those who refer the fulfillment of the prophecy to an historical event, which followed immediately upon its delivery. The majority of Christian writers, till within the last fifty years, form a second class, and apply the prophecy exclusively to the Messiah, while a third class, almost equally numerous, agree in considering both these explanations true, and hold that the prophecy had an immediate and literal fulfillment, but was completely accomplished in the miraculous conception and birth of Christ. Among the first are numbered the Jewish writers of all ages, without exception. Jerome refutes, on chronological grounds, a theory which was current in his day amongst the Jews, that the prophecy had reference to Hezekiah, the son of Ahaz, who from a comparison of 2 K. xvi. 2 with xviii. 2, must have been nine years old at the time it was delivered. The force of his argument is somewhat weakened by the evident obscurity of the numbers in the passages in question, from which we must infer that Ahaz was eleven years old at the time of Hezekiah's birth. By the Jews in the middle ages this explanation was abandoned as untenable, and in consequence some, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra, refer the prophecy to a son of Isaiah himself, and others to a son of Ahaz by another wife, as Kimchi and Abarbanel. In this case, the 'almâh is explained as the wife or betrothed wife of the prophet, or as a later wife of Ahaz. Kelle (Gesen. Comm. über den Jesaia) degrades her to the third rank of ladies in the harem (comp. Cant. vi. 8). Hitzig (der Proph. Jesaia) rejects Gesenius' application of 'almâh to a second wife of the prophet, and interprets it of the prophetess mentioned in viii. 3. Hendewerk (des Proph. Jesaia Weissag.) follows Gesenius. In either case, the prophet is made to fulfill his own prophecy. Isenbiehl, a pupil of Michaelis, defended the historical sense with considerable learning, and suffered unworthy persecution for expressing his opinions. The 'almâh in his view was some Hebrew girl who was present at the colloquy between Isaiah and Ahaz, and to whom the prophet pointed as he spoke. This opinion was held by Bauer, Cube, and Rosenmüller (1st ed.). Michaelis, Eichhorn, Paulus, and Ammon, give her a merely ideal existence; while Umbreit allows her to be among the bystanders, but explains the pregnancy and birth as imaginary only. Interpreters of the second class, who refer the prophecy solely to the Messiah, of course understand by the 'almâh the Virgin Mary. Among these, Vitringa (Obs. Sacr. v. c. 1) vigorously opposes those, who, like Grotius, Pellicanus, and Tirinus, conceded to the Jews that the reference to Christ Jesus was not direct and immediate, but by way of typical allusion. For, he maintains, a young married woman of the time of Ahaz and Isaiah could not be a type of the Virgin, nor could her issue by her husband be a figure of the child to be born of the Virgin by the operation of the Holy Ghost. Against this hypothesis of a solely Messianic reference, it is objected that the birth of the Messiah could not be a sign of deliverance to the people of Judah in the time of Ahaz. In reply to this, Theodoret advances the opinion that the birth of the Messiah involved the conservation of the family of Jesse, and therefore by implication of the Jewish state. Coccius argues on the same side, that the sign of the Messiah's birth would intimate that in the interval the kingdom and state of the Jews could not be alienated from God, and besides it confirms ver. 8, indicating that before the birth of Christ Judæa should not be subject to Syria, as it was when Archelaus was removed and it was reduced to the form of a Roman province. Of all these explanations Vitringa disapproves, and states his own conclusion, which is also that of Calvin and Piscator, to be the following: In vv. 14–16, the prophet gives a sign to the pious in Israel of their deliverance from the impending danger, and in ver. 17, &c., announces the evils which the Assyrians, not the Syrians, should inflict upon Ahaz and such of his people as resembled him. As surely as Messiah would be born of the Virgin, so surely would God deliver the Jews from the threatened evil. The principle of interpretation here made use of is founded by Calvin on the custom of the prophets, who confirmed special promises by the assurance that God would send a redeemer. But this explanation involves another difficulty, besides that which arises from the distance of the event predicted. Before the child shall arrive at years of discretion the prophet announces the desolation of the land whose kings threatened Ahaz. By this Vitringa understands that no more time would elapse before the former event was accomplished than would intervene between the birth and youth of Immanuel, an argument too far-fetched to have much weight. Hengstenberg (Christology, ii. 44–66, Eng. trans.) supports to the full the Messianic interpretation, and closely connects vii. 14 with ix. 6. He admits frankly that the older explanation of vv. 15, 16, has exposed itself to the charge of being arbitrary, and confidently propounds his own method of removing the stumbling-block. "In ver. 14 the prophet had seen the birth of the Messiah as present. Holding fast this idea and expanding it, the prophet makes him who has been born accompany the people through all the stages of its existence. We have here an ideal anticipation of the real incarnation. . . . . What the prophet means, and intends to say here is, that, in the space of about a twelvemonth, the overthrow of the hostile kingdoms would already have taken place. As the representative of the contemporaries, he brings forward the wonderful child who, as it were, formed the soul of the popular life. . . . . In the subsequent prophecy, the same wonderful child, grown up into a warlike hero, brings the deliverance from Asshur, and the world's power represented by it." The learned professor thus admits the double sense in the case of Asshur, but denies its application to Immanuel. It would be hard to say whether text or commentary be the more obscure.

[a] 'Almâh denotes a girl of marriageable age, but not married, and therefore a virgin by implication. It is never even used, as בְּתוּלָה, bethûlâh, which more directly expresses virginity, of a bride or betrothed wife (Joel i. 8). 'Almâh and bethûlâh are both applied to Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 16, 43), as apparently convertible terms; and in addition to the evidence from the cognate languages, Arabic and Syriac, we have the testimony of Jerome (on Is. vii. 14) that in Punic alma denoted a virgin.

In view of the difficulties which attend these explanations of the prophecy, the third class of interpreters above alluded to have recourse to a theory which combines the two preceding, namely, the hypothesis of the double sense. They suppose that the immediate reference of the prophet was to some contemporary occurrence, but that his words received their true and full accomplishment in the birth of the Messiah. Jerome (Comm. in Esaiam, vii. 14) mentions an interpretation of some Judaizers that Immanuel was the son of Isaiah, born of the prophetess, as a type of the Saviour, and that his name indicates the calling of the nations after the Word became flesh and dwelt among us. Something of the same kind is proposed by Dathe; in his opinion "the miracle, while it immediately respected the times of the prophet, was a type of the birth of Christ of the Virgin Mary." Dr. Pye Smith conjectured that it had an immediate reference to Hezekiah, "the virgin" being the queen of Ahaz; but, like some other prophetic testimonies, had another and a designed reference to some remoter circumstance, which when it occurred would be the real fulfillment, answering every feature and filling up the entire extent of the original delineation (Scrip. Test. to the Messiah, i. 357, 3d ed.). A serious objection to the application of the prophecy to Hezekiah has already been mentioned. Kennicott separates ver. 16 from the three preceding, applying the latter to Christ, the former to the son of Isaiah (Sermon on Is. vii. 13–16).

Such in brief are some of the principal opinions which have been held on this important question. From the manner in which the quotation occurs in Matt. i. 23, there can be no doubt that the Evangelist did not use it by way of accommodation, but as having in view its actual accomplishment. Whatever may have been his opinion as to any contemporary or immediate reference it might contain, this was completely obscured by the full conviction that burst upon him when he realized its completion in the Messiah. What may have been the light in which the promise was regarded by the prophet's contemporaries we are not in a position to judge; the hypothesis of the double sense satisfies most of the requirements of the problem, and as it does less violence to the text than the others which have been proposed, and is at the same time supported by the analogy of the Apostle's quotations from the O. T. (Matt. ii. 15, 18, 23; iv. 15), we accept it as approximating most nearly to the true solution. W. A. W.

IM'MER (אִמֵּר [perh. talkative, Dietr. Ges.; prominent, high, Fürst]: Ἐμμήρ; [in 1 Chr. ix. 12, Vat. Εμηρ; Neh. xi. 13, Vat. Alex. FA. omit:] Esmer), apparently the founder of an important family of priests, although the name does not occur in any genealogy which allows us to discover his descent from Aaron (1 Chr. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 13). This family had charge of, and gave its name to, the sixteenth course of the service (1 Chr. xxiv. 14). From them came Pashur, chief governor of the Temple in Jeremiah's time, and his persecutor (Jer. xx. 1). They returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Ezr. ii. 37; Neh. vii. 40). Zadok ben-Immer repaired his own house (Neh. iii. 29), and two other priests of the family put away their foreign wives (Ezr. x. 20). But it is remarkable that the name is omitted from the list of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah, and also of those who came up with Zerubbabel and Jeshua, and who are stated to have had descendants surviving in the next generation — the days of Joiakim (see Neh. xii. 1, 10, 12–21). [EMMER.] Different from the foregoing must be —

2. (Ἐμμήρ, Ἰεμήρ; [in Ezr., Vat. Εμηρ; in Neh., Alex. Ιεμμηρ:] Emer, [Emmer]), apparently the name of a place in Babylonia from which certain persons returned to Jerusalem with the first caravan, who could not satisfactorily prove their genealogy (Ezr. ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61). In 1 Esdras the name is given as Ἀαλάρ.

IM'NA (יִמְנָע [holding back]: Ἰμανά: Jemna), a descendant of Asher, son of Helem, and one of the "chief princes" of the tribe (1 Chr. vii. 35; comp. 40).

IM'NAH (יִמְנָה [luck, success]: Ἰεμνά; [Vat. Ιμνα:] Jemna). 1. The first-born of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 30). In the Pentateuch the name (identical with the present) is given in the A. V. as JIMNAH.

2. [Vat. Αιμαν.] Kore ben-Imnah, the Levite, assisted in the reforms of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 14).

* IMPLEAD (A. V. Acts xix. 38) is a technical term (like Luke's ἐγκαλεῖτωσαν), signifying "to accuse," or "prosecute" by a due course of law. The proper word occurs in the proper place. It is the city-councilor who speaks in that passage (see in loc.), pointing out to the Ephesians the lawful remedy for their grievances as opposed to one unlawful. H.

* IMPORTABLE occurs in the Prayer of Manasses: = importabilis in the Vulg. i. e. insupportable, unendurable, said of the divine threatening. The word is now obsolete in that sense. H.

* IMPOTENT (from impotens) signifies "strengthless," "sick," "infirm." It is the rendering of ἀσθενῶν in John v. 3, and in Acts iv. 9; but of ἀδύνατος in Acts xiv. 8. H.

* IMPRISONMENT. [PUNISHMENTS.]

IM'RAH (יִמְרָה [obstinacy, Ges.]: Ἰμράν; [Vat. corrupt:] Alex. Ιεμρα: Jamra), a descendant of Asher, of the family of ZOPHAH (1 Chr. vii. 36), and named as one of the chiefs of the tribe.

IM'RI (אִמְרִי [eloquent]). 1. (Ἀμβραΐμ, [Vat.] Alex. omit: Omrai, but it seems to have changed places with the preceding name.) A man of Judah of the great family of Pharez (1 Chr. ix. 4).

2. (Ἀμαρί; [Vat. FA. Αμαρει; Alex. Μιαρι:] Amri), father or progenitor of ZACCUR, who assisted Nehemiah in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 2).

* INCANTATIONS. [MAGIC.]

INCENSE, קְטוֹרָה (ketóràh), Deut. xxxiii. 10; קְטֹרֶת (ketóreth), Ex. xxv. 6, xxx. 1, &c.; לְבוֹנָה (lebônâh), Is. xliii. 23, lx. 6, &c. The incense employed in the service of the tabernacle was distinguished as קְטֹרֶת הַסַּמִּים (ketóreth hassammim), Ex. xxv. 6, from being compounded of the perfumes stacte, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense. All incense which was not made of these ingredients was called קְטֹרֶת זָרָה (ketōrâh zârâh), Ex. xxx. 9, and was forbidden to be offered. According to Rashi on Ex. xxx. 34, the above-mentioned perfumes were mixed in equal proportions, seventy manehs being taken of each. They were compounded by the skill of the apothecary, to whose use, according to rabbinical tradition, was devoted a portion of the temple, called, from the name of the family whose especial duty it was to prepare the incense, "the house of Abtines." So in the large temples of India "is retained a man whose chief business it is to distil sweet waters from flowers, and to extract oil from wood, flowers, and other substances" (Roberts, Orient. Illus. p. 82) The priest or Levite to whose care the incense was intrusted, was one of the fifteen מְמֻנִים (memûnîm), or prefects of the temple. Constant watch was kept in the house of Abtines that the incense might always be in readiness (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. אבטינס).

In addition to the four ingredients already mentioned Jarchi enumerates seven others, thus making eleven, which the Jewish doctors affirm were communicated to Moses on Mount Sinai. Josephus (B. J. v. 5, § 5) mentions thirteen. The proportions of the additional spices are given by Maimonides (Celê hammikdâsh, ii. 2, § 3) as follows. Of myrrh, cassia, spikenard, and saffron, sixteen manehs each. Of costus twelve manehs, cinnamon nine manehs, sweet bark three manehs. The weight of the whole confection was 368 manehs. To these was added the fourth part of a cab of salt of Sodom, with amber of Jordan, and an herb called "the smoke-raiser," (מַעֲלֵה עָשָׁן, maăleh âshân), known only to the cunning in such matters, to whom the secret descended by tradition. In the ordinary daily service one maneh was used, half in the morning and half in the evening. Allowing then one maneh of incense for each day of the solar year, the three manehs which remained were again pounded, and used by the high-priest on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 12). A store of it was constantly kept in the temple (Jos. B. J. vi. 8, § 3).

The incense possessed the threefold characteristic of being salted (not tempered as in A. V.), pure and holy. Salt was the symbol of incorruptness, and nothing, says Maimonides, was offered without it, except the wine of the drink-offerings, the blood, and the wood (cf. Lev. ii. 13). The expression בַּד בְּבַד (bad bebad), Ex. xxx. 34, is interpreted by the Chaldee "weight by weight," that is, an equal weight of each (cf. Jarchi, in loc.); and this rendering is adopted by our version. Others however, and among them Aben Ezra and Maimonides, consider it as signifying that each of the spices was separately prepared, and that all were afterwards mixed. The incense thus compounded was specially set apart for the service of the sanctuary: its desecration was punished with death (Ex. xxx. 37, 38); as in some part of India, according to Michaelis (Mosaisch. Recht, art. 249), it was considered high treason for any person to make use of the best sort of Calambuk, which was for the service of the king alone.

Aaron, as high-priest, was originally appointed to offer incense, but in the daily service of the second temple the office devolved upon the inferior priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot (Mishna, Yoma, ii. 4; Luke i. 9), each morning and evening (Abarbanel on Lev. x. 1). A peculiar blessing was supposed to be attached to this service, and in order that all might share in it, the lot was cast among those who were "new to the incense," if any remained (Mishna, Yoma, l. c.; Bartenora on Tamid, v. 2). Uzziah was punished for his presumption in attempting to infringe the prerogatives of the descendants of Aaron, who were consecrated to burn incense (2 Chr. xxvi. 16–21: Jos. Ant. ix. 10, 4). The officiating priest appointed another, whose office it was to take the fire from the brazen altar. According to Maimonides (Tmid. Umus. ii. 8, iii. 5) this fire was taken from the second pile, which was over against the S. E. corner of the altar of burnt-offering, and was of fig-tree wood. A silver shovel (מַחְתָּה, machtâh) was first filled with the live coals, and afterwards emptied into a golden one, smaller than the former, so that some of the coals were spilled (Mishna, Tamid, v. 5, Yoma, iv. 4; cf. Rev. viii. 5). Another priest cleared the golden altar from the cinders which had been left at the previous offering of incense (Mishna, Tamid, iii. 6, 9, vi. 1).

The times of offering incense were specified in the instructions first given to Moses (Ex. xxx. 7, 8). The morning incense was offered when the lamps were trimmed in the holy place, and before the sacrifice, when the watchman set for the purpose announced the break of day (Mishna, Yoma, iii. 1, 5). When the lamps were lighted "between the evenings," after the evening sacrifice and before the drink-offerings were offered, incense was again burnt on the golden altar, which "belonged to the oracle" (1 K. vi. 22), and stood before the veil which separated the holy place from the Holy of Holies, the throne of God (Rev. viii. 4; Philo, de Anim. idon. § 3).

When the priest entered the holy place with the incense, all the people were removed from the temple, and from between the porch and the altar (Maimon. Tmid. Umus. iii. 3; cf. Luke i. 10). The incense was then brought from the house of Abtines in a large vessel of gold called כַּף (caph), in which was a phial (בַּזִיךְ, bazîc, properly "a salver") containing the incense (Mishna, Tamid, v. 4). The assistant priests who attended to the lamps, the clearing of the golden altar from the cinders, and the fetching fire from the altar of burnt-offering, performed their offices singly, bowed towards the ark of the covenant, and left the holy place before the priest, whose lot it was to offer incense, entered. Profound silence was observed among the congregation who were praying without (cf. Rev. viii. 1), and at a signal from the prefect the priest cast the incense on the fire (Mishna. Tamid, vi. 3), and bowing reverently towards the Holy of Holies retired slowly backwards, not prolonging his prayer that he might not alarm the congregation, or cause them to fear that he had been struck dead for offering unworthily (Lev. xvi. 13; Luke i. 21: Mishna, Yoma, v. 1). When he came out he pronounced the blessing in Num. vi 24–26, the "magrephah" sounded, and the Levites burst forth into song, accompanied by the full swell of the temple music, the sound of which, say the Rabbins, could be heard as far as Jericho (Mishna. Tamid, iii. 8). It is possible that this may be alluded to in Rev. viii. 5. The priest then emptied the censer in a clean place, and hung it on one of the horns of the altar of burnt-offering.

On the day of atonement the service was different. The high-priest, after sacrificing the bullock as a sin-offering for himself and his family, took incense in his left hand and a golden shovel filled with live coals from the west side of the brazen altar (Jarchi on Lev. xvi. 12) in his right, and went into the Holy of Holies. He then placed the shovel upon the ark between the two bars. In the second temple, where there was no ark, a stone was substituted. Then sprinkling the incense upon the coals, he stayed till the house was filled with smoke, and walking slowly backwards came without the veil, where he prayed for a short time (Maimonides, Yom hakkippur, quoted by Ainsworth on Lev. xvi ; Outram de Sacrificiis, i. 8, § 11).

The offering of incense has formed a part of the religious ceremonies of most ancient nations. The Egyptians burnt resin in honor of the sun at its rising, myrrh when in its meridian, and a mixture called Kuphi at its setting (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. v. 315). Plutarch (de Is. et Os. c. 52, 80) describes Kuphi as a mixture of sixteen ingredients. "In the temple of Siva incense is offered to the Lingam six times in twenty-four hours" (Roberts, Orient. Illus. p. 468). It was an element in the idolatrous worship of the Israelites (Jer. xi. 12, 17, xlviii. 35; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 25).

With regard to the symbolical meaning of incense, opinions have been many and widely differing. While Maimonides regarded it merely as a perfume designed to counteract the effluvia arising from the beasts which were slaughtered for the daily sacrifice, other interpreters have allowed their imaginations to run riot, and vied with the wildest speculations of the Midrashim. Philo (Quis rer. div. hær. sit, § 41, p. 501) conceives the stacte and onycha to be symbolical of water and earth; galbanum and frankincense of air and fire. Josephus, following the traditions of his time, believed that the ingredients of the incense were chosen from the products of the sea, the inhabited and the uninhabited parts of the earth, to indicate that all things are of God and for God (B. J. v. 5, § 5). As the temple or tabernacle was the palace of Jehovah, the theocratic king of Israel, and the ark of the covenant his throne, so the incense, in the opinion of some, corresponded to the perfumes in which the luxurious monarchs of the East delighted. It may mean all this, but it must mean much more. Grotius, on Ex. xxx. 1, says the mystical signification is "sursum habenda corda." Cornelius a Lapide, on Ex. xxx. 34, considers it as an apt emblem of propitiation, and finds a symbolical meaning in the several ingredients. Fairbairn (Typology of Scripture, ii. 320), with many others, looks upon prayer as the reality of which incense is the symbol, founding his conclusion upon Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, 4. Bähr (Symb. d. Mos. Cult. vol. i., vi. § 4) opposes this view of the subject, on the ground that the chief thing in offering incense, is not the producing of the smoke, which presses like prayer towards heaven, but the spreading of the fragrance. His own exposition may be summed up as follows. Prayer, among all oriental nations, signifies calling upon the name of God. The oldest prayers consisted in the mere enumeration of the several titles of God. The Scripture places incense in close relationship to prayer, so that offering incense is synonymous with worship. Hence incense itself is a symbol of the name of God. The ingredients of the incense correspond severally to the perfections of God, though it is impossible to decide to which of the four names of God each belongs. Perhaps stacte corresponds to יְהוָה (Jehovah), onycha to אֱלֹהִים (Elôhîm), galbanum to חַי (chai), and frankincense to קָדוֹשׁ (kâdôsh). Such is Bähr's exposition of the symbolism of incense, rather ingenious than logical. Looking upon incense in connection with the other ceremonial observances of the Mosaic ritual, it would rather seem to be symbolical, not of prayer itself, but of that which makes prayer acceptable, the intercession of Christ. In Rev. viii. 3, 4, the incense is spoken of as something distinct from, though offered with, the prayers of all the saints (cf. Luke i. 10); and in Rev. v. 8 it is the golden vials, and not the odors or incense, which are said to be the prayers of saints. Ps. cxli. 2, at first sight, appears to militate against this conclusion; but if it be argued from this passage that incense is an emblem of prayer, it must also be allowed that the evening sacrifice has the same symbolical meaning. INDIA (הֹדּוּ, i. e. Hoddu: ἡ Ἰνδική: India)

The name of India does not occur in the Bible before the book of Esther, where it is noticed as the limit of the territories of Ahasuerus in the east, as Ethiopia was in the west (i. 1; viii. 9): the names are similarly connected by Herodotus (vii. 9). The Hebrew form "Hoddu" is an abbreviation of Honadu, which is identical with the indigenous names of the river Indus, "Hindu," or "Sindhu," and again with the ancient name of the country as it appears in the Vendidad, "Hapta Hendu." The native form "Sindus" is noticed by Pliny (vi. 23) The India of the book of Esther is not the peninsula of Hindostan, but the country surrounding the Indus — the Punjâb, and perhaps Scinde — the India which Herodotus describes (iii. 98) as forming part of the Persian empire under Darius, and the India which at a later period was conquered by Alexander the Great. The name occurs in the inscriptions of Persepolis and Nakhsh-i-Rustam, but not in those of Behistûn (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 485). In 1 Macc. viii. 8, India is reckoned among the countries which Eumenes, king of Pergamus, received out of the former possessions of Antiochus the Great. It is clear that India proper cannot be understood, inasmuch as this never belonged either to Antiochus or Eumenes. At the same time none of the explanations offered by commentators are satisfactory: the Eneti of Paphlagonia have been suggested, but these people had disappeared long before (Strab. xii. 534): the India of Xenophon (Cyrop. i. 5, § 3, iii. 2, § 25), which may have been above the Carian stream named Indus (Plin. v. 29, probably the Calbis), is more likely; but the emendation "Mysia and Ionia" for Media and India, offers the best solution of the difficulty. [IONIA.] A more authentic notice of the country occurs in 1 Macc. vi. 37, where Indians are noticed as the drivers of the war-elephants introduced into the army of the Syrian king. (See also 1 Esdr. iii. 2; Esth. xiii. 1; xvi. 1.)

But though the name of India occurs so seldom, the people and productions of that country must have been tolerably well known to the Jews. There is undoubted evidence that an active trade was carried on between India and Western Asia: the Tyrians established their depôts on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and procured "horns of ivory and ebony," "broidered work and rich apparel" (Ez. xxvii. 15, 24), by a route which crossed the Arabian desert by land, and then followed the coasts of the Indian ocean by sea. The trade opened by Solomon with Ophir through the Red Sea chiefly consisted of Indian articles, and some of the names even of the articles, algummim, "sandal wood," kophim, "apes," thuccim, "peacocks," are of Indian origin (Humboldt, Kosmos, ii. 133); to which we may add the Hebrew name of the "topaz," pitdah, derived from the Sanscrit pita. There is a strong probability that productions of yet greater utility were furnished by India through Syria to the shores of Europe, and that the Greeks derived both the term κασσίτερος (comp. the Sanscrit kastira), and the article it represents, "tin," from the coasts of India. The connection thus established with India led to the opinion that the Indians were included under the ethnological title of Cush (Gen. x. 6), and hence the Syrian, Chaldæan, and Arabic versions frequently render that term by India or Indians, as in 2 Chr. xxi. 16; Is. xi. 11, xviii. 1; Jer. xiii. 23; Zeph. iii. 10. For the connection which some have sought to establish between India and Paradise, see EDEN. [See on this word Roediger's Addit. ad Ges. Thes. p. 83. — H.]

W. L. B.

* INFIDEL, known to our Bible phraseology only in 2 Cor. vi. 15, and 1 Tim. v. 8. Instead of this positive term the privative "unbeliever" (ἄπιστος) is more correct, a distinction elsewhere observed in the rendering. The A. V. misses also the alliteration in the former of the above passages.

INHERITANCE. [HEIR.]

INK, INKHORN. [WRITING.]

INN (מָלוֹן, mâlôn: κατάλυμα, πανδοκεῖον). The Hebrew word thus rendered literally signifies "a lodging-place for the night." [a] Inns, in our sense of the term, were, as they still are, unknown in the East, where hospitality is religiously practiced. The khans, or caravanserais, are the representatives of European inns, and these were established but gradually. It is doubtful whether there is any allusion to them in the Old Testament. The halting-place of a caravan was selected originally on account of its proximity to water or pasture, by which the travellers pitched their tents and passed the night. Such was undoubtedly the "inn" at which occurred the incident in the life of Moses, narrated in Ex. iv. 24. It was probably one of the halting-places of the Ishmaelitish merchants who traded to Egypt with their camel-loads of spices. Moses was on his journey from the land of Midian, and the merchants in Gen. xxxvii. are called indiscriminately Ishmaelites and Midianites. At one of these stations, too, the first which they reached after leaving the city, and no doubt within a short distance from it, Joseph's brethren discovered that their money had been replaced in their wallets (Gen. xlii. 27).

Increased commercial intercourse, and in later times religious enthusiasm for pilgrimages [b] gave rise to the establishment of more permanent accommodation for travellers. On the more frequented routes, remote from towns (Jer. ix. 2), caravanserais were in course of time erected, often at the expense of the wealthy. The following description of one of those on the road from Baghdad to Babylon will suffice for all: "It is a large and substantial square building, in the distance resembling a fortress, being surrounded with a lofty wall, and flanked by round towers to defend the inmates in case of attack. Passing through a strong gateway, the guest enters a large court, the sides of which are divided into numerous arched compartments, open in front, for the accommodation of separate parties and for the reception of goods. In the centre is a spacious raised platform, used for sleeping upon at night, or for the devotions of the faithful during the day. Between the outer wall and the compartments are wide vaulted arcades, extending round the entire building, where the beasts of burden are placed. Upon the roof of the arcades is an excellent terrace, and over the gateway an elevated tower containing two rooms—one of which is open at the sides, permitting the occupants to enjoy every breath of air that passes across the heated plain. The terrace is tolerably clean; but the court and stabling below are ankle-deep in chopped straw and filth" (Loftus, Chaldæa, p. 13). The great khans established by the Persian kings and great men, at intervals of about six miles on the roads from Baghdad to the sacred places, are provided with stables for the horses of the pilgrims. "Within these stables, on both sides, are other cells for travellers" (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 478, note). The "stall" or "manger," mentioned in Luke ii. 7, was probably in a stable of this kind. Such khans are sometimes situated near running streams, or have a supply of water of some kind, but the traveller must carry all his provisions with him (Ouseley, Trav. in Persia, i. 261, note). At Damascus the khans are, many of them, substantial buildings; the small rooms which surround the court, as well as those above them which are entered from a gallery, are used by the merchants of the city for depositing their goods (Porter's Damascus, i. 33). The wekâlehs of modern Egypt are of a similar description (Lane, Mod. Eg. ii. 10).

"The house of paths" (Prov. viii. 2, ἐν οἴκῳ διόδων, Vers. Ven.), where Wisdom took her stand, is understood by some to refer appropriately to a khan built where many ways met and frequented by many travellers. A similar meaning has been attached to גֵּרוּת כִּמְהָם, gêrûth Cimhâm, "the hostel of Chimham" (Jer. xli. 17), beside Bethlehem, built by the liberality of the son of Barzillai for the benefit of those who were going down to Egypt (Stanley, S. & P., p. 163; App. § 90). The Targum says, "which David gave to Chimham, son of Barzillai the Gileadite" (comp. 2 Sam. xix. 37, 38). With regard to this passage, the ancient versions are strangely at variance. The LXX. had evidently another reading with ב and כ transposed, which they left untranslated γαβηραχαμάα, Alex.

[a] In the language of the A. V. "to lodge" has the force of remaining for the night. The word לִין is rendered in 1 K. xix. 9 "lodge;" in Gen. xix. 2 "tarry all night;" comp. also Jer. xiv. 8, &c.

[b] The erection of hospitals in the middle ages was due to the same cause. Paula, the friend of Jerome, built several on the road to Bethlehem; and the Scotch and Irish residents in France erected hospitals for the use of pilgrims of their own nation, on their way to Rome (Beckmann, Hist. of Inv. ii. 457). Hence Ang. pital, hostel, and finally hotel.

Βηθαραχαμάαμ. The Vulgate, if intended to be literal, must have read בָּרִים תְּכַמָּ, peregrinantes in Chanaam. The Arabic, following the Alexandrian MS., read it ἐν γῇ Βηρωθχαμάαμ, "in the land of Berothchamaam." The Syriac has בְּיָדֵי, bêdrê, "in the threshing-floors," as if בְּגָרְנוֹת, begornôth. Josephus had a reading different from all, בְּגִדְרוֹת, begidrôth, "in the folds of" Chimham; for he says the fugitives went "to a certain place called Mandra" (Μάνδρα λεγόμενον, Ant. x. 9. § 5), and in this he was followed by Aquila and the Hexaplar Syriac.

The πανδοκεῖον (Luke x. 34) probably differed from the κατάλυμα (Luke ii. 7) in having a "host" or "innkeeper" (πανδοκεύς, Luke x. 35), who supplied some few of the necessary provisions, and attended to the wants of travellers left to his charge. The word has been adopted in the later Hebrew, and appears in the Mishna (Yebamoth, xvi. 7) under the form פונדק, pûndak, and the host is פונדקי, pûndâki. The Jews were forbidden to put up their beasts at establishments of this kind kept by idolaters (Aboda Zara, ii. 1). It appears that houses of entertainment were sometimes, as in Egypt (Her. ii. 35), kept by women, whose character was such that their evidence was regarded with suspicion. In the Mishna (Yebamoth, xvi. 7) a tale is told of a company of Levites who were travelling to Zoar, the City of Palms, when one of them fell ill on the road and was left by his comrades at an inn, under the charge of the hostess (פונדקית, pûndekith = πανδοκευτρία). On their return to inquire for their friend, the hostess told them he was dead and buried, but they refused to believe her till she produced his staff, wallet, and roll of the law. In Josh. ii. 1, זוֹנָה, zônâh, the term applied to Rahab, is rendered in the Targum of Jonathan פונדקיתא, pûndekithâ, "a woman who keeps an inn." So in Judg. xi. 1, of the mother of Jephthah; of Delilah (Judg. xvi. 1) and the two women who appealed to Solomon (1 K. iii. 16). The words, in the opinion of Kimchi on Josh. ii. 1, appear to have been synonymous.

In some parts of modern Syria a nearer approach has been made to the European system. The people of es-Salt, according to Burckhardt, support four taverns (Menzel or Medhafe) at the public expense. At these the traveller is furnished with everything he may require, so long as he chooses to remain, provided his stay is not unreasonably protracted. The expenses are paid by a tax on the heads of families, and a kind of landlord superintends the establishment (Trav. in Syria, p. 36).

W. A. W.

* The statement ascribed above to Burckhardt is not strictly correct. In modern Syria, in all villages not provided with a khan, there is a house, usually the dwelling of the sheikh, which is called the menzoul, which is the place of entertainment of all strangers who are not visiting at the houses of friends. One of the villagers is officially designated as the khowât or caterer, and his business is to direct strangers to the menzoul, to supply them with provisions and fodder if required, to keep off the intrusive visits of children and idlers, and to provide a place of safety for the animals at night. It is not customary for the village to furnish these supplies gratis, but the traveller pays for them at usual rates, the caterer being the referee in case of a dispute between the buyer and seller. The caterer receives a compensation for his services proportioned to the generosity of the traveller. G. E. P.

INSTANT, INSTANTLY. A word employed by our translators in the N. T. with the force of urgency or earnestness, to render five distinct Greek words. We still say "at the instance of," but as that sense is no longer attached to "instant" — though it is still to the verb "insist," and to other compounds of the same root, such as "persist," "constant" — it has been thought advisable to notice its occurrences. They afford an interesting example, if an additional one be needed, of the close connection which there is between the Authorized Version and the Vulgate; the Vulgate having, as will be seen, suggested the word in three out of its five occurrences.

1. σπουδαίως — "they besought Him instantly" (Luke vii. 4). This word is elsewhere commonly rendered "earnestly," which is very suitable here.

2. ἐπέκειντο, from ἐπίκειμαι, to lie upon: — "they were instant with loud voices" (Vulg. instabant), Luke xxiii. 23. This might be rendered "they were pressing" (as in ver. 1).

3. ἐν ἐκτενείᾳ, "instantly serving God" (Acts xxvi. 7). The metaphor at the root of this word is that of stretching — on the stretch. Elsewhere in the A. V. it is represented by "fervently."

4. προσκαρτεροῦντες, "continuing instant" (Rom. xii. 12), Vulg. instantes. Here the adjectiv is hardly necessary, the word being elsewhere rendered by "continuing" — or to preserve the rhythm of so familiar a sentence — "continuing stedfast" (as Acts ii. 42).

b. Ἐπίστηθι, from ἐφιστάναι, to stand by or upon — "be instant in season, out of season" (2 Tim. iv. 2), Vulg. insta. Four verses further on it is rendered, "is at hand." The sense is "stand ready," "be alert" for whatever may happen. Of the five words this is the only one which contains the same metaphor as "instant."

In Luke ii. 38, "that instant" is literally "that same hour," — αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ. G.

* INWARD is used in the expression "my inward friends," for "familiar," "confidential" (A. V.) Job xix. 19 (מְרֵעַי כֹּולָּי, lit. men of my intimacy). The patriarch complains that those with whom he had been most familiar, to whom he had made known his most secret thoughts, had turned against him and abhorred him. H.

IO'NIA ([Semitic יָוָן, Javan, which see:] Ἰωνία). The substitution of this word for ἡ Ἰνδική in 1 Macc. viii. 8 (A. V. "India") is a conjecture of Grotius, without any authority of MSS. It must be acknowledged, however, that the change removes a great difficulty, especially if, as the same commentator suggests, Μυσία [Mysia] be substituted for Μηδεία or Μηδία in the same context.[a] The passage refers to the cession of territory which the Romans forced Antiochus the Great to make; and it is evident that India and Media are nothing to the purpose, whereas Ionia and Mysia were among the districts cis Taurum, which were given up to Eumenes.

As to the term Ionia, the name was given in early times to that part of the western coast of Asia Minor which lay between Æolis on the north and Doris on the south. These were properly ethnological terms, and had reference to the tribes of Greek settlers along this shore. Ionia, with its islands, was celebrated for its twelve, afterwards thirteen cities; five of which, Ephesus, Smyrna, Miletus, Chios, and Samos, are conspicuous in the N. T. In Roman times Ionia ceased to have any political significance, being absorbed in the province of Asia. The term, however, was still occasionally used, as in Joseph. Ant. xvi. 2, § 3, from which passage we learn that the Jews were numerous in this district. This whole chapter in Josephus is very interesting, as a geographical illustration of that part of the coast. [Javan.] J. S. H.

IPHEDEIAH [4 syl.] (יִפְדְּיָה [whom Jehovah frees]: Ἰεφαδίας: [Vat. Ἰεφερεια;] Alex. εφαδια: Jephdiæ), a descendant of Benjamin, one of the Bene-Shashak (1 Chr. viii. 25); specially named as a chief of the tribe, and as residing in Jerusalem (comp. ver. 28).

IR (עִיר [city, town]: Ὤρ, as if עוֹר; Alex. Ωρα; [Vat. om.; Comp. Ἴρ:] Hir), 1 Chr. vii. 12. [Ira.]

I'RA (עִירָא [vigilant, Dietr.; or watcher]: Ira). 1. (Ἰρᾶς, [Vat.] Alex. Ειρας.) "The Jairite," named in the catalogue of David's great officers (2 Sam. xx. 26) as "priest to David" (כֹּהֵן: A. V. "a chief ruler"). The Peshito version for "Jairite" has "from Jathir," i. e. probably Jattir, where David had found friends during his troubles with Saul. [Jairite.] If this can be maintained, and it certainly has an air of probability, then this Ira is identical with —

2. (Ἴρας, Ἰρά; [Vat. Ειρας, Ιρα:] Alex. Ειρας, [Ιρας]) "Ira the Ithrite" (הַיִּתְרִי; A. V. omits the article), that is, the Jattirite, one of the heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chr. xi. 40). [Ithrite; Jattir; Jether.]

3. (Ἴρας, Ἀρά; [Vat. Ειρας, Ωραι;] Alex. Ωραι; [in 1 Chr. xxvii., Ὀδουίας, Alex. Ειρα, Comp. Ἰρᾶ:] Hira.) Another member of David's guard, a Tekoite, son of Ikkesh (2 Sam. xxiii. 26: 1 Chr. xi. 28). Ira was leader of the sixth monthly course of 24,000, as appointed by David (1 Chr xxvii. 9).

I'RAD (עִירָד [fleet, rapid, Dietr.]: Γαϊδάδ in both MSS.; Joseph. Ἰαρέδης: Syr. Idar: Irad), son of Enoch; grandson of Cain, and father of Mehujael (Gen. iv. 18).

I'RAM (עִירָם [watchful, Dietr.]: Ζαφοίν; [Alex. Ζαφωει, Ηραμ; Vat. in Chr., Ζαφωειν:] Hiram; "belonging to a city," Ges.), a leader (אַלּוּף): LXX. ἡγεμών: "phylarch," A. V "duke") of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi. 43; 1 Chr. i. 54), i. e. the chief of a family or tribe. He occurs in the list of "the names of the dukes [that came] of Esau, according to their families, after their places, by their names" (Gen. xxxvi. 40–43); but none of these names is found in the genealogy of Esau's immediate descendants; the latter being separated from them by the enumeration of the sons of Seir and the kings of Edom, both in Gen. and Chr. They were certainly descendants of Esau, but in what generation is not known; evidently not in a remote one. The sacred records are generally confined to the history of the chosen race, and the reason of the exclusion of the Edomite genealogy beyond the second generation is thus explicable. In remarking on this gap in the genealogy, we must add that there appears to be no safe ground for supposing a chronological sequence of sons and grandsons of Esau, sons of Seir, kings of Edom, and lastly descendants of Esau again, ruling over the Edomites. These were probably in part, or wholly, contemporaneous; and אַלּוּפִים, we think, should be regarded as signifying a chief of a tribe, etc. (as rendered above), rather than a king. The Jewish assertion that these terms signified the same rank, except that the former was uncrowned and the latter crowned, may be safely neglected.

The names of which Iram is one are "according to their families, after their places (or 'towns,' מְקֹמֹתָם), by their names" (ver. 40); and again (ver. 43), "These [be] the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations in the land of their possession." These words imply that tribes and places were called after their leaders and founders, and tend to confirm the preceding remarks on the descendants of Esau being chiefs of tribes, and probably more or less contemporaneous with each other, and with the kings and Horites named together with them in the same records. It has been suggested that the names we are considering are those of the tribes and places founded by Esau's immediate descendants, mentioned earlier in the record; but no proof has been adduced in support of this theory.

[a] * For a copious note on this textual question, see Fritzsche's Handb. zu den Apokryphen, iii. 124. Unless the text be corrupt, it is impossible to acquit the writer of Maccabees of gross inaccuracy. Drusius and others had suggested the change of names before Grotius. It has been thought possible also that the error may have crept into the Greek in the process of translation from the Aramæan. H.

The time of the final destruction of the Horites is uncertain. By analogy with the conquest of Canaan (cf. Deut. ii. 12, 22) we may perhaps infer that it was not immediate on Esau's settlement. No identification of Iram has been found.

IR-HA-HE'RES, in A. V. THE CITY OF DESTRUCTION (עִיר הַהֶרֶס, var. עִיר הַחֶרֶס: [πόλις ἀσεδέκ; FA.[1] π. ασεδηλιου; Comp. π. ἀχερές]: Civitas Solis), the name or an appellation of a city in Egypt, mentioned only in Is. xix. 18. The reading הַהֶרֶס is that of most MSS. the Syr. Aq. and Theod., the other reading, חַרֶס, is supported by the LXX., but only in form, by Symm. who has πόλις ἡλίου, and the Vulg. Gesenius (Thes. pp. 391 a, 522) prefers the latter reading. There are various explanations: we shall first take those that treat it as a proper name, then those that suppose it to be an appellation used by the prophet to denote the future of the city.

1. עִיר הַהֶרֶס, city of the sun, a translation of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, generally called in the Bible On, the Hebrew form of its civil name AN [ON], and once Beth-shemesh, "the house of the sun" (Jer. xliii. 13), a more literal translation than this supposed one of the sacred name [BETH-SHEMESH].

2. עִיר הַהֶרֶס, or עִיר הַחֶרֶס, the city Heres, a transcription in the second word of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, HA-RA, "the abode (lit. 'house') of the sun." This explanation would necessitate the omission of the article. The LXX. favor it.

3. עִיר הַהֶרֶס, a city destroyed, lit. "a city of destruction;" in A. V. "the city of destruction," meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be destroyed, according to Isaiah's idiom.

4. עִיר הַהֶרֶס, a city preserved, meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be preserved. Gesenius, who proposes this construction, if the second word be not part of the name of the place, compares the Arabic حرس, "he guarded, kept, preserved," etc. It may be remarked that the word HERES or HRES in ancient Egyptian, probably signifies "a guardian." This rendering of Gesenius is, however, merely conjectural, and seems to have been favored by him on account of its directly contradicting the rendering last noticed.

The first of these explanations is highly improbable, for we find elsewhere both the sacred and the civil names of Heliopolis, so that a third name, merely a variety of the Hebrew rendering of the sacred name, is very unlikely. The name Beth shemesh is, moreover, a more literal translation in its first word of the Egyptian name than this supposed one. It may be remarked, however, as to the second word, that one of the towns in Palestine called Beth-shemesh, a town of the Levites on the borders of Judah and Dan, was not far from a Mount Heres, הַר־הֶרֶס (Judg. i. 35), so that the two names as applied to the sun as an object of worship might probably be interchangeable. The second explanation, which we believe has not been hitherto put forth, is liable to the same objection as the preceding one, besides that it necessitates the exclusion of the article. The fourth explanation would not have been noticed had it not been supported by the name of Gesenius. The common reading and old rendering remains, which certainly present no critical difficulties. A very careful examination of the xixth chap. of Isaiah, and of the xviiith and xxth, which are connected with it, has inclined us to prefer it. Egypt and Ethiopia were then either under a joint rule or under an Ethiopian sovereign. We can, therefore, understand the connection of the three subjects comprised in the three chapters. Chap. xviii. is a prophecy against the Ethiopians, xix. is the Burden of Egypt, and xx., delivered in the year of the capture of Ashdod by Tartan, the general of Sargon, predicts the leading captive of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, probably the garrison of that great stronghold, as a warning to the Israelites who trusted in them for aid. Chap. xviii. ends with an indication of the time to which it refers, speaking of the Ethiopians — as we understand the passage — as sending "a present" "to the place of the name of the Lord of hosts, the mount Zion" (ver. 7). If this is to be taken in a proper and not a tropical sense, it would refer to the conversion of Ethiopians by the preaching of the Law while the Temple yet stood. That such had been the case before the gospel was preached is evident from the instance of the eunuch of Queen Candace, whom Philip met on his return homeward from worshipping at Jerusalem, and converted to Christianity (Acts viii. 26–39). The Burden of Egypt seems to point to the times of the Persian and Greek dominions over that country. The civil war agrees with the troubles of the Dodecarchy, then we read of a time of bitter oppression by "a cruel lord and [or 'even'] a fierce king," probably pointing to the Persian conquests and rule, and specially to Cambyses, or Cambyses and Ochus, and then of the drying of the sea (the Red Sea, comp. xi: 15) and the river and canals, of the destruction of the water-plants, and of the misery of the fishers and workers in linen. The princes and counsellors are to lose their wisdom and the people to be filled with fear, all which calamities seem to have begun in the desolation of the Persian rule. It is not easy to understand what follows as to the dread of the land of Judah which the Egyptians should feel, immediately preceding the mention of the subject of the article: "In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of hosts; one shall be called Ir-ha-heres. In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt; for they shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressors, and he shall send them a savior and a great one, and he shall deliver them" (xix. 18–20). The partial or entire conversion of Egypt is prophesied in the next two verses (21, 22). The time of the Greek dominion, following the Persian rule, may be here pointed to. There was then a great influx of Jewish settlers, and as we know of a Jewish town, Onion, and a great Jewish population at Alexandria, we may suppose that there were other large settlements. These would "speak the language of Canaan," at first literally, afterwards in their retaining the religion and customs of their fathers. The altar would well correspond to the temple built by Onias; the pillar, to the synagogue of Alexandria, the latter on the northern and western borders of Egypt. In this case Alexander would be the deliverer. We do not know, however, that at this period there was any recognition of the true God on the part of the Egyptians. If the prophecy is to be understood in a proper sense, we can however see no other time to which it applies, and must suppose that Ir-ha-heres was one of the cities partly or wholly inhabited by the Jews in Egypt: of these Onion was the most important, and to it the rendering, "One shall be called a city of destruction," would apply, since it was destroyed by Titus, while Alexandria, and perhaps the other cities, yet stand. If the prophecy is to be taken tropically, the best reading and rendering can only be determined by verbal criticism. R. S. P.

IRI (Οὐρία; Alex. Ουρι; [Vat. Ουρεια; Ald. (with preceding word) Μαρμωθιουρί·] Jorus), 1 Esdr. viii. 62. This name answers to Uriah in Ezra (viii. 33). But whence did our translators get their form?

IRI or IR (עִירִי or עֲרִי [adorer of Jehovah, Dietr.; Jehovah is watcher, Fürst]: Οὐρί [Vat. -ρει] and Ἄρ; [Alex. ver. 12, Ωρα, Vat. omits:] Urai and Ur), a Benjamite, son of Bela, according to 1 Chr. vii. 7, 12. The name does not occur in any of the other genealogies of the tribe. [HUPHAM.] A. C. H.

IRI'JAH (יִרְאִיָּה [whom Jehovah sees, or Jehovah sees]: Σαρουία; [Alex. FA. Σαραυιας:] Jerias), son of Shelemiah, "a captain of the ward" (פְּקֻדָּה), who met Jeremiah in the gate of Jerusalem called the "gate of Benjamin," accused him of being about to desert to the Chaldæans, and led him back to the princes (Jer. xxxvii. 13, 14).

IR-NA'HASH (עִיר־נָחָשׁ = serpent-city: πόλις Ναάς; [Comp. Ἠρναάς;] Urbs Naas), a name which, like many other names of places, occurs in the genealogical lists of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 12). Tehinnah Abi Ir-nahash — "father of Ir-nahash" — was one of the sons of Eshton, all of them being descendants of Chelub (ver. 11). But it seems impossible to connect this special genealogy with the general genealogies of Judah, and it has the air of being a fragment of the records of some other family, related, of course, or it would not be here, but not the same. May not "Shuah, the brother of Chelub" (ver. 11), be Shuah the Canaanite, by whose daughter Judah had his three eldest sons (Gen. xxxviii. 2, &c.), and these verses be a fragment of Canaanite record preserved amongst those of the great Israelite family, who then became so closely related to the Canaanites? True, the two Shuahs are written differently in Hebrew — שׁוּעַ and שׁוּחָה, but, considering the early date of the one passage and the corrupt and incomplete state of the other, this is perhaps not irreconcilable.

No trace of the name of Ir-nahash attached to any site has been discovered. Jerome's interpretation (Qu. Hebr. ad loc.) — whether his own or a tradition he does not say — is, that Ir-nahash is Bethlehem, Nahash being another name for Jesse. [NAHASH.]

I'RON (יִרְאוֹן [fearful, perh. God-fearing]: Κερωέ; Alex. Ιαριων; [Comp. Ἰερών; Ald. Ἔρων:] Jeron), one of the cities of Naphtali, named between En-hazor and Migdal-el (Josh. xix. 38); hitherto unknown, though possibly Yarûn. G.

IRON (בַּרְזֶל, barzel: Ch. בַּרְזֶלָא, parzlâ: σίδηρος), mentioned with brass as the earliest of known metals (Gen. iv. 22). As it is rarely found in its native state, but generally in combination with oxygen, the knowledge of the art of forging iron, which is attributed to Tubal Cain, argues an acquaintance with the difficulties which attend the smelting of this metal. Iron melts at a temperature of about 3000° Fahrenheit, and to produce this heat large furnaces supplied by a strong blast of air are necessary. But, however difficult it may be to imagine a knowledge of such applianees at so early a period, it is perfectly certain that the use of iron is of extreme antiquity, and that therefore some means of overcoming the obstacles in question must have been discovered. What the process may have been is left entirely to conjecture; a method is employed by the natives of India, extremely simple and of great antiquity, which though rude is very effective, and suggests the possibility of similar knowledge in an early stage of civilization (Ure, Dict. Arts and Sciences, art. Steel). The smelting furnaces of Æthalia, described by Diodorus (v. 13), correspond roughly with the modern bloomeries, remains of which still exist in this country (Napier, Metallurgy of the Bible, p. 140). Malleable iron was in common use, but it is doubtful whether the ancients were acquainted with cast-iron. The allusions in the Bible supply the following facts.

The natural wealth of the soil of Canaan is indicated by describing it as "a land whose stones are iron" (Deut. viii. 9). By this Winer (Realw. art. Eisen) understands the basalt which predominates in the Hauran, is the material of which Og's bedstead (Deut. iii. 11) was made, and contains a large percentage of iron. It is more probable that the expression is a poetical figure. Pliny (xxxvi. 11), who is quoted as an authority, says indeed that basalt is "ferrei coloris atque duritiæ," but does not hint that iron was ever extracted from it. The book of Job contains passages which indicate that iron was a metal well known. Of the manner of procuring it, we learn that "iron is taken from dust" (xxviii. 2). It does not follow from Job xix. 24, that it was used for a writing implement, though such may have been the case, any more than that adamant was employed for the same purpose (Jer. xvii. 1), or that shoes were shod with iron and brass (Deut. xxxiii. 25). Indeed, iron so frequently occurs in poetic figures, that it is difficult to discriminate between its literal and metaphorical sense. In such passages as the following in which a "yoke of iron" (Deut. xxviii. 48) denotes hard service; a "rod of iron" (Ps ii. 9), a stern government; a "pillar of iron" (Jer i 18), a strong support; and "threshing instruments of iron" (Am. i. 3), the means of cruel oppression; the hardness and heaviness (Ecclus. xxii. 15) of iron are so clearly the prominent ideas, that though it may have been used for the instruments in question, such usage is not of necessity indicated. The "furnace of iron" (Deut. iv. 20; 1 K. viii. 51) is a figure which vividly expresses hard bondage, as represented by the severe labor which attended the operation of smelting. Iron was used for chisels (Deut. xxvii. 5), or something of the kind; for axes (Deut. xix. 5; 2 K. vi. 5, 6; Is. x. 34; Hom. Il. iv. 485); for harrows and saws (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chr. xx. 3); for nails (1 Chr. xxii. 3), and the fastenings of the Temple; for weapons of war (1 Sam. xvii. 7; Job xx. 24), and for war-chariots (Josh. xvii. 16, 18; Judg. i. 19, iv. 3, 13). The latter were plated or studded with it. Its usage in defensive armor is implied in 2 Sam. xxiii. 7 (cf. Rev. ix. 9), and as a safeguard in peace it appears in fetters (Ps. cv. 18), prison-gates (Acts xii. 10), and bars of gates or doors (Ps. cvii. 16; Is. xlv. 2), as well as for surgical purposes (1 Tim. iv. 2). Sheet-iron was used for cooking utensils (Ez. iv. 3; cf. Lev. vii. 9),[a] and bars of hammered iron are mentioned in Job xl. 18, though here the LXX. perversely render σίδηρος χυτός, "cast iron." That it was plentiful in the time of David appears from 1 Chr. xxii. 3. It was used by Solomon, according to Josephus, to clamp the large rocks with which he built up the Temple mount (Ant. xv. 11, § 3); and by Hezekiah's workmen to hew out the conduits of Gihon (Ecclus. xlviii. 17). Images were fastened in their niches in later times by iron brackets or clamps (Wisd. xiii. 15). Agricultural implements were early made of the same material. In the treaty made by Porsena was inserted a condition like that imposed on the Hebrews by the Philistines, that no iron should be used except for agricultural purposes (Plin. xxxiv. 39).

The market of Tyre was supplied with bright or polished iron by the merchants of Dan and Javan (Ez. xxvii. 19). Some, as the LXX. and Vulg., render this "wrought iron:" so De Wette "geschmiedetes Eisen."[b] The Targum has "bars of iron," which would correspond with the strictura of Pliny (xxxiv. 41). But Kimchi (Lex. s. v.) expounds עֲשׁוֹת, 'áshôth, as "pure and polished" (= Span. acéro, steel), in which he is supported by R. Sol. Parchon, and by Ben Zeb, who gives "glänzend" as the equivalent (comp. the Homeric αἴθων σίδηρος, Il. vii. 473). If the Javan alluded to were Greece, and not, as Bochart (Phaleg, ii. 21) seems to think, some place in Arabia, there might be reference to the iron mines of Macedonia, spoken of in the decree of Æmilius Paulus (Liv. xlv. 29); but Bochart urges, as a very strong argument in support of his theory, that, at the time of Ezekiel's prophecy, the Tyrians did not depend upon Greece for a supply of cassia and cinnamon, which are associated with iron in the merchandise of Dan and Javan, but that rather the contrary was the case. Pliny (xxxiv. 41) awards the palm to the iron of Serica, that of Parthia being next in excellence. The Chalybes of the Pontus were celebrated as workers in iron in very ancient times (Æsch. Prom. 733). They were identified by Strabo with the Chaldæi of his day (xii. 549), and the mines which they worked were in the mountains skirting the sea-coast. The produce of their labor is supposed to be alluded to in Jer. xv. 12, as being of superior quality. Iron mines are still in existence on the same coast, and the ore is found "in small nodular masses in a dark yellow clay which overlies a limestone rock" (Smith's Geog Dict. art. Chalybes).

It was for a long time supposed that the Egyptians were ignorant of the use of iron, and that the allusions in the Pentateuch were anachronisms, as no traces of it have been found in their monuments; but in the sepulchres at Thebes butchers are represented as sharpening their knives on a round bar of metal attached to their aprons, which from its blue color is presumed to be steel. The steel weapons on the tomb of Rameses III. are also painted blue; those of bronze being red (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. iii. 247). One iron mine only has been discovered in Egypt, which was worked by the ancients. It is at Hammámi, between the Nile and the Red Sea; the iron found by Mr. Burton was in the form of specular and red ore (Id. iii. 246). That no articles of iron should have been found is easily accounted for by the fact that it is easily destroyed by exposure to the air and moisture. According to Pliny (xxxiv. 43) it was preserved by a coating of white lead, gypsum, and liquid pitch. Bitumen was probably employed for the same purpose (xxxv. 52). The Egyptians obtained their iron almost exclusively from Assyria Proper in the form of bricks or pigs (Layard, Nin. ii. 415). Specimens of Assyrian iron-work overlaid with bronze were discovered by Mr. Layard, and are now in the British Museum (Nin. and Bab. p. 191). Iron weapons of various kinds were found at Nimroud, but fell to pieces on exposure to the air. Some portions of shields and arrow-heads (Id. 194, 596) were rescued, and are now in England. A pick of the same metal (Id. 194) was also found, as well as part of a saw (195), and the head of an axe (357), and remains of scale-armor and helmets inlaid with copper (Nin. i. 340). It was used by the Etruscans for offensive weapons, as bronze for defensive armor. The Assyrians had daggers and arrow-heads of copper mixed with iron, and hardened with an alloy of tin (Layard, Nin. ii. 418). So in the days of Homer war-clubs were shod with iron (Il. vii. 141); arrows were tipped with it (Il. iv. 123); it was used for the axles of chariots (Il. v. 723), for fetters (Od. i. 204), for axes and bills (Il. iv. 485; Od. xxi. 3, 81). Adrastus (Il. vi. 48) and Ulysses (Od. xxi. 10) reckoned it among their treasures, the iron weapons being kept in a chest in the treasury with the gold and brass (Od. xxi. 61). In Od. i. 184, Mentes tells Telemachus that he is travelling from Taphos to Tamese to procure brass in exchange for iron, which Eustathius says was not obtained from the mines of the island, but was the produce of piratical excursions (Millin Mineral. Hom. p. 115, 2d ed.). Pliny (xxxiv. 41) mentions iron as used symbolically for a statue of Hercules at Thebes (cf. Dan. ii. 33, v. 4), and goblets of iron as among the offerings in the temple of Mars the Avenger, at Rome. Alyattes the Lydian dedicated to the oracle at Delphi a small goblet of iron, the workmanship of Glaucus of Chios, to whom the discovery of the art of soldering this metal is attributed (Her. i. 25). The goblet is described by Pausanias (x. 16). From the fact that such offerings were made to the temples, and that Achilles gave as a prize of contest a rudely-shaped mass of the same metal (Il. xxiii. 826), it has been argued that in early times iron was so little known as to be greatly esteemed for its rarity. That this was not the case in the time of Lycurgus is evident, and Homer attaches to it no epithet which would denote its preciousness (Millin, p. 106). There is reason to suppose that the discovery of brass preceded that of iron (Lucr. v. 1292), though little weight can be attached to the line of Hesiod often quoted as decisive on this point (Op. et Dies, 150). The Dactyli Idaei of Crete were supposed by the ancients to have the merit of being the first to discover the properties of iron (Plin. vii. 57; Diod. Sic. v. 64), as the Cyclops were said to have invented the iron-smith's forge (Plin. vii. 57). According to the Arundelian marbles, iron was known B. C. 1370, while Larcher (Chronol. d Herod. p. 570) assigns a still earlier date, B. C. 1537. Enough has been said to prove that the allusions to iron in the Pentateuch and other parts of the O. T. are not anachronisms.

There is considerable doubt whether the ancients were acquainted with cast-iron. The rendering given by the LXX. of Job xl. 18, as quoted above, seems to imply that some method nearly like that of casting was known, and is supported by a passage in Diodorus (v. 13). The inhabitants of Æthalia traded with pig-iron in masses like large sponges to Dicæarchia and other marts, where it was bought by the smiths and fashioned into various moulded forms (πλάσματα παντοδαπά).

In Ecclus. xxxviii. 28, we have a picture of the interior of an iron-smith's (Is. xliv. 12) workshop: the smith, parched with the smoke and heat of the furnace, sitting beside his anvil and contemplating the unwrought iron, his ears deafened with the din of the heavy hammer, his eyes fixed on his model, and never sleeping till he has accomplished his task. * Iron of a superior quality is mined and worked at the present day near the village of Duma in Mount Lebanon. It is especially valuable for shoeing beasts of burden, and is greatly sought for through Northern Syria. It is probable that the merchants of Dan, who had possessions in the extreme north of Palestine in the neighborhood of Cæsarea Philippi, derived from this source the "bright iron," which is probably to be translated "wrought iron," Ezr. xxvii. 19.

This view commends itself the more if we suppose Java to be in Arabia, as the mention of the two places together makes it probable that they had at least a common entrepôt for their wares. This would be possible at the junction of the roads of Cœlesyria from the north, with those from Gilead on the east in the possessions of Dan, and would explain the circumstance that to Tyre Dan was a source of supply of iron from Mount Lebanon, and of cassia and calamus from Arabia.

Still further, the geographical position of this entrepôt corresponds with the language of the context. In ver. 18 the prophet speaks of Damascus; in ver. 19, of Dan with its trade with Javan; in ver. 20, of the caravans from Dedan, which would come in toward Tyre to the southward of Dan: finally, ver. 21, of those from Arabia, which would come from a still more southerly direction.

IR'PEËL (יִרְפְּאֵל [whom God heals, or God repairs, builds]: Καφάν; [Alex.] Alex. Ἰερφαήλ: Jurephel), one of the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27), occurring in the list between Rekem and Taralah. No trace has yet been discovered of its situation. It will be observed that the Ir in this name is radically different from that in the names Ir-nahash, Ir-shemesh, etc. Taken as a Hebrew name it is Irpe-El = "restored by God." G.

IR-SHE'MESH (עִיר שֶׁמֶשׁ = city of the sun: πόλεις Σαμμαύς; Alex. πολις Σαμες: Hersemes, id est, Civitas Solis), a city of the Danites (Josh. xix. 41), probably identical with BETH-SHEMESH, and, if not identical, at least connected with MOUNT HERES (Judg. i. 35), the "mount of the sun." Beth-shemesh is probably the later form of the name. In other cases Beth appears to have been substituted for other older terms [see BAAL-MEON, etc.], such as Ir or Ar, which is unquestionably a very ancient word. G.

I'RU (עִירִי [watch, Fürst]: Ἴρ, Alex. Ηρα; [Comp. Ἰρού:] Hir), the eldest son of the great Caleb son of Jephunneh (1 Chr. iv. 15). It is by some supposed that this name should be Ir, the vowel at the end being merely the conjunction "and," properly belonging to the following name.

* It is true, ו more frequently connects the nouns in such an enumeration; but that reason for changing Iru to Ir is not decisive. The copula may also be omitted between them (see 1 Chr. iv. 20, 24, &c.). H.

I'SAAC (יִצְחָק, or יִצְחָק, laughter [mocker, laughter, Fürst]: Ἰσαάκ: [Isaac]), the son whom Sarah, in accordance with the Divine promise, bore to Abraham in the hundredth year of his age, at Gerar. In his infancy he became the object of Ishmael's jealousy; and in his youth (when twenty-five years old, according to Joseph. Ant. i. 13, § 2) the victim, in intention, of Abraham's great sacrificial act of faith. When forty years old he married Rebekah his cousin, by whom, when he was sixty, he had two sons, Esau and Jacob. In his seventy-fifth year he and his brother Ishmael buried their father Abraham in the cave of Machpelah. From his abode by the well Lahai-roi, in the South Country — a barren tract, comprising a few pastures and wells, between the hills of Judæa and the Arabian desert, touching at its western end Philistia, and on the north Hebron — Isaac was driven by a famine to Gerar. Here Jehovah appeared to him and bade him dwell there and not go over into Egypt, and renewed to him the promises made to Abraham. Here he subjected himself, like Abraham in the same place and under like circumstances (Gen. xx. 2), to a rebuke from Abimelech the Philistine king for an equivocation. Here he acquired great wealth by his flocks; but was repeatedly dispossessed by the Philistines of the wells which he sunk at convenient stations. At Beersheba Jehovah appeared to him by night and blessed him, and he built an altar there: there, too, like Abraham, he received a visit from the Philistine king Abimelech, with whom he made a covenant of peace. After the deceit by which Jacob acquired his father's blessing, Isaac sent his son to seek a wife in Padanaram; and all that we know of him during the last forty-three years of his life is that he saw that son, with a large and prosperous family, return to him at Hebron (xxxv. 27) before he died there at the age of 180 years. He was buried by his two sons in the cave of Machpelah.

In the N. T. reference is made to the offering of Isaac (Heb. xi. 17; and James ii. 21) and to his blessing his sons (Heb. xi. 20). As the child of the promise, and as the progenitor of the children of the promise, he is contrasted with Ishmael (Rom. ix. 7, 10; Gal. iv. 28; Heb. xi. 18). In our Lord's remarkable argument with the Sadducees, his history is carried beyond the point at which it is left in the O. T., into and beyond the grave. Isaac, of whom it was said (Gen. xxxv. 29) that he was gathered to his people, is represented as still living to God (Luke xx. 38, &c.); and by the same Divine authority he is proclaimed as an acknowledged heir of future glory (Matt. viii. 11, &c.).

II. Such are the facts which the Bible supplies of the longest-lived of the three Patriarchs, the least migratory, the least prolific, and the least favored with extraordinary divine revelations. A few events in this quiet life have occasioned discussion.

(a.) The signification of Isaac's name is thrice alluded to (Gen. xvii. 17, xviii. 12, xxi. 6). Josephus (Ant. i. 12, § 2) refers to the second of those passages for the origin of the name; Jerome (Quæst. Heb. in Gen.) vehemently confines it to the first; Ewald (Gesch. i. 425), without assigning reasons, gives it as his opinion that all three passages have been added by different writers to the original record.

(b.) It has been asked what are the persecutions sustained by Isaac from Ishmael to which St. Paul refers (Gal. iv. 29)? If, as is generally supposed, he refers to Gen. xxi. 9, then the word מְצַחֵק παίζοντα, may be translated mocking, as in the A. V., or insulting, as in xxxix. 14, and in that case the trial of Isaac was by means of "cruel mockings" (ἐμπαιγμῶν), in the language of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 36). Or the word may include the signification paying idolatrous worship, as in Ex. xxxii. 6, or fighting, as in 2 Sam. ii. 14. These three significations are given by Jarchi, who relates a Jewish tradition (quoted more briefly by Wetstein on Gal. iv. 29) of Isaac suffering personal violence from Ishmael, a tradition which, as Mr. Ellicott thinks, was adopted by St. Paul. [HAGAR, Amer. ed.] The English reader who is content with our own version, or the scholar who may prefer either of the other renderings of Jarchi, will be at no loss to connect Gal. iv. 29 with Gen. xxi. 9. But Origen (in Gen. Hom. vii. § 3), and Augustine (Sermo iii.), and apparently Professor Jowett (on Gal. iv. 29), not observing that the gloss of the LXX. and the Latin versions "playing with he, son Isaac" forms no part of the simple statement in Genesis, and that the words מְצַחֵק, παίζοντα, are not to be confined to the meaning "playing, seem to doubt (as Mr. Ellicott does on other grounds), whether the passage in Genesis bears the construction apparently put upon it by St. Paul. On the other hand, Rosenmüller (Schol. in Gen xxi. 9) even goes so far as to characterize ἐδίωκε — "persecuted" — as a very excellent interpretation of מְצַחֵק. (See Drusius on Gen. xxi. 9 in Crit. Sacr., and Estius on Gal. iv. 29.)

(c.) The offering up of Isaac by Abraham has been viewed in various lights. It is the subject of five dissertations by Frischmuth in the Thes. Theol. Philol. p. 197 (attached to Crit. Sacri). By Bishop Warburton (Div. Leg. b. vi. § 5) the whole transaction was regarded as "merely an information by action (compare Jer. xxvii. 2; Ez. xii. 3; Hos. i. 2), instead of words, of the great sacrifice of Christ for the redemption of mankind, given at the earnest request of Abraham, who longed impatiently to see Christ's day." This view is adopted by Dean Graves (On the Pentateuch, pt. iii. § 4), and has become popular. But it is pronounced to be unsatisfactory by Davison (Primitive Sacrifice, pt. iv. § 2), who, pleading for the progressive communication of the knowledge of the Christian atonement, protests against the assumption of a contemporary disclosure of the import of the sacrifice to Abraham, and points out that no expiation or atonement was joined with this emblematic oblation, which consequently symbolized only the act, not the power or virtue of the Christian sacrifice. Mr. Maurice (Patriarchs and Lawgivers, iv.) draws attention to the offering of Isaac as the last and culminating point (compare Ewald, Gesch. i. 430–4) in the divine education of Abraham, that which taught him the meaning and ground of self-sacrifice. The same line of thought is followed up in a very instructive and striking sermon on the sacrifice of Abraham in Doctrine of Sacrifice, iii. 33–48. Some German writers have spoken of the whole transaction as a dream (Eichhorn), or a myth (De Wette), and treat other events in Isaac's life as slips of the pen of a Jewish transcriber. Even the merit of novelty cannot be claimed for such views, which appear to have been in some measure forestalled in the time of Augustine (Sermo ii. de Tentatione Abrahæ). They are, of course, irreconcilable with the declaration of St. James, that it was a work by which Abraham was justified. Eusebius (Præp. Evang. iv. 16, and i. 10) has preserved a singular and inaccurate version of the offering of Isaac in an extract from the ancient Phœnician historian Sanchoniathon; but it is absurd to suppose that the widely-spread (see Ewald, Alterthümer, p. 79, and Thomson's Bampton Lectures, 1853, p. 38) heathen practice of sacrificing human beings received any encouragement from a sacrifice which Abraham was forbidden to accomplish (see Waterland, Works, iv. 203). Some writers have found for this transaction a kind of parallel — it amounts to no more — in the classical legends of Iphigenia and Phrixus. The story of Iphigenia, which inspired the devout Athenian dramatist with sublime notions of the import of sacrifice and suffering (Æsch. Agam. 147 ff.), supplied the Roman infidel only with a keen taunt against religion (Lucret. i. 102), just as the great trial which perfected the faith of Abraham and moulded the character of Isaac, draws from the Romanized Jew of the first century a rhetorical exhibition of his own unacquaintance with the meaning of sacrifice (see Joseph. Ant. i. 13, § 3).

(d.) No passage of his life has produced more reproach to Isaac's character than that which is recorded in Gen. xxvi. 6–11. Abraham's conduct while in Egypt (xii.) and in Gerar (xx.), where he concealed the closer connection between himself and his wife, was imitated by Isaac in Gerar. On the one hand, this has been regarded by avowed adversaries of Christianity as involving the guilt of "lying and endeavoring to betray the wife's chastity," and even by Christians, undoubtedly zealous for truth and right, as the conduct of "a very poor paltry earthworm, displaying cowardice, selfishness, readiness to put his wife in a terrible hazard for his own sake." But, on the other hand, with more reverence, more kindness, and quite as much probability, Waterland, who is no indiscriminate apologist for the errors of good men, after a minute examination of the circumstances, concludes that the patriarch did "right to evade the difficulty so long as it could lawfully be evaded, and to await and see whether Divine Providence might not, some way or other, interpose before the last extremity. The event answered. God did interpose." (Scripture Vindicated, in Works, iv. 188, 190.)

(c.) Isaac's tacit acquiescence in the conduct of his sons has been brought into discussion. Perhaps Fairbairn (Typology, i. 334) seems scarcely justified by facts in his conclusion that the later days of Isaac did not fulfill the promise of his earlier; that, instead of reaching to high attainments in faith, he fell into general feebleness and decay, moral and bodily, and made account only of the natural element in judging of his sons. The inexact translation (to modern ears) of צַיִד, prey taken in hunting, by "venison" (Gen. xxv. 28), may have contributed to form, in the minds of English readers, a low opinion of Isaac. Nor can that opinion be supported by a reference to xxvii. 4; for Isaac's desire at such a time for savory meat may have sprung either from a dangerous sickness under which he was laboring (Blunt, Undesigned Coincidences, pt. i. ch. vi.), or from the same kind of impulse preceding inspiration as prompted Elisha (2 K. iii. 15) to demand the soothing influence of music before he spoke the word of the Lord. For sadness and grief are enumerated in the Gemara among the impediments to the exercise of the gift of prophecy (Smith's Select Discourses, vi. 245). The reader who bears in mind the peculiarities of Isaac's character, will scarcely infer from those passages any fresh accession of mental or moral feebleness.

III. Isaac, the gentle and dutiful son, the faithful and constant husband, became the father of a house in which order did not reign. If there were any very prominent points in his character they were not brought out by the circumstances in which he was placed. He appears less as a man of action than as a man of suffering, from which he is generally delivered without any direct effort of his own. Thus he suffers as the object of Ishmael's mocking, of the intended sacrifice on Moriah, of the rapacity of the Philistines, and of Jacob's stratagem. But the thought of his sufferings is effaced by the ever-present tokens of God's favor; and he suffers with the calmness and dignity of a conscious heir of heavenly promises, without uttering any complaint, and generally without committing any action by which he would forfeit respect. Free from violent passions, he was a man of constant, deep, and tender affections. Thus he mourned for his mother till her place was filled by his wife. His sons were nurtured at home till a late period of their lives; and neither his grief for Esau's marriage, nor the anxiety in which he was involved in consequence of Jacob's deceit, estranged either of them from his affectionate care. His life of solitary blamelessness must have been sustained by strong habitual piety such as showed itself at the time of Rebekah's barrenness (xxv. 21), in his special intercourse with God at Gerar and Beer-sheba (xxvi. 2, 23), in the solemnity with which he bestows his blessing and refuses to change it. His life, judged by a worldly standard, might seem inactive, ignoble, and unfruitful; but the "guileless years, prayers, gracious acts and daily thank-offerings of pastoral life" are not to be so esteemed, although they make no show in history. Isaac's character may not have exercised any commanding influence upon either his own or succeeding generations; but it was sufficiently marked and consistent to win respect and envy from his contemporaries. By his posterity his name is always joined in equal honor with those of Abraham and Jacob; and so it was even used as part of the formula which Egyptian magicians in the time of Origen (Contra Celsum, i. 22) employed as efficacious to bind the demons whom they adjured (comp. Gen. xxxi. 42, 53).

If Abraham's enterprising, unsettled life foreshadowed the early history of his descendants; if Jacob was a type of the careful, commercial, unwarlike character of their later days, Isaac may represent the middle period, in which they lived apart from nations, and enjoyed possession of the fertile land of promise.

IV. The typical view of Isaac is barely referred to in the N. T.; but it is drawn out with minute particularity by Philo and those interpreters of Scripture who were influenced by Alexandrian philosophy. Thus in Philo, Isaac = laughter = the most exquisite enjoyment = the soother and cheerer of peace-loving souls, is foreshadowed in the facts that his father had attained 100 years (the perfect number) when he was born, and that he is specially designated as given to his parents by God. His birth from the mistress of Abraham's household symbolizes happiness proceeding from predominant wisdom. His attachment to one wife (Rebekah = perseverance) is contrasted with Abraham's multiplied connections and with Jacob's toil-won wives, as showing the superiority of Isaac's heaven-born, self-sufficing wisdom, to the accumulated knowledge of Abraham and the painful experience of Jacob. In the intended sacrifice of Isaac Philo sees only a sign that laughter = rejoicing is the prerogative of God, and is a fit offering to Him, and that He gives back to obedient man as much happiness as is good for him. Clement of Rome (ch. 31), with characteristic soberness, merely refers to Isaac as an example of faith in God. In Tertullian he is a pattern of monogamy and a type of Christ bearing the cross. But Clement of Alexandria finds an allegorical meaning in the incidents which connect Abimelech with Isaac and Rebekah (Gen. xxvi. 8) as well as in the offering of Isaac. In this latter view he is followed by Origen, and by Augustine, and by Christian expositors generally. The most minute particulars of that transaction are invested with a spiritual meaning by such writers as Rabanus Maurus, in Gen. § iii. Abraham is made a type of the First Person in the blessed Trinity, Isaac of the Second; the two servants dismissed are the Jewish sects who did not attain to a perception of Christ in his humiliation; the ass bearing the wood is the Jewish nation, to whom were committed the oracles of God which they failed to understand; the three days are the Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Christian dispensations; the ram is Christ on the cross; the thicket they who placed him there. Modern English writers hold firmly the typical significance of the transaction, without extending it into such detail (see Pearson on the Creed, i. 243, 251, ed. 1843; Fairbairn's Typology, i. 332). A recent writer (A. Jukes, Types of Genesis), who has shown much ingenuity in attaching a spiritual meaning to the characters and incidents in the book of Genesis, regards Isaac as representing the spirit of sonship, in a series in which Adam represents human nature, Cain the carnal mind, Abel the spiritual, Noah regeneration, Abraham the spirit of faith, Jacob the spirit of service, Joseph suffering or glory. With this series may be compared the view of Ewald (Gesch. i. 387–400), in which the whole patriarchal family is a prefigurative group, comprising twelve members with seven distinct modes of relation: (1.) Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are three fathers, respectively personifying active power, quiet enjoyment, success after struggles, distinguished from the rest as Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses among the heroes of the Iliad, or as the Trojan Anchises, Æneas, and Ascanius, and mutually related as Romulus, Remus, and Numa; (2.) Sarah, with Hagar, as mother and mistress of the household; (3.) Isaac as child; (4.) Isaac with Rebekah as the type of wedlock (comp. Alterthümer, p. 233); (5.) Leah and Rachel the plurality of coequal wives; (6.) Deborah as nurse (compare Anna and Caieta, Æn. iv. 654, and vii. 1); (7.) Eliezer as steward, whose office is compared to that of the messenger of the Olympic deities.

V. Jewish legends represent Isaac as an angel made before the world, and descending to earth in human form (Origen, in Joann. ii. § 25); as one of the three men in whom human sinfulness has no place, as one of the six over whom the angel of death has no power (Eisenmenger, Ent. Jud. i. 343, 864). He is said to have been instructed in divine knowledge by Shem (Jarchi, on Gen. xxv.). The ordinance of evening prayer is ascribed to him (Gen. xxiv. 63), as that of morning prayer to Abraham (xix. 27), and night prayer to Jacob (xxviii. 11) (Eisenmenger, Ent. Jud. i. 483).

The Arabian traditions included in the Koran represent Isaac as a model of religion, a righteous person inspired with grace to do good works, observe prayer, and give alms (ch. 21), endowed with the divine gifts of prophecy, children, and wealth (ch. 19). The promise of Isaac and the offering of Isaac are also mentioned (ch. 11, 38). Faith in a future resurrection is ascribed to Abraham; but it is connected, not as in Heb. xi. 19 with the offering of Isaac, but with a fictitious miracle (ch. 2). W. T. B.

* A few additional words should be said on some of the points introduced or suggested in the foregoing article.

It is well to notice in regard to the origin of Isaac's name, that while it was given by divine command (Gen. xvii. 19), the reason for giving it is not explicitly stated. The historian employs the word on which the name is founded just before (ver. 17), in speaking of Abraham's joy on being assured that the child of promise was about to be born after so long a delay; and again, shortly after that (xviii. 12), in speaking of Sarah's incredulity as to the possibility of her becoming a mother at so advanced an age. We may infer, therefore, that the name was designed to embody and commemorate these incidents in the family-history. It represents, indeed, very different states of mind but no violence is done thereby to the Hebrew word, which readily admits of the twofold combination. No doubt Sarah refers once more to the signification of the name, on the occasion of formally giving it to the child at the time of circumcision (Gen. xxi. 3 ff.); but in that instance her object was simply to recognize in the better sense of the name a symbol and pledge of joy both to herself and to the multitude of others who should be blessed in the promised seed. Such reasons for the name are certainly not inconsistent with each other, and, still less, are they so inconsistent as to discredit the narrative as one made up from contradictory sources. For some good remarks on the significance of "birth-names," the reader may consult Wilkinson's Personal Names of the Bible, pp 256–312 (Lond. 1865).

It will be noticed above that some of the opinions respecting the typical character of Abraham's offering up of Isaac extend the analogy to numerous and very minute correspondences. It is of some importance here to distinguish between such opinions of interpreters and the explicit teaching of Scripture on this subject; so as not to make the sacred writers answerable for views or principles of exegesis in the allegorizing of the O. T. history, which in the hands of some expositors have led to very fanciful conclusions. It seems unreasonable to deny altogether a symbolic significance to this sacrificial act and its concomitants, both on account of its suitableness in itself considered to shadow forth Christian ideas and relations, and also on account of some hints given by Paul which point in that direction. The most extended reference to Isaac in the N. T. is that in Gal. iv. 21–31. Yet the intimations there in regard to his typical character, leave it questionable whether the Apostle meant to recognize the general facts of his history as in a strict sense prophetic of the N. T. dispensation, or simply to use the facts for the purpose of illustration. The points of comparison which the Apostle draws out in that passage are the following: As Ishmael was born in accordance with the laws of nature, so the Jews are a mere natural seed; but Christians who obtain justification in conformity with the promise made to Abraham, are the true promised seed, even as Isaac was. Further, as in the history of Abraham's family, Ishmael persecuted Isaac, the child of promise, so it should not be accounted strange that under the Gospel, the natural seed, that is, the Jews, should persecute the spiritual seed, that is, Christians. And finally, as Isaac was acknowledged as the true heir, but Ishmael was set aside, so must it be as to the difference which exists between Jews and believers. The former, or, in other words, those who depend on their own merit for obtaining the favor of God, will be rejected, while those who seek it by faith shall obtain the heavenly inheritance. It may be remarked that this parallelism (whether illustrative only or typical) enables the Apostle skilfully to recapitulate the prominent doctrines of the whole epistle, and thus to leave them so associated in the minds of the Galatians with a familiar and striking portion of sacred history, that the teachings of the epistle could never be easily forgotten.

No mention is made in Genesis of Ishmael's persecuting Isaac; but Ishmael's mocking at the feast of weaning (Gen. xxi. 8, 9) reveals the spirit out of which an active hostility would be expected to grow in due time. In all probability Paul refers to such effects of that spirit, well known to the Jews of his time, from traditionary sources. For other examples of traditions thus recognized as true, see under ABIATHAR (Amer. ed.). Beer (Leben Abraham's, pp. 49, 170) shows that the Jews found in Ishmael's "mocking" a significant intimation of the alienation and strife which marked the subsequent relations of the two brothers to each other.

Of the precise age of Isaac at the time of the great trial of Abraham's faith, we obtain no knowledge from the Bible. That he was no longer a child, but was at least approaching his manhood, is evident from the fact that the wood was laid on him, as the father and the son went up the mountain. He is called at that time a lad in the A. V. (Gen. xxii. 5), but the same Hebrew term (נַעַר) is applied also to the servants who accompanied Abraham on this journey. When Josephus speaks of him as then twenty-five years old (Ant. i. 13, § 2), it is a conjecture only, without any proof from Scripture or elsewhere to warrant so precise a statement. The full consent of Isaac to the wishes and design of Abraham must be taken for granted, as otherwise a resistance could have been made by the stronger to the weaker, rendering it difficult to bind the victim to the altar. It is evident from Heb. xi. 19, that the pious Hebrews regarded this trial of Abraham's character as illustrating not so much a blind submission to the will of God, whatever this might seem to require, as an unwavering faith in the power and willingness of God to bring back the son to life if the father's hand must slay him. The question of the place of sacrifice is discussed under MORIAH (Amer. ed.). The view maintained there, that it was some mount near Jerusalem, in all probability the temple-mount itself (2 Chr. iii. 1), is also that of Baumgarten (Pentateuch, i. 227); Knobel (Die Genesis erklärt, p. 174); Ewald (Gesch. i. 476, comp. iii. 313 f., 3e Aufl.); Hengstenberg (Authentie des Pent. ii. 195 ff.); Winer (Realw. ii. 108); Delitzsch (Genesis, p. 406 ff., and Edinb. transl. p. 249); Kurtz (Geschichte des A. Bundes, i. 213 f.), and others.

It has been made an objection to the accuracy of the Biblical history of the patriarchs that so many similar events and so many identical names of persons and places occur in the account of the different men. But it is not to be forgotten that the dissimilarity in what is related of them is incomparably greater than the agreement. Their personal characteristics are unlike, bearing unmistakable marks of originality and individuality. Isaac never goes beyond the boundary of Palestine, though Abraham and Jacob roamed from one extreme part of the East to another. The domestic events also of their respective families were as diverse as the vicissitudes of human condition could well permit, Abimelech's lawless seizure of the wives of the two strangers (Gen. xx. 2 ff., and xxvi. 6 ff.) proves only that the same passions belong to men in successive generations, and prompt to the same acts in the presence of the same temptations. That, leading as they all did a nomadic life, they should occasionally visit the same places, was natural and inevitable. Abraham and Isaac appear at different times at Gerar and Beer-sheba, but the fertility of these places, or the opportunity for obtaining water, accounts for that coincidence. The recurrence of the same personal names, e. g., Abimelech and Phichol, in the intercourse of Abraham and Isaac with the Philistines, has its perfect analogy in the present customs of the East. It is generally allowed that ABIMELECH (which see) like Pharaoh in Egypt, and Cæsar among the Romans, was a royal title, and not the name of a single individual. But Phichol also, says Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 352), "may have been a name of office, as mushir or mushir now is in this country. If one of these officers is spoken of, his name is rarely mentioned. I, indeed, never knew any but the official title of these Turkish officers." It is alleged as a difficulty that Beer-sheba is represented as receiving its name from Abraham, and then again from Isaac, in ratification, in both instances, of a similar covenant between them and the native chiefs or sheiks of the region. But we have here an example merely of the reaffirmation of a name (as in other instances, e. g. BETHEL) under new circumstances such as made the name doubly significant, or revived it after having fallen partially into disuse. Beer-sheba, being well known when Genesis was written, the name occurs proleptically in xxi. 14. But it was first so called when Abraham established there a treaty of peace with Abimelech respecting the well in dispute between them (Gen. xxi. 31). A similar difficulty arose between Isaac and the Abimelech who succeeded the other; and that being settled by a like treaty sealed with sacrifices and oaths, Isaac reimposed the appropriate name in token of the same happy issue of the strife. It was this restoration of the name, it would seem, that made it permanent through all time (Gen. xxvi. 33).

For an outline of the events in Isaac's life, and a discussion of some of the historical and exegetical questions which the narrative presents, the reader may see Kurtz's Geschichte des A. Bundes, i. 218–239. This writer regards "the ground-type of Isaac's character as a certain elasticity of endurance which does not resist evil, does not contend against it, but overcomes it by patience and concession (see Gen. xxvi. 17–22); and, in this respect, Isaac is truly great and worthy of admiration. That this greatness of men is usually unrecognized and abused, detracts nothing from its worth; and that in Isaac also it was mixed and marred by a degree of weakness and want of self command" shows that human virtue has its unavoidable limitations. Hess has sketched the patriarch's life with mingled praise and censure in his Geschichte der Patriarchen, ii. 3–64. Vaihinger has a brief article on Isaac in Herzog's Real-Encyk. vii. 81–83; and also Wunderlich, in Zeller's Bibl. Wörterb. i. 730 ff. The portraiture of Isaac's life, as this latter writer remarks, does not indeed impress us as that of an extraordinary personality; but, on the other hand, we are to remember that the design of Scripture here is, not to present men to us, even the elect ones, as they should be, but as they are. A spirit of humility and honesty must stamp itself on biography so written. It is not to be forgotten that what we know of the faults of good men in the Bible, rests, in great part, on confessions which they themselves have made, and not on the accusation of others. Bishop Hall's reflections on "Isaac's offering" (Contemplations, lv. bk. li.) are characteristic and interesting. H.

* ISAAC, twice used (Am. vii. 9, 16, where the form is יִשְׂחָק) as a poetic synonym for Israel, i. e the ten tribes. Hence "the high-places of Isaac" (ver. 9) are the sanctuaries of idol worship to which the Israelites resorted in their apostasy from Jehovah. The LXX. go further, and find a sarcasm in the use and the import of the name (βωμοὶ τοῦ γέλωτος, "altars of laughter," but the laughter to become a mockery in the day of God's visitation). This hidden meaning is far-fetched. Pusey (Amos, p. 211) regards it with favor. H.

ISAI'AH [3 syl.] (יְשַׁעְיָהוּ, i. e. Yeshayahu [Jehovah's help or salvation], always in Heb. Text; but in Rabbinical superscriptions of the Heb. Bible יְשַׁעְיָה: Ἡσαΐας: Isaias). The Hebrew name, our shortened form of which occurs of other persons [see JESAIAH, JESHAIAH], signifies Salvation of Jahu (a shortened form of Jehovah). Reference is plainly made by the prophet himself (Is. viii. 18), to the significance of his own name as well as of those of his two sons. His father Amoz (אָמוֹץ, Ἀμώς) must not be confounded, as was done by Clemens Alexandrinus and some other of the Fathers through their ignorance of Hebrew, with the prophet Amos (עָמוֹס, in LXX. also Ἀμώς), who flourished in the reign of Jeroboam II. Nothing whatever is known of Amoz. He is said by some of the Rabbins to have been also a prophet, and brother of king Amaziah — the latter apparently a mere guess founded on the affinity of the two names. Kimchi (A. D. 1230) says in his commentary on Is. i. 1, "We know not his race, nor of what tribe he was."

I. The first verse of the book runs thus: "The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah." A few remarks on this verse will open the way to the solution of several inquiries relative to the prophet and his writings.

1. This verse is not the preface to the first chapter only, nor to any small portion of the book, as is clear from the enumeration of the four kings. It plainly prefaces at least the first part of the book (chs. i.–xxxix.), which leaves off in Hezekiah's reign; and as there appears no reason for limiting its reference even to the first part, the obvious construction would take it as applying to the whole book (comp. Hos. i. 1; Mic. i. 1). The word vision Heb. is a collective noun, as in 2 Chr. xxxii. 32; the חָזוֹן is never found in the plural. As this is the natural and obvious bearing of the verse,

2. We are authorized to infer, that no part of the vision, the fruits of which are recorded in this book, belongs to the reign of Manasseh. Hypotheses, therefore, which lengthen Isaiah's prophetic ministration into the reign of Manasseh, appear to lack historical foundation. A rabbinical tradition, it is true, apparently confirmed by the διεπρίσθησαν of Heb. xi. 37, which can be referred to no other known fact, reports the prophet to have been sawn asunder[a] in the trunk of a tree by order of Manasseh; but the hostility of the party opposed to the service of Jehovah, which gained the ascendency at the accession of that prince, had been sufficiently excited by the prophet during the reign of his predecessor to prompt them to the murder, without our lengthening the period of his prophesying beyond the limits which this verse assigns. For indeed —

3. Isaiah must have been an old man at the close of Hezekiah's reign. The ordinary chronology gives 758 B. C. for the date of Jotham's accession, and 698 for that of Hezekiah's death. This gives us a period of 60 years. And since his ministry commenced before Uzziah's death (how long we know not), supposing him to have been no more than 20 years old when he began to prophesy, he would have been 80 or 90 at Manasseh's accession.

4. The circle of hearers upon whom his ministry was immediately designed to operate is determined to be "Judah and Jerusalem." True, we have in the book prophecies relating to the kingdom of Israel — as also to Moab, Babylon, and other heathen states; but neither in the one case nor the other was the prophesying designed for the benefit of these foreign states, or meant to be communicated to them, but only for Judah, now becoming the sole home of Hebrew blessings and hopes. Every other interest in the prophet's inspired view moves round Judah, and is connected with her.

5. It is the most natural and obvious supposition that the "visions" are in the main placed in the collection according to their chronological order; and this supposition it would be arbitrary to set aside without more solid reasons than the mere impulses of subjective fancy. We grant that this presumption might be overruled, if good cause were shown; but till it is shown, we have no warrant for rejecting the principle that the present arrangement is in the main founded upon chronological propriety, only departed from in cases where (as is very natural to suppose) similarity of character occasioned the grouping together of visions which were not uttered at the same time.

6. If then we compare the contents of the book with the description here given of it, we recognize prophesyings which are certainly to be assigned to the reigns of Uzziah, Ahaz, and Hezekiah; but we cannot so certainly find any belonging to the reign of Jotham. The form of the expression in vi. 1, "the year that king Uzziah died," fixes the time of that vision to the close of Uzziah's reign, and not to the commencement of Jotham's. What precedes ch. vi. may be referred to some preceding part of Uzziah's reign: except perhaps the first chapter; this may be regarded as a general summary of advice founded upon the whole of what follows, — a kind of general preface; corresponding at the commencement of the book to the parænesis of the nine chapters at its close. Ch. vii. brings us at once from "the year that king Uzziah died" to "the days of Ahaz." We have then nothing left for Jotham's reign, unless we suppose that some of the group of "burdens" in xiii.–xxiii. belong to it, or some of the perhaps miscellaneous utterances in xxviii.–xxxv. It may be that prophesyings then spoken were not recorded, because, applying to a state of things similar to what obtained in the latter part of Uzziah, they were themselves of a similar strain with chs. ii.–v.

7. We naturally ask, Who was the compiler of the book? The obvious answer is, that it was Isaiah himself aided by a scribe; comp. the very interesting glimpse afforded us by Jer. xxxvi. 1–5, of the relation between the utterance of prophecies and their writing. Isaiah we know was otherwise an author; for in 2 Chr. xxvi. 22 we read: "Now the rest of the acts of Uzziah first and last did Isaiah the son of Amoz the prophet write"; and though that historical work has perished, the fact remains to show that Isaiah's mind was not alien from the cares of written composition (comp. also 2 Chr. xxxii. 32; and observe the first person used in viii. 1–5). The organic structure of the whole book also, which we hope to make apparent, favors the same belief. On the whole, that Isaiah was himself the compiler, claims to be accepted as the true view. The principal objection deserving of notice is that founded upon xxxvii. 38. It has been alleged (Hitzig, in loc.) that Sennacherib's murder took place B. C. 696, two years after Manasseh's accession; others, however, question this (comp. Hävernick's Einleitung): at all events the passage is quite reconcilable with the belief of Isaiah's being the compiler, if we suppose him to have lived two or three years after Manasseh's accession, even without our having recourse to the expedient of attributing the verse in question and the one before it to a later hand. The name given in xxxvi. 11, 13, to the Hebrew spoken in Jerusalem, "the Jews' language," יְהוּדִית, is no evidence of a later age: it is perfectly conceivable that while the written language remained the same in both kingdoms, as is evidenced by the prophetical books, the spoken dialect (comp. Judg. xii. 6) of the kingdom of Judah may have diverged so far from that of the (now perished) kingdom of Israel as to have received a distinct designation; and its name would naturally, like that of the kingdom itself, be drawn from the tribe which formed the chief constituent of the population. As we are seeking for objective evidence, we may neglect those wild hypotheses which some have indulged in, respecting an original work and its subsequent modifications; for since they originate in the denial of divine inspiration conjoined with reliance on a merely subjective appreciation of the several writings, such hypotheses must be assigned to the region of fancy rather than of historic investigation.

8. In this introductory verse we have yet to notice the description which it gives of Isaiah's prophesyings: they are "the vision which he saw." When we hear of visions we are apt to think of a mental condition in which the mind is withdrawn altogether from the perception of objects actually present, and contemplates, instead of these, another set of objects which appear at the moment sensibly present — a sort of dream without sleep. Such a vision was that of St. Peter at Joppa. Such again we recognize in Is. vi. — the only instance of this kind of pure vision in the book; in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Zechariah, they abound. But Isaiah's mental state in his prophesying appears ordinarily to have been different from this. Outward objects really present were not withdrawn from his perception, but appear to have blended to his view, at times, with the spiritual which was really present, though not recognizable except to the eye of faith (e. g., the presence of Jehovah); at times, with the future, whether sensible or spiritual, which seemed to the prophet as if actually present. In this view, his prophesyings are not to be regarded as utterances, in the delivery of which the Holy Ghost employed the intellectual and physical organs of the prophet as mere instruments wielded by itself, but as vision, i. e., the description by the prophet himself under divine direction (2 Tim. iii. 16) of that which at the time he seemed to himself to see. It this view be just, it follows that in the descriptions which the prophet gives of that which appeared to be before him, we cannot be at once sure, whether he is describing what was actually objectively present, or whether the objects delineated as present belonged to the future. For example; at first sight the description given of the condition of Judah in i. 5–9, portraying an invasion, might be understood of what was actually present, and so might lead us either to supplement the history of 2 K. with a hypothetical invasion, or put forward the time of the prophesying to Ahaz or Hezekiah. But recollecting that it is vision, we see that it may be taken as simply predictive and threatening, and therefore as still spoken in Uzziah's reign. Similarly iii. 8, v. 13, x. 28–32, are all predictive. So in the second part is lxiv. 11. Further, it would be only in accordance with this method of prophetic sight if we found the prophet describing some future time as if present, and from that standing-point announcing some more distant future, sometimes as future, and sometimes, again, as present. And in fact it is thus that Isaiah represents the coming fortunes of God's people in the second part of his prophecy. Comp. xlii. 13–17, xlix. 18, xlv. 1–4, liii. 3–10, 11, 12, lxiii. 1–6, as illustrations of the manner in which the relations of past, present, and future time are in vision blended together.

It has been remarked above as characteristic of Isaiah's ordinary prophetic vision, that the actually present is not lost to view. In fact this was essential to his proper function. His first and immediate concern was with his contemporaries, as the reprover of sin, and to build up the piety of believers. Even when his vision the most contemplates the future, he yet does not lose his reference to the present, but (as we shall see even in the second part) he makes his prophesyings tell by exhortation and reproof upon the state of things actually around him. From all this it results, that we often find it difficult to discriminate his predictions from his rebukes of present disorders. His contemporaries, however, would be under no such difficulty. The idolatrous and ungodly Hebrew would promptly recognize his own description; the pious would be confirmed and cheered.

II. In order to realize the relation of Isaiah's prophetic ministry to his own contemporaries, we need to take account both of the foreign relations of Judah at the time, and internally of its social and religious aspects. Our materials are scanty, and are to be collected partly out of 2 K. and 2 Chr., and partly out of the remaining writings of contemporary prophets, Joel (probably), Obadiah, and Micah, in Judah; and Hosea, Amos, and Jonah, in Israel. Of these the most assistance is obtained from Micah.

1. Under Uzziah the political position of Judah had greatly recovered from the blows suffered under Amaziah; the fortifications of Jerusalem itself were restored; castles were built in the country; new arrangements in the army and equipments of defensive artillery were established; and considerable successes in war gained against the Philistines, the Arabians, and the Ammonites. [UZZIAH.] This prosperity continued during the reign of Jotham, except that, towards the close of this latter reign, troubles threatened from the alliance of Israel and Syria. [JOTHAM.] The consequence of this prosperity was an influx of wealth, and this with the increased means of military strength withdrew men's confidence from Jehovah, and led them to trust in worldly resources. Moreover great disorders existed in the internal administration, all of which, whether moral or religious, were, by the very nature of the commonwealth, as theocratic, alike amenable to prophetic rebuke. It was the very business of Isaiah and other prophets to raise their voices as public reformers, as well as to fulfill the work which belongs to religious teachers in edifying God's true servants and calling the irreligious to repentance. Accordingly our prophet steps forward into public view with the divine message, dressed after the manner of prophets in general — girded in coarse and black, or at least dark colored, hair-cloth (comp. Is. xx. 2, l. 3; 2 K. i. 8; Zech. xiii. 4) — emblematically indicating by this attire of mourning that Jehovah spoke to his people in grief and resentment. [SACKCLOTH.] From his house, which appears to have been in Jerusalem (comp. vii. 3, xxxvii. 5), he goes forth to places of general concourse, chiefly no doubt, as Christ and his Apostles afterwards did, to the colonnades and courts of the Temple, and proclaims in the audience of the people "the word of Jehovah."

2. And what is the tenor of his message in the time of Uzziah and Jotham? This we read in chs. i.–v. Chap. i. is very general in its contents. In perusing it we may fancy that we hear the very voice of the Seer as he stands (perhaps) in the Court of the Israelites denouncing to nobles and people, then assembling for divine worship, the whole estimate of their character formed by Jehovah, and his approaching chastisements. "They are a sinful nation; they have provoked the Holy One of Israel to anger. Flourishing as their worldly condition now appears, the man whose eyes are opened sees another scene before him (i–9) — the land laid waste, and Zion left as a cottage in a vineyard — (a picture realized in the Syro-Ephraimitish war, and more especially in the Assyrian invasion — the great event round which the whole of the first part of the book revolves). Men of Sodom and Gomorrah that they are, let them hearken! they may go on if they will with their ritual worship, 'trampling' Jehovah's courts; nevertheless, He loathes them: the stain of innocent blood is on their hands: the weak are oppressed; there is bribery and corruption in the administration of justice. Let them reform; if they will not, Jehovah will burn out their sins in the smelting fire of his judgment. Zion shall be purified, and thus saved, whilst the sinners and recreants from Jehovah in her shall perish in their much-loved idolatries." This discourse suitably heads the book; it sounds the key-note of the whole; fires of judgment destroying, but purifying a remnant — such was the burden all along of Isaiah's prophesyings.

Of the other public utterances belonging to this period, chs. ii.–iv. are by almost all critics considered to be one prophesying — the leading thought of which is that the present prosperity of Judah should be destroyed for her sins, to make room for the real glory of piety and virtue; while ch. v. forms a distinct discourse, whose main purport is that Israel, God's vineyard, shall be brought to desolation. The idolatry denounced in these chapters is to be taken as that of private individuals, for both Uzziah and Jotham served Jehovah. They are prefaced by the vision of the exaltation of the mountain on which Jehovah dwells above all other mountains, to become the source of light and moral transformation to all mankind (ii. 2–4).

Here we are met by the fact that this same vision is found in very nearly the same words in Micah iv. 1–3. The two prophets were contemporary, and one may very well have heard the other, and adopted his words. Compare a nearly similar phenomenon in 1 Pet. v. 5–9, compared with Jam. iv. 6–10; for Peter and James had no doubt often heard each other's public teaching at Jerusalem. Which was the prior speaker of the words we cannot in either case determine. In many cases writers of Scripture adopt the words of former inspired writers; why not speakers also? In this instance, Isaiah or Micah may without improbability be imagined as standing by whilst the other announced Jehovah's word, and himself, still under divine inspiration, afterwards repeating the same word. As among the prophets in the Christian Church some were directed to remain in silence, and "judge" whilst others spoke; so we may believe that occasions frequently occurred in which the prophesying of one sable-dressed prophet was listened to, and ratified by other prophets, one or more, standing by, who might add their testimony: "This is the word of Jehovah" (comp. 1 K. xxii. 11, 12).

After thus refreshing pious souls with delineating future (Messianic) glories, Isaiah is recalled by the sad present. Far distant is God's people as yet from the high calling of being the teacher of the world. "All is now wrong. Heathenism is flooding the land with charmers and diviners, with silver and gold, with horses and chariots, and with idols! Jehovah, forgive them not! — Jehovah's day of judgment is coming, when all human glory shall disappear before his glory, and in consternation Hebrew idolaters shall hurl their images into any corner. Lo, Jehovah-Zebaoth will take away every stay of order and well-being in the state, leaving only the refuse of society to rule (if indeed they will) the desolated city. Look at them only! They are as shameless as Sodom! O my people, thy leaders lead thee astray, thy princes oppress: what mean ye that ye grind the faces of my poor? saith Jehovah. Look again at their ladies, with their jewels and their head-gear, and their fine dresses and their trinkets! Jehovah will take all of it away, leaving to them only shame and sackcloth. Yes, Zion shall lose both sons and daughters (so many are they who offend!), and bereaved of all shall sit on the bare ground. Yet out of these judgments shall issue purity and peace. He, the Branch of Jehovah's appointing (iv. 2), shall appear in glory and the redeemed springing out of the earth shall shine with accordant splendor in what is left of Israel. All in Zion shall then be holy, and the pillar of fire by night, and the overshadowing cloud by day, shall as of yore cheer and protect — what is precious must needs be protected! Sweet shall be the security and refreshment of those days."

Again the prophet is seen in the public concourse. At first he invites attention by reciting a parable (of the vineyard) in calm and composed accents (ch. v.). But as he interprets the parable his note changes, and a sixfold "woe" is poured forth with terrible invective. It is levelled against the covetous amassers of land, breaking down those landmarks which fenced the small hereditary freeholders whose perpetuity formed an essential element in the original constitution of the Hebrew commonwealth (comp. 1 K. xxi. 3); against luxurious revellers; against bold sinners who defied

God's works of judgment, with which the prophets threatened them (comp. the similar association of revelling with hardened unbelief in Israel, Am. v. 18. vi. 3–6); against those who confounded moral distinctions; against self-conceited skeptics; and against profligate perverters of judicial justice. In fury of wrath Jehovah stretches forth his hand. Here there is an awful vagueness in the images of terror which the prophet accumulates, till at length out of the cloud and mist of wrath we hear Jehovah hiss for the stern and irresistible warriors (the Assyrians), who from the end of the earth should crowd forward to spoil, — after which all distinctness of description again fades away in vague images of sorrow and despair.

What effect (we may ask) would such denunciations produce upon the mass of Hebrew hearers? It was not from Isaiah only that the same persons heard them. Oppression, denounced by him (iii. 14, 15, v. 7–10), was denounced also by Micah (ii. 1, 2); maladministration of justice (Is. i. 23, v. 23) is noted also by Micah (iii. 1–3, 9–11, vii. 3); the combination of idolatry, diviners, and horses found in Is. ii. 6–8, 15, is paralleled in Mic. v. 10–15. This concurrence of prophetical testimony would not be without weight with those who had still some faith in Jehovah. But the worldly-minded, however silent when flagrant immorality was censured, might find what they would count plausible ground for demurring, when the prophet put the multiplication of gold, silver, horses, and chariots, in the same category with idols, or when with unsparing satire he particularized articles of female adornment as objects of Jehovah's wrath. But God's law through Moses had given similar injunctions (Deut. xvii. 16, 17); and indeed in general there is not a single page of the prophetic books in which the Pentateuch is not again and again referred to. The Hebrew commonwealth was not designed to be a commercial state, but a system of small hereditary land-owners under a theocracy. Material progress and ever heightening embellishment, whether in the court or in society in general, with the men or with the women, removed it further and further from its original constitution, and from Jehovah its God. Something resembling Spartan plainness belonged essentially to the idea of the Hebrew state.

3. In the year of Uzziah's death an ecstatic vision fell upon Isaiah, which, in compiling his prophecies long after, he was careful to record, both for other reasons, and also because he had then become aware of the failure of his ministry in reference to the bulk of his contemporaries, and of the desolation, yet not without hope, which awaited his people. We see in the case of St. Peter at Joppa (Acts x. 9–16) that such a state of ecstasis, though unquestionably of divine origin, yet in its form adapts itself to the previous condition, whether corporeal or psychological, of the patient. Isaiah at this period (as we must infer from the placing of the narrative) had been already for some time engaged in his ministry; and we may venture to surmise he lamented his little success. Seeing what he saw around him, and foreseeing what he foresaw, could he do otherwise than feel deeply how little he was able to effect for the welfare of his beloved country? In this vision he saw Jehovah, in the Second Person of the Godhead (John xii. 41; comp. Mal. iii. 1), enthroned aloft in his own earthly tabernacle, attended by seraphim, whose praise filled the sanctuary as it were with the smoke of incense. As John at Patmos, so Isaiah was overwhelmed with awe: he felt his own sinfulness and that of all with whom he was connected, and cried "woe" upon himself as if brought before Jehovah to receive the reward of his deeds. But, as at Patmos, the Son of Man laid his hand upon John saying, "Fear not!" so, in obedience evidently to the will of Jehovah, a seraph with a hot stone taken from the altar touched his lips, the principal organ of good and evil in man, and thereby removing his sinfulness, qualified him to join the seraphim in whatever service he might be called to. And now the condescending invitation of the Great King is heard: "Whom shall I send? Who will go for us?" "Here am I! send me." Had he not borne Jehovah's commission before? No doubt he had; yet now, with the intenser sense of the reality of divine things which that hour brought him, he felt as if he had not. What heaven-taught minister does not understand this? And what was to be the nature of his work? "Make the understanding of this people (not "my people") torpid: dull their ears; close up their eyes; the more they hear thy word, the more hardened they shall become; they must not, they shall not, receive the message so as to repent." A heart-crushing commission for one who loved his people as Isaiah did! The moan of grief at length finds utterance: "Lord, how long?" "Till the land be desolate — saving a small remnant, utterly desolate — a remnant of a holy seed, which will be a stock to sprout forth, but again and again to be cut back and burnt, and yet still to survive."

This vision in the main was another mode of representing what, both in previous and in subsequent prophesyings, is so continually denounced — the almost utter destruction of the Hebrew people, with yet a purified remnant. But while this prediction was its principal purport, we are sure that the inspired editor of his prophesyings so many years after, beheld in it also the sketch of the fruits of his ministry, which at the time when the revelation was made to him must have had no small effect upon his own private feelings. He goes afresh about his work, despairingly as to the main result for the present, yet with seraph-like zeal, ardent and heaven-purged, and not without hope too, for the time to come. The "holy seed" was to be the "stock." It was to be his business to form that holy seed.

It is a touching trait, illustrating the prophet's own feelings, that when he next appears before us, some years later, he has a son named Shearjashub, "Remnant-shall-return." The name was evidently given with significance; and the fact discovers alike the sorrow which ate his heart, and the hope in which he found solace.

4. Some years elapse between chs. vi. and vii, and the political scenery has greatly altered. The Assyrian power of Nineveh now threatens the Hebrew nation; Tiglath-pileser has already spoiled Pekah of some of the fairest parts of his dominions — of the country east of Jordan and the vale of the Sea of Galilee, removing the inhabitants probably to people the wide and as yet uninhabited space inclosed by the walls of Nineveh (n. c. 746). After the Assyrian army was withdrawn, the Syrian kingdom of Damascus rises into notice; its monarch, Rezin, combines with the now weakened king of Israel, and probably with other small states around, to consolidate (it has been conjectured) a power which shall confront Asshur. Ahaz keeps aloof and becomes the object of attack to the allies; he has been already twice defeated (2 Chr. xxviii. 5, 6); and now the allies are threatening him with a combined invasion (741). The news that "Aram is encamped in Ephraim" (Is. vii. 2) fills both king and people with consternation, and the king is gone forth from the city to take measures, as it would seem, to prevent the upper reservoir of water from falling into the hands of the enemy. Under Jehovah's direction Isaiah goes forth to meet the king, surrounded no doubt by a considerable company of his officers and of spectators.[a] The prophet is directed to take with him the child whose name, Shearjashub, was so full of mystical promise, to add greater emphasis to his message. "Fear not," he tells the king, "Damascus is the head of Syria, and of Syria only; and Rezin head of Damascus, and not of Jerusalem; and within 65 years Ephraim shall be broken, to be no more a kingdom: so far shall Ephraim be from annexing Judah! Samaria again is head only of Ephraim, and Remaliah's son only of Samaria. If ye will be established, believe this!"

"Dost thou hesitate? Ask what sign thou wilt to assure thee that thus it shall be." The young king is already resolved not to let himself into the line of policy which Isaiah is urging upon him; he is bent upon an alliance with Assyria. To ask a sign might prove embarrassing; for, if it should be given ———? Ahaz therefore, with a half-mocking show of reverence, declines to "tempt Jehovah." "O house of David, are ye not satisfied with trying the patience of an honest and wisely advising prophet, that you will put this contempt also upon the God who speaks through me? Jehovah himself, irrespective of your deservings, gives you a guarantee that the commonwealth of Israel is not yet to perish. Behold, the Virgin is with child, and is bearing a son, and thou, O mother (comp. Gen. xvi. 11), shalt call his name Immanuel. I seem to see that Child already born! Behold Him there! Cream and honey, abundance of the best food, shall he eat, when, ten or twenty years hence, he comes to the age of discretion; the devastating inroad of Syria and Israel shall be past then; for before that, the land of the two kings thou holdest so formidable shall be desolate. But" — here the threat which mingles with the promise in Shearjashub appears — "upon thy people and upon thy family, not only in thy lifetime, but afterwards, Jehovah will bring an enemy more terrible than Jacob has ever known, Asshur — Asshur, whom thou wouldest fain hire to help (v. 20), but who shall prove a razor that will shave but too clean; he shall so desolate the land that its inhabitants shall be sparse and few."

Again Isaiah predicts the Assyrian invasion; comp. ch. xxxvi.[b]

5. As the Assyrian empire began more and more to threaten the Hebrew commonwealth with utter overthrow, it is now that the prediction of the Messiah, the Restorer of Israel, becomes more positive and clear. Micah (v. 2) points to Bethlehem as the birthplace, and (v. 3) speaks of "her that travaileth" as an object to prophetic vision seeming almost present. Would not Micah and Isaiah confer with each other in these dark days of prevailing unbelief, upon the cheering hope which the Spirit of Christ that was in them suggested to their minds? (comp. Mal. iii. 16).

The king was bent upon an alliance with Assyria. This Isaiah stedfastly opposes (comp. x. 20). In a theocracy the messenger of Jehovah would frequently appear as a political adviser. "Neither fear Aram and Israel, for they will soon perish; nor trust in Asshur, for she will be thy direst oppressor." Such is Isaiah's strain. And by divine direction he employs various expedients to make his testimony the more impressive. He procured a large tablet (viii. 1), and with witnesses (for the purpose of attesting the fact, and displaying its especial significance) he wrote thereon in large characters suited for a public notice the words[c] HASTENBOOTY SPEEDSPOIL; which tablet was no doubt to be hung up for public view, in the entrance (we may suppose) to the Temple (comp. "priest," ver. 2). And further: his wife — who, by the way, appears to have been herself possessed of prophetic gifts, for "prophetess" always has this meaning and nowhere indicates a prophet's wife merely — just at this time apparently gave birth to a son. Jehovah bids the prophet give him the name Hastenbooty Speedspoil, adding, what Isaiah was to avow on all occasions, that before the child should be able to talk, the wealth of Damascus and the booty of Samaria should be carried away before the king of Assyria.

The people of Judah was split into political factions. The court was for Assyria, and indeed formed an alliance with Tiglath-pileser; but a popular party was for the Syro-Ephraimitic connection formed to resist Assyria — partly actuated by their fears of a confederacy from which they had already severely suffered, and partly perhaps influenced by sympathies of kindred race, drawing them to Israel, and even to Aram, in opposition to the more foreign Assyria. "Fear none but Jehovah only! fear Him, trust Him; He will be your safety." Such is the purport of the discourse viii. 5–ix. 7; in which, however, he augurs coming distress through the rejection of his counsels, but refreshes himself with the thought of the birth of the Great Deliverer.[d]

[a] The reader will observe the particular specification of the place, indicating the authenticity of the narrative. (Comp. Blunt's Undesigned Coincidences, pt. iii. no. i.)

[b] That the birth of the Messiah is here pointed to cannot be doubted; indeed even Ewald sees this. But the exact interpretation of vv. 15, 16, is hard to determine. That given above is in the main Hengstenberg's (Christology, vol. ii.). The great difficulty which attaches to it is that the prophet represents Christ as already appearing, reckoning from his birth at the then present time, forward to the desolation of Syria and Israel within a few years. This difficulty is, however, alleviated by the consideration that the prophet states the future as exhibited to him in "vision," and in such prophetic vision the distances between events in point of time are often unperceived by the seer, who perhaps might sometimes in his own private interpretation of the vision (comp. 1 Pet. i. 10) have misconceived the relations of time in regard to events. The very clearness with which the future event was exhibited to him might deceive him in judging of its nearness. In the N. T. we have a somewhat similar phenomenon in the estimate formed by the Apostles and others of the relation of time between Christ's coming to judge Jerusalem and his second coming at the end of the world.

[c] A. V. Maher-shalal-hash-baz; by Luther rendered Raubebald, Eilebeute.

[d] With reference to Tiglath-pileser's having recently removed the population of Galilee, the prophet specifies that "as the former time brought humiliation in the direction of Zebulun and Naphtali," located on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, "so the latter time

The inspired advice was not accepted. Unbelief not discerning the power and faithfulness of Jehovah would argue that isolation was ruin, and accordingly involved Judah in alliances which soon brought her to almost utter destruction.

6. A prophecy was delivered at this time against the kingdom of Israel (ix. 8–x. 4), consisting of four strophes, each ending with the terrible refrain: "for all this, his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still." It announces that all expedients for recovering the power which Israel had lately lost were nugatory; they had forsaken Jehovah, and therefore God-forsaken (x. 4) they should perish. As Isaiah's message was only to Judah, we may infer that the object of this utterance was to check the disposition shown by many in Judah to connect Judah with the policy of the sister kingdom.

7. The utterance recorded in x. 5–xii. 6, one of the most highly wrought passages in the whole book, was probably one single outpouring of inspiration. It stands wholly disconnected with the preceding in the circumstances which it presupposes; and to what period to assign it, is not easy to determine.[a] To allay the dread of Assyria which now prevailed, Isaiah was in God's mercy to his people inspired to declare, that though heavy judgments would consume the bulk of the nation, yet Shearjashub! the remnant should return (x. 20–22; comp. vii. 3), and that the Assyrian should be overthrown in the very hour of apparently certain success by agency whose precise nature is left in awful mystery (x. 33, 34). From the destruction of Judah's enemies thus representatively foreshadowed, he then takes wing to predict the happy and peaceful reign of the "Twig which was to come forth from the stump of Jesse," when the united commonwealth of Judah and Ephraim should be restored in glory, and JAH JEHOVAH should be celebrated as the proved strength of his people. Here again is set forth a great deliverance, possibly the foreshadowing of xxxvii.

8. The next eleven chapters, xiii.–xxiii., contain chiefly a collection of utterances, each of which is styled a "burden."[b] As they are detached pieces, it is possible they have been grouped together without strict observance of their chronological order.

(a.) The first (xiii. 1–xiv. 27) is against Babylon; placed first, either because it was first in point of utterance, or because Babylon in prophetic vision, particularly when Isaiah compiled his book, headed in importance all the earthly powers opposed to God's people, and therefore was to be first struck down by the shaft of prophecy. As yet, not Babylon but Nineveh was the imperial city; but Isaiah possessed not a mere foreboding drawn from political sagacity, but an assured knowledge, that Babylon would be the seat of dominion and a leading antagonist to the theocratic people. Not only did he tell Hezekiah a few years later, when Nineveh was still the seat of empire, that his sons should be carried captive "to Babylon," but in this "burden" he also foretells both the towering ambition and glory of that city, and its final overthrow.[c] The ode of triumph (xiv. 3–23) in this burden is among the most poetical passages in all literature. It is remarkable that the overthrow of Babylon is in vv. 24, 25, associated with the blow inflicted upon the Ninevite empire in the destruction of Sennacherib's army (for here again this great miracle of divine judgment looms out into the prophet's view), which very disaster, however, probably helped on the rise of Babylon at the cost of its northern rival. The explanation seems to be that Babylon was regarded as merely another phase of Asshur's sovereignty (comp. 2 K. xxiii. 29), so that the overthrow of Sennacherib's army was a harbinger of that more complete destruction of the power of Asshur which should bring these regions honor." A mysterious oracle then! But made clear to us by the event (Matt. iv. 16).

[a] Since the great object of this discourse is to allay Judah's fear of the Assyrian (x. 24), it can hardly belong to the very early part of the reign (742 to 727) of Ahaz: for then the more immediate fear was the Syro-Ephraimite alliance. According to the principle of chronological arrangement which we suppose to have been followed by Isaiah in his compilation, it would be before the death of Ahaz (comp. xiv. 28). Ahaz had "hired" the help of Tiglath-pileser by a large present (2 K. xvi.), and the Assyrian had come and fulfilled (738) the prediction of Isaiah (viii. 4) by capturing and spoiling Damascus. But already, in the time of Ahaz, Assyria began to occasion uneasiness to Judah (2 Chr. xxviii. 20). Shalmaneser succeeded Tiglath-pileser not later than 728, and might not care much for his predecessor's engagements — if, indeed, Tiglath-pileser himself felt bound by them. At any rate, so encroaching a power, bent on conquest, must needs be formidable to the feeble kingdom of Judah, Syria being now conquered and Israel powerless. Critics, who do not take sufficient account of the manner in which future events are represented in the predictions of inspiration as already taking place, have been led to unsettle the chronology by observing that Samaria is described by the boasting Assyrian as being already as Damascus, and that the invading army is already near Jerusalem. But the conquest of Samaria was already announced at the beginning of the reign of Ahaz (viii. 4) as equally certain with that of Damascus; and the imagery of x. 28–32 is probably that in which the imagination of one familiar with the passes of the country would obviously portray an invader's approach. The destruction of Sennacherib's army is the centre object of the first part of the book; and the action of predictive prophecy, and of miracle in relation to it, cannot be gainsaid without setting aside the authenticity of the narrative altogether.

[b] This remarkable word, מַשָּׂא, "lifting up," is variously understood, some taking it to refer to evils to be borne by the parties threatened, others as a lifting up of the voice in a solemn utterance. A hundred years later the term had been so misused by false prophets, that Jeremiah (xxiii. 33–40) seems to forbid its use. See 1 Chr. xv. 22, where in text and margin of A. V. it is rendered "song," "carriage," and "lifting up."

[c] Compare our remarks in p. 1160. Even if this were conceded to be the production of a later prophet than Isaiah (which there is no just cause whatever for believing), the problem which it presents to skepticism would remain as hard as ever; for whence should its author learn that the ultimate condition of Babylon would be such as is here delineated? (xiii. 19–22). In no time of Hebrew literature was there reason to anticipate this of Babylon in particular more than of other cities. In vain does skepticism quote xvii. 1; nothing is said there of the ultimate condition of Damascus; and it is obvious enough that any such blow as that (e. g.) inflicted by Tiglath-pileser would make Damascus for a while appear to be "no city" compared with what it had been, and would convert many of its streets into desolation. How different the language used of Babylon! And how wonderfully verified by time! We have the parallel language and verification in reference to Idumæa (xxxiv.).

this burden announces. This prophecy is a note of preparation for the second part of the book; for the picture which it draws of Babylon, as having Jacob in captivity, and being compelled to relinquish her prey (xiv. 1–3), is in brief the same as is more fully delineated in xlvii.; while the concluding verses about Sennacherib's army (24–27) stand in somewhat the same relation to the rest of the "burden," as the full history in xxxvi., xxxvii stands to xl.–xlviii.

(b.) The short and pregnant "burden" against Philistia (xiv. 29–32) in the year that Ahaz died, was occasioned by the revolt of the Philistines from Judah and their successful inroad, recorded 2 Chr. xxviii. 18. "If Judah's rule was a serpent, that of Assyria would prove a basilisk — a flying dragon; let their gates howl at the smoke which announced the invading army! Meanwhile Zion would repose safe under the protection of her king:" — language plainly predictive, as the compiler in giving the date evidently felt; comp. xxxvii.

(c.) The "burden of Moab" (xv., xvi.) is remarkable for the elegiac strain in which the prophet bewails the disasters of Moab, and for the dramatic character of xvi. 1–6, in which 3–5 is the petition of the Moabites to Judah, and ver. 6 Judah's answer.[a] For Moab's relation to Israel see MOAB.

(d.) Chapters xvii., xviii. This prophecy is headed "the burden of Damascus;" and yet after ver. 3 the attention is withdrawn from Damascus and turned to Israel, and then to Ethiopia. Israel appears as closely associated with Damascus, and indeed dependent upon her, and as having adopted her religious rites, "strange slips," ver. 10 (comp. 2 K. xvi. 10, of Ahaz), which shall not profit her. This brings us to the time of the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance; at all events Ephraim has not yet ceased to exist. Chap. xvii. 12–14, as well as xviii. 1–7, point again to the event of xxxvii. But why this here? The solution seems to be that, though Assyria would be the ruin both of Aram and of Israel, and though it would even threaten Judah ("us," ver. 14), it should not then conquer Judah (comp. turn of xiv. 31, 32). And with this last thought ch. xviii. is inseparably connected; for it is a call of congratulation to Ethiopia ("woe" in ver. 1 of A. V. should be "ho!" as lv. 1; also in ver. 2 omit "saying"), whose deputies, predictively imagined as having come to Palestine to learn the progress of the Assyrian invasion (comp. xxxvii. 9), are sent back by the prophet charged with the glad news of Asshur's overthrow described in vv. 4–6. In ver. 7 we have the conversion of Ethiopia; for "the people tall, and shorn" is itself "the present" to be brought unto Jehovah. (Comp. Acts viii. 26–40, and the present condition of Ethiopia.)

These repeated predictions of Zion's deliverance from Asshur, in conjunction with Asshur's triumph over Zion's enemies, entered deeply into the essence of the prophet's public ministry; the great aim of which was to fix the dependence of his countrymen entirely upon Jehovah.

(e.) In the "burden of Egypt" (xix. the prophet seems to be pursuing the same object. Both Israel (2 K. xvii. 4) and Judah (Is. xxxi.) were naturally disposed to look towards Egypt for succor against Assyria. Probably it was to counteract this tendency that the prophet is here directed to prophesy the utter helplessness of Egypt under God's judgments: she should be given over to Asshur (the "cruel lord" and "fierce king" of ver. 4, not Psammetichus), and should also suffer the most dreadful calamities through civil dissensions and through drought, — unless this drought is a figure founded upon the peculiar usefulness of the Nile, and the veneration with which it was regarded (1–15). But the result should be that numerous cities of Egypt should own Jehovah for their God, and be joined in brotherhood with his worshippers in Israel and in Asshur; — a reference to Messianic times.[b]

(f.) In the midst of these "burdens" stands a passage which presents Isaiah in a new aspect, an aspect in which he appears in this instance only. It was not uncommon both in the O. T. and in the New (comp. Acts xxi. 11) for a prophet to add to his spoken word an action symbolizing its import Sargon, known here only, was king of Assyria, probably between Shalmaneser and Sennacherib. His armies were now in the south of Palestine besieging Ashdod. It has been plausibly conjectured that Tirhakah, king of Meroë, and Sethos, the king of Egypt, were now in alliance. The more emphatically to enforce the warning already conveyed in the "burden of Egypt" — not to look thitherward for help — Isaiah was commanded to appear in the streets and temple of Jerusalem stripped of his sackcloth mantle, and wearing his vest only, with his feet also bare. "Thus shall Egyptians and Ethiopians walk, captives before the king of Assyria." For three years was he directed (from time to time, we may suppose) thus to show himself in public view, — to make the lesson the more impressive by constant repetition.

(g.) In "the burden of the desert of the sea," a poetical designation of Babylonia (xxi. 1–10), the images in which the fall of Babylon is indicated are sketched with Æschylean rapidity, and certainly not less than Æschylean awfulness and grandeur. As before (xiii. 17), the Medes are the captors. It is to comfort Judah sighing under the "treacherous spoiling" (v. 2) and continual "threshing" (v. 10) of Asshur — Ninevite and Babylonian — that the Spirit of God moves the prophet to this utterance.[c]

(h.) "The burden of Dumah," — in which the watchman can see nothing but night, let them ask him as often as they will — and "of Arabia" (xxi. 11–17), relate apparently to some Assyrian invasion.

(i.) In "the burden of the valley of vision" (xxii. 1–14), it is doubtless Jerusalem that is thus designated, and not without sadness, as having been so long the home of prophetic vision to so little result. The scene presented is that of Jerusalem

[a] A good deal of this burden is an enlargement of Num. xxi. 27–30, from the imitation of which the coloring of its style in part arises. It in turn reappears in an enlarged edition in Jer. xlviii. The two concluding verses (Is. xvi. 13, 14), which furnish no real ground for doubting whether Isaiah wrote the whole of it, recount that of old time the purport of this denunciation has been decreed (namely, in Num. xxi. and xxiv. 17), but that within three years it should begin to be fulfilled. It was not completely fulfilled even in Jeremiah's time.

[b] Comp. the close of the "burden of Tyre." The "city of destruction" (xix 18) is supposed by many to be Beth-shemesh of Jer. xliii. 13, specified because hitherto an especial seat of idolatry. Onias's misuse of this prediction is well known. [See IR-HA-HERES.

[c] In vv. 3 and 4 the poet dramatically represents the feelings of the Babylonians.

during an invasion; in the hostile army are named Elam and Kir, nations which no doubt contributed troops both to the Ninevite and to the Babylonian armies. The latter is probably here contemplated.[a] The homiletic purpose of this prediction in reference to Isaiah's contemporaries, was to inculcate a pious and humble dependence upon Jehovah in place of any mere fleshly confidence.

(k.) The passage xxii. 15–25 is singular in Isaiah as a prophesying against an individual. Comp. the word of Amos (vii.) against Amaziah, and of Jeremiah (xx.) against Pashur. Shebna was probably as ungodly as they. One of the king's highest functionaries, he seems to have been leader of a party opposed to Jehovah (v. 25, "the burden that is upon it"). Himself a stranger in Jerusalem — perhaps an alien, as Ewald conjectures from the un-Hebrew form of his name — he may have been introduced by Hezekiah's predecessor Ahaz; he made great parade of his rank (ver. 18; comp. 2 Sam. xv. 1), and presumed upon his elevation so far as to hew out a tomb high up in the cliffs (probably on the western or southwestern side of Jerusalem, where so many were excavated), as an ostentatious display of his greatness (comp. 2 Chr. xxxii. 33, margin). We may believe him to have been engaged with this business outside the walls when Isaiah came to him with his message. Shebna fancies his power securely rooted; but Jehovah will roll him up as a ball and toss him away into a far distant land, — disgrace that he is to his master! his stately robes of office, with his broad magnificent girdle, shall invest another, Eliakim. Ch. xxxvi. 3, seems to indicate a decline of his power, as it also shows Eliakim's promotion to Shebna's former post. Perhaps he was disgraced and exiled by Hezekiah, after the event of xxxvii., when the sinners in Zion were overawed and great ascendency for a while secured to the party which was true to Jehovah. If his fall was the consequence of the Assyrian overthrow, we can better understand both the denunciation against the individual and the position it occupies in the record.

(l.) The last "burden" is against Tyre (xxiii.). The only cause specified by Isaiah for the judgment upon Tyre is her pride (ver. 9; comp. Ez. xxviii. 2, 6); and we can understand how the Tyrians, proud of their material progress and its outward displays, may have looked with contempt upon the plainer habits of the theocratic people. But this was not the only ground. The contagion of her idolatry reached Jerusalem (1 K. xi. 5, 33; 2 K. xi. 18, xxiii. 13). Otherwise also she was an injurious neighbor (Ps. lxxxiii. 7; Joel, iii. 6; Am. i. 9). It therefore behoved Jehovah, both as avenging his own worship, and as the guardian and avenger of his peculiar people, to punish Tyre Shalmaneser appears to have been foiled in his five years' siege; Nebuchadnezzar was more successful, capturing at least the mainland part of the city; and to this latter circumstance ver. 13 refers.[b] In vv. 15–17 it seems to be intimated that when the pressure of Asshur should be removed (by the Medo-Persian conquest), Tyre should revive. Her utter destruction is not predicted by Isaiah as it afterwards was by Ezekiel. Ver. 18 probably points to Messianic times: comp. Mark vii. 26; Acts xxi. 3; Euseb. H. E. x. 4.

9. The next four chapters, xxiv.–xxvii., form one prophecy essentially connected with the preceding ten "burdens" (xiii.–xxiii.), of which it is in effect a general summary; it presents previous denunciations in one general denunciation which includes the theocratic people itself, and therewith also the promise of blessings, especially Messianic blessings, for the remnant. It no longer particularizes (Moab, xxv. 10, represents all enemies of God's people, as Edom does in lxiii. 1), but speaks of judgments upon lands, cities, and oppressors in general terms, the reference of which is to be gathered from what goes before.[c]

The elegy of xxiv. is interrupted at ver. 13 by a glimpse at the happy remnant (ver. 15, fires probably means east), but is resumed at ver. 16, till at ver. 21 the dark night passes away altogether to usher in an inexpressibly glorious day.[d]

In xxv., after commemorating the destruction of all oppressors ("city" ver. 2, contemplates Babylon as type of all), the prophet gives us in vv. 6–9 a most glowing description of Messianic blessings, which connects itself with the N. T. by numberless links, indicating the oneness of the prophetic Spirit ("the Spirit of Christ," 1 Pet. i. 11), with that which dwells in the later revelation.[e]

In xxvi., vv. 12–18 describe the new, happy state of God's people as God's work wholly (comp. 13, "by thee only"); all their efforts were fruitless till God graciously interposed. The new condition of Israel is figuratively a resurrection (comp. Ezekiel's vision of dry bones, Ez. xxxvii.), a fruit of omnipotent agency; as indeed the glorified state of the Church hereafter will be literally a resurrection.

In xxvii. 1, "Leviathan the fleeing serpent, and Leviathan the twisting serpent, and the dragon in the sea," are perhaps Nineveh and Babylon — two phases of the same Asshur — and Egypt (comp. ver. 13); all, however, symbolizing adverse powers of evil. The reader will observe that in this period of his ministry, Isaiah already contemplates the a That it is not Sennacherib's invasion, we infer from the unrelieved description of godlessness and recklessness (vv. 11, 12), and the threatened punishment unto death (ver. 14), whereas Hezekiah's piety was conspicuous, and saved the city. (Comp. 2 Chr. xxxvi. 12, 16.) Moreover, the famine in 2 K. xxv. 3 throws light on Is. xxii. 2. That vv. 9–11 agree with 2 Chr. xxxii. 3–5 proves nothing: the same measures would be taken in any invasion (comp. Is. vii. 3). The former part of ver. 2 and vv. 12, 13, describe the state of things preceding the imagined present.

b "Behold the land of the Chaldæans; this people," i. e. the Chaldæans, "was not: Asshur founded it for the inhabitants of the wilderness," assigning a location to the Chaldæans, heretofore nomadic, Job i. 17; "they," the Chaldæans, "set up their watch-towers; they demolished her (Tyre's) palaces: He made her a ruin." In the face of all external evidence, we cannot accept Ewald's ingenious conjecture of כַּנַּעֲנִים for כַּשְׂדִּים.

c Thus comp. xxiv. 13–15, xxvii. 9, with xvii 5–8; also xxv. 2 with xiii. 19; also xxv. 3–12 with xviii. 7, xxiii. 18; and xxv. 5 with xviii. 4–6.

d In ver. 21, "Jehovah shall visit the host of the height" — stars, symbolic of rulers, as Mark xiii. 25. The "ancients" of ver. 23 represent the Church, like the elders in Rev. iv. 4.

e In ver. 7 "the face," i. e. "the surface of the covering," is the veil itself as lying upon the earth, "of the covering." In ver. 11 we have the fruitless endeavors of Moab to escape out of the flood of God's wrath.

future deliverance of his people as a restoration from captivity, especially from Assyria, vv. 12, 13 (comp. xi. 11, 16), as he does in the second part; — Babylon being a second phase of Asshur.

10. Chs. xxviii.–xxxv. The former part of this section seems to be of a fragmentary character, being, as Hengstenberg with much probability conjectures, the substance of discourses not fully communicated, and spoken at different times. The latter part hangs more closely together, and may with considerable certainty be assigned to the time of Sennacherib's invasion. At such a season the spirit of prophecy would be especially awake.

Ch. xxviii. 1–6 is clearly predictive; it therefore preceded Shalmaneser's invasion. when Samaria, "the crown of pride" surmounting its beautiful hill, was destroyed. But the men of Judah also, ver. 7 (comp. ver. 14), are threatened. And here we have a picture given us of the way in which Jehovah's word was received by Isaiah's contemporaries. Priest and prophet were drunk with a spirit of infatuation, — "they erred in vision, they stumbled in judgment," and therefore only scoffed at his ministrations.[a]

In the lips of these false prophets, prophesying, in proportion to its falsehood, would be exaggerated in the wildness and incoherency of the style. Hence the scoffing prophets and priests made it a matter of reproach against Isaiah that his style was so plain and simple — as if he were dealing with little children, ver. 9. And in mockery they accumulate monosyllables as imitating his style (tsav la-tsav, tsav la-tsav, kav la-kav, kav la-kav, zeeir sham, zeeir sham, ver. 10). "Twist my words" (is Isaiah's reply) "into a mocking jabber if ye will; God shall in turn speak to you by the jabber of foreign invaders!" (comp. Deut. xxviii. 49). They trusted that they had made a "vision" — a compact with death and hell (vv 15, 18, "agreement," Hebr. vision), and that through the measures which they, seer and priest together, had adopted, no invasion should hurt them. But the stone which Jehovah lays in Zion (God's own prophets) alone secures those who trust in it; ye shall perish (16–22). Ver. 16 is applied in the N. T. to Christ; he is now the prophet who saves those who believe in him. This glimpse into Hebrew life explains to us in part the cause of the failure of the prophetic ministry. The travesty of "the word of Jehovah" preoccupied men's minds, or at least confused them; while further the conflicting voices of different prophets, the false and the true, would furnish them, as in all ages it does to the worldly and the skeptical, a ground for entire disbelief.

"Cannot ye wise men apply to the conduct of your affairs in relation to God that shrewdness and wisdom, which the farmer displays in dealing with his various businesses, and which God has given alike to him and to you?" (23–29).

Ch. xxix. Jerusalem was to be visited with extreme danger and terror, and then sudden deliverance, vv. 1–8. (Sennacherib's invasion again! But the threatening and promise seemed very enigmatical; prophets, and rulers, and scholars, could make nothing of the riddle (9–12). Alas! the people themselves will only hearken to the prophets and priests speaking out of their own heart; even their so-called piety to Jehovah is regulated, not by his true organs, but by pretended ones, ver. 13 (comp. the condition of the Jews in relation to their rabbins and to Christ, Matt. xv. 8, 9); but all their vaunted policy shall be confounded; the wild wood shall become a fruitful field, and the fruitful field a wild wood; — the humble pupils of Jehovah and these self-wise leaders shall interchange their places of dishonor and prosperity, vv. 13–24.

One instance of the false leading of these prophets and priests (xxx. 1) in opposition to the true prophets (vv. 10, 11) was the policy of courting the help of Egypt against Assyria. Against this, Isaiah is commanded to protest, which he does both in xxx. 1–17, and in xxx. 1–3, pointing out at the same time the fruitlessness of all measures of human policy and the necessity of trusting in Jehovah alone for deliverance. In xxx. 18–33, and xxxi. 4–9, there is added to each address the prediction of the Assyrian's overthrow and its consequences, xxx. 19–24, in terms which, when read in the light of the event, seem very clear, but which no doubt appeared to the worldly and skeptical at the time mere frenzy.

As the time approaches, the spirit of prophecy becomes more and more glowing; that marvelous deliverance from Asshur, wherein God's "Name" (xxx. 27) so gloriously came near, opens even clearer glimpses into the time when God should indeed come and reign, in the Anointed One, and when virtue and righteousness should everywhere prevail (xxxii. 1–8, 15–20); then the mighty Jehovah should be a king dwelling amongst his people (xxxiii. 17, 22); he should himself be a sea of glory and defense encircling them, in which all hostile galleys should perish. At that glorious display of Jehovah's nearness (namely, that afforded in the Assyrian's overthrow), they who had rejected Jehovah in his servants and prophets, the sinners in Zion, should be filled with dismay, dreading lest his terrible judgment should alight upon themselves also (xxxiii. 14). With these glorious predictions are blended also descriptions of the grief and despair which should precede that hour, xxxii. 9–14 (?)[b] and xxxiii. 7–9, and the earnest prayer then to be offered by the pious (xxxiii. 2).

In ch. xxxiv. the prediction must certainly be taken with a particular reference to Idumæa (this is shown by the challenge in ver. 16, to compare the fulfillment with the prophecy); we are however led, both by the placing of the prophecy and by lxiii. 2, to take it in a general sense as well as typical.[c]

[a] "The priest and the prophet." There is no reason to understand these as connected with idolatry. There were always (it would seem) a numerous party who assumed the hair-wove mantle of the prophet ("wearing a hairy garment to deceive"); and these sable-clad men perhaps even swarmed in the streets of Jerusalem. [ELIJAH, p. 703, note c.] The priests, on the other hand, were the aristocracy of Judæa, and, under the king, to a great extent ruled its policy. Like the coalition of strategus and orator at Athens, so priest and prophet played into each other's hands at Jerusalem. Whatever public policy the priests advised, they would be seconded therein by prophets, "in the name of Jehovah." Isaiah's contemporary shows us in what an unprincipled manner the prophets abused their function for their own advantage (Mic. iii. 5–7, 11): "The prophets prophesied falsely, and the priests bare rule by their means" (Jer. v. 31). Hence prophets and priests are so often named together (comp. xxix. 9, 10).

[b] In ver. 10, read "some days over a year shall ye be troubled."

[c] The reference to "the book of Jehovah," ver. 16 as containing this prediction, deserves notice. As the

As xxxiv. has a general sense, so xxxv. indicates in general terms the deliverance of Israel as if out of captivity, rejoicing in their secure and happy march through the wilderness. It may be doubted whether the description is meant to apply to any deliverance out of temporal captivity, closely as the imagery approaches that of the second part. It rather seems to picture the march of the spiritual Israel to her eternal Zion (Heb. xii. 22).

11. xxxvii.–xxxix. — At length the season so often, though no doubt obscurely foretold, arrived. The Assyrian was near with forces apparently irresistible. In the universal consternation which ensued, all the hope of the state centred upon Isaiah; the highest functionaries of the state, — Shebna too, — wait upon him in the name of their sovereign, confessing that they were now in the very extremity of danger (xxxvii. 3), and entreating his prayers; — a signal token this, of the approved fidelity of the prophet in the ministry which he had so long exercised. The short answer which Jehovah gave through him was, that the Assyrian king should hear intelligence which would send him back to his own land, there to perish. The event shows that the intelligence pointed to was that of the destruction of his army. Accordingly Hezekiah communicated to Sennacherib, now at Libnah, his refusal to submit, expressing his assurance of being protected by Jehovah (comp. ver. 10). This drew from the Assyrian king a letter of defiance against Jehovah himself, as being no more able to defend Jerusalem, than other tutelary gods had been to defend the countries which he had conquered. On Hezekiah spreading this letter before Jehovah in the Temple for him to read and answer (ver. 17), Isaiah was commissioned to send a fuller reply to the pious king (21–35), the manifest object of which was the more completely to signalize, especially to God's own people themselves, the meaning of the coming event.[a] How the deliverance was to be effected, Isaiah was not commissioned to tell; but the very next night (2 K. xix. 35) brought the appalling fulfillment. A divine interposition so marvelous, so evidently miraculous, was in its magnificence worthy of being the kernel of Isaiah's whole book: it is indeed that without which the whole book falls to pieces, but with which it forms a well-organized whole (comp. l's. lxxvi., xlvi., xlviii.).

Chs. xxxviii., xxxix. chronologically precede the two previous ones;[b] but there seems to be a twofold purpose in this arrangement: one ethical, to illustrate God's discipline exercised over his most favored servants, and the other literary, to introduce by the prediction of the Babylonian Captivity the second part of the book. As the two preceding chapters look back upon the prediction of the first part, and therefore stand even before xxxviii., so xxxix. looks forward to the subsequent prophesyings, and is therefore placed immediately before them.[c]

12. The last 27 chapters form a prophecy, whose coherence of structure and unity of authorship are generally admitted even by those who deny that it was written by Isaiah. The point of time and situation from which the prophet here speaks, is for the most part that of the Captivity in Babylon (comp., e. g., lxiv. 10, 11). But this is adopted on a principle already noted as characterizing "vision," namely, that the prophet sees the future as if present. That the present with the prophet in this section was imagined and not real, is indicated by the specification of sins which are rebuked; as neglect of sacrifices (xliii. 22–24), unacceptable sacrifices (lxvi. 3), various idolatries (lvii. 3–10) ixv. 3, 4); sins belonging to a period before the exile, and not to the exile itself.[d] But that this imagined time and place should be maintained through so long a composition, is unquestionably a remarkable phenomenon. It is, however, explained by the fact, that the prophet in these later prophesyings is a writer rather than a public speaker, writing for the edification of God's people in those future days of the approach of which Isaiah was aware. For the punishment of exile had been of old denounced in case of disobedience even by Moses himself (Lev. xxvi. 31–35), and thus contemplated by Solomon (1 K. viii. 46–50); moreover, Isaiah had himself often realized and predicted it, with reference repeatedly to Babylon in particular (xxxix. 6, 7, xxvii. 12, 13, xxi. 2, 10, xiv. 2, 3, xi. 11, 12, vi. 11, 12); which was also done by Micah (iv. 10, vii. 12, 13). Apart therefore from the immediate suggestion of an inspiring afflatus, it was a thought already fixed in Isaiah's mind by a chain of foregoing revelations, that the Hebrews would be deported to Babylon, and that too within a generation or two. We dwell upon this, because it must prophet's spoken word was "the word of Jehovah," so his written word is here called "the book of Jehovah." It shows Isaiah's estimate of his prophetical writings. So xxx. 8 points to an enduring record in which he was to deposit his testimony concerning Egypt. (In xxx. 9, for "That this is," etc., read "Because this is," etc.)

a How like Isaiah's style the whole passage is! xxxvii. 26 refers to the numerous predictions of Asshur's conquests and overthrow found in preceding parts of the book (comp. xliv. 8; xlvi. 9–11, &c.). Comp. ver. 27 with xli. 2. "Sign" in ver 30, as in vii. 14–16; — There must be a remnant; therefore ye shall now be delivered. For further explanation, Ewald refers to the law in Lev. xxv. 5, 11: "Your condition this year will be like that of a Sabbath year; next year (the land being even then not quite cleared of invaders) like that of the jubilee year: as at the jubilee the Hebrew commonwealth starts afresh, restored to its proper condition, so now reformation, the fruit of affliction, shall introduce better days" (ver. 31).

b For Hezekiah's sickness was 15 years before his death, whereas the destruction of Sennacherib's army (so chronologers determine) occurred 12 or 13 years before the same date.

c Since xxxviii. 9–20 is not in 2 K., and on the other hand in 2 K. are found many touches not found in Is. (e. g 2 K. xviii. 14–16; xx. 4, 5, 9, &c.), critics are generally agreed that neither account was drawn from the other, but both of them from the record mentioned in 2 Chr. xxxii. 32 as "the vision of Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz, (found) in (not, as in A. V., 'and in') the book of the kings of Judah and Israel"; which record Isaiah adopted with modifications into the compilation of his prophecies.

d As it is for the benefit of God's own people that Isaiah writes, and not to affect heathen nations to whom he had no commission, the arguing against idolatry, of which we have so much in this part, is to be ascribed to idolatrous tendencies among the Hebrews themselves, which ceased at the Captivity; for the deportation probably (Hengst.) affected chiefly the best disposed of the nation, especially the priests, of whom there appears to have been a disproportionate number both among those who were exiled and those who returned.

be acknowledged, and we have already made the remark, that "vision" even in its most heightened form still adapted itself more or less to the previous mental condition of the seer. We can understand, therefore, how Isaiah might be led to write prophesyings, such as should serve as his ministerial bequest to his people when the hour of their captivity should have fallen upon them.

This same fact, namely, that the prophet is here, in the undisturbed retirement of his chamber, giving us a written prophecy, and not recording, as in the early part of the book, spoken discourses, goes far to explain the greater profusion of words, and the clearer, more flowing, and more complete exposition of thoughts, which generally characterize this second part; whereas the first part frequently exhibits great abruptness, and a close compression and terseness of diction, at times almost enigmatical — as an indignant man might speak among gainsayers from whom little was to be hoped. This difference of style, so far as it exists (for it has been greatly exaggerated), may be further ascribed to the difference of purpose; for here Isaiah generally appears as the tender and compassionate comforter of the pious and afflicted; whereas before he appears rather as accuser and denouncer. There exists after all sufficient similarity of diction to indicate Isaiah's hand (see Keil's Einleitung, § 72, note 7).

This second part falls into three sections, each, as it happens, consisting of nine chapters; the two first end with the refrain, "There is no peace, saith Jehovah (or "my God"), to the wicked;" and the third with the same thought amplified.

(1.) The first section (xl.–xlviii.) has for its main topic the comforting assurance of the deliverance from Babylon by Koresh (Cyrus) who is even named twice (xli. 2, 3, 25, xliv. 28, xlv. 1–4, 13, xlvi. 11, xlviii. 14, 15).[a] This section abounds with arguments against idolatry, founded mainly (not wholly, see the noble passage xliv. 9–20) upon the gift of prediction possessed by Jehovah's prophets, especially as shown by their predicting Cyrus, and even naming him (xli. 26, xliv. 8, 24–26, xlv. 4, 19, 21, xlvi. 8–11, xlviii. 3–8, 15). Idols and heathen diviners are taunted with not being able to predict (xli. 1–7, 21–24, xliii. 8–13, xlv. 20–21, xlvi. 10–13). This power of foretelling the future, as shown in this instance, is insisted upon as the test of divinity.[b] It is of importance to observe, in reference to the prophet's standing-point in this second part, that in speaking both of the Captivity in Babylon and of the deliverance out of it, there is (excepting Cyrus's name) no specification of particular circumstances, such as we might expect to find if the writer had written at the end of the exile; the delineation is of a general kind, borrowed frequently from the history of Moses and Joshua. Let it be observed, in particular, that the language respecting the wilderness (e. g. xli. 17–20), through which the redeemed were to pass, is unmistakably ideal and symbolical.

It is characteristic of sacred prophecy in general, that the "vision" of a great deliverance leads the seer to glance at the great deliverance to come through Jesus Christ. This association of ideas is found in several passages in the first part of Isaiah, in which the destruction of the Assyrian army suggests the thought of Christ (e. g. x. 24–xi. 16, xxxi. 8–xxxii. 2). This principle of association prevails in the second part taken as a whole; but in the first section, taken apart, it appears as yet imperfectly. However, xlii. 1–7 is a clear prediction of the Messiah, and that too as viewed in part in contrast with Cyrus; for the "servant" of Jehovah is meek and gentle (ver. 2, 3), and will establish the true religion in the earth (ver. 4). Nevertheless, since the prophet regards the two deliverances as referable to the same type of thought (comp. lxi. 1–3), so the announcement of one (xl. 3–5) is held by all the four Evangelists, and by John Baptist himself, as predictive of the announcement of the other.[c]

(2.) The second section (xlix.–lvii.) is distinguished from the first by several features. The person of Cyrus as well as his name, and the specification of Babylon (named in the first section four times) and of its gods, and of the Chaldæans (named before five times), disappear altogether. Return from exile is indeed repeatedly spoken of and at length (xlix. 9–26, li. 9–lii. 12, lv. 12, 13, lvii. 14); but in such general terms as admit of being applied to the spiritual and Messianic, as well as to the literal restoration. And that the Messianic restoration (whether a spiritual restoration or not) is principally intended, is clear from the connection of the restoration promised in xlix. 9–25 with the Messiah portrayed in xlix. 1–8;[d] from the description of the suffering Christ (in l. 5, 6) in the midst of the promise of deliverance (l. 1–11); from the same description in lii. 13–liii. 12, between the passages li. 1–lii. 12, and liv. 1–17; and from the exhibition of Christ in lv. 4 (connected in ver. 3 with the Messianic promise given to David), forming the foundation on which is raised the promise of lv. 3–13. Comp. also the interpretation of liv. 13 given by Christ himself in John vi. 45, and that of lxi. 1–3 in Luke iv. 18. In fact the place of Cyrus in the first section is in this second section held by his greater Antitype.[e]

(3.) In the third section (lviii.–lxvi.) as Cyrus

---

[a] The point has been argued for, and the evidence seems satisfactory (Hävernick, Hengst.), that Koresh, a word meaning Sun, was commonly in the East, and particularly in Persia, a title of princes, and that it was assumed by Cyrus, whose original name was Agradates, on his ascending the throne. It stands, however, in history as his own proper name. This instance of particularizing in prophecy is paralleled by the specification of Josiah's name (1 K. xiii. 2) some 350 years before his time.

[b] It is difficult to acquit the passages above cited of impudent and indeed suicidal mendacity, if they were not written before Cyrus appeared on the political scene.

[c] For the discussion and refutation of all expositions which understand by "the servant of Jehovah" here or in the second section, the Jewish people, or the pious among them, or the prophetical order, or some other object than the Messiah, comp. Hengstenberg's Christology, vol. ii.

[d] In this passage Christ is called "Israel," as the concentration and consummation of the covenant-people — as he in whom its idea is to be realized.

[e] That Jesus of Nazareth is the object which in "vision" the prophet saw in l. 6, and in lii. 13, liii. 12 (connecting lii. 13 with liii. 12 as one passage), will hardly be questioned amongst ourselves, except by those whose minds are prepossessed by the notion that predictive revelation is inconceivable. Meanwhile all will acknowledge the truth of Ewald's remark: "In the Servant of Jahve, who so vividly hovers before his view, the prophet discerns a new clear light shed abroad over all possible situations of that time; in him he finds the balm of consolation, the cheer of nowhere appears, so neither does "Jehovah's servant" occur so frequently to view as in the second. The only delineation of the latter is in lxi. 1–3 and in lxiii. 1–6, 9. He no longer appears as suffering, but only as saving and avenging Zion." The section is mainly occupied with various practical exhortations founded upon the views of the future already set forth. In the second the parænesis is almost all consoling, taking in lv. 1–7 the form of advice; only in lii. and towards the close in lvi. 9–lvii. 14 is the language accusing and minatory. In this third section, on the other hand, the prophesying is very much in this last-named strain (cf. lviii. 1–7, lix. 1–8, lxv. 1–16, lxvi. 1–6, 15–17, 24); taking the form of national self-bewailment in lix. 9–15 and lxiii. 15–lxiv. 12. Still, interspersed in this admonition, accusation, and threatening, there are gleams, and even bright tracts, of more cheering matter; besides the conditional promises as arguments for well-doing in lviii. 8 14 and lxvi. 1, 2, we have the long passage of general and unconditional promise in lix. 20–lxiii. 6, and the shorter ones lxv. 17–25, lxvi. 7–14, 18–23; and in some of these passages the future of Zion is depicted with brighter coloring than almost anywhere before in the whole book. But on the whole the predominant feature of this section is exhortation with the view, as it should seem, of qualifying men to receive the promised blessings. There was to be "no peace for the wicked," but only for those who turned from ungodliness in Jacob; and therefore the prophet in such various forms of exhortations urges the topic of repentance, — promising, advising, leading to confession (lxiv. 6–12; comp. Hos. xiv. 2, 3), warning, threatening. In reference to the sins especially selected for rebuke, we find specified idolatry lxv. 3, 4, 11, lxvi. 17 (as in the second section lvii. 3–10), bloodshedding, and injustice (lix. 1–15), selfishness (lxv. 5), and merely outward and ceremonial religiousness (lxvi. 1–3). If it were not for the place given to idolatry, we might suppose with Dr. Henderson that the spirit of God is already by prophetic anticipation rebuking the Judaism of the time of Jesus Christ, — so accurately in many places are its features delineated as denounced in the N. T. But the specification of idolatry leads us to seek for the immediate objects of this parænesis in the prophet's own time, when indeed the Pharisaism displayed in the N. T. already existed, being in fact in all ages the natural product of an unconverted, unspiritual heart combining with the observance of a positive religion, and in all ages (comp. e. g. Ps. l.) antagonistic to true piety.

While we can clearly discern certain dominant thoughts and aims in each of these three sections, we must not, however, expect to find them pursued with the regularity which we look for in a modern sermon; such treatment is wholly alien from the spirit of prophecy, which always more or less is in the strict sense of the word desultory. Accordingly we find in these, as in the earlier portions of the book, the transitions sudden, and the exhortation every now and then varied by dramatic interlocution, by description, by odes of thanksgiving, by prayers.

III. Numberless attacks have been made by German critics upon the integrity of the whole book, different critics pronouncing different portions of the first part spurious, and many concurring to reject the second part altogether. A few observations, particularly on this latter point, appear there fore to be necessary.

1. The first writer who ever breathed a suspicion that Isaiah was not the author of the last twenty seven chapters was Koppe, in remarks upon ch. l., in his German translation of Lowth's Isaiah, published in the years 1779–1781. This was presently after followed up by Diederlein, especially in his Latin translation and commentary in 1789; by Eichhorn, who in a later period most fully developed his views on this point in his Hebräischen Propheten, 1816–1819; and the most fully and effectively by Justi. The majority of the German critics have given in their adhesion to these views: as Paulus (1793), Bertholdt (1812), De Wette (1817), Gesenius (1820, 1821), Hitzig (1833), Knobel (1838), Umbreit and Ewald (1841). Defenders of the integrity of the book have not, however, been wanting — particularly Jahn in his Einleitung (1802); Möller in his De Authentiâ Oraculorum Jesaiæ (Copenhagen, 1825); Kleinert in his Echtheit des Jesaias (1829); Hengstenberg in his Christology, vol. ii.; Hävernick, Einleitung, B. iii. (1849); Stier in his Jesaias nicht Pseudo-Jesaias (1850); and Keil, Einleitung (1853), in which last the reader will find a most satisfactory compendium of the controversy and of the grounds for the generally received view.

2. The catalogue of authors who gainsay Isaiah's authorship of this second part is, in point of numbers, of critical ability, and of profound Hebrew scholarship, sufficiently imposing. Nevertheless when we come to inquire into their grounds of objection, we soon cease to attach much value to this formidable array of authorities. The circumstance mainly urged by them is the unquestionable fact that the author has to a considerable view taken his standing-point at the close of the Babylonish Captivity as if that were his present, and from thence looks forward into the subsequent future. Now is it possible (they ask) that in such a manner and to such a degree a Seer should step out of his own time, and plant his foot so firmly in a later time? We must grant (they urge) that he might gaze upon a future not very distant, as if present, and represent it accordingly; but in the case before us infallible insight and prescience must be predicated of him; for this idea of an Isaiah who knows even Cyrus's name was not realized for two centuries later, and a chance hit is here out of the question. "This, however, is inconceivable. A prophet's prescience must be limited to the notion of foreboding (Ahnung), and to the deductions from patent facts taken in combination with real or supposed truths. Prophets were bounded like other men by the horizon of their own age; they borrowed the object of their soothsaying from their everlasting hope, the weapon wherewith to combat and shame down those who understand not the time, the means of impressive exhortation. And if in this long piece (xl.–lxvi.) a multitude of very diverse weighty thoughts emerge into view, yet this is the dominant thought which binds everything together" (Propheten, ii. p 407.

[a] Restoration from captivity is spoken of in lviii. 12, lxi. 4–7, lxii. 4, 5, 10; but for the most part in such general terms as might easily be understood as referring to spiritual restoration only; but since the literal restoration pre-required repentance, this exhortation may be taken with a reference to literal restoration as well.

present; and excited by the relations of their present they spoke to their contemporaries of what affected other people's minds or their own, occupying themselves only with that future whose rewards or punishments were likely to reach their contemporaries. For exegesis the position is impregnable, that the prophetic writings are to be interpreted in each case out of the relations belonging to the time of the prophet; and from this follows as a corollary the critical Canon: that that time, those time-relations, out of which a prophetic writer is explained, are his time, his time-relations; — to that time he must be referred as the date of his own existence" (Hitzig, p. 463–468).

3. This is the main argument. Other grounds which are alleged are confessedly "secondary and external," and are really of no great weight. The most important of these is founded upon the difference in the complexion of style which has already been noticed; this point will come into view again presently. A number of particulars of diction said to be non-Isaianic have been accumulated; but the reasoning founded upon them has been satisfactorily met by opposing evidence of a similar kind (see Keil, Einleitung, § 72) It is not, however, on such considerations that the chief stress is laid by the impugners of the Isaianic authorship of this portion of Scripture: the great ground of objection is, as already stated, the incompatibility of those phenomena of prediction which are noted in the writings in question, with the subjective theories of inspiration (or rather non-inspiration) which the reader has just had submitted to him. The incompatibility is confessed. But where is the solution of the difficulty to be sought? Are those theories so certainly true that all evidence must give way to them? This is not the place for combating them: but, for our own part, we are so firmly convinced that the theory is utterly discredited by the facts exhibited to us in the Bible throughout, that we are content to lack in this case the countenance of its upholders. Their judgment in the critical question before us is determined, not by their scholarship, but avowedly by the prepossessions of their unbelief.

4. For our present purpose it must suffice briefly to indicate the following reasons as establishing the integrity of the whole book, and as vindicating the authenticity of the second part: —

(a.) Externally. — The unanimous testimony of Jewish and Christian tradition — Ecclus. xlviii. 24 25, which manifestly (in the words παρεκάλεσε τοὺς πενθοῦντας ἐν Σιών and ὑπέδειξε — τὰ ὑπόκρυφα πρὶν ἢ παραγενέσθαι αὐτά) refers to this second part. The use apparently made of the second part by Jeremiah (x. 1–16, v. 25, xxv. 31, l., li.), Ezekiel (xxiii. 40, 41), and Zephaniah (ii. 15, iii. 10). The decree of Cyrus in Ezr. i. 2–4, which plainly is founded upon Is. xliv. 28, xlv. 1, 13, accrediting Josephus's statement (Ant. xi. 1, § 2) that the Jews showed Cyrus Isaiah's predictions of him. The inspired testimony of the N. T., which often (Matt. iii. 3 and the parallel passages; Luke iv. 17; Acts viii. 28; Rom. x. 16, 20) quotes with specification of Isaiah's name prophecies found in the second part.

(b.) Internally. — The unity of design and construction which, as we have seen, connects these last twenty-seven chapters with the preceding parts of the book. — The oneness of diction which pervades the whole book. — The peculiar elevation and grandeur of style, which, as is universally acknowledged, distinguishes the whole contents of the second part as much as of the first, and which assigns their composition to the golden age of Hebrew literature. — The absence of any other name than Isaiah's claiming the authorship. At the time to which the composition is assigned, a Zechariah or a Malachi could gain a separate name and book; how was it that an author of such transcendent gifts, as "the Great Unnamed" who wrote xl.–lxvi., could gain none? — The claims which the writer makes to the *fore*knowledge of the deliverance by Cyrus, which claims, on the opposing view, must be regarded as a fraudulent personation of an earlier writer. — Lastly, the predictions which it contains of the character, sufferings, death, and glorification of Jesus Christ: a believer in Christ cannot fail to regard those predictions as affixing to this second part the broad seal of Divine Inspiration; whereby the chief ground of objection against its having been written by Isaiah is at once annihilated.[a]

IV. It remains to make a few observations on

[a] * In the critical discussions respecting the prophecies ascribed to Isaiah, the language which has sometimes been used has led to a misapprehension of the real question at issue. Such terms as "spurious," "Pseudo-Isaiah," have been very naturally understood as implying that the portions so designated are regarded as unworthy of a place among the writings of the Hebrew Prophets, or even as the work of fraud. But this has not been generally, if ever, intended by those who have used such expressions. The question is essentially one of authorship and date; it does not necessarily affect the value, the inspiration, or the canonicity of the portions of Scripture under consideration. Take, for example, the last 27 chapters of Isaiah. Whoever was the author of that wonderful composition, it shines by its own light; and its splendor is not lessened by the supposition that the name of the writer, like that of the Book of Job, must remain unknown. If he were not the Isaiah who wrote the earlier prophecies which have been collected in the same volume, we have two great prophets instead of one. His lofty strains of exhortation, warning, and consolation do not lose their power when we consider them specially adapted to the condition of his immediate contemporaries, rather than designed for the edification of the people 150 years or more after the death of the author. Those who feel compelled from internal evidence to ascribe the latter part of Isaiah to a writer who flourished in the time of the Captivity, do not on that account value the work the less, but regard this view of it as investing it with new interest Thus Dr. Noyes calls the author "the greatest of all the Jewish prophets" (New Trans. of the Hebrew Prophets, 4th ed., i. p. xli.); Dean Stanley speaks of these chapters as "the most deeply inspired, the most truly Evangelical, of any portion of the Prophetical writings, whatever be their date, and whoever their author" (Hist. of the Jewish Church, ii. 637); and Dean Milman remarks: "It is well known that the later chapters of Isaiah are attributed, by the common consent of most of the profoundly learned writers of Germany . . . to a different writer, whom they call the great nameless Prophet, or the second Isaiah, who wrote during the exile. I must acknowledge that these chapters, in my judgment, read with infinitely greater force, sublimity, and reality under this view. If they lose, and I hardly feel that they do lose, in what is commonly called prophetic, they rise far more in historical interest. . . . As to what are usually called the Messianic predictions . . . they have the same force and meaning, whether uttered by one or two prophets, at one or two different periods

Isaiah's style; though in truth the abundance of the materials which offer themselves makes it a difficult matter to give anything like a just and definite view of the subject, without trespassing unduly upon the limits necessarily prescribed to us. On this point we cannot do better than introduce some of the remarks with which Ewald prefaces his translation of such parts of the book as he is disposed to acknowledge as Isaiah's (Propheten, i. 166–179): —

"In Isaiah we see prophetic authorship reaching its culminating point. Everything conspired to raise him to an elevation to which no prophet either before or after could as writer attain. Among the other prophets, each of the more important ones is distinguished by some one particular excellence, and some one peculiar talent: in Isaiah, all kinds of talent and all beauties of prophetic discourse meet together so as mutually to temper and qualify each other; it is not so much any single feature that distinguishes him as the symmetry and perfection of the whole.

"We cannot fail to assume, as the first condition of Isaiah's peculiar historical greatness, a native power and a vivacity of spirit, which even among prophets is seldom to be met with. It is but rarely that we see combined in one and the same spirit the three several characteristics of — first, the most profound prophetic excitement and the purest sentiment; next, the most indefatigable and successful practical activity amidst all perplexities and changes of outward life; and, thirdly, that facility and beauty in representing thought which is the prerogative of the genuine poet: but this threefold combination we find realized in Isaiah as in no other prophet; and from the traces which we can perceive of the unceasing joint-working of these three powers we must draw our conclusions as to the original greatness of his genius. — Both as prophet and as author Isaiah stands upon that calm, sunny height, which in each several branch of ancient literature one eminently favored spirit at the right time takes possession of; which seems as it were to have been waiting for him; and which, when he has come and mounted the ascent, seems to keep and guard him to the last as its own right man. In the sentiments which he expresses, in the topics of his discourses, and in the manner of expression, Isaiah uniformly reveals himself as the Kingly Prophet.

"In reference to the last named point, it cannot be said that his manner of representing thought is elaborate and artificial: it rather shows a lofty simplicity and an unconcern about external attractiveness, abandoning itself freely to the leading and requirement of each several thought; but nevertheless it always rolls along in a full stream which overpowers all resistance, and never fails at the right place to accomplish at every turn its object without toil or effort.

"The progress and development of the discourse is always majestic, achieving much with few words, which though short are yet clear and transparent; an overflowing, swelling fullness of thought, which might readily lose itself in the vast and indefinite, but which always at the right time with tight rein collects and tempers its exuberance; to the bottom exhausting the thought and completing the utterance, and yet never too diffuse. This severe self-control is the most admirably seen in those shorter utterances, which, by briefly sketched images and thoughts, give us the vague apprehension of something infinite, whilst nevertheless they stand before us complete in themselves and clearly delineated; e. g., viii. 6–ix. 6, xiv. 29–32, xviii. 1–7, xxi. 11, 12; while in the long piece, xxviii.–xxxii., if the composition here and there for a moment languishes, it is only to lift itself up again afresh with all the greater might. In this rich and thickly crowded fullness of thought and word, it is but seldom that the simile which is employed appears apart, to set forth and complete itself (xxxi. 4, 5): in general, it crowds into the delineation of the object which it is meant to illustrate and is swallowed up in it, — aye, and frequently simile after simile; and yet the many threads of the discourse which for a moment appeared ravelled together soon disentangle themselves into perfect clearness: — a characteristic which belongs to this prophet alone, a freedom of language which with no one else so easily succeeds.

"The versification in like manner is always full, and yet strongly marked: while however this prophet is little concerned about anxiously weighing out to each verse its proper number of words; not unfrequently he repeats the same word in two members (xxxi. 8, xxxii. 17, xi. 5, xiv. 13), as if, with so much power and beauty in the matter within, he did not so much require a painstaking finish in the outside. The structure of the strophe is always easy and beautifully rounded.

"Still the main point lies here, — that we cannot in the case of Isaiah, as in that of other prophets, specify any particular peculiarity, or any favorite (Hist. of the Jews, i. 462, note, new Amer. ed.). Davidson, in his Introduction to the Old Testament (iii. 59), after a full discussion of the authorship, concludes as follows: "Among all the prophetic writings, the first place in many respects is due to those of the younger Isaiah. . . . None has announced in such strains as his the downfall of all earthly powers; or [so] unfolded to the view of the afflicted the transcendent glory of Jehovah's salvation which should arise upon the remnant of Israel, forsaken and persecuted. None has penetrated so far into the essence of the new dispensation. . . . There is unjesty in his sentiments, beauty and force in his language, propriety and elegance in his imagery." Delitzsch, one of the most orthodox and conservative of the modern German theologians, in his elaborate article on Isaiah in Fairbairn's Imperial Bible Dictionary, maintains that all the prophecies in the book which bears the name of Isaiah are correctly ascribed to him: but also remarks that, on the contrary supposition, "the prophetic discourses ch. xl.–lxvi. would not necessarily lose anything of their predictive character and of their incomparable value. Their anonymous author might pass henceforward, also, as the greatest evangelist of the Old Testament. We have no doctrinal reasons which would forbid us to distinguish in the book of Isaiah prophecies of Isaiah himself, and prophecies of anonymous prophets annexed to these." (Fairbairn, i. 805, 806.) He had before spoken of the composite character of the historical books of the Old Testament, and of the book of Proverbs, "where, under the name of Solomon, the gnomic pearls of different times and of several authors are arranged beside one another, just as in the Psalter the poets of many centuries are collected under the banner of David, the father of lyric poetry." So Prof. Stuart observes, "It is of little or no theological or doctrinal importance which way this question is decided" (Crit. Hist. of the Old Test Canon, p. 109). On this subject see also the excellent remarks of Stanley, in his Note "On the Authorship of the Books of the Old Testament," appended to vol. ii of his History of the Jewish Church. A.

color as attaching to his genera. style. He is not the especially lyrical prophet, or the especially elegiacal prophet, or the especially oratorical and hortatory prophet, as we should describe a Joel, a Hosea, a Micah, with whom there is a greater prevalence of some particular color; but, just as the subject requires, he has readily at command every several kind of style and every several change of delineation; and it is precisely this that, in point of language, establishes his greatness, as well as in general forms one of his most towering points of excellence. His only fundamental peculiarity is the lofty, majestic calmness of his style, proceeding out of the perfect command which he feels he possesses over his subject-matter. This calmness, however, no way demands that the strain shall not, when occasion requires, be more vehemently excited and assail the hearer with mightier blows: but even the extremest excitement, which does here and there intervene, is in the main bridled still by the same spirit of calmness, and, not overstepping the limits which that spirit assigns, it soon with lofty self-control returns back to its wonted tone of equability (ii. 10–iii. 1, xxviii. 11–23, xxix. 9–14). Neither does this calmness in discourse require that the subject shall always be treated only in a plain, level way, without any variation of form; rather, Isaiah shows himself master in just that variety of manner which suits the relation in which his hearers stand to the matter now in hand. If he wishes to bring home to their minds a distant truth which they like not to hear, and to judge them by a sentence pronounced by their own mouth, he retreats back into a popular statement of a case drawn from ordinary life (vv. 1–6, xxviii. 23–29). If he will draw the attention of the over-wise to some new truth, or to some future prospect, he surprises them by a brief oracle clothed in an enigmatical dress, leaving it to their penetration to discover its solution (vii. 14–16, xxix. 1–8). When the unhappy temper of people's minds which nothing can amend leads to loud lamentation, his speech becomes for a while the strain of elegy and lament (i. 21–23, xxii. 4, 5). Do the frivolous leaders of the people mock? — he outdoes them at their own weapons, and crushes them under the fearful earnest of divine mockery (xxviii. 10–13). Even a single ironical word in passing will drop from the lofty prophet (xvii. 3, glory). Thus his discourse varies into every complexion: it is tender and stern, didactic and threatening, mourning and again exulting in divine joy, mocking and earnest; but ever at the right time it returns back to its original elevation and repose, and never loses the clear ground-color of its divine seriousness."

In this delineation of Isaiah's style, Ewald contemplates exclusively the Isaiah of i.–xxxix., in which part of the book itself, however, there are several passages of which he will not allow Isaiah to be the author. These are the following: xii., xiii. 2–xiv. 23, xxi. 1–10, xxiv.–xxvii., xxxiv., xxxv. In reference to all these passages, with the exception of the first, the ground of objection is obvious upon a moment's observation of the contents; on rationalistic views of prophecy, none of them can be ascribed to Isaiah. For the proof of their genuineness it is sufficient to refer to Drechsler's Prophet Jesaja, or to Keil's Einleitung. We cannot, however, help noticing the estimate which the honesty of Ewald's æsthetical judgment forms of the style of nearly all these passages. He pronounces the magnificent denunciation of Babylon, xiii. 2–xiv. 23, to be referable to the same author as the prediction of Babylon's overthrow in xxi. 1–10, and both as alike remarkable for "the poetical facility of the words, images, and sentiments,' particularizing xiv. 5–20 especially as "an ode of high poetical finish," which in the last strophe (vv. 20–23) rises to "prophetical sublimity." In xxiv.–xxvii. he finds parts, particularly the "beautiful utterances" in xxv. 6–8, xxvii. 9, 12, 13, which he considers as plainly borrowed from oracles which are now lost; while lastly, in xxxiv., xxxv. (which in his 20th lecture on Hebrew poetry Bishop Lowth selects for particular comment on account of its peculiar poetical merit), he traces much that "reëchoes words of the genuine Isaiah."

If we refer to that part of Ewald's Propheten which treats of xl.–lxvi., which he ascribes to "the Great Unnamed," the terms in which he speaks of its style of composition do not fall far short of those which he has employed respecting the former part. "Creative as this prophet is in his views and thoughts, he is not less peculiar and new in his language, which at times is highly inspired, and carries away the reader with a wonderful power. — Although, after the general manner of the later prophets, the discourse is apt to be too diffuse in delineation; yet, on the other side, it often moves confusedly and heavily, owing to the over-gushing fullness of fresh thoughts continually streaming in. But whenever it rises to a higher strain, as e. g., xl., xli. 1–4, it then attains to such a pure luminous sublimity, and carries the hearer away with such a wonderful charm of diction, that one might be ready to fancy he was listening to another prophet altogether, if other grounds did not convince us that it is one and the same prophet speaking, only in different moods of feeling. In no prophet does the mood in the composition of particular passages so much vary, as throughout the three several sections into which this part of the book is divided, while under vehement excitement the prophet pursues the most diverse objects. It is his business at different times, to comfort, to exhort, to shame, to chasten: to show, as out of heaven, the heavenly image of the Servant of the Lord, and, in contrast, to scourge the folly and base groveling of image-worship; to teach what conduct the times require, and to rebuke those who linger behind the occasion, and then also to draw them along by his own example — his prayers, confessions, and thanksgivings, thus smoothing for them the approach to the exalted object of the New Time. Thus the complexion of the style, although hardly anywhere passing into the representation of visions properly so called, varies in a constant interchange; and rightly to recognize these changes is the great problem for the interpretation" (Propheten, vol. ii. 407–409).

For obvious reasons we have preferred citing the æsthetical judgments of so accomplished a critic as Ewald, to attempting any original criticism of our own; and this all the more willingly, because the inference to be drawn from the above cited passages (the reader will please especially to mark the sentences which we have put into italics) is clear, that in point of style, after taking account of the considerations already stated by us, we can find no difficulty in recognizing in the second part the presence of the same plastic genius as we discover in the first. And, altogether, the æsthetic criticism of all the different parts of the book brings us to the conclusion substantiated by the evidence previously accumulated; namely, that the whole of the book originated in one mind, and that mind one of the most sublime and variously gifted instruments which the Spirit of God has ever employed to pour forth its voice upon the world.

V. The following are the most important works on Isaiah: Vitringa's Commentarius in Librum Prophetarum Isaiæ, 2 vols. fol. 1714, a vast mine of materials; Rosenmüller's Scholia, 1818–1820 [3d ed., 1829–34],-or his somewhat briefer Scholia in Compendium redacta, 1831, which, though rationalistic, is [are] sober, and valuable in particular for the full use which he makes of Jerome and the Jewish expositors; Gesenius's Philologisch-kritischer und historischer Commentar, 1821 [and Uebersetzung, 2e Aufl., 1829]; Hitzig's Prophet Jesaja übersetzt und ausgelegt, 1833, and Knobel, 1843 [3d ed. 1861], in the Kurzgefasztes Exegetisches Handbuch zum Alt. Testam., which are all three decidedly skeptical, but for lexical and historical materials are of very great value; Ewald's Propheten des Alten Bundes [1840–41, 2e Ausg. 1867–68], which, though likewise skeptical, is absolutely indispensable for a just appreciation of the poetry; the second volume of Hengstenberg's Christology, translated in Clark's Foreign Theological Library, 1856; Drechsler's Prophet Jesaja über setzt und erklärt, now in course of publication [completed after the author's death by F. Delitzsch and A. Hahn, 3 Theile, 1845–57], and Rud. Stier's Jesaias nicht Pseudo-Jesaias, 1850–51, which is a commentary on the last 27 chapters. The two chief English works are Bishop Lowth's Isaiah, a new translation, with Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory, 1778 [13th ed., 1842], (whose incessant correction of the Hebrew text is constantly to be mistrusted), and Dr. Ebenezer Henderson's Translation and Commentary, 2d ed., 1857. E. H. S.

* The strong internal evidence of the common origin of the various writings attributed to Isaiah is of a cumulative character, and (especially as requiring often for its just presentation the aid of exegesis) can only be adequately exhibited at considerable length. A few of the more prominent points of the argument, in addition to those above given, may be here alluded to.

It is a consideration of no little weight, that many of the representations which are most strikingly characteristic of the second part are but further developments of thoughts that are more or less clearly suggested in the first. Thus the Captivity and the restoration, so largely and variously dwelt upon in the disputed portions, are distinctly predicted in ch. vi. 11–13, as well as intimated in other passages of which Isaiah is unhesitatingly admitted to be the author. Even the view presented of the Servant of Jehovah, which is perhaps the most distinctive feature of the second part, and which, combining as it does elements at first sight wholly irreconcilable with one another,[a] has always been the stumbling-block of expositors, is, when rightly regarded, but a further unfolding of the conception which Gesenius, Ewald, and Knobel find in ch. xi. of the organic relation subsisting between the (ideal) Messiah and his people — the same conception, substantially, which Ewald, Hitzig, and Knobel find in viii. 8 and ix. 6, and which Ewald recognizes even in vii. 14.

In xliv. 28–xlv. 13 we find the thought expanded and applied to Cyrus which occurs in another form with a different application in x. 5–7. Compare here also xlvi. 11, liv. 16. The elements of the representation of the new heaven and the new earth in lxv. 17–25 are found in xi. 6–9 and elsewhere.

The magnificent representations, ch. lx. and elsewhere, of the glory of Jehovah being made the light and the defense of his people, have their germ in iv. 5.

In like manner the predictions in xliii. 6, xlix. 22, and lxvi. 20 are foreshadowed in xiv. 1,2.[b] Compare also xlv. 9–11 with xix. 25, and xxix. 23; xliv 9–20 with ii. 8; lxiii. 17 with vi. 10.

One of the most prominent characteristics of style, binding together the various portions of the book, is the frequent occurrence of the expression, The Holy One of Israel. This designation of Jehovah is found out of Isaiah but six times: 2 K. xix. 22; Ps. lxxi. 22, lxxviii. 41, lxxxix. 18; Jer. l. 29, li. 5. In the first of these passages it is put into the mouth of Isaiah himself. In the passages of Jeremiah, the whole intermediate context exhibits an expansion of the thoughts of Isaiah, sometimes presented even in his own language, yet in such a manner as to suggest that Jeremiah was not (as Hengstenberg affirms) imitating, but only writing with the impression full upon his mind of the utterances of his great predecessor. It deserves to be noticed that by such critics as Ewald, J. Olshausen, and Hitzig, the Psalms where the expression occurs are all assigned to a period later than the time of Isaiah. According to this view the expression must in all probability have originated with Isaiah.

Another remarkable peculiarity observable in the different portions of Isaiah is the frequent use of the formula to be named in the sense of to be. Such coincidences as these cannot have been accidental. Gesenius, with whom De Wette substantially agrees, attempting to account for them, conjectures that there may have been an imitation of the earlier writer by the later, or, as he supposes with more probability, an attempt by a later hand to bring the various portions of the book into mutual conformity. But the former supposition, if consistently carried out and applied to all cases of marked resemblance occurring in these writings, must lead to results which no one capable of recognizing the impress of independent thought can possibly admit. The latter supposition is simply absurd. No proper parallel to such a procedure can be found in the history of ancient literature. Gesenius refers indeed to the traces of a conforming a * For an exposition of the phrase Servant of Jehovah, which meets perhaps better than any other the demands of the various connections in which this phrase occurs, the reader is referred to the commentary of Dr. J A. Alexander on ch. xlii. D. S. T.

b * Chap. xiii. and xiv. 1–23 are among the sections most confidently referred to the later period of the captivity. But if anything in the results of criticism can be regarded as established, it is that Is. xiv. 9–19 is the original from which are derived some of the most remarkable images and expressions in Ez. xxxi. 14–18 and xxxii. 18–32. That there is a connection between these passages can hardly be denied. Nor is there any room to question that the great conception embodied in Isaiah xiv. is an original conception. We need not affirm that in the later prophet there is any conscious imitation. But in the many and varied repetitions of Ezekiel we hear beyond all reasonable doubt the reverberations of that majestic strain in which Isaiah has described the descent of the king of Babylon to the region of the dead. D. S. T.

and in the punctuation of הוא and נער in the Pentateuch. But it is not necessary to point out how wide is the difference between the correction of what was supposed to be an error in a single letter, and the radical changes which upon the supposition in question must have been made by the "conforming hand" in such passages as liv. 5, lxii. 2, 4.

To say nothing of the difficulty there is in imagining an adequate motive for such a procedure, the procedure itself implies a habit of critical observation which was wholly foreign to the spirit of the times. And those who can suppose a Jewish redacteur, living two or three centuries before Christ, to have thus placed himself by anticipation at the stand-point of modern criticism, ought to find no difficulty in conceiving that a prophet writing in the time of Hezekiah should take his position amidst the scenes of the Captivity, and should announce the name of the deliverer.[a]

While there are confessedly marked peculiarities, both of thought and diction, exhibited in the later portions of the prophecies attributed to Isaiah, and to some extent in the other portions also of which the genuineness has been called in question, the uncertain nature of the argument they furnish is sufficiently shown by a comparison of the widely different conclusions which different critics of the same school have formed in view of them. A very striking comparison of this kind is presented by Alexander in his Commentary, vol. i. pp. xxvii., xxviii.

The array of linguistic evidence in proof of a diversity of authorship, which has gradually grown within the last century into the formidable proportions in which it meets us in the pages of Knobel and others, rests very largely upon an assumption which none of these critics have the hardihood distinctly to vindicate, namely, that within the narrow compass of the Hebrew literature that has come down to us from any given period, we have the means for arriving at an accurate estimate of all the resources which the language at that time possessed. When we have eliminated from the list of words and phrases relied upon to prove a later date than the time of Isaiah, everything the value of which to the argument must stand or fall with this assumption, there remains absolutely nothing which may not be reasonably referred to the reign of Hezekiah. Indeed, considering all the circumstances of the times, it might justly have been expected that the traces of foreign influence upon the language would be far more conspicuous in a writing of this date than they actually are in the controverted portions.

It is to be remembered that the ministry of the prophet must have extended through a period, at the lowest calculation, of nearly fifty years;[b] a period signalized, especially during the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah, by constant and growing intercourse with foreign nations, thus involving continually new influences for the corruption of public morals and new dangers to the state, and making it incumbent upon him who had been divinely constituted at once the political adviser of the nation and its religious guide, to be habitually and intimately conversant among the people, so as to descry upon the instant every additional step taken in their downward course and the first approaches of each new peril from abroad, and to be able to meet each successive phase of their necessities with forms of instruction, admonition, and warning, not only in their general purport, but in their very style and diction, accommodated to conditions hitherto unknown, and that were still perpetually changing. Now when we take all this into the account, and then imagine to ourselves the prophet, toward the close of this long period, entering upon what was in some respects a novel kind of labor, and writing out, with a special view[c] to the benefit of a remote posterity, the suggestions of that mysterious Theopneustia to which his lips had been for so many years the channel of communication with his contemporaries, far from finding any difficulty in the diversities of style perceptible in the different portions of his prophecy, we shall only see fresh occasion to admire that native strength and grandeur of intellect, which have still left upon productions so widely remote from each other in the time and circumstances of their composition, so plain an impress of one and the same overmastering individuality. Probably there is not one of all the languages of the globe, whether living or dead, possessing any considerable literature, which does not exhibit instances of greater change in the style of an author, writing at different periods of his life, than appears upon a comparison of the later prophecies of Isaiah with the earlier. D. S. T.

a * As a further exhibition of the correspondences in thought, illustration, and expression which occur in the different portions of the book, the reader is referred to the following passages, which are but a part of what might be adduced: i. 3, v. 13, xxix. 24, xxx. 20, liv. 13; i. 11 ff., xxix. 13, lviii. 2 ff.; i. 22, 25, xlviii. 10; vi. 13, lxv. 8, 9; ix. 19, xlvii. 14; ix. 20, xix. 2, xlix. 26; x. 20, xlviii. 1, 2; xxiv. 23, xxx 23, lx. 19, 20; xxix. 5, xli. 16; xxix. 18, xxxv. 5, xlii. 7, 18, 19; xxx. 22, lxiv. 6 (see Ges. Lex. under עֶדְוָה, Fürst under עֵד); xxx. 27, 30, lxiv. 1, 2, lxvi. 6, 14, 15, 16; xxxii. 15, xxxv. 1, lv. 13. D. S. T.

b * Isaiah certainly began his public work as early, at least, as the last year of Uzziah, and continued it at least till the 14th of Hezekiah. This gives him a minimum period of 47 years. In all probability his ministry lasted several years longer. D. S. T.

c * That the prophet throughout his later writings had more or less reference continually to the circumstances of his own time, is abundantly manifest, and deserves to be particularly noticed here. Those who deny the genuineness of these productions, while they admit (see Bertholdt, Einl. pp. 1384, 1385) that Isaiah and other prophets often transfer themselves in spirit into future times, lay great stress upon the alleged fact that the writer here deals exclusively with a period which in the age of Isaiah was yet future. But in addition to the considerations in relation to this point presented in the preceding article, p. 1158 b, the passage lvii. 11 may be adduced as plainly implying that at the time the prophet wrote, Jehovah had as yet forborne to punish his rebellious people, and that his forbearance had only been abused. The last clause of the first verse is also most naturally explained as containing an intimation of coming judgment. Still further, the only explanation of ver. 9 which satisfies all the demands of the passage makes it to refer to the attempts of the people, in the age preceding the Captivity, to strengthen themselves by foreign alliances and these attempts are spoken of as being made by the contemporaries of the prophet. It is also strongly implied in vii. 5, 7, and still more strongly in lxvi. 3 6, 20 (last clause), that the Temple was yet standing D. S. T

Stanley's description of Isaiah (Jewish Church, ii. 494–504) presents him to us as one of the grandest figures on the page of history. A few sentences may be quoted, showing the universality of Isaiah's ideas and sympathies and the reach of his prophetic vision. "First of the prophets, he and those who followed him seized with unreserved confidence the mighty thought, that not in the chosen people, so much as in the nations outside of it, was to be found the ultimate well-being of man, the surest favor of God. Truly might the Apostle say that Isaiah was "very bold," — "bold beyond" (ἀποτολμᾷ, Rom. x. 20) all that had gone before him — in enlarging the boundaries of the church; bold with that boldness, and large with that largeness of view which, so far from weakening the hold on things divine, strengthens it to a degree unknown in less comprehensive minds. For to him also, with a distinctness which makes all other anticipations look pale in comparison, a distinctness which grew with his advancing years, was revealed the coming of a Son of David, who should restore the royal house of Judah and gather the nations under its sceptre. . . . Lineament after lineament of that Divine Ruler was gradually drawn by Isaiah or his scholars, until at last a Figure stands forth, so marvelously combined of power and gentleness and suffering as to present in the united proportions of his descriptions the moral features of an historical Person, such as has been, by universal confession, known once, and once only, in the subsequent annals of the world."

IS'CAH (יִסְכָּה, [one who looks about, or peers]: Ἰεσχά: Jescha), daughter of Haran the brother of Abram, and sister of Milcah and of Lot (Gen. xi. 29). In the Jewish traditions as preserved by Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 5), Jerome (Quæst. in Genesim), and the Targum Pseudo-jonathan — not to mention later writers — she is identified with SARAI.

ISCARIOT. [JUDAS ISCARIOT.]

ISDAEL ('Ισδαήλ: Gaddahel), 1 Esdr. v. 33. [GIDDEL, 2.]

ISH'BAH (יִשְׁבָּח [praising]: δ 'Ιεσβά: [Vat. Μαρεθ;] Alex. Ιεσαβα: Iesba), a man in the line of Judah, commemorated as the "father of Eshtemoa" (1 Chr. iv. 17); but from whom he was immediately descended is, in the very confused state of this part of the genealogy, not to be ascertained. The most feasible conjecture is that he was one of the sons of Mered by his Egyptian wife BITHIAH. (See Bertheau, Chronik, ad loc.)

ISH'BAK (יִשְׁבָק [leaving behind, Ges.]. 'Ιεσβώκ, Σοβάκ: [Alex. in Chr., Ιεσβοκ:] Jesboc), a son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chr. i. 32), and the progenitor of a tribe of northern Arabia. The settlements of this people are very obscure, and we can only suggest as possible that they may be recovered in the name of the valley called Sabák, or, it is said, Sibák (سِبَاق), in the Dahnà (الدَّهْنَاء and الدَّهْنَا), (Marásid, s. v.). The Heb. root שׁבק corresponds to the Arabic سبق in etymology and signification: therefore identifications with names derived from the root شبك are improbable. There are many places of the latter derivation, as Shebek (شَبَك), Shibák (شِبَاك), and Esh-Shóbak (الشَّوْبَك): the last having been supposed (as by Bunsen, Bibelwerk, i. pt. ii. 53) to preserve a trace of Ishbak. It is a fortress in Arabia Petræa; and is near the well-known fortress of the Crusader's times called El-Karak.

The Dahnà, in which is situate Sabák, is a fertile and extensive tract, belonging to the Bene-Temeem, in Nejd, or the highland, of Arabia, on the northeast of it, and the borders of the great desert, reaching from the rugged tract ("hazn") of Yensoo'ah to the sands of Yebreen. It contains much pasturage, with comparatively few wells, and is greatly frequented by the Arabs when the vegetation is plentiful (Mushtarak and Marásid, s. v.). There is, however, another Dahnà, nearer to the Euphrates (ib.), and some confusion may exist regarding the true position of Sabák; but either Dahnà is suitable for the settlements of Ishbak. The first-mentioned Dahnà lies in a favorable portion of the widely-stretching country known to have been peopled by the Keturahites. They extended from the borders of Palestine even to the Persian Gulf, and traces of their settlements must be looked for all along the edge of the Arabian peninsula, where the desert merges into the cultivable land, or (itself a rocky undulating plateau) rises to the wild, mountainous country of Nejd. Ishbak seems from his name to have preceded or gone before his brethren: the place suggested for his dwelling is far away towards the Persian Gulf, and penetrates also into the peninsula. On these, as well as mere etymological grounds, the identification is sufficiently probable, and every way better than that which connects the patriarch with Esh-Shóbak, etc. E. S. P.

ISH'BI-BE'NOB (יִשְׁבִּי בְנֹב, Keri, יִשְׁבִּי [dwelling in rest]: 'Ιεσβί; [Alex. Ιεσβι εν Νοβ:] Jesbi-benob), son of Rapha, one of the race of Philistine giants, who attacked David in battle, but was slain by Abishai (2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17).

H. W. P.

ISH-BO'SHETH (אִישׁ בֹּשֶׁת [see infra]: 'Ιεβοσθέ; [in 2 Sam. ii., Alex. Ιεβοσθαι or Ειεβ., Comp. 'Ισβόσεθ; in 2 Sam. iii., iv., Vat. Μεμφιβοσθει, Alex. Μεμφιβοσθαι:] Isboseth), the youngest of Saul's four sons, and his legitimate successor. His name appears (1 Chr. viii. 33, ix. 39) to have been originally ESH-BAAL, אֶשְׁבַּעַל, the man of Baal. Whether this indicates that Baal was used as equivalent to Jehovah, or that the reverence for Baal still lingered in Israelitish families, is uncertain; but it can hardly be doubted that the name (Ish-bosheth, "the man of shame") by which he is commonly known, must have been substituted for the original word, with a view of removing the scandalous sound of Baal from the name of an Israelitish king, and superseding it by the contemptuous word (Bosheth — "shame") which was sometimes used as its equivalent in later times (Jer. iii. 24, xi. 13; Hos. ix. 10). A similar process appears in the alteration of Jerubbaal (Judg. viii. 35) into Jerubbesheth (2 Sam. xi. 21); Meribaal (2 Sam. iv. 4) into Mephi-bosheth (1 Chr. viii. 34, ix. 40). The three last cases all occur in Saul's family. He was 35 years of age at the time of the battle of Gilboa, in which his father and three oldest brothers perished; and therefore, according to the law of Oriental, though not of European succession, ascended the throne, as the oldest of the royal family, rather than Mephi-bosheth, son of his elder brother Jonathan, who was a child of five years old. He was immediately taken under the care of Abner, his powerful kinsman, who brought him to the ancient sanctuary of Mahanaim on the east of the Jordan, beyond the reach of the victorious Philistines (2 Sam. ii. 8). There was a momentary doubt even in those remote tribes whether they should not close with the offer of David to be their king (2 Sam. ii. 7, iii. 17). But this was overruled in favor of Ish-bosheth by Abner (2 Sam. iii. 17), who then for five years slowly but effectually restored the dominion of the house of Saul over the Transjordanic territory, the plain of Esdraelon, the central mountains of Ephraim, the frontier tribe of Benjamin, and eventually "over all Israel" (except the tribe of Judah, 2 Sam. ii. 9). Ish-bosheth was then "40 years old when he began to reign over Israel, and reigned two years" (2 Sam. ii. 10). This form of expression is used only for the accession of a fully recognized sovereign (comp. in the case of David, 2 Sam. ii. 4, and v. 4).

During these two years he reigned at Mahanaim, though only in name. The wars and negotiations with David were entirely carried on by Abner (2 Sam. ii. 12, iii. 6, 12). At length Ish-bosheth accused Abner (whether rightly or wrongly does not appear) of an attempt on his father's concubine, Rizpah; which, according to oriental usage, amounted to treason (2 Sam. iii. 7; comp. 1 K. ii. 13; 2 Sam. xvi. 21, xx. 3). Abner resented this suspicion in a burst of passion, which vented itself in a solemn vow to transfer the kingdom from the house of Saul to the house of David. Ish bosheth was too much cowed to answer; and when, shortly afterwards, through Abner's negotiation, David demanded the restoration of his former wife, Michal, he at once tore his sister from her reluctant husband, and committed her to Abner's charge (2 Sam. iii. 14, 15).

The death of Abner deprived the house of Saul of their last remaining support. When Ish-bosheth heard of it, "his hands were feeble and all the Israelites were troubled" (2 Sam. iv. 1).

In this extremity of weakness he fell a victim, probably, to a revenge for a crime of his father. The guard of Ish-bosheth, as of Saul, was taken from their own royal tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. xii. 29). But amongst the sons of Benjamin were reckoned the descendants of the old Canaanitish inhabitants of Beeroth, one of the cities in league with Gibeon (2 Sam. iv. 2, 3). Two of those Beerothites, Baana and Rechab, in remembrance, it has been conjectured, of Saul's slaughter of their kinsmen the Gibeonites, determined to take advantage of the helplessness of the royal house to destroy the only representative that was left, excepting the child Mephi-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 4). They were "chiefs of the marauding troops" which used from time to time to attack the territory of Judah (comp. 2 Sam. iv. 2, iii. 22, where the same word בְּדֻד is used; Vulg. principes latronum). [BENJAMIN, vol. i. p. 278 a; GITTAIM, vol. ii. p. 930.] They knew the habits of the king and court, and acted accordingly. In the stillness of an eastern noon they entered the palace, as if to carry off the wheat which was piled up near the entrance. The female slave, who, as usual in eastern houses, kept the door, and was herself sifting the wheat, had, in the heat of the day, fallen asleep at her task (2 Sam. iv. 5, 6, in LXX. and Vulg.). They stole in, and passed into the royal bedchamber, where Ish-bosheth was asleep on his couch. They stabbed him in the stomach, cut off his head, made their escape, all that afternoon, all that night, down the valley of the Jordan (Arabah, A. V. "plain;" 2 Sam. iv. 7), and presented the head to David as a welcome present. They met with a stern reception. David rebuked them for the cold-blooded murder of an innocent man, and ordered them to be executed; their hands and feet were cut off, and their bodies suspended over [prob. by or near] the tank at Hebron. The head of Ish-bosheth a was carefully buried in the sepulchre of his great kinsman Abner, at the same place (2 Sam. iv. 9–12).b

I'SHI (יִשִׁי [saving, salutary]: Jesi). 1. ('Ισεμιήλ: Alex. Ισσει.) A man of the descendants of Judah, son of Appaim (1 Chr. ii. 31); one of the great house of Hezron, and therefore a near connection of the family of Jesse (comp. 9–13). The only son here attributed to Ishi is Sheshan.

2. (Σεῖ; [Vat. Σεει:] Alex. Ες; [Comp. 'Ισσί.]) In a subsequent genealogy of Judah we find another Ishi, with a son Zoheth (1 Chr. iv. 20). There does not appear to be any connection between the two.

3. ('Ισσί; [Vat. Ισσθευ:] Alex. Ισσει.) Four men of the Bene-Ishi [sons of I.], of the tribe of Simeon, are named in 1 Chr. iv. 42 as having headed an expedition of 500 of their brethren who took Mount Seir from the Amalekites, and made it their own abode.

4. (Σεῖ; [Vat. Σεει:] Alex. Ισσει.) One of the heads of the tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).

I'SHI (אִישִׁי: ὁ ἀνήρ μου: Vir meus). This word has no connection whatever with the foregoing. It occurs in Hos. ii. 16, and signifies "my man," "my husband." It is the Israelite term, in opposition to BAALI [Amer. ed.] the Canaanite term, with the same meaning, though with a significance of its own. See pp. 207–8, 210 a, where the difference between the two appellations is noticed more at length.

ISHI'AH (יִשִׁיָּה, i. e. Isshiyah [whom Jehovah lends, perh. with the idea of children as a trust]: 'Ιεσία; [Vat. corrupt: Jesia]), the fifth of the five sons of Izrahiah; one of the heads of the tribe of Issachar in the time of David (1 Chr vii. 3).

The name is identical with that elsewhere given as ISHIJAH, ISSHIAH, JESIAH.

ISHI'JAH (יִשִׁיָּהוּ [as above]: 'Ιεσία; [Vat. FA. Ιεσσεια:] Alex. Ιεσσια: Josue), a lay Israelite of the Bene-Harim [sons of H.], who had married a foreign wife, and was compelled to relinquish her (Ezr. x. 31). In Esdras the name is ASEAS.

This name appears in the A. V. under the various forms of ISHIAH, ISSHIAH, JESIAH.

ISH'MA (יִשְׁמָא [waste, desert, Ges.]: 'Ισμάν; [Vat. Ραγμα:] Alex. Ισμα: Jesema), a name in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3). The passage is very obscure, and in the case of many of the names it is difficult to know whether they are of persons or places. Ishma and his companions appear to be closely connected with Bethlehem (see ver. 4).

ISH'MAEL (יִשְׁמָעֵאל, whom God hears: 'Ισμαήλ: Ismael), the son of Abraham by Hagar, his concubine, the Egyptian; born when Abraham was fourscore and six years old (Gen. xvi. 15, 16). Ishmael was the first-born of his father; in ch. xv. we read that he was then childless, and there is no apparent interval for the birth of any other child; nor does the teaching of the narrative, besides the precise enumeration of the sons of Abraham as the father of the faithful, admit of the supposition. The saying of Sarah, also, when she gave him Hagar, supports the inference that until then he was without children. When he "added and took a wife" (A. V. "Then again Abraham took a wife," xxv. 1), Keturah, is uncertain, but it is not likely to have been until after the birth of Isaac, and perhaps the death of Sarah. The conception of Ishmael occasioned the flight of Hagar [HAGAR]; and it was during her wandering in the wilderness that the angel of the Lord appeared to her, commanding her to return to her mistress, and giving her the promise, "I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude;" and, "Behold, thou [art] with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael, because the

b The Jews at Hebron claim that they know the exact place of this sepulchre. They are accustomed to offer prayers there on every new moon-day (Sepp, Jerusalem u. das heilige Land, i. 499). The custom shows a trace of the old superstition in regard to the observance of such days (Is. i. 13, 14; Col. ii. 16, &c.).

Lord hath heard thy affliction. And he will be a wild man; his hand [will be] against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren" (xvi. 10–12).

Ishmael was born in Abraham's house, when he dwelt in the plain of Mamre; and on the institution of the covenant of circumcision, was circumcised, he being then thirteen years old (xvii. 25). With the institution of the covenant, God renewed his promise respecting Ishmael. In answer to Abraham's entreaty, when he cried, "O that Ishmael might live before thee!" God assured him of the birth of Isaac, and said, "As for Ishmael, I have heard thee: behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes [a] shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation" (xvii. 18, 20). Before this time, Abraham seems to have regarded his first-born child as the heir of the promise, his belief in which was counted unto him for righteousness (xv. 6); and although that faith shone yet more brightly after his passing weakness when Isaac was first promised, his love for Ishmael is recorded in the narrative of Sarah's expulsion of the latter: "And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son" (xxi. 11).

Ishmael does not again appear in the narrative until the weaning of Isaac. The latter was born when Abraham was a hundred years old (xxi. 5), and as the weaning, according to eastern usage, probably took place when the child was between two and three years old, Ishmael himself must have been then between fifteen and sixteen years old. The age of the latter at the period of his circumcision, and at that of his expulsion (which we have now reached), has given occasion for some literary speculation. A careful consideration of the passages referring to it fails, however, to show any discrepancy between them. In Gen. xvii. 25, it is stated that he was thirteen years old when he was circumcised; and in xxi. 14 (probably two or three years later), "Abraham . . . took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave [it] unto Hagar, putting [it] on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away." [b] Here it is at least unnecessary to assume that the child was put on her shoulder, the construction of the Hebrew (mistranslated by the LXX., with whom seems to rest the origin of the question) not requiring it; and the sense of the passage renders it highly improbable: Hagar certainly carried the bottle on her shoulder, and perhaps the bread: she could hardly have also thus carried a child. Again, these passages are quite reconcilable with ver. 20 of the last quoted chapter, where Ishmael is termed הַנַּעַר, A. V. "lad" (comp., for use of this word, Gen. xxxiv. 19, xxxvii. 2, xli. 12).

At the "great feast" made in celebration of the weaning, "Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking," and urged Abraham to cast out him and his mother. The patriarch, comforted by God's renewed promise that of Ishmael he would make a nation, sent them both away, and they departed and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. Here the water being spent in the bottle, Hagar cast her son under one of the desert shrubs,[c] and went away a little distance, "for she said, Let me not see the death of the child," and wept. "And God heard the voice of the lad, and the angel of the Lord called to Hagar out of heaven," renewed the promise already thrice given, "I will make him a great nation," and "opened her eyes and she saw a well of water." Thus miraculously saved from perishing by thirst, "God was with the lad; and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness; and became an archer." It is doubtful whether the wanderers halted by the well, or at once continued their way to the "wilderness of Paran," where, we are told in the next verse to that just quoted, he dwelt, and where "his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt" (Gen. xxi. 9–21). This wife of Ishmael is not elsewhere mentioned; she was, we must infer, an Egyptian; and this second infusion of Hamitic blood into the progenitors of the Arab nation, Ishmael's sons, is a fact that has been generally overlooked. No record is made of any other wife of Ishmael, and failing such record, the Egyptian was the mother of his twelve sons, and daughter. This daughter, however, is called the "sister of Nebajoth" (Gen. xxviii. 9), and this limitation of the parentage of the brother and sister certainly seems to point to a different mother for Ishmael's other sons.[d]

[a] The Heb. rendered "prince" in this case, is נָשִׂיא, which signifies both a "prince" and the "leader," or "captain" of a tribe, or even of a family (Gesen.). It here seems to mean the leader of a tribe, and Ishmael's twelve sons are enumerated in Gen. xxv. 16 "according to their nations," more correctly "peoples," אֻמּוֹת.

[b] * The ambiguity lies in the A. V., rather than the original. According to the Hebrew construction (though a little peculiar), the expression "putting on her shoulder" should be taken as parenthetic, and that of "the child" be made the object of the first of the verbs which precede. H.

[c] * This allusion to "the shrubs" of the desert brings out a picturesque trait of the narrative. The word so rendered (שִׂיחִים) is still used in Arabic, unchanged. It is used, however, with some latitude, being a general designation for the shrubby or bushy plants. These shrubby plants, which are of various kinds, are called generally سِيح, as we speak of "bushes." The kind, however, most in use, and more than any other specifically designated, is the Spartium junceum. This is a tall shrub, growing to the height of eight or ten feet, of a close ramification, but making a light shade, owing to the small size and lanceolate shape of its leaves. Its flowers are yellow, and its seeds edible. It grows in stony places, usually where there is little moisture, and is widely diffused. We should expect to find it, of course, in a "wilderness" like that of Beer-sheba. But whether we understand by שִׂיחַ this particular plant, whose light and insufficient shade would prove the only mitigation of the heat of the sun, or, in general, a bush or shrub, the allusion to it in Gen. xxi. 15 is locally exact, and explains why the mother sought such a shelter for the child. It might also be understood of Genista monosperma, the Retem of the Arabs, which furnished a shade to the prophet Elijah (1 K. xix. 4, 5), and is spoken of in Ps. cxx. 4, and Job xxx. 4. This species is said to abound in the desert of Sinai, and is kindred to the سِيح, being, in fact, mentioned with it in Job xxx. 4. G. E. P.

[d] According to Rabbinical tradition, Ishmael put away his wife and took a second; and the Arabs.

Of the later life of Ishmael we know little. He was present with Isaac at the burial of Abraham; and Esau contracted an alliance with him when he "took unto the wives which he had Mahalath [or Bashemath or Basmath, Gen. xxxvi. 3] the daughter of Ishmael Abraham's son, the sister of Nebajoth, to be his wife;" and this did Esau because the daughters of Canaan pleased not Isaac and Rebekah, and Jacob in obedience to their wishes had gone to Laban to obtain of his daughters a wife (xxviii. 6–9). The death of Ishmael is recorded in a previous chapter, after the enumeration of his sons, as having taken place at the age of a hundred and thirty-seven years; and, it is added, "he died in the presence of all his brethren" [a] (xxv. 17, 18). The alliance with Esau occurred before this event (although it is mentioned in a previous passage), for he "went . . . unto Ishmael;" but it cannot have been long before, if the chronological data be correctly preserved.[b]

It remains for us to consider, (1), the place of Ishmael's dwelling; and, (2), the names of his children, with their settlements, and the nation sprung from them.

1. From the narrative of his expulsion, we learn that Ishmael first went into the wilderness of Beer-sheba, and thence, but at what interval of time is uncertain, removed to that of Paran. His continuance in these or the neighboring places seems to be proved by his having been present at the burial of Abraham; for it must be remembered that in the East, sepulture follows death after a few hours' space; and by Esau's marrying his daughter at a time when he (Esau) dwelt at Beer-sheba: the tenor of the narrative of both these events favoring the inference that Ishmael did not settle far from the neighborhood of Abraham and Isaac. There are, however, other passages which must be taken into account. It is prophesied of him, that "he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren," and thus too he "died in the presence of all his brethren" (xxv. 18).[b] The meaning of these passages is confessedly obscure; but it seems only to signify that he dwelt near them. He was the first Abrahamic settler in the east country. In ch. xxv. 6 it is said, "But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country." The "east country" perhaps was restricted in early times to the wildernesses of Beer-sheba and Paran, and it afterwards seems to have included those districts (though neither supposition necessarily follows from the above passage); or, Ishmael removed to that east country, northwards, without being distant from his father and his brethren; each case being agreeable with Gen. xxv. 6. The appellation of the "east country" became afterwards applied to the whole desert extending from the frontier of Palestine east to the Euphrates, and south probably to the borders of Egypt and the Arabian peninsula. This question is discussed in art. Bene-Kedem; and it is interwoven, though obscurely, with the next subject, that of the names and settlements of the sons of Ishmael. See also Keturah, etc.; for the "brethren" of Ishmael, in whose presence he dwelt and died, included the sons of Keturah.[c]

2. The sons of Ishmael were, Nebajoth (expressly stated to be his first-born), Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, Kedemah (Gen. xxv. 13–15); and he had a daughter named Mahalath (xxviii. 9), elsewhere written Bashemath (or Basmath, Gen. xxxvi. 3), the sister of Nebajoth, before mentioned. The sons are enumerated with the particular statement that "these are their names, by their towns, and by their castles; twelve princes according to their nations" or "peoples" (xxv. 16). In seeking to identify Ishmael's sons, this passage requires close attention: it bears the interpretation of their being fathers of tribes, having towns and castles called after them; and identifications of the latter become therefore more than usually satisfactory. "They dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest unto Assyria" (xxv. 18), and it is certain, in accordance with this statement of their limits [see Havilah, Shur], that they stretched in very early times across the desert to the Persian Gulf, peopled the north and west of the Arabian peninsula, and eventually formed the chief element of the Arab nation. Their language, which is generally acknowledged to have been the Arabic commonly so called, has been adopted with insignificant exceptions throughout Arabia. It has been said that the Bible requires the whole of that nation to be sprung from Ishmael, and the fact of a large admixture of Joktanite and even Cushite peoples in the south and southeast has been regarded as a suggestion of skepticism. Yet not only does the Bible contain no warrant for the assumption that all Arabs are Ishmaelites; but the characteristics of the Ishmaelites, strongly marked in all the more northern tribes of Arabia, and exactly fulfilling the prophecy "he will be a wild man; his hand [will be] against every man, and every man's hand against him," become weaker in the south, and can scarcely be predicated of all the peoples of Joktanite and other descent. The true Ishmaelites, however, and even tribes of very mixed race, are thoroughly "wild men," living by warlike forays and plunder; dreaded by their neighbors; dwelling in tents, with hardly any household chattels, but rich in flocks and herds, migratory, and recognizing no law but the authority of the chiefs of their tribes. Even the religion of Mohammad is held in light esteem by many of the more remote tribes, among whom the ancient usages of their people obtain in almost probably borrowing from the above, assert that he twice married; the first wife being an Amalekite, by whom he had no issue; and the second, a Joktanite, of the tribe of Jurhum (Mir-át ez-Zemán, MS., quoting a tradition of Mohammad Ibn-Is-hák).

[a] * The meaning is different in the Hebrew. The verb there is נָפַל, and means not "died" but "settled" or "dwelt" (= יִשְׁכֹּן, Gen. xvi. 12). The statement is really made not of Ishmael, but of his descendants. Ishmael's death is mentioned in ver. 17, but not in ver 18. H.

[b] Abraham at the birth of Ishmael was 86 years old, and at Isaac's about 100. Isaac took Rebekah to wife when he was 40 years old, when Ishmael would be about 54. Esau was born when his father was 60; and Esau was more than 40 when he married Ishmael's daughter. Therefore Ishmael was then at least 114 (54 + 20 + 40 = 114), leaving 23 years before his death for Esau's coming to him.

[c] * Ishmael is not named in the N. T., but is directly referred to in the allegory, Gal. iv. 25 ff. See mention under Isaac. L.

their old simplicity, besides idolatrous practices altogether repugnant to Mohammadanism as they are to the faith of the patriarchs; practices which may be ascribed to the influence of the Canaanites, of Moab, Ammon, and Edom, with whom, by intermarriages, commerce, and war, the tribes of Ishmael must have had long and intimate relations.

The term ISHMAELITE (יִשְׁמְעֵאלִי) occurs on three occasions, Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, xxxix. 1; Judg. viii. 24; Ps. lxxxiii. 6. From the context of the first two instances, it seems to have been a general name for the Abrahamic peoples of the east country, the Bene-Kedem; but the second admits also of a closer meaning. In the third instance the name is applied in its strict sense to the Ishmaelites. It is also applied to Jether, the father of Amasa, by David's sister Abigail (1 Chr. ii. 17). [ITHRA; JETHER.]

The notions of the Arabs respecting Ishmael (اسماعيل) are partly derived from the Bible, partly from the Jewish Rabbins, and partly from native traditions. The origin of many of these traditions is obscure, but a great number may be ascribed to the fact of Mohammad's having for political reasons claimed Ishmael for his ancestor, and striven to make out an impossible pedigree; while both he and his followers have, as a consequence of accepting this assumed descent, sought to exalt that ancestor. Another reason may be safely found in Ishmael's acknowledged headship of the naturalized Arabs, and this cause existed from the very period of his settlement. [ARABIA.] Yet the rivalry of the Joktanite kingdom of southern Arabia, and its intercourse with classical and mediæval Europe, the wandering and unsettled habits of the Ishmaelites, their having no literature, and, as far as we know, only a meagre oral tradition, all contributed, till the importance it acquired with the promulgation of El-Islâm, to render our knowledge of the Ishmaelitic portion of the people of Arabia, before Mohammad, lamentably defective. That they maintained, and still maintain, a patriarchal and primitive form of life is known to us. Their religion, at least in the period immediately preceding Mohammad, was in central Arabia chiefly the grossest fetishism, probably learnt from aboriginal inhabitants of the land; southwards it diverged to the cosmic worship of the Joktanite Himyerites (though these were far from being exempt from fetishism), and northwards (so at least in ancient times) to an approach to that true faith which Ishmael carried with him, and his descendants thus gradually lost. This last point is curiously illustrated by the numbers who, in Arabia, became either Jews (Caraites) or Christians (though of a very corrupt form of Christianity), and by the movement in search of the faith of the patriarchs which had been put forward, not long before the birth of Mohammad, by men not satisfied with Judaism or the corrupt form of Christianity, with which alone they were acquainted. This movement first aroused Mohammad, and was afterwards the main cause of his success.

The Arabs believe that Ishmael was the first born of Abraham, and the majority of their doctors (but the point is in dispute) assert that this son, and not Isaac, was offered by Abraham in sacrifice.[a] The scene of this sacrifice is Mount 'Arafât, near Mekkeh, the last holy place visited by pilgrims, it being necessary to the completion of pilgrimage to be present at a sermon delivered there on the 9th of the Mohammedan month Zu-l-Hejjeh, in commemoration of the offering, and to sacrifice a victim on the following evening after sunset, in the valley of Minè. The sacrifice last mentioned is observed throughout the Muslim world, and the day on which it is made is called "The Great Festival" (Mr. Lane's Mod. Egypt. ch. iii.). Ishmael, say the Arabs, dwelt with his mother at Mekkeh, and both are buried in the place called the "Hejr," on the northwest (termed by the Arabs the north) side of the Kaabeh, and inclosed by a curved wall called the "Hateem." Ishmael was visited at Mekkeh by Abraham, and they together rebuilt the temple, which had been destroyed by a flood. At Mekkeh, Ishmael married a daughter of Mudâd or El-Mudâd, chief of the Joktanite tribe Jurhum [ALMODAD; ARABIA], and had thirteen children (Mir-át-ez-Zemán, MS.), thus agreeing with the Biblical number, including the daughter.

Mohammad's descent from Ishmael is totally lost, for an unknown number of generations to 'Adnân, of the twenty-first generation before the prophet: from him downwards the latter's descent is, if we may believe the genealogists, fairly proved. But we have evidence far more trustworthy than that of the genealogists; for while most of the natives of Arabia are unable to trace up their pedigrees, it is scarcely possible to find one who is ignorant of his race, seeing that his very life often depends upon it. The law of blood-revenge necessitates his knowing the names of his ancestors for four generations, but no more; and this law extending from time immemorial has made any confusion of race almost impossible. This law, it should be remembered, is not a law of Mohammad, but an old pagan law that he endeavored to suppress, but could not. In casting doubt on the prophet's pedigree, we must add that this cannot affect the proofs of the chief element of the Arab nation being Ishmaelite (and so too the tribe of Kureysh of whom was Mohammad). Although partly mixed with Joktanites, they are more mixed with Keturahites, etc.; the characteristics of the Joktanites, as before remarked, are widely different from those of the Ishmaelites; and whatever theories may be adduced to the contrary, we believe that the Arabs, from physical characteristics, language, the concurrence of native traditions (before Mohammadanism made them untrustworthy), and the testimony of the Bible, are mainly and essentially Ishmaelite. 2. One of the sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Merib-baal, or Mephi-bosheth (1 Chr. viii. 38, ix. 44). See the genealogy, under SAUL.

3. [Vat. omits: Ismahel.] A man of Judah, whose son or descendant ZEBADIAH was ruler (נָגִיד) of the house of Judah in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xix. 11).

4. [Vat. M. Ισραηλ: Ismahel.] Another man of Judah, son of Jehohanan; one of the "captains (שָׂרֵי) of hundreds" who assisted Jehoiada in restoring Joash to the throne (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).

by Ezra to relinquish his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 22). [ISHMAEL, 2.]

6. [Vat.[1] in 2 K. xxv. 25, Μαναηλ: Ismahel.] The son of Nethaniah; a perfect marvel of craft and villainy, whose treachery forms one of the chief episodes of the history of the period immediately succeeding the first fall of Jerusalem. His exploits are related in Jer. xl. 7–xli. 15, with a short summary in 2 K. xxv. 23–25, and they read almost like a page from the annals of the late Indian mutiny.

His full description is "Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, of the seed royal" [a] of Judah (Jer. xli. 1; 2 K. xxv. 25). Whether by this is intended that he was actually a son of Zedekiah, or one of the later kings, or, more generally, that he had royal blood in his veins — perhaps a descendant of ELISHAMA, the son of David (2 Sam. v. 16) — we cannot tell. During the siege of the city he had, like many others of his countrymen (Jer. xl. 11), fled across the Jordan, where he found a refuge at the court of Baalis, the then king of the Bene-Ammon (Jos. Ant. x. 9, § 2). Ammonite women were sometimes found in the harems of the kings of Jerusalem (1 K. xi. 1), and Ishmael may have been thus related to the Ammonite court on his mother's side. At any rate he was instigated by Baalis to the designs which he accomplished but too successfully (Jer. xl. 14; Ant. x. 9, § 3). Several bodies of Jews appear to have been lying under arms in the plains on the S. E. of the Jordan,[b] during the last days of Jerusalem, watching the progress of affairs in Western Palestine, commanded by "princes" [c] (שָׂרֵי), the chief of whom were Ishmael, and two brothers, Johanan and Jonathan, sons of Kareah. Immediately after the departure of the Chaldæan army these men moved across the Jordan to pay their respects to GEDALIAH, whom the king of Babylon had left as superintendent (פקיד) of the province. Gedaliah had taken up his residence at MIZPAH, a few miles north of Jerusalem, on the main road, where Jeremiah the prophet resided with him (xl. 6). The house would appear to have been isolated from the rest of the town. We can discern a high inclosed court-yard and a deep well within its precincts. The well was certainly (Jer. xli. 9; comp. 1 K. xv. 22), and the whole residence was probably, a relic of the military works of Asa king of Judah.

Ishmael made no secret of his intention to kill the superintendent, and usurp his position. Of this Gedaliah was warned in express terms by Johanan and his companions; and Johanan, in a secret interview, foreseeing how irreparable a misfortune Gedaliah's death would be at this juncture (xl. 15), offered to remove the danger by killing Ishmael. This, however, Gedaliah, a man evidently of a high and unsuspecting nature, would not hear of (xl. 16, and see the amplification in Joseph. Ant. x. 9, § 3). They all accordingly took leave. Thirty days after (Ant. x. 9, § 4), in the seventh month (xli. 1), on the third day of the month — so says the tradition — Ishmael again appeared at Mizpah, this time accompanied by ten men, who were, according to the Hebrew text, "princes of the king" (רַבֵּי הַמֶּלֶךְ), though this is omitted by the LXX. and by Josephus. Gedaliah entertained them at a feast (xli. 1). According to the statement of Josephus this was a very lavish entertainment, and Gedaliah became much intoxicated. It must have been a private one, for before its close Ishmael and his followers had murdered Gedaliah and all his attendants with such secrecy that no alarm was given outside the room. The same night he killed all Gedaliah's establishment, including some Chaldæan soldiers who were there. Jeremiah appears fortunately to have been absent, and, incredible as it seems, so well had Ishmael taken his precautions that for two days the massacre remained perfectly unknown to the people of the town. On the second day Ishmael perceived from his elevated position a large party coming southward along the main road from Shechem and Samaria. He went out to meet them. They proved to be eighty devotees, who with rent clothes, and with shaven beards, mutilated bodies, and other marks of heathen devotion, and weeping [d] as they went, were bringing incense and offerings to the ruins of the Temple. At his invitation they turned aside to the residence of the superintendent. And here Ishmael put into practice the same stratagem, which on a larger scale was employed by Mehemet Ali in the massacre of the Mamelukes at Cairo in 1806. As the unsuspecting pilgrims passed into the court-yard [e] he closed the entrances

[a] ירע המלוכה. Jerome (Qu. Hebr. on 2 Chron. xxviii. 7) interprets this expression as meaning "of the seed of Molech." He gives the same meaning to the words "the King's son" applied to Maaseiah in the above passage. The question is an interesting one, and has been recently revived by Geiger (Urschrift, etc. p. 307), who extends it to other passages and persons. [MOLECH.] Jerome (as above) further says — perhaps on the strength of a tradition — that Ishmael was the son of an Egyptian slave, Gera: as a reason why the "seed royal" should bear the meaning he gives it. This the writer has not hitherto succeeded in elucidating.

[b] So perhaps, taking it with the express statement of xl. 11, we may interpret the words "the forces which were in the field" (Jer. xl. 7, 13), where the term rendered "the field" (בַּשָּׂדֶה) is one used to denote the pasture grounds of Moab — the modern Belka — oftener than any other district. See Gen. xxxvi. 35; Num. xxi. 20; Ruth i. 1, and passim; 1 Chr. viii. 8; and Stanley's S. & P. App. § 15. The persistent use of the word in the semi-Moabite book of Ruth is alone enough to fix its meaning.

[c] It is a pity that some different word is not employed to render this Hebrew term from that used in xli. 1 to translate one totally distinct.

[d] This is the LXX. version of the matter — αὐτοὶ ἐπορεύοντο καὶ ἔκλαιον. The statement of the Hebrew Text and A. V. that Ishmael wept is unintelligible.

[e] The Hebrew has הָעִיר — "the city" (A. V. ver. 7). This has been read by Josephus הֶחָצֵר — "court-yard." The alteration carries its genuineness in its face. The same change has been made by the Masorets (Keri) in 2 K. xx. 4.

* It is safer to follow the text, with Hitzig, Umbreit, De Wette, and others. It is to be noted that in the Hebrew אֶל תּוֹךְ precedes הָעִיר, i. e. they came "into the midst of the city," so that they were completely in Ishmael's power before the massacre took place. It was natural to mention that circumstance, but there is no obvious reason for speaking thus precisely of "the midst of the court-yard." That specification also seems to require the article before the genitive. The "pit" (or "cistern," the word is בּוֹר behind them, and there he and his band butchered the whole number: ten only escaped by the offer of heavy ransom for their lives. The seventy corpses were then thrown into the well, which, as at Cawnpore, was within the precincts of the house, and which was completely filled with the bodies. It was the same thing that had been done by Jehu — a man in some respects a prototype of Ishmael — with the bodies of the forty-two relatives of Ahaziah (2 K. x. 14). This done he descended to the town, surprised and carried off the daughters of king Zedekiah, who had been sent there by Nebuchadnezzar for safety, with their eunuchs and their Chaldæan guard (xli. 10, 16), and all the people of the town, and made off with his prisoners to the country of the Ammonites. Which road he took is not quite clear; the Hebrew text and LXX. say by Gibeon, that is north; but Josephus, by Hebron, round the southern end of the Dead Sea. The news of the massacre had by this time got abroad, and Ishmael was quickly pursued by Johanan and his companions. Whether north or south, they soon tracked him and his unwieldy booty, and found them reposing by some copious waters (מַיִם רַבִּים). He was attacked, two of his bravoes slain, the whole of the prey recovered, and Ishmael himself, with the remaining eight of his people, escaped to the Ammonites, and thenceforward passes into the obscurity from which it would have been well if he had never emerged.

Johanan's foreboding was fulfilled. The result of this tragedy was an immediate panic. The small remnants of the Jewish commonwealth — the captains of the forces, the king's daughters, the two prophets Jeremiah and Baruch, and all the men, women, and children — at once took flight into Egypt (Jer. xli. 17; xliii. 5–7); and all hopes of a settlement were for the time at an end. The remembrance of the calamity was perpetuated by a fast — the fast of the seventh month (Zech. vii. 5; viii. 19), which is to this day strictly kept by the Jews on the third of Tishri. (See Reland, Antiq. iv. 10; Kimchi on Zech. vii. 5.) The part taken by Baalis in this transaction apparently brought upon his nation the denunciations both of Jeremiah (xlix. 1–6), and the more distant Ezekiel (xxv. 1–7), but we have no record how these predictions were accomplished. ISH'MAELITE. [ISHMAEL, p. 1171.]

ISHMA'IAH [3 syl.] (יִשְׁמַעְיָהוּ, i. e. Ishmaya'hu [Jehovah hears]: Σαμαΐας: Jesmaias), son of Obadiah: the ruler of the tribe of Zebulun in the time of king David (1 Chr. xxvii. 19).

ISH'MEËLITE AND ISH'MEËLITES (יִשְׁמָעֵאלִי and יִשְׁמָעֵאלִים respectively: [Ισμαηλίτης (Vat. -λει-), Ἰσμαηλῖται: Ismahelithes, Ismaëlitæ]), the form — in agreement with the vowels of the Hebrew — in which the descendants of Ishmael are given in a few places in the A. V.; the former in 1 Chr. ii. 17; the latter in Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, xxxix. 1.

ISH'MERAI [3 syl.] (יִשְׁמַרְי, [whom Jehovah keeps]: Ἰσαμαρί: [Vat. Σαμαρει;] Alex. Ιεσμαρι: Jesamari), a Benjamite; one of the family of Elpaal, and named as a chief man in the tribe (1 Chr. viii. 18).

ISH'OD (אִישְׁהוֹד, i. e. Ish-hod [man of renown]: ὁ Ἰσιυδ; [Vat. Ισαδεκ;] Alex. Σουδ: virum decorum), one of the tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan, son of Hammoleketh, i. e. the Queen, and, from his near connection with Gilead, evidently an important person (1 Chr. vii. 18).

ISH'PAN (יִשְׁפָּן [perh. bald, Ges.; one strong, Fürst]: Ἰεσφάν; [Vat. Ισφαν;] Alex. Εσφαν: Jespham), a Benjamite, one of the family of Shashak; named as a chief man in his tribe (1 Chr. viii. 22).

ISH'TOB (אִישׁ־טוֹב [see infra]: Ἰστώβ; [Vat. Εισταωβ;] Joseph. Ἴστωβος: Istob), apparently one of the small kingdoms or states which formed part of the general country of Aram, named with Zobah, Rehob, and Maacah (2 Sam. x. 6, 8). In the parallel account of 1 Chr. xix. Ishtob is omitted. By Josephus (Ant. vii. 6, § 1) the name is given as that of a king. But though in the ancient versions the name is given as one word, it is probable that the real signification is "the men of TOB," a district mentioned also in connection with Ammon in the records of Jephthah, and again perhaps, under the shape of TOBIE or TUBIENI, in the history of the Maccabees. G.

ISH'UAH (יִשְׁוָה [even, level, Ges.; resting peaceful, Dietr.]: Ἰεσουέ, Alex. Ιεσσαι: Jesua), the second son of Asher (Gen. xlvi. 17). In the genealogies of Asher in 1 Chr. vii. 30 the name, though identical in the original, is in the A. V. given as ISUAH. In the lists of Num. xxvi., however, Ishuah is entirely omitted.

* The word is properly Ishvah, and was probably intended by the translators of the A. V. to be so read, u being used in the edition of 1611 for v. A.

ISH'UAI [3 syl.] (יִשְׁוִי, i. e. Ishvi [see above]: Ἰσουί; Alex. Ιεσουι: Jessui), the third son of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 30), founder of a family bearing his name (Num. xxvi. 44; A. V. "Jesuites"). His descendants, however, are not mentioned in the genealogy in Chronicles. His name is elsewhere given in the A. V. as ISUI, JESUI, and (another person) ISHUI.

ISH'UI (יִשְׁוִי, i. e. Ishvi [peaceful, quiet, Dietr.]: Ἰεσσιού; [Vat. Ιεσσιουλ;] Alex. Ισουει; Joseph. Ἰεσοῦς: Jessui), the second son of Saul by his wife Ahinoam (1 Sam. xiv. 49, comp. 50): his place in the family was between Jonathan and Melchishua. In the list of Saul's genealogy in 1 Chr. viii. and ix., however, the name of Ishui is entirely omitted; and in the sad narrative of the battle of Gilboa his place is occupied by Abinadab (1 Sam. xxxi. 2). We can only conclude that he died young.

The same name is elsewhere given in the A. V as ISUI, and ISHUAI. [In all these names u may have been intended by the translators of the A. V. to be read as v. See ISHUAH. — A.] G.

ISLE (אִי: νῆσος). The radical sense of the Hebrew word seems to be "habitable places," as opposed to water, and in this sense it occurs in Is. xlii. 15. Hence it means secondarily any maritime district, whether belonging to a continent or to an island: thus it is used of the shore of the Mediinto which the bodies were thrown may have been in a court-yard or elsewhere. In eastern towns there are reservoirs for public use as well as private. H.

terranean (Is. xx. 6, xxiii. 2, 6), and of the coasts of Elishah (Ez. xxvii. 7), i. e. of Greece and Asia Minor. In this sense it is more particularly restricted to the shores of the Mediterranean, sometimes in the fuller expression "islands of the sea" (Is. xi. 11), or "isles of the Gentiles" (Gen. x. 5; comp. Zeph. ii. 11), and sometimes simply as "isles" (1's. lxxii. 10; Ez. xxvi. 15, 18, xxvii. 3, 35, xxxix. 6; Dan. xi. 18): an exception to this, however, occurs in Ez. xxvii. 15, where the shores of the Persian gulf are intended. Occasionally the word is specifically used of an island, as of Caphtor or Crete (Jer. xlvii. 4), and Chittim or Cyprus (Ez. xxvii. 6; Jer. ii. 10), or of islands as opposed to the mainland (Esth. x. 1). But more generally it is applied to any region separated from Palestine by water, as fully described in Jer. xxv. 22, "the isles which are beyond the sea," which were hence regarded as the most remote regions of the earth (Is. xxiv. 15, xlii. 10, lix. 18: compare the expression in Is. lxvi. 19, "the isles afar off"), and also as large and numerous (Is. xl. 15; Ps. xcvii. 1): the word is more particularly used by the prophets. (See J. D. Michaelis, Spicilegium, i. 131–142.) W. L. B.

ISMACHI'AH (יִכְמַכְיָהוּ, i. e. Ismacya'hu [whom Jehovah supports]: ὁ Σαμαχία [Vat. -χει-]: Jesmachias), a Levite who was one of the overseers (פְּקִידִים) of offerings, during the revival under king Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).

ISMAEL. 1. (Ἰσμαήλ: Ismaël), Jud. ii. 23. Another form for the name ISHMAEL, son of Abraham.

2. (Ἰσμαῆλος: Iismaenis), 1 Esdr. ix. 22. [ISHMAEL, 5.]

ISMAI'AH [3 syl.] (יִשְׁמַעְיָה [Jehovah hears]: Σαμαΐας: Samaias), a Gibeonite, one of the chiefs of those warriors who relinquished the cause of Saul, the head of their tribe, and joined themselves to David, when he was at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 4). He is described as "a hero (Gibbor) among the thirty and over the thirty" — i. e. David's body-guard: but his name does not appear in the lists of the guard in 2 Sam. xxiii. and 1 Chr. xi. Possibly he was killed in some encounter before David reached the throne.

ISPAH (יִשְׁפָּה, i. e. Ishpah [perh. babl, Ges.]: Ἰεσφά: Alex. Εσφαχ: Jespha), a Benjamite, of the family of Beriah; one of the heads of his tribe (1 Chr. viii. 16).

ISRAEL (יִשְׂרָאֵל [see infra]: Ἰσραήλ). 1. The name given (Gen. xxxii. 28) to Jacob after his wrestling with the Angel (Hos. xii. 4) at Peniel. In the time of Jerome (Quæst. Hebr. in Gen. Opp. iii. 357) the signification of the name was commonly believed to be "the man (or the mind) seeing God." But he prefers another interpretation, and paraphrases the verse after this manner: "Thy name shall not be called Jacob, Supplanter, but Israel, Prince with God. For as I am a Prince, so thou who hast been able to wrestle with Me shalt be called a Prince. But if with Me who am God (or an Angel) thou hast been able to contend, how much more [shalt thou be able to contend] with men, i. e. with Esau, whom thou oughtest not to dread?" The A. V., apparently following Jerome, translates שָׂרִיתָ, "as a prince thou hast power;" but Rosenmüller and Gesenius give it the simpler meaning, "thou hast contended." Gesenius interprets Israel "soldier of God."

2. It became the national name of the twelve tribes collectively. They are so called in Ex. iii. 16 and afterwards.

3. It is used in a narrower sense, excluding Judah, in 1 Sam. xi. 8. It is so used in the famous cry of the rebels against David (2 Sam. xx. 1), and against his grandson (1 K. xii. 16). Thenceforth it was assumed and accepted as the name of the Northern Kingdom, in which the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, Levi, Dan, and Simeon had no share.

4. After the Babylonian Captivity, the returned exiles, although they were mainly of the kingdom of Judah, resumed the name Israel as the designation of their nation; but as individuals they are almost always described as Jews in the Apocrypha and N. T. Instances occur in the Books of Chronicles of the application of the name Israel to Judah (e. g. 2 Chr. xi. 3, xii. 6); and in Esther of the name Jews to the whole people. The name Israel is also used to denote laymen, as distinguished from priests, levites, and other ministers (Ezr. vi. 16, ix. 1, x. 25; Neh. xi. 3, &c.). W. T. B.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF. 1. The prophet Ahijah of Shiloh, who was commissioned in the latter days of Solomon to announce the division of the kingdom, left one tribe (Judah) to the house of David, and assigned ten to Jeroboam (1 K. xi. 35, 31). These were probably Joseph (= Ephraim and Manasseh), Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, Naphtali, Benjamin, Dan, Simeon, Gad, and Reuben; Levi being intentionally omitted. Eventually, the greater part of Benjamin, and probably the whole of Simeon and Dan, were included as if by common consent in the kingdom of Judah. With respect to the conquests of David, Moab appears to have been attached to the kingdom of Israel (2 K. iii. 4); so much of Syria as remained subject to Solomon (see 1 K. xi. 24) would probably be claimed by his successor in the northern kingdom; and Ammon, though connected with Rehoboam as his mother's native land (2 Chr. xii. 13), and though afterwards tributary to Judah (2 Chr. xxvii. 5), was at one time allied (2 Chr. xx. 1), we know not how closely, or how early, with Moab. The sea-coast between Accho and Japho remained in the possession of Israel.

2. The population of the kingdom is not expressly stated, and in drawing any inference from the numbers of fighting-men, we must bear in mind that the numbers in the Hebrew text of the O. T. are strongly suspected to have been subjected to extensive, perhaps systematic, corruption. Forty years before the disruption, the census taken by direction of David gave 800,000 according to 2 Sam. xxiv. 9, or 1,100,000[a] according to 1 Chr. xxi. 5, as the number of fighting-men in Israel. Jeroboam, B. C. 957, brought into the field an army of 800,000 men (2 Chr. xiii 3). The small number of the army of Jehoahaz (2 K. xiii. 7) is to be attributed to his compact with Hazael: for in the next reign Israel could spare a mercenary host ten times as numerous for the wars of Amaziah (2 Chr. xxv. 6). Ewald is scarcely correct in his remark that we know not what time of life is reckoned as the military age (Gesch. Isr. iii. 185); for it is defined in [a] Bp. Patrick proposes to reconcile these two numbers, by adding to the former 288,000 on account of David's standing legions.

Num. i. 3, and again 2 Chr. xxv. 5, as "twenty years old and above." If in B. C. 957 there were actually under arms 800,000 men of that age in Israel, the whole population may perhaps have amounted to at least three millions and a half.[a] Later observers have echoed the disappointment with which Jerome from his cell at Bethlehem contemplated the small extent of this celebrated country (Ep. 129, ad Dardan. § 4). The area of Palestine, as it is laid down in Kiepert's Bibel-Atlas (ed. Lionnet, 1859), is calculated at 13,620 English square miles. Deducting from this 810 miles for the strip of coast S. of Japho, belonging to the Philistines, we get 12,810 miles as the area of the land occupied by the 12 tribes at the death of Solomon: the area of the two kingdoms being — Israel, 9,375, Judah, 3,435. Hence it appears that the whole area of Palestine was nearly equal to that of the kingdom of Holland (13,610 square miles); or rather more than that of the six northern counties of England (13,136 square miles). The kingdom of Judah was rather less than Northumberland, Durham, and Westmoreland (3,683 square miles, with 752,852 population in 1851); the kingdom of Israel was very nearly as large as Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Cumberland (9,453 square miles, with 4,023,713 population in 1851).

3. SHECHEM was the first capital of the new kingdom (1 K. xii. 25), venerable for its traditions, and beautiful in its situation. Subsequently Tirzah, whose loveliness had fixed the wandering gaze of Solomon (Cant. vi. 4), became the royal residence, if not the capital, of Jeroboam (1 K. xiv. 17) and of his successors (xv. 33, xvi. 8, 17, 23). Samaria, uniting in itself the qualities of beauty and fertility, and a commanding position, was chosen by Omri (1 K. xvi. 24), and remained the capital of the kingdom until it had given the last proof of its strength by sustaining for three years the onset of the hosts of Assyria. Jezreel was probably only a royal residence of some of the Israelitish kings. It may have been in awe of the ancient holiness of Shiloh, that Jeroboam forbore to pollute the secluded site of the Tabernacle with the golden calves. He chose for the religious capitals of his kingdom Dan, the old home of northern schism, and Bethel,[b] a Benjamite city not far from Shiloh, and marked out by history and situation as the rival of Jerusalem.

4. The disaffection of Ephraim and the northern tribes, having grown in secret under the prosperous but burdensome reign of Solomon, broke out at the critical moment of that great monarch's death. It was just then that Ephraim, the centre of the movement, found in Jeroboam an instrument prepared to give expression to the rivalry of centuries, with sufficient ability and application to raise him to high station, with the stain of treason on his name, and with the bitter recollections of an exile in his mind. Judah and Joseph were rivals from the time that they occupied the two prominent places, and received the amplest promises in the blessing of the dying patriarch (Gen. xlix. 8, 22). When the twelve tribes issued from Egypt, only Judah and Joseph could muster each above 70,000 warriors. In the desert and in the conquest, Caleb and Joshua, the representatives of the two tribes, stand out side by side eminent among the leaders of the people. The blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 13) and the divine selection of Joshua inaugurated the greater prominence of Joseph for the next three centuries. Othniel, the successor of Joshua, was from Judah; the last, Samuel, was born among the Ephraimites. Within that period Ephraim supplied at Shiloh (Judg. xxi. 19) a resting-place for the ark, the centre of divine worship; and a rendezvous, or capital at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 1; Judg. ix. 2) for the whole people. Ephraim arrogantly claimed (Judg. viii. 1, xii. 1) the exclusive right of taking the lead against invaders. Royal authority was offered to one dweller in Ephraim (viii. 22), and actually exercised for three years by another (ix. 22). After a silent, perhaps sullen, acquiescence in the transfer of Samuel's authority with additional dignity to a Benjamite, they resisted for seven years (2 Sam. ii. 9–11) its passing into the hands of the popular Jewish leader, and yielded reluctantly to the conviction that the sceptre which seemed almost within their grasp was reserved at last for Judah. Even in David's reign their jealousy did not always slumber (2 Sam. xix. 43); and though Solomon's alliance and intercourse with Tyre must have tended to increase the loyalty of the northern tribes, they took the first opportunity to emancipate themselves from the rule of his son. Doubtless the length of Solomon's reign, and the clouds that gathered round the close of it (1 K. xi. 14–25), and possibly his increasing despotism (Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 395), tended to diminish the general popularity of the house of David; and the idolatry of the king alienated the affection of religious Israelites. But none of these was the immediate cause of the disruption. No aspiration after greater liberty, political privileges, or aggrandizement at the expense of other powers, no spirit of commercial enterprise, no breaking forth of pent-up energy seems to have instigated the movement. Ephraim proudly longed for independence, without considering whether or at what cost he could maintain it. Shechem was built as a capital, and Tirzah as a residence, for an Ephraimite king, by the people who murmured under the burden imposed upon them by the royal state of Solomon. Ephraim felt no patriotic pride in a national splendor of which Judah was the centre. The dwelling-place of God when fixed in Jerusalem ceased to be so honorable to him as of old. It was ancient jealousy rather than recent provocation, the opportune death of Solomon rather than unwillingness to incur taxation, the opportune return of a persecuted Ephraimite rather than any commanding genius for rule which Jeroboam possessed, that finally broke up the brotherhood of the children of Jacob. It was an outburst of human feeling so soon as that divine influence which restrained the spirit of disunion was withdrawn in consequence of the idolatry of Solomon, so soon as that stern prophetic voice which had called Saul to the throne under a protest, and David to the throne in repentance, was heard in anger summoning Jeroboam to divide the kingdom.

5. Disruption where there can be no expansion, or dismemberment without growth, is fatal to a state If England and America have prospered since 1783 it is because each found space for increase, and had vital energy to fill it. If the separation of east and west was but a step in the decline of the Roman empire, it was so because each portion was hemmed in by obstacles which it wanted vigor to surmount. The sources of life and strength begin to dry up; the state shrinks within itself, withers, and falls before some blast which once it might have braved.

The kingdom of Israel developed no new power. It was but a portion of David's kingdom deprived of many elements of strength. Its frontier was as open and as widely extended as before; but it wanted a capital for the seat of organized power. Its territory was as fertile and as tempting to the spoiler, but its people were less united and patriotic. A corrupt religion poisoned the source of national life. When less reverence attended on a new and unconsecrated king, and less respect was felt for an aristocracy reduced by the retirement of the Levites, the army which David found hard to control rose up unchecked in the exercise of its willful strength; and thus eight houses, each ushered in by a revolution, occupied the throne in quick succession. Tyre ceased to be an ally when the alliance was no longer profitable to the merchant-city. Moab and Ammon yielded tribute only while under compulsion. A powerful neighbor, Damascus, sat armed at the gate of Israel; and, beyond Damascus, might be discerned the rising strength of the first great monarchy of the world.

These causes tended to increase the misfortunes, and to accelerate the early end of the kingdom of Israel. It lasted 254 years, from B. C. 975 to B. C. 721, about two thirds of the duration of its more compact neighbor Judah.

But it may be doubted whether the division into two kingdoms greatly shortened the independent existence of the Hebrew race, or interfered with the purposes which, it is thought, may be traced in the establishment of David's monarchy. If among those purposes were the preservation of the true religion in the world, and the preparation of an agency adapted for the diffusion of Christianity in due season, then it must be observed — first, that as a bulwark providentially raised against the corrupting influence of idolatrous Tyre and Damascus, Israel kept back that contagion from Judah, and partly exhausted it before its arrival in the south; next, that the purity of divine worship was not impaired by the excision of those tribes which were remote from the influence of the Temple, and by the concentration of priests and religious Israelites within the southern kingdom; and lastly, that to the worshippers at Jerusalem the early decline and fall of Israel was a solemn and impressive spectacle of judgment — the working out of the great problem of God's toleration of idolatry. This prepared the heart of Judah for the revivals under Hezekiah and Josiah, softened them into repentance during the Captivity, and strengthened them for their absolute renunciation of idolatry, when after seventy years they returned to Palestine, to teach the world that there is a spiritual bond more efficacious than the occupancy of a certain soil for keeping up national existence, and to become the channel through which God's greatest gift was conveyed to mankind. [CAPTIVITY.]

6. The detailed history of the kingdom of Israel will be found under the names of its nineteen kings. [See also EPHRAIM.] A summary view may be taken in four periods: —

(a.) B. C. 975–929. Jeroboam had not sufficient force of character in himself to make a lasting impression on his people. A king, but not a founder of a dynasty, he aimed at nothing beyond securing his present elevation. Without any ambition to share in the commerce of Tyre, or to compete with the growing power of Damascus, or even to complete the humiliation of the helpless monarch whom he had deprived of half a kingdom, Jeroboam acted entirely on a defensive policy. He attempted to give his subjects a centre which they wanted for their political allegiance, in Shechem or in Tirzah. He sought to change merely so much of their ritual as was inconsistent with his authority over them. But as soon as the golden calves were set up, the priests and Levites and many religious Israelites (2 Chr. xi. 16) left their country, and the disastrous emigration was not effectually checked even by the attempt of Baasha to build a fortress (2 Chr. xvi. 6) at Ramah. A new priesthood was introduced (1 K. xii. 31) absolutely dependent on the king (Am. vii. 13), not forming as under the Mosaic law a landed aristocracy, not respected by the people, and unable either to withstand the oppression or to strengthen the weakness of a king. A priesthood created, and a ritual devised for secular purposes, had no hold whatever on the conscience of the people. To meet their spiritual cravings a succession of prophets was raised up, great in their poverty, their purity, their austerity, their self-dependence, their moral influence, but imperfectly organized; — a rod to correct and check the civil government, not, as they might have been under happier circumstances, a staff to support it. The army soon learned its power to dictate to the isolated monarch and disunited people. Baasha in the midst of the army at Gibbethon slew the son and successor of Jeroboam; Zimri, a captain of chariots, slew the son and successor of Baasha; Omri, the captain of the host, was chosen to punish Zimri; and after a civil war of four years he prevailed over Tibni, the choice of half the people.

(b.) B. C. 929–884. For forty-five years Israel was governed by the house of Omri. That sagacious king pitched on the strong hill of Samaria as the site of his capital. Damascus, which in the days of Baasha had proved itself more than a match for Israel, now again assumed a threatening attitude. Edom and Moab showed a tendency to independence, or even aggression. Hence the princes of Omri's house cultivated an alliance with the contemporary kings of Judah, which was cemented by the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah, and marked by the community of names among the royal children. Ahab's Tyrian alliance strengthened him with the counsels of the masculine mind of Jezebel, but brought him no further support. The entire rejection of the God of Abraham, under the disguise of abandoning Jeroboam's unlawful symbolism, and adopting Baal as the god of a luxurious court and subservient populace, led to a reaction in the nation, to the moral triumph of the prophets in the person of Elijah, and to the extinction of the house of Ahab in obedience to the bidding of Elisha.

(c.) B. C. 884–772. Unparalleled triumphs, but deeper humiliation, awaited the kingdom of Israel under the dynasty of Jehu. The worship of Baal was abolished by one blow; but, so long as the kingdom lasted, the people never rose superior to the debasing form of religion established by Jeroboam. Hazael, the successor of the two Benhadads, the ablest king of Damascus, reduced Jehoahaz to the condition of a vassal, and triumphed for a time over both the disunited Hebrew kingdoms. Almost the first sign of the restoration of their strength was a war between them; and Jehoash, the grandson of Jehu, entered Jerusalem as the conqueror of Amaziah. Jehoash also turned the tide of war against the Syrians; and Jeroboam II., the most powerful of all the kings of Israel, captured Damascus, and recovered the whole ancient frontier from Hamath to the Dead Sea. In the midst of his long and seemingly glorious reign the prophets Hosea and Amos uttered their warnings more clearly than any of their predecessors. The short-lived greatness expired with the last king of Jehu's line.

(d.) B. C. 772–721. Military violence, it would seem, broke off the hereditary succession after the obscure and probably convulsed reign of Zachariah. An unsuccessful usurper, Shallum, is followed by the cruel Menahem, who, being unable to make head against the first attack of Assyria under Pul, became the agent of that monarch for the oppressive taxation of his subjects. Yet his power at home was sufficient to insure for his son and successor Pekahiah a ten years' reign, cut short by a bold usurper, Pekah. Abandoning the northern and transjordanic regions to the encroaching power of Assyria under Tiglath-pileser, he was very near subjugating Judah, with the help of Damascus, now the coequal ally of Israel. But Assyria interposing summarily put an end to the independence of Damascus, and perhaps was the indirect cause of the assassination of the baffled Pekah. The irresolute Hoshea, the next and last usurper, became tributary to his invader, Shalmaneser, betrayed the Assyrian to the rival monarchy of Egypt, and was punished by the loss of his liberty, and by the capture, after a three years' siege, of his strong capital, Samaria. Some gleanings of the ten tribes yet remained in the land after so many years of religious decline, moral debasement, national degradation, anarchy, bloodshed, and deportation. Even these were gathered up by the conqueror and carried to Assyria, never again, as a distinct people, to occupy their portion of that goodly and pleasant land which their forefathers won under Joshua from the heathen.

scheme adopted in the margin of the English Version, which is founded on the calculations of Archbishop Ussher: column 5 being the computation of Clinton (Fasti Hellenici, iii. App. § 5); and column 6 being the computation of Winer (Realwörterbuch).

The numerous dates given in the Bible as the limits of the duration of the king's reigns act as a continued check on each other. The apparent discrepancies between them have been unduly exaggerated by some writers. To meet such difficulties various hypotheses have been put forward; — that an interregnum occurred; that two kings (father and son) reigned conjointly; that certain reigns were dated not from their real commencement, but from some arbitrary period in that Jewish year in which they commenced; that the Hebrew copyists have transcribed the numbers incorrectly, either by accident or design; that the original writers have made mistakes in their reckoning. All these are mere suppositions, and even the most probable of them must not be insisted on as if it were a historical fact. But in truth most of the discrepancies may be accounted for by the simple fact that the Hebrew annalists reckon in round numbers, never specifying the months in addition to the years of the duration of a king's reign. Consequently some of these writers seem to set down a fragment of a year as an entire year, and others omit such fragments altogether. Hence in computing the date of the commencement of each reign, without attributing any error to the writer or transcribers, it is necessary to allow for a possible mistake amounting to something less than two years in our interpretation of the indefinite phraseology of the Hebrew writers. But there are a few statements in the Hebrew text which cannot thus be reconciled.

(a.) There are in the Second Book of Kings three statements as to the beginning of the reign of Jehoram king of Israel, which in the view of some writers involve a great error, and not a mere numerical one. His accession is dated (1) in the second year of Jehoram king of Judah (2 K. i. 17); (2) in the fifth year before Jehoram king of Judah (2 K. viii. 16); (3) in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat (2 K. iii. 1). But these statements may be reconciled by the fact that Jehoram king of Judah had two accessions which are recorded in Scripture, and by the probable supposition of Archbishop Ussher that he had a third and earlier accession which is not recorded. These three accessions are, (1) when Jehoshaphat left his kingdom to go to the battle of Ramoth-Gilead, in his 17th year; (2) when Jehoshaphat (2 K. viii. 16) either retired from the administration of affairs, or made his son joint king, in his 23d year; (3) when Jehoshaphat died, in his 25th year. So that, if the supposition of Ussher be allowed, the accession of Jehoram king of Israel in Jehoshaphat's 18th year synchronized with (1) the second year of the first accession, and (2) the fifth year before the second accession of Jehoram king of Judah.

(b.) The date of the beginning of Uzziah's reign (2 K. xv. 1) in the 27th year of Jeroboam II. cannot be reconciled with the statement that Uzziah's father, Amaziah whose whole reign was 29 years only, came to the throne in the second year of Joash (2 K. xiv. 1), and so reigned 14 years contemporaneously with Joash and 27 with Jeroboam. Ussher and others suggest a reconciliation of these statements by the supposition that Jeroboam's reign had two commencements, the first not mentioned in Scripture, on his association with his father Joash, B. C. 837. But Keil, after Capellus and Grotius, supposes that בז is an error of the Hebrew copyists for מז, and that instead of 27th of Jeroboam we ought to read 15th.

(c.) The statements that Jeroboam II. reigned 41 years (2 K. xiv. 23) after the 15th year of Amaziah, who reigned 29 years, and that Jeroboam's son Zachariah came to the throne in the 38th year of Uzziah (2 K. xv. 8), cannot be reconciled without supposing that there was an interregnum of 11 years between Jeroboam and his son Zachariah. And almost all chronologists accept this as a fact, although it is not mentioned in the Bible. Some chronologists, who regard an interregnum as intrinsically improbable after the prosperous reign of Jeroboam, prefer the supposition that the number 41 in 2 K. xiv. 23 ought to be changed to 51, and that the number 27 in xv. 1 should be changed to 14, and that a few other corresponding alterations should be made.

(d.) In order to bring down the date of Pekah's murder to the date of Hoshea's accession, some chronologists propose to read 29 years for 20, in 2 K. xv. 27. Others prefer to let the dates stand as at present in the text, and suppose that an interregnum, not expressly mentioned in the Bible, occurred between those two usurpers. The words of Isaiah (ix. 20, 21) seem to indicate a time of anarchy in Israel.

The Chronology of the Kings has been minutely investigated by Abp. Ussher, Chronologia Sacra, Pars Posterior, De Annis Regum, Works, xii. 95–144; by Lightfoot, Order of the Texts of the O. T., Works, i. 77–130; by Hales, New Analysis of Chronology, ii. 372–447; by Clinton, l. c.; and by H. Browne, Ordo Seculorum. [See also D. ISRAELITE (יִשְׂרְאֵלִי: Ἰεζραηλίτης; [Vat. Ισραηλειτης; Ald. Ἰσραηλίτης;] Alex. Ισμαηλειτης: de Jesraëli). In 2 Sam. xvii. 25, Ithra, the father of Amasa, is called "an Israelite," or more correctly "the Israelite," while in 1 Chr. ii. 17 he appears as "Jether the Ishmaelite." The latter is undoubtedly the true reading, for unless Ithra had been a foreigner there would have been no need to express his nationality. The LXX. and Vulg. appear to have read יִזְרְעֵאלִי, "Jezreelite."

* "Israelite" also occurs in the A. V. as the rendering of אִישׁ יִשְׂרְאֵל, "man of Israel." Num. xxv. 14; and of Ἰσραηλίτης or Ἰσραηλείτης (Tisch. Treg.), John i. 47, Rom. xi. 1. "Israelites" is the translation of יִשְׂרְאֵל, used collectively, in Ex. ix. 7; Lev. xxiii. 42; Josh. iii. 17, xiii. 6 Judg. xx. 21; 1 Sam. ii. 14, xiii. 20, xiv. 21, xxv 1, xxix. 1; 2 Sam. iv. 1; 2 K. iii. 24, vii. 13; 1 Chron. ix. 2; — of Ἰσραήλ, Bar. iii. 4; 1 Macc. i. 43, 53, 58, iii. 46, vi. 18; — of υἱοὶ Ἰσραήλ, Jud. vi. 14; 1 Macc. vii. 23; — and of Ἰσραηλῖται οἱ -λεῖται, Rom. ix. 4; 2 Cor. xi. 22. ISSACHAR (יִשָּׂשכָר, [see infra], i. e. Isascar — such is the invariable spelling of the name in the Hebrew, the Samaritan Codex and Version, the Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-jonathan, but the Masorets have pointed it so as to supersede the second S, יִשָּׂשכָר, Issa [s] car: Ἰσσάχαρ; Rec. Text of N. T. Ἰσασχάρ, but Cod. C, Ἰσαχάρ [Cod. A, and Sin. Ἰσσαχαρ]; Joseph. Ἰσσάχαρις: Issachar), the ninth son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah; the firstborn to Leah after the interval which occurred in the births of her children (Gen. xxx. 17; comp. xxix. 35). As is the case with each of the sons the name is recorded as bestowed on account of a circumstance connected with the birth. But, as may be also noticed in more than one of the others, two explanations seem to be combined in the narrative, which even then is not in exact accordance with the requirements of the name. "God hath given me my hire (שָׂכָר, sâcâr) . . . and she called his name Issachar," is the record; but in verse 18 that "hire" is for the surrender of her maid to her husband — while in ver. 14–17 it is for the discovery and bestowal of the mandrakes. Besides, as indicated above, the name in its original form — Isascar — rebels against this interpretation, an interpretation which, to be consistent, requires the form subsequently imposed on the word Is-sachar.[a] The allusion is not again brought forward as it is with Dan, Asher, etc., in the blessings of Jacob and Moses. In the former only it is perhaps allowable to discern a faint echo of the sound of "Issachar" in the word shicmo — "shoulder" (Gen. xlix. 15).

Of Issachar the individual we know nothing. In Genesis he is not mentioned after his birth, and the few verses in Chronicles devoted to the tribe contain merely a brief list of its chief men and heroes in the reign of David (1 Chr. vii. 1–5).

At the descent into Egypt four sons are ascribed to him, who founded the four chief families of the tribe (Gen. xlvi. 13; Num. xxvi. 23, 25: 1 Chr. vii. 1). Issachar's place during the journey to Canaan was on the east of the Tabernacle with his brothers Judah and Zebulun (Num. ii. 5), the group moving foremost in the march (x. 15), and having a common standard, which, according to the Rabbinical tradition, was of the three colors of sardine, topaz, and carbuncle, inscribed with the names of the three tribes, and bearing the figure of a lion's whelp (see Targum Pseudojon. on Num. ii. 3). At this time the captain of the tribe was Nethaneel ben-Zuar (Num. i. 8, ii. 5, vii. 18, x. 15). He was succeeded by Igal ben-Joseph, who went as representative of his tribe among the spies (xiii. 7), and he again by Paltiel ben-Azzan, who assisted Joshua in apportioning the land of Canaan (xxxiv. 26). Issachar was one of the six tribes who were to stand on Mount Gerizim during the ceremony of blessing and cursing (Deut. xxvii. 12). He was still in company with Judah, Zebulun being opposite on Ebal. The number of the fighting men of Issachar when taken in the census at Sinai was 54,400. During the journey they seem to have steadily increased, and after the mortality at Peor they amounted to 64,300, being inferior to none but Judah and Dan. — to the latter by 100 souls only. The numbers given in 1 Chr. vii. 2, 4, 5 probably the census of Joab, amount in all to 145,600.

The Promised Land once reached, the connection between Issachar and Judah seems to have closed, to be renewed only on two brief occasions, which will be noticed in their turn. The intimate relation with Zebulun was however maintained. The two brother-tribes had their portions close together, and more than once they are mentioned in company. The allotment of Issachar lay above that of Manasseh. The specification of its boundaries and contents is contained in Josh. xix. 17–23. But to the towns there named must be added Daberath, given in the catalogue of Levitical cities (xxi. 28: Jarmuth here is probably the Remeth of xix. 21), and five others — Beth-shean, Ibleam, En-dor, Taanach, and Megiddo. These last, though the property of Manasseh, remained within the limits of Issachar (Josh. xvii. 11; Judg. i. 27), and they assist us materially in determining his boundary. In the words of Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 22), "it extended in length from Carmel to the Jordan, in breadth to Mount Tabor." In fact it exactly consisted of the plain of Esdraelon or Jezreel. The south boundary we can trace by En-gannim, the modern Jenîn, on the heights which form the southern inclosure to the Plain; and then, further westward, by Taanach and Megiddo, the authentic fragments of which still stand on the same heights as they trend away to the hump of Carmel. On the north the territory also ceased with the plain, which is there bounded by Tabor, the outpost of the hills of Zebulun. East of Tabor the hill-country continued so as to screen the tribe from the Sea of Galilee, but a continuous tract of level on the S. E. led to Beth-shean and the upper part of the Jordan valley. West of Tabor, again, a little to the south, is Chesulloth, the modern Iksâl, close to the traditional "Mount of Precipitation;" and over this the boundary probably ran in a slanting course till it joined Mount Carmel, where the Kishon (Josh. xix. 20) worked its way below the eastern bluff of that mountain — and thus completed the triangle at its western apex. Nazareth lies among the hills, a few [about two] miles north of the so-called Mount of Precipitation, and therefore escaped being in Issachar. Almost exactly in the centre of this plain stood Jezreel, on a low swell, attended on the one hand by the eminence of Mount Gilboa, on the other by that now called el-Duhy, or "little Hermon," the latter having Shunem, Nain, and En-dor on its slopes, names which recall some of the most interesting and important events in the history of Israel.

This territory was, as it still is, among the richest land in Palestine. Westward was the famous plain which derived its name, the "seed-plot of God" — such is the signification of Jezreel — from its fertility, and the very weeds of which at this day

[a] The words occur again almost identically in 2 Chr. xv. 7, and Jer. xxxi. 16: יֵשׁ שָׂכָר = "there is a reward for," A. V. "shall be rewarded."

An expansion of the story of the mandrakes, with curious details, will be found in the Testamentum Isachar, Fabricius, Cod. Pseudepigr. i. 620–623. They were ultimately deposited "in the house of the Lord," whatever that expression may mean.

testify to its enormous powers of production (Stanley, S. & P. p. 348). [ESDRAELON: JEZREEL.] On the north is Tabor, which even under the burning sun of that climate is said to retain the glades and dells of an English wood (ibid. p. 350). On the east, behind Jezreel, is the opening which conducts to the plain of the Jordan — to that Beth-shean which was proverbially among the Rabbis the gate of Paradise for its fruitfulness. It is this aspect of the territory of Issachar which appears to be alluded to in the Blessing of Jacob. The image of the "strong-boned he-ass" (חֲמֹר גָּרֶם) — the large animal used for burdens and field work, not the lighter and swifter she-ass for riding — "couching down between the two hedge-rows," [a] chewing the cud of stolid ease and quiet — is very applicable, not only to the tendencies and habits, but to the very size and air of a rural agrarian people, while the sequel of the verse is no less suggestive of the certain result of such tendencies when unrelieved by any higher aspirations: "He saw that rest was good and the land pleasant, and he bowed his back to bear, and became a slave [b] to tribute" — the tribute imposed on him by the various marauding tribes who were attracted to his territory by the richness of the crops. The Blessing of Moses completes the picture. He is not only "in tents" — in nomad or semi-nomad life — but "rejoicing" in them, and it is perhaps not straining a point to observe that he has by this time begun to lose his individuality. He and Zebulun are mentioned together as having part possession in the holy mountain of Tabor, which was on the frontier line of each (Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19). We pass from this to the time of Deborah: the chief struggle in the great victory over Sisera took place on the territory of Issachar, "by Taanach at the waters of Megiddo" (Judg. v. 19); but the allusion to the tribe in the song of triumph is of the most cursory nature, not consistent with its having taken any prominent part in the action.

One among the Judges of Israel was from Issachar — TOLA (Judg. x. 1) — but beyond the length of his sway we have only the fact recorded that he resided out of the limits of his own tribe — at Shamir in Mount Ephraim. By Josephus he is omitted entirely (see Ant. v. 7, § 6). The census of the tribe taken in the reign of David has already been alluded to. It is contained in 1 Chr. vii. 1–5, and an expression occurs in it which testifies to the nomadic tendencies above noticed. Out of the whole number of the tribe no less than 36,000 were marauding mercenary troops — "bands" (גְּדוּדִים) — a term applied to no other tribe in this enumeration, though elsewhere to Gad, and uniformly to the irregular bodies of the Bedouin nations round Israel.[c] This was probably at the close of David's reign. Thirty years before, when two hundred of the head men of the tribe had gone to Hebron to assist in making David king over the entire realm different qualifications are noted in them — they "had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do . . . and all their brethren were at their commandment." To what this "understanding of the times" was we have no clew. By the later Jewish interpreters it is explained as skill in ascertaining the periods of the sun and moon, the intercalation of months, and dates of solemn feasts, and the interpretation of the signs of the heavens (Targum, ad loc.; Jerome, Quæst. Hebr.). Josephus (Ant. vii. 2, § 2) gives it as "knowing the things that were to happen;" and he adds that the armed men who came with these leaders were 20,000. One of the wise men of Issachar, according to an old Jewish tradition preserved by Jerome (Quæst. Hebr. on 2 Chr. xvii. 16), was Amasiah son of Zichri, who with 200,000 men offered himself to Jehovah in the service of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 16): but this is very questionable, as the movement appears to have been confined to Judah and Benjamin. The ruler of the tribe at this time was Omri, of the great family of Michael (1 Chr. xxvii. 18; comp. vii. 3). May he not have been the forefather of the king of Israel of the same name — the founder of the "house of Omri" and of the "house of Ahab," the builder of Samaria, possibly on the same hill of Shamir on which the Issacharite judge, Tola, had formerly held his court? But whether this was so or not, at any rate one dynasty of the Israelite kings was Issacharite. BAASHA, the son of Ahijah, of the house of Issachar, a member of the army with which Nadab and all Israel were besieging Gibbethon, apparently not of any standing in the tribe (comp. 1 K. xvi. 2), slew the king, and himself mounted the throne (1 K xv. 27, &c.). He was evidently a fierce and warlike man (xv. 29; 2 Chr. xvi. 1), and an idolater like Jeroboam. The Issacharite dynasty lasted during the 24 years of his reign and the 2 of his son Elah. At the end of that time it was wrested from him by the same means that his father had acquired it, and Zimri, the new king, commenced his reign by a massacre of the whole kindred and connections of Baasha — he left him "not even so much as a dog" (xvi. 11).

One more notice of Issachar remains to be added to the meagre information already collected. It is fortunately a favorable one. There may be no truth in the tradition just quoted that the tribe was in any way connected with the reforms of Jehoshaphat, but we are fortunately certain that, distant as Jezreel was from Jerusalem, they took part in the passover with which Hezekiah sanctified the opening of his reign. On that memorable occasion a multitude of the people from the northern tribes, and amongst them from Issachar, although so long estranged from the worship of Jehovah as to have forgotten how to make the necessary purifications, yet by the enlightened wisdom of Hezekiah were allowed to keep the feast; and they did keep it seven days with great gladness — with such tumultuous joy as had not been known since the time of Solomon, when the whole land was one. Nor did they separate till the occasion had been signalized by an immense destruction of idolatrous altars and symbols, "in Judah and Benjamin, in Ephraim and Manasseh," up to the very confines of Issachar's own land — and then "all the children of Israel returned every man to his possession into their own cities" (2 Chr. xxxi. 1). It is a satisfactory farewell to take of the tribe. Within five years from this date Shalmaneser king of Assyria had invaded the north of Palestine, and after three years' siege had taken Samaria, and with the rest of Israel had carried Issachar away to his distant dominions. There we must be content to leave them until, with the rest of their brethren of all the tribes of the children of Israel (Dan only excepted), the twelve thousand of the tribe of Issachar shall be sealed in their foreheads (Rev. vii. 7).

[a] The word here rendered "hedge-rows" is one which only occurs in Judg. v. 16. The sense there is evidently similar to that in this passage. But as to what that sense is all the authorities differ. See Gesenius, Ben Zev, etc. The rendering given seems to be nearer the real force than any.

[b] לְמַס עֹבֵד. By the LXX. rendered ἀνὴρ γεωργός. Comp. their similar rendering of עֲבֹדָה (A. V. "servants," and "husbandry") in Gen. xxvi. 14

[c] The word "bands," which is commonly employed in the A. V. to render Gedudim, as above, is unfortunately used in 1 Chr. xii. 23 for a very different term, by which the orderly assembly of the fighting men of the tribes is denoted when they visited Hebron to make David king. This term is רָאשִׁי = "heads." We may almost suspect a mere misprint, especially as the Vulgate has principes. [The marginal rendering shows that it is not a misprint.]

2. (יִשָּׂשכָר: Ἰσσάχαρ: [Issachar.]) A Korhite Levite, one of the doorkeepers (A. V. "porters") of the house of Jehovah, seventh son of OBED-EDOM (1 Chr. xxvi. 5). G.

ISSHI'AH (יִשִּׁיָּה [whom Jehovah leads]). 1. (Vat. omits; Alex. Ιεσιας: Jesias.) A descendant of Moses by his younger son Eliezer; the head of the numerous family of Rehabiah, in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 21; comp. xxiii. 17, xxvi. 25). His name is elsewhere given as JESHAIAH. [ISHIAH.]

2 (Ἰσία; Alex. Ασια: Jesia.) A Levite of the house of Kohath and family of Uzziel; named in the list of the tribe in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 25).

* ISSUE OF BLOOD. [BLOOD, ISSUE OF.]

ISSUE, RUNNING. The texts Lev. xv. 2, 3, xxii. 4, Num. v. 2 (and 2 Sam. iii. 29, where the malady [a] is invoked as a curse), are probably to be interpreted of gonorrhœa. In Lev. xv. 3 a distinction is introduced, which merely means that the cessation of the actual flux does not constitute ceremonial cleanness, but that the patient must bide the legal time, 7 days (ver. 13), and perform the prescribed purifications and sacrifice (ver. 14). See, however, Surenhusius's preface to the treatise Zabim of the Mishna, where another interpretation is given. As regards the specific varieties of this malady, it is generally asserted that its most severe form (gon. virulenta) is modern, having first appeared in the 15th century. Chardin (Voyages en Perse, ii. 200) states that he observed that this disorder was prevalent in Persia, but that its effects were far less severe than in western climates. If this be true, it would go some way to explain the alleged absence of the gon. virul. from ancient nosology, which found its field of observation in the East, Greece, etc.; and to confirm the supposition that the milder form only was the subject of Mosaic legislation. But, beyond this, it is probable that diseases may appear, run their course, and disappear, and, for want of an accurate observation of their symptoms, leave no trace behind them. The "bed," "seat," etc. (Lev. xv. 5, 6, &c.), are not to be supposed regarded by that law as contagious, but the defilement extended to them merely to give greater prominence to the ceremonial strictness with which the case was ruled. In the woman's "issue" (ver. 19) the ordinary menstruation seems alone intended, supposed prolonged (ver. 25) to a morbid extent. The Scriptural handling of the subject not dealing, as in the case of leprosy, in symptoms, it seems gratuitous to detail them here: those who desire such knowledge will find them in any compendium of therapeutics. The references are Joseph. B. J. v. 5, § 6, vi. 9, § 3; Mishna, Celim, i. 3, 8; Maimon. ad Zabim, ii. 2: whence we learn that persons thus affected might not ascend the Temple-mount, nor share in any religious celebration, nor even enter Jerusalem. See also Michaelis, Laws of Moses, iv. 282. H. H

ISTALCU'RUS. In 1 Esdr. viii. 40, the "son of Istalcurus" (ὁ τοῦ Ἰσταλκούρου [Vat. Ἰσταλκαλκου]) is substituted for "and Zabbud" of the corresponding list in Ezra (viii. 14). The Kŏri has Ziccur instead of Zabbud, and of this there is perhaps some trace in Istalcurus.

IS'UAH (יִשְׁוָה, i. e. Ishvah [peaceful, quiet]: Σουιά; [Vat. Ισουα;] Alex. Ιεσουα: Jesua), second son of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 30). Elsewhere in the A. V. his name, though the same in Hebrew, appears as ISHUAH.

IS'UI (יִשְׁוִי, i. e. Ishvi [as above]: Vat. [Rom. (not in Vat.)] and Alex. Ἰεούλ: Jessui), third son of Asher (Gen. xlvi. 17); founder of a family called after him, though in the A. V. appearing as THE JESUITES (Num. xxvi. 44). Elsewhere the name also appears as ISHUAI.

* IT is used for its in Lev. xxv. 5 in the A. V. ed. 1611 ("That which groweth of it owne accord," etc.), as in the Genevan version, though its has been substituted here in later editions. This use of it was not uncommon in the English of the sixteenth century, and occurs 15 times in Shakespeare in the folio edition of 1623 (see the examples in Eastwood and Wright's Bible Word-Book, p. 273 f.). Its is not found in the original edition of the A. V., his being everywhere used in its place, with the single exception noted above. [ITS.] It was just beginning to come into use in the time of Shakespeare, in whose plays it occurs 10 times (commonly spelt it's). For fuller details, see Eastwood and Wright as above. A.

* ITALIAN BAND or COHORT (σπεῖρα Ἰταλική), Acts x. i. This topic has been alluded to under ARMY and ITALY, but demands a fuller notice. It is no longer questioned that the Roman cohorts were distinguished from each other as well as the legions, not by numbers only but by names. Five legions are known to have been called Italian, and at least one cohort (see Vömel's Schulprogramme, p. 7, 1850). No ancient writer, it is true, speaks of any cohort as bearing this name, stationed at Cæsarea. It certainly was not a cohort detached from the Italica Legio or Prima Italica mentioned by Tacitus (Hist. i. 59, 64; ii. 100, &c.); for that legion was raised by Nero (Dio Cass. l. 5, 24), and hence did not exist at the time of Peter's visit to the centurion, about A. D. 40–43. Yet Luke's accuracy here, though not confirmed by any direct evidence, is not left wholly unsupported. It so happens that one of Gruter's inscriptions speaks of a "Cohors militum Italicorum voluntaria, quæ est in Syria" (see Akerman, Numismatic Illustr. of the Narrative Portions of the N. T. p. 34). There was a class of soldiers in the Roman army who enlisted of their own accord, and were known as "voluntarii" in distinction from conscripts (see Pauly's Real-Encyk. vi. 2744).

[a] The expressions are, זֹב מִבְּשָׂרוֹ, or זָב alone, also רֵר בְּעֲשָׂרוֹ אֶת־זוֹבוֹ; and those of the LXX., ῥύσις ἐκ τοῦ σώματος, the verb γονορρύειν, or the adj γονορρύής, etc.

It is supposed, therefore, with good reason, that there was such a cohort at Cæsarea, at the time to which Luke's narrative refers, and that it was called Italian because it consisted of native Italians; whereas the other cohorts in Palestine were levied, for the most part, from the country itself (see Joseph. Ant. xiv. 15, § 10; B. J. i. 17, § 1). Ewald conjectures that this Italian cohort and the Augustan cohort (Acts xxvii. 1) may have been the same; but the fact that Luke employs different names is against that supposition, and so much the more because different cohorts are known to have been in Judæa at this time (Joseph. Ant. xix. 9, § 2; xx. 8, § 7). It is worthy of remark, as Tholuck observes (Glaubw. der Evang. Geschichte, p. 174), that Luke places this Italian cohort at Cæsarea. That city was the residence of the Roman procurator; and it was important that he should have there a body of troops on whose fidelity he could rely. We may add that, if the soldiers who composed this legion were Italians, no doubt Cornelius himself who commanded them was an Italian.

Writers on this topic refer, as the principal authority, to Schwartz, Dissertatio de cohorte Italica et Augusta, Altorf, 1720. IT'ALY (Ἰταλία: [Italia]). This word is used in the N. T. in the usual sense of the period, i. e. in its true geographical sense, as denoting the whole natural peninsula between the Alps and the Straits of Messina. For the progress of the history of the word, first as applied to the extreme south of the peninsula, then as extended northwards to the right bank of the Po, see the Dict. of Geogr. vol. ii. pp. 75, 76. From the time of the close of the Republic it was employed as we employ it now. In the N. T. it occurs three, or indeed, more correctly speaking, four times. In Acts x. 1, the Italian cohort at Cæsarea (ἡ σπεῖρα ἡ καλουμένη Ἰταλική, A. V. "Italian band"), consisting, as it doubtless did, of men recruited in Italy, illustrates the military relations of the imperial peninsula with the provinces. [ARMY.] In Acts xviii. 2, where we are told of the expulsion of Aquila and Priscilla with their compatriots "from Italy," we are reminded of the large Jewish population which many authorities show that it contained. Acts xxvii. 1, where the beginning of St. Paul's voyage "to Italy" is mentioned, and the whole subsequent narrative, illustrate the trade which subsisted between the peninsula and other parts of the Mediterranean. And the words in Heb. xiii. 24, "They of Italy (οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας) salute you," whatever they may prove for or against this being the region in which the letter was written (and the matter has been strongly argued both ways), are interesting as a specimen of the progress of Christianity in the west.

ITH'AI [2 syl.] (אִיתַי [with Jehovah]: Αἰρί. [Vat. Αιρει; FA. Αιθει; Alex.] Ηθου; [Ald. Ἠθαί Comp. Ἰθαΐ: Ethai), a Benjamite, son of Ribai of Gibeah, one of the heroes of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 31). In the parallel list of 2 Sam. xxiii the name is given as ITTAI. But Kennicott decides that the form Ithai is the original (Dissertation, ad loc.).

ITH'AMAR (אִיתָמָר [land of palms]: Ἰθαμάρ: Ithamar), the youngest son of Aaron (Ex. vi. 23). After the deaths of Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x. 1), Eleazar and Ithamar, having been admonished to show no mark of sorrow for their brothers' loss, were appointed to succeed to their places in the priestly office, as they had left no children (Ex. xxviii. 1, 40, 43; Num. iii. 3, 4; 1 Chr. xxiv. 2). In the distribution of services belonging to the Tabernacle and its transport on the march of the Israelites, the Gershonites had charge of the curtains and hangings, and the Merarites of the pillars, cords, and boards, and both of these departments were placed under the superintendence of Ithamar (Ex. xxxviii. 21; Num. iv. 21–33). These services were continued under the Temple system, so far as was consistent with its stationary character, but instead of being appropriated to families, they were divided by lot, the first lot being taken by the family of Eleazar, whose descendants were more numerous than those of Ithamar (1 Chr. xxiv. 4, 6). The high-priesthood passed into the family of Ithamar in the person of Eli, but for what reason we are not informed. It reverted into its original line in the person of Zadok, in consequence of Abiathar's participation in the rebellion of Adonijah. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy delivered to Samuel against Eli (1 Sam. ii. 31–35; 1 K. ii. 26, 27, 35; Joseph. Ant. viii. 1, § 3).

A descendant of Ithamar, by name Daniel, is mentioned as returning from captivity in the time of Artaxerxes (Ezr. viii. 2).

ITHI'EL (אִיתִיאֵל [God is with me]: Ἐθιήλ; [Vat. Alex. Αιθιηλ: FA. Ξεθιηλ:] Ethiel). 1. A Benjamite, son of Jesaiah (Neh. xi. 7).

2. (LXX. omit; Vulg. translates, cum quo est Deus.) One of two persons — Ithiel and Ucal — to whom Agur ben-Jakeh delivered his discourse (Prov. xxx. 1). [UCAL.]

ITH'MAH (יִתְמָה [orphanage]: Ἰεθαμά; [Vat. Εθμα; FA. Εθεμα:] Alex. Ιεθεμα: Jethma), a Moabite, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the enlarged list of Chronicles (1 Chr. xi. 46).

ITH'NAN (יִתְנָן [bestowed, given]; in both MSS. of the LXX. the name is corrupted by being attached to that next it: Ἀσαριωναΐν, Alex. Ἰθναζιφ: Jethnam), one of the towns in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 23), named with Kedesh and Telem (comp. 1 Sam. xv. 4), and therefore probably on the borders of the desert, if not actually in the desert itself. No trace of its existence has yet been discovered, nor does it appear to have been known to Jerome. The village Idna which recalls the name, is between Hebron and Beit-Jibrin, and therefore much too far north ITH'RA (יִתְרָא) [abundance, eminence]: Ἰεθέρ; [Vat. Alex.] Ἰοθαρ; Joseph. Ant. vii. 10, § 1, Ἰεθάφρος: Jetra), an Israelite (2 Sam. xvii. 25) or Ishmaelite (1 Chr. ii. 17, "Jether the Ishmeelite"); the father of Amasa by Abigail, David's sister. He was thus brother-in-law to David and uncle to Joab, Abishai, and Asahel, the three "sons of Zeruiah." There is no absolute means of settling which of these — Israelite or Ishmaelite — is correct; but there can be little doubt that the latter is so; the fact of the admixture of Ishmaelite blood in David's family being a fit subject for notice in the genealogies, whereas Ithra's being an Israelite would call for no remark. [JETHER.]

G.

* Keil and Delitzsch also (Books of Samuel, p. 433, Eng. transl.) read "Ishmaelite" for "Israelite," 2 Sam. xvii. 25. Wordsworth (Books of Samuel, p. 111) suggests that if "Israelite" be correct, Ithra may be so called because he belonged to one of the other tribes, and not to that of Judah into which he married. [ABIGAIL.] As to the question (not an easy one to answer) of his precise relationship to David in consequence of the marriage, see NAHASH. H.

ITH'RAN (יִתְרָן) [as above]). 1. (Ἰθράν, Ἰεθράμ; [Alex. Ἰεθραν; Vat. in 1 Chr., Γεθραμ:] Jethram, Jethran), a son of Dishon, a Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26; 1 Chr. i. 41); and probably a phylarch ("duke," A. V.) of a tribe of the Horim, as was his father (Gen. xxxvi. 30); for the latter was evidently a son of Seir (vv. 21 and 30), and not a son of Anah (ver. 25).

2. (Ἰεθρά; [Vat. Θερα; Alex. Ἰεθερ; Comp. Ald. Ἰεθράν:] Jethran), a descendant of Asher, in the genealogy contained in 1 Chr. vii. 30–40.

ITH'REAM (יִתְרְעָם) [residue of the people]: Ἰεθεραάμ, Ἰεθραάμ; [Vat. in 1 Chr., Ιθαραμ:] Alex. Ειεθερααμ, Ιεθραμ; Joseph. Γεθραάμης: Jethraam), a son of David, born to him in Hebron, and distinctly specified as the sixth, and as the child of "Eglah, David's wife" (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chr. iii. 3). In the ancient Jewish traditions Eglah is said to have been Michal, and to have died in giving birth to Ithream.

ITH'RITE, THE (הַיִּתְרִי) [patronym. from יֶתֶר]: ὁ Ἐθιραῖος, Ἐθεναῖος, Ἰεθρί; [Vat. Αιθειραιος, Εθθεναιος, Ηθηρει (FA. Ιθηρει:)] Alex. ο Εθραιος, Τεθριτης, Ιεθερι, Ιθηρει: Jethrites, Jethræus), the native of a place, or descendant of a man called Iether (according to the Hebrew mode of forming derivatives): the designation of two of the members of David's guard, Ira and Gareb (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chr. xi. 40). The Ithrite (A. V. "Ithrites" [Αἰθαλίμ, Vat. Alex. -λειμ: Jethrei]) is mentioned in 1 Chr. ii. 53 as among the "families of Kirjath-jearim;" but this does not give us much clew to the derivation of the term, except that it fixes it as belonging to Judah. The two Ithrite heroes of David's guard may have come from JATTIR, in the mountains of Judah, one of the places which were the "haunt" of David and his men in their freebooting wanderings, and where he had "friends" (1 Sam. xxx. 27; comp. 31). Ira has been supposed to be identical with "Ira the Jairite," David's priest (2 Sam xx. 26) — the Syriac version reading "from Jatir" in that place. But nothing more than conjecture can be arrived at on the point.

* ITS. [HIS; IT.]

ITTAH-KA'ZIN (עִתָּה קָצִין): ἐπὶ πόλει Κατασέμ; Alex. . . . . Κασιμ: Thacosin), one of the landmarks of the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 13), named next to Gath-hepher. Like that place (A. V. "Gittah-hepher") the name is probably Eth-kazin, with the Hebrew particle of motion (ah) added — i. e. "to Eth-kazin." Taken as Hebrew the name bears the interpretation time, or people, of a judge (Ges. Thes. p. 1083 b). It has not been identified. G.

ITTAI [2 syl.] (אִתַּי) [in time, opportunely present]). 1. (Ἐθί, and so Josephus; [Vat. Σεθθει:] Alex. Εθθει: Ethai.) "ITTAI THE GITTITE," i. e. the native of Gath, a Philistine in the army of King David. He appears only during the revolution of Absalom. We first discern him on the morning of David's flight, while the king was standing under the olive-tree below the city, watching the army and the people defile past him. [See DAVID, vol. i. p. 563 a.] Last in the procession came the 600 heroes who had formed David's band during his wanderings in Judah, and had been with him at Gath (2 Sam. xv. 18; comp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 13, xxvii. 2, xxx. 9, 10; and see Joseph. Ant. vii. 9, § 2). Amongst these, apparently commanding them, was Ittai the Gittite (ver. 19). He caught the eye of the king, who at once addressed him and besought him as "a stranger and an exile," and as one who had but very recently joined his service, not to attach himself to a doubtful cause, but to return "with his brethren" and abide with the king" (19, 20). But Ittai is firm; he is the king's slave (עֶבֶד, A. V. "servant"), and wherever his master goes he will go. Accordingly he is allowed by David to proceed, and he passes over the Kedron with the king (xv. 22, LXX.), with all his men, and "all the little ones that were with him." These "little ones" (כָּל־הַטַּף) "all the children") must have been the families of the band, their "households" (1 Sam. xxvii. 3). They accompanied them during their wanderings in Judah, often in great risk (1 Sam. xxx. 6), and they were not likely to leave them behind in this fresh commencement of their wandering life.

When the army was numbered and organized by David at Mahanaim, Ittai again appears, now in command of a third part of the force, and (for the time at least) enjoying equal rank with Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. xviii. 2, 5, 12). But here, on the eve of the great battle, we take leave of this valiant and faithful stranger; his conduct in the fight and his subsequent fate are alike unknown to us. Nor is he mentioned in the lists of David's captains and of the heroes of his body-guard (see 2 Sam. xxiii.; 1 Chr. xi.), lists which are possibly of a date previous to Ittai's arrival in Jerusalem.

An interesting tradition is related by Jerome (Quest. Hebr. on 1 Chr. xx. 2). "David took the crown off the head of the image of Milcom (A. V. 'their king'). But by the law it was forbidden to any Israelite to touch either gold or silver of an idol. Wherefore they say that Ittai a The meaning of this is doubtful. "The king" may be Absalom, or it may be Ittai's former king Achish. By the LXX the words are omitted the Gittite, who had come to David from the Philistines, was the man who snatched the crown from the head of Milcom; for it was lawful for a Hebrew to take it from the hand of a man, though not from the head of the idol." The main difficulty to the reception of this legend lies in the fact that if Ittai was engaged in the Ammonite war, which happened several years before Absalom's revolt, the expression of David (2 Sam. xv. 20), "thou camest but yesterday," loses its force. However, these words may be merely a strong metaphor.

From the expression "thy brethren" (xv. 20) we may infer that there were other Philistines besides Ittai in the six hundred; but this is uncertain. Ittai was not exclusively a Philistine name, nor does "Gittite"—as in the case of Obed-edom, who was a Levite—necessarily imply Philistine parentage. Still David's words, "stranger and exile," seem to show that he was not an Israelite.

2. (Ἐσθαΐ; [Vat. Εσθαει; Comp. Ald. Ἐσθί:] Ithai.) Son of Ribai, from Gibeah of Benjamin; one of the thirty heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 29). In the parallel list of 1 Chr. xi. the name is given as ITHAI. G.

ITURÆ'A (Ἰτουραία [from יְתוּר, enclosure, nomadic camp, Ges.]), a small province on the northwestern border of Palestine, lying along the base of Mount Hermon. In Luke iii. 1 it is stated that Philip was "tetrarch of Ituræa and the region of Trachonitis;" and this is the only mention in Scripture of the district under its Greek name. But the country became historic long before the rule of the Herodian family or the advent of the Greeks. JETUR (יְתוּר) was a son of Ishmael, and he gave his name, like the rest of his brethren, to the little province he colonized (Gen. xxv. 15, 16). In after years, when the Israelites had settled in Canaan, a war broke out between the half-tribe of Manasseh and the Hagarites (or Ishmaelites), Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab. The latter were conquered, and the children of Manasseh "dwelt in the land, and they increased from Bashan unto Baal-Hermon." They already possessed the whole of Bashan, including Gaulanitis and Trachonitis; and now they conquered and colonized the little province of Jetur, which lay between Bashan and Mount Hermon (1 Chr. v. 19–23). Subsequent history shows that the Ishmaelites were neither annihilated nor entirely dispossessed, for in the second century B. C., Aristobulus, king of the Jews, reconquered the province, then called by its Greek name Ituræa, and gave the inhabitants their choice of Judaism or banishment (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 11, § 3). While some submitted, many retired to their own rocky fastnesses, and to the defiles of Hermon adjoining. Strabo says that in his day the mountainous regions in the kingdom of Chalcis were inhabited partly by Ituræans, whom he describes as κακοῦργαι πάντες (xvi. pp. 518, 520). Other early writers represent them as skillful archers and daring plunderers (Cic. Phil. ii. 44; Virg. Georg. ii. 448; Lucan. Phar. vii. 230). Ituræa, with the adjoining provinces, fell into the hands of a chief called Zenodorus; but, about B. C. 20, they were taken from him by the Roman emperor, and given to Herod the Great (Joseph. Ant. xv. 10, § 1), who bequeathed them to his son Philip (Ant. xvii. 8, § 1; Luke iii. 1; comp. Joseph. B. J. ii. 3, § 3).

The passages above referred to point clearly to the position of Ituræa, and show, notwithstanding the arguments of Reland and others (Reland, p. 106; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. s. v. Ituræa), that it was distinct from Auranitis. Pliny rightly places it north of Bashan and near Damascus (v. 23);[a] and J. de Vitry describes it as adjoining Trachonitis, and lying along the base of Libanus between Tiberias and Damascus (Gesta Dei, p. 1074; comp. pp. 771, 1003). At the place indicated is situated the modern province of Jedûr (جيدور), which is just the Arabic form of the Hebrew Jetur (יְתוּר). It is bounded on the east by Trachonitis, on the south by Gaulanitis, on the west by Hermon, and on the north by the plain of Damascus. It is tableland with an undulating surface, and has little conical and cup-shaped hills at intervals. The southern section of it has a rich soil, well watered by numerous springs and streams from Hermon. The greater part of the northern section is entirely different. The surface of the ground is covered with jagged rocks; in some places heaped up in huge piles, in others sunk into deep pits; at one place smooth and naked, at another seamed with yawning chasms in whose rugged edges rank grass and weeds spring up. The rock is all basalt, and the formation similar to that of the Lejah. [ARGOB.] The molten lava seems to have issued from the earth through innumerable pores, to have spread over the plain, and then to have been rent and shattered while cooling (Porter's Handbook, p. 465). Jedûr contains thirty-eight towns and villages, ten of which are now entirely desolate, and all the rest contain only a few families of poor peasants, living in wretched hovels amid heaps of ruins (Porter's Damascus, ii. 272 ff.). J. L. P.

* Yet there is some dissent from this view of the identity of Jetur (Gen. xxv. 15) and Jedûr, and hence of the situation of Ituræa as being on the northeastern slope of Jebel Heisch, one of the spurs of Hermon. The German traveller in the Hauràn, Dr. Wetzstein, though he regards Jetur and Ituræa as unquestionably the same, maintains that Jetur and Jedûr, or Gedûr, are not identical, partly on account of the difference in the names (generally considered unimportant), and partly because the Ituræans, as described by ancient writers, must have been a more hardy and powerful race than the inhabitants of a few villages in a comparatively low region like Gedûr, and poorly protected against invasion and subjugation. He places Ituræa further south, on the summits and on the eastern declivity of the central mountains of the Hauràn, now inhabited by a portion of the Druzes, one of the most warlike tribes of the East. He holds that the Biblical Jetur, though now lost, was among these mountains, and belonged to an Ishmaelitic tribe, as stated in Gen. xxv. 12 ff. He argues, also, that a little district like Gedûr, so near to Damascus, would be under the jurisdiction of that city, and not form part of an independent tetrarchy. The farms and villages there at present are owned by patrician families of Damascus. See this author's Reisebericht über Hauràn und die Trachonen, pp. 88–92. The derivation of Gedûr from Jetur, says the writer on "Ituræa," in Zeller's Bibl. Wörterb., s. v. (2te Aufl.), has not yet been shown. If the ancient name still remains, it certainly favors the finding of Ituræa in Gedûr, as does also its being assigned by some of the ancient writers to Cœle-Syria. Yet Cœle-Syria, it should be said, is a vague designation, and was sometimes used so as to embrace nearly all inner Syria from Damascus to Arabia (see Winer's Bibl. Realw. i. 232, 3te Aufl.). Dr. Robinson (Phys. Geogr. p. 319) follows the common representation. See, to the same effect, Raumer's Palästina, p. 227, 4te Aufl. For a paper on "Bashan, Ituræa, and Kerath," by Mr. Porter, author of the above article, see Bibl. Sacra, xiii. 789–808. H.

[a] Pliny assigns Ituræa to Cœle-Syria in H. N. v. 19, but does not refer to it in v. 23. H.

IVAH, or AVA (עִוָּה [destruction, ruins, Ges.]: Ἀβά, [in Is. (with Hena), Ἀναγουγάνα, Vat. (with Hena) Ἀναγουγανα; Comp. Ἀουάν; in 2 K. xviii., Vat. omits, Alex. Ανα; in xix., Vat. Ουδου, Alex. Αυτα:] Ava), which is mentioned in Scripture twice (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13; comp. Is. xxxvii. 13; in connection with Hena and Sepharvaim, and once (2 K. xvii. 24) in connection with Babylon and Cuthah, must be sought in Babylonia, and is probably identical with the modern Hît, which is the Ἴς of Herodotus (i. 179). This town lay on the Euphrates, between Sippara (Sepharvaim) and Anah (Hena), with which it seems to have been politically united shortly before the time of Sennacherib (2 K. xix. 13). It is probably the Ahava (אַהָוָא) of Ezra (viii. 15). The name is thought to have been originally derived from that of a Babylonian god, Iva, who represents the sky or Æther, and to whom the town is supposed to have been dedicated (Sir H. Rawlinson, in Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 606, note). In this case Ivvah (עִוָּה) would seem to be the most proper pointing. The pointing Ava, or rather Avva (עַוָּא), shows a corruption of articulation, which might readily pass on to Ahava (אַהָוָא). In the Talmud the name appears as Ihih (יהיא); and hence would be formed the Greek Ἴς, and the modern Hît, where the t is merely the feminine ending. Isidore of Charax seems to intend the same place by his Ἀεί-πολις (Mans. Parth. p. 5). Some have thought that it occurs as Ist in the Egyptian Inscriptions of the time of Thothmes III., about B. C. 1450 (Birch, in Otia Ægyptiaca, p. 80).

This place has always been famous for its bitumen springs. It is bitumen which is brought to Thothmes III. as tribute from Ist. From Is, according to Herodotus, was obtained the bitumen used as cement in the walls of Babylon (l. s. c.). Isidore calls Aeipolis "the place where are the bitumen springs" (ἔνθα ἀσφαλτίτιδες πηγαί). These springs still exist at Hît, and sufficiently mark the identity of that place with the Herodotean Is, and therefore probably with the Ivah of Scripture. They have been noticed by most of our Mesopotamian travellers (see, among others, Rich's First Memoir on Babylon, p. 64, and Chesney's Euphrates Expedition, i. 55). G. R.

IVORY (שֵׁן, shên, in all passages, except 1 K. x. 22, and 2 Chr. ix. 21, where שֵׁנְהַבִּים, shenhabbîm, is so rendered). The word shên literally signifies the "tooth" of any animal, and hence more especially denotes the substance of the projecting tusks of elephants. By some of the ancient nations these tusks were imagined to be horns (Ez. xxvii. 15; Plin. viii. 4, xviii. 1), though Diodorus Siculus (i. 55) correctly calls them teeth As they were first acquainted with elephants through their ivory, which was an important article of commerce, the shape of the tusks, in all probability, led them into this error. It is remarkable that no word in Biblical Hebrew denotes an elephant, unless the latter portion of the compound shenhabbîm be supposed to have this meaning. Gesenius derives it from the Sanscrit ibhas, "an elephant;" Keil (on 1 K. x. 22) from the Coptic eboy; while Sir Henry Rawlinson mentions a word habba, which he met with in the Assyrian inscriptions, and which he understands to mean "the large animal," the term being applied both to the elephant and the camel (Journ. of As. Soc. xii. 463). It is suggested in Gesenius' Thesaurus (s. v.) that the original reading may have been שֵׁן הַבְּנִים, "ivory, ebony" (cf. Ez. xxvii. 15). Hitzig (Isaiah, p. 643), without any authority, renders the word "nubischen Zahn." The Targum Jonathan on 1 K. x. 22 has שֵׁן דְּפִיל, "elephant's tusk," while the Peshito gives simply "elephants." In the Targum of the Pseudo Jonathan, Gen. l. 1 is translated, "and Joseph placed his father upon a bier of שִׁנְדְּפִין" (shindâphin), which is conjectured to be a valuable species of wood, but for which Buxtorf, with great probability, suggests as another reading שֵׁן דְּפִיל, "ivory."

The Assyrians appear to have carried on a great traffic in ivory. Their early conquests in India had made them familiar with it, and (according to one rendering of the passage) their artists supplied the luxurious Tyrians with carvings in ivory from the isles of Chittim (Ez. xxvii. 6). On the obelisk in the British Museum the captives or tribute bearers are represented as carrying tusks. Among the merchandise of Babylon, enumerated in Rev. xviii. 12. are included "all manner vessels of ivory." The skilled workmen of Hiram, king of Tyre, fashioned the great ivory throne of Solomon, and overlaid it with pure gold (1 K. x. 18; 2 Chr. ix. 17). The ivory thus employed was supplied by the caravans of Dedan (Is. xxi. 13; Ez. xxvii. 15), or was brought with apes and peacocks by the navy of Tharshish (1 K. x. 22). The Egyptians, at a very early period, made use of this material in decoration. The cover of a small ivory box in the Egyptian collection at the Louvre is "inscribed with the prænomen Nefer-ka-re, or Neper-cheres, adopted by a dynasty found in the upper line of the tablet of Abydos, and attributed by M. Bunsen to the fifth. . . . In the time of Thothmes III. ivory was imported in considerable quantities into Egypt, either 'in boats laden with ivory and ebony' from Ethiopia, or else in tusks and cups from the Ruten-nu. . . . The celebrated car at Florence has its linchpins tipped with ivory" (Birch, in Trans. of Roy. Soc. of Lit. iii. 2d series). The specimens of Egyptian ivory work, which are found in the principal museums of Europe, are, most of them, in the opinion of Mr. Birch, of a date anterior to the Persian invasion, and some even as old as the 18th dynasty.

The ivory used by the Egyptians was principally brought from Ethiopia (Herod. iii. 114), though their elephants were originally from Asia. The Ethiopians, according to Diodorus Siculus (i. 55), brought to Sesostris "ebony and gold, and the teeth of elephants." Among the tribute paid by them to the Persian kings were "twenty large tusks of ivory" (Herod. iii. 97). In the Periplus of the Red Sea (c. 4), attributed to Arrian, Coloe (Cadai) is said to be "the chief mart for ivory." It was thence carried down to Adouli (Zulla, or Thulla), a port on the Red Sea, about three days' journey from Coloe, together with the hides of hippopotami, tortoise-shell, apes, and slaves (Plin. vi. 34). The elephants and rhinoceroses, from which it was obtained, were killed further up the country, and few were taken near the sea, or in the neighborhood of Adouli. At Ptolemais Theron was found a little ivory like that of Adouli (Peripl. c. 3). Ptolemy Philadelphus made this port the depôt of the elephant trade (Plin. vi. 34). According to Pliny (viii. 10), ivory was so plentiful on the borders of Ethiopia that the natives made door-posts of it, and even fences and stalls for their cattle. The author of the Periplus (c. 16) mentions Rhapta as another station of the ivory trade, but the ivory brought down to this port is said to have been of an inferior quality, and "for the most part found in the woods, damaged by rain, or collected from animals drowned by the overflow of the rivers at the equinoxes" (Smith, Dict. Geogr. art. Rhapta). The Egyptian merchants traded for ivory and onyx stones to Barygaza, the port to which was carried down the commerce of Western India from Ozene (Peripl. c. 49).

In the early ages of Greece ivory was frequently employed for purposes of ornament. The trappings of horses were studded with it (Hom. Il. v. 584); it was used for the handles of keys (Od. xxi. 7), and for the bosses of shields (Hes. Sc. Herc. 141, 142). The "ivory house" of Ahab (1 K. xxii. 39) was probably a palace, the walls of which were panelled with ivory, like the palace of Menelaus described by Homer (Odys. iv. 73; cf. Eur. Iph. Aul. 583, ἐλεφαντοδέτοι δόμοι. Comp. also Am. iii. 15, and Ps. xlv. 8, unless the "ivory palaces" in the latter passage were perfume boxes made of that material, as has been conjectured). Beds inlaid or veneered with ivory were in use among the Hebrews (Am. vi. 4; cf. Hom. Od. xxiii. 200), as also among the Egyptians (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii. 169). The practice of inlaying and veneering wood with ivory and tortoise-shell is described by Pliny (xvi. 84). The great ivory throne of Solomon, the work of the Tyrian craftsmen, has been already mentioned (cf. Rev. xx. 11); but it is difficult to determine whether the "tower of ivory" of Cant. vii. 4 is merely a figure of speech, or whether it had its original among the things that were. By the luxurious Phœnicians ivory was employed to ornament the boxwood rowing benches (or "hatches" according to some) of their galleys (Ez. xxvii. 6). Many specimens of Assyrian carving in ivory have been found in the excavations at Nimroud, and among the rest some tablets "richly inlaid with blue and opaque glass, lapis lazuli, etc." (Bonomi, Nineveh and its Palaces, p. 334; cf. Cant. v. 14). Part of an ivory staff, apparently a sceptre, and several entire elephants' tusks were discovered by Mr. Layard in the last stage of decay, and it was with extreme difficulty that these interesting relics could be restored (Nin. and Bab. p. 195).

IVY (κισσός: hedera), the common Hedera Helix, of which the ancient Greeks and Romans describe two or three kinds, which appear to be only varieties. Mention of this plant is made only in 2 Macc. vi. 7, where it is said that the Jews were compelled, when the feast of Bacchus was kept, to go in procession carrying ivy to this deity, to whom it is well known this plant was sacred. Ivy, however, though not mentioned by name, has a peculiar interest to the Christian, as forming the "corruptible crown" (1 Cor. ix. 25) for which the competitors at the great Isthmian games contended, and which St. Paul so beautifully contrasts with the "incorruptible crown" which shall hereafter encircle the brows of those who run worthily the race of this mortal life. In the Isthmian contests the victor's garland was either ivy or pine.

IZ'EHAR ['Ισσάαρ: Jesaar]. The form in which the name Izhar is given in the A. V. of Num. iii. 19 only. In ver. 27 the family of the same person is given as Izeharites. The Hebrew word is the same as Izhar.

IZ'EHARITES, THE (הַיִּצְהָרִי: ὁ Ἰσσάαρ; Alex. ο Σααρ: Jesaarite). A family of Kohathite Levites, descended from Izhar the son of Kohath (Num. iii. 27); called also in the A. V. "Izharites." W. A. W.

IZ'HAR (spelt Izehar in Num. iii. 19, of A. V.; in Heb. always יִצְהָר [oil, and perh. one anointed with oil]: Ἰσσάαρ and [1 Chr. vi. 38, xxiii. 12, 18,] Ἰσάαρ [but here Vat. Alex. read Ισσααρ; Vat. in Ex. iii. 19, Ισσαχαρ]: Isaar), son of Kohath, grandson of Levi, uncle of Aaron and Moses, and father of Korah (Ex. vi. 18, 21; Num. iii. 19, xvi. 1; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18). But in 1 Chr. vi. 22 Amminadab is substituted for Izhar, as the son of Kohath and father of Korah, in the line of Samuel. This, however, must be an accidental error of the scribe, as in ver. 38, where the same genealogy is repeated, Izhar appears again in his right place. The Cod. Alex. in ver. 32 reads Izhar [Ισσααρ] in place of Amminadab, and the Aldine and Complut. read Amminadab between Izhar and Kore, making another generation. But these are probably only corrections of the text. (See Burrington's Genealogies of the O. T.) Izhar was the head of the family of the IZHARITES or IZEHARITES (Num. iii. 27; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23, 29), one of the four families of the Kohathites.

A. C. H.

IZ'HARITES, THE (הַיִּצְהָרִי: ὁ Ἰσσααρί, Ἰσσαάρ, ὁ Ἰσσααρί; [Vat. in 1 Chr. xxiv. 22, xxvi. 29, Ισσαρει:] Alex. ο Ισσααρι, Ισσαρι, ο Ικααρι: Isaari, Isaarite). The same as the preceding. In the reign of David, Shelomith was the chief of the family (1 Chr. xxiv. 22), and with his brethren had charge of the treasure dedicated for the Temple (1 Chr. xxvi. 23, 29). W. A. W.

IZRAHI'AH (יִזְרַחְיָה [Jehovah causes to sprout forth or appear]: Ἰεζραΐα, Ἐζραΐα; [Vat. Ζαρεια:] Alex. Ιεζρια: Izrahia), a man of Issachar, one of the Bene-Uzzi [sons of U.], and father of four, or five — which, is not clear — of the principal men in the tribe (1 Chr. vii. 3).

IZ'RAHITE, THE (הַזַּרְחִי, i. e. "the Izrach" [indigenous, native, Ges., First]: ὁ Ἰεσραέ, [Vat. Εσραε:] Alex. Ιεζραελ: Jezerites), the designation of Shamhuth, the captain of the fifth monthly course as appointed by David (1 Chr. xxvii 8). In its present form the Hebrew will not bear the interpretation put on it in the A. V. Its real force is probably Zerahite, that is, from the great Judaic family of ZERAH — the Zarhites.

* IZ'REËL in Josh. xix. 18 in the A. V. ed. 1611. It is the common form in the Genevan version. A.

IZ'RI (יִזְרִי, i. e. "the Itsrite [Jehovah creates, Fürst]:" Ἰεσρί; [Vat. Ἰεσδρει:] Alex. Ἰεσδρι: Isari), a Levite, leader of the fourth course or ward in the service of the house of God (1 Chr. xxv. 11). In ver. 3 he is called ZERI.

J.

JA'AKAN (יַעֲקָן [one sagacious, intelligent, Fürst]: Ἰακίμ; [Vat.] Alex. Ἰακειμ: Jacan), the forefather of the Bene-Jaakan, round whose wells the children of Israel encamped after they left Mosera, and from which they went on to Hor-Hagidgad (Deut. x. 6). Jaakan was son of Ezer, the son of Seir the Horite (1 Chr. i. 42). The name is here given in the A. V. as JAKAN, though without any reason for the change. In Gen. xxxvi. 27 it is in the abbreviated form of AKAN. The site of the wells has not been identified. Some suggestions will be seen under BENE-JAAKAN. G.

JAAKO'BAH (יַעֲקֹבָה: Ἰωκαβά; Alex. Ἰακαβα: Jacoba), one of the princes (נְשִׂיאִים) of the families of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 36). Excepting the termination, the name is identical with that of JACOB.

* Fürst makes this name = "to Jacob," i. e. reckoned to him. It is the unaccented paragogic ה־, appended to a class of proper names in the later Hebrew. (Hebr. und Chald. Handw. s. v.) H.

JA'ALA (יַעֲלָא [wild she-goat]: Ἰελήλ; [Alex. FA. Ιεαηλ:] Jahala). Bene-Jaala [sons of J.] were among the descendants of "Solomon's slaves" who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 58). The name also occurs as —

JA'ALAH (יַעֲלָה [as above]: Ἰεηλά; Alex. Ιελα: Jala), Ezr. ii. 56; and in Esdras as JEELI.

JA'ALAM (יַעְלָם: whom God hides, Ges.: Ἰεγλάμ: Ihelon, Ihelom), a son of Esau by his wife AHOLIBAMAH (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; cf. 1 Chr. i 35), and a phylarch (A. V. "duke") or head of a tribe of Edom. E. S. P.

JA'ANAI [3 syl.] (יַעְנַי: [whom Jehovah answers]: Ἰανίν; [Vat. Ιανειν;] Alex. Ἰαναι: Janai), a chief man in the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. v. 12). The LXX. have connected the following name, Shaphat, to Jaanai, and rendered it as I. ὁ γραμματεύς.

JA'ARE-OR'EGIM (יַעְרֵי אֹרְגִים [see infra]: Ἀριωργίμ; [Vat. Alex. -γειμ:] Saltus polymitarius), according to the present text of 2 Sam. xxi. 19, a Bethlehemite, and the father of Elhanan who slew Goliath (the words "the brother of," are added in the A. V.). In the parallel passage, 1 Chr. xx. 5, besides other differences Jair is found instead of Jaare, and Oregim is omitted. Oregim is not elsewhere found as a proper name nor is it a common word; and occurring as it does without doubt at the end of the verse (A. V. "weavers"), in a sentence exactly parallel to that in 1 Sam. xvii. 7, it is not probable that it should also occur in the middle of the same. The conclusion of Kennicott (Dissertation, 80) appears a just one — that in the latter place it has been interpolated from the former, and that Jair or Jaor is the correct reading instead of Jaare. [ELHANAN, vol. i. p. 697 a.]

Still the agreement of the ancient versions with the present Hebrew text affords a certain corroboration to that text, and should not be overlooked. [JAIR.]

The Peshito, followed by the Arabic, substitutes for Jaare-Oregim the name "Malaph the weaver," to the meaning of which we have no clew. The Targum, on the other hand, doubtless anxious to avoid any apparent contradiction of the narrative in 1 Sam. xvii., substitutes David for Elhanan, Jesse for Jaare, and is led by the word Oregim to relate or possibly to invent a statement as to Jesse's calling — "And David son of Jesse, weaver of the veils of the house of the sanctuary, who was of Bethlehem, slew Goliath the Gittite." By Jerome Jaare is translated by saltus, and Oregim by polymitarius (comp. Quæst. Hebr. on both passages). In Josephus's account (Ant. vii. 12, § 2) the Israelite champion is said to have been "Nephan the kinsman of David" (Νεφάνος ὁ συγγενὴς αὐτοῦ); the word kinsman perhaps referring to the Jewish tradition of the identity of Jair and Jesse, or simply arising from the mention of Bethlehem.

In the received Hebrew text Jaare is written with a small or suspended ר, showing that in the opinion of the Masorets that letter is uncertain.

JA'ASAU (יַעְשָׂו, but the Keri has יִעְשׂי, i. e. Jaasai [Jehovah makes, or is maker]: and so the Vulg. Jasi), one of the Bene-Bani who had married a foreign wife, and had to put her away (Ezr. x. 37). In the parallel list of 1 Esdras the name is not recognizable. The LXX. had a different text — καὶ ἐποίησαν = וַיַּעְשׂוּ.

JAA'SIEL (יַעֲשִׂיאֵל [whom God created]: Ἰασιήλ; [Vat. Ασειηρ:] Alex. Ασιηλ: Jasiel), son of the great Abner, ruler (נָגִיד) or "prince" (שַׂר) of his tribe of Benjamin, in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 21).

JAAZANI'AH (יַאֲזַנְיָה and יַאֲזַנְיָהוּ [whom Jehovah hears]). 1. YA'AZAN-YA'HU (Ἰεζονίας; [Vat. Οζονιας:] Jezonias), one of the "captains of the forces" who accompanied Johanan ben-Kareah to pay his respects to Gedaliah at Mizpah after the fall of Jerusalem (2 K. xxv. 23), and who appears afterwards to have assisted in recovering Ishmael's prey from his clutches (comp. Jer. xli. 11). After that, he probably went to Egypt with the rest (Jer. xliii. 4, 5). He is described as the "son of the (not 'a') Maachathite." In the narrative of Jeremiah the name is slightly changed to JEZANIAH.

2. YA'AZAN-YA'HU (Ἰεζονίας; Alex. Ιεζονιας: Jezonias), son of Shaphan: leader of the band of seventy of the elders of Israel, who were seen by Ezekiel worshipping before the idols on the wall of the court of the house of Jehovah (Ez. viii. 11). It is possible that he is identical with —

3. YA'AZAN-YAH' (Ἰεχονίας: Jezonias), son of Azur; one of the "princes" (שָׂרֵי) of the people against whom Ezekiel was directed to prophesy (Ez. xi. 1).

4. YA'AZAN-YAH' (Ἰεχονίας: Jezonias), a Rechabite, son of Jeremiah. He appears to have been the sheikh of the tribe at the time of Jeremiah's interview with them (Jer. xxxv. 3). [JEHONADAB.]

JA'AZER and JA'ZER [helper, Ges.; or place hedged about, Fürst: see infra]. (The form of this name is much varied both in the A. V. and the Hebrew, though the one does not follow the other. In Num. xxxii. it is twice given Jazer and once Jaazer, the Hebrew being in all three cases יַעְזֵר [?], i. e. Ya'ezzer. Elsewhere in Numbers and in Josh. xiii. it is Jaazer; but in Josh. xxi., in 2 Sam. xxiv., Isaiah and Jeremiah, Jazer: the Hebrew in all these is יַעְזֵר, Ya'ezer. In Chronicles it is also Jazer; but here the Hebrew is in the extended form of יַעְזִיר, Ya'ezeir, a form which the Samar. Codex also presents in Num. xxxii. The LXX. have Ἰαζήρ, but once [2 Sam. xxiv. 5] Ἐλιέζερ, Alex. Ελιαζηρ — including the affixed Heb. particle, [and in 1 Chr. vi. 81, Vat. Γαζερ; xxvi. 31, Vat. Ριαζηρ, Alex. Γαζηρ:] Vulg. Jazer, Jaser, [Jezer]). A town on the east of Jordan, in or near to Gilead (Num. xxxii. 1, 3; 1 Chr. xxvi. 31). We first hear of it in possession of the Amorites, and as taken by Israel after Heshbon, and on their way from thence to Bashan (Num. xxi. 32).[a] It was rebuilt subsequently by the children of Gad (xxxii. 35), and was a prominent place in their territory (Josh. xiii. 25; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5). It was allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 39; 1 Chr. vi. 31), but in the time of David it would appear to have been occupied by Hebronites, i. e. descendants of Kohath (1 Chr. xxvi. 31). It seems to have given its name to a district of dependent or "daughter" towns (Num. xxi. 32, A. V. "villages;" 1 Macc. v. 8), the "land of Jazer" (Num. xxxii. 1). In the "burdens" proclaimed over Moab by Isaiah and Jeremiah, Jazer is mentioned so as to imply that there were vineyards there, and that the cultivation of the vine had extended thither from SIBMAH (Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32). In the latter passage, as the text at present stands, mention is made of the "Sea of Jazer" (יַם יַעְזֵר). This may have been some pool or lake of water, or possibly is an ancient corruption of the text, the LXX. having a different reading — πόλις Ἰ. (See Gesenius, Jesaia, i. 550.)

Jazer was known to Eusebius and Jerome, and its position is laid down with minuteness in the Onomasticon as 10 (or 8, s. voc. Ἀζωρ) Roman miles west of Philadelphia (Ammân), and 15 from Heshbon, and as the source of a river which falls into the Jordan. Two sites bearing the names of Chürbet Szâr and es-Szir, on the road westward of Amman, were pointed out to Seetzen in 1806 (Reisen, 1854, i. 397, 398). The latter of these was passed also by Burckhardt (Syr. 364) at 2½ hours below Fuheis going south. The ruins appear to have been on the left (east) of the road, and below them and the road is the source of the Wâ'ly Szîr (صير), or Mojeb es-Szîr (Seetzen), answering though certainly but imperfectly, to the ποταμὸς μέγιστος of Eusebius. Seetzen conjectures that the sea of Jazer may have been at the source of this brook, considerable marshes or pools sometimes existing at these spots. (Comp. his early suggestion of the source of the Wady Serka, p. 393.) Szir, or Seir, is shown on the map of Van de Velde as 9 Roman miles W. of Ammân, and about 12 from Heshbon. And here, until further investigation, we must be content to place Jazer. G.

JAAZI'AH (יַעֲזִיָּהוּ, i. e. Yaaziya'hu [whom Jehovah consoles]: Ὀζία; [Vat. Οζεια:] Oziau), apparently a third son, or a descendant, of Merari the Levite, and the founder of an independent house in that family (1 Chr. xxiv. 26, 27); neither he nor his descendants are mentioned elsewhere (comp. the lists in xxiii. 21-23; Ex. vi. 19, &c.). The word Beno (בְּנוֹ), which follows Jaaziah, should probably be translated "his son," i. e. the son of Merari.

JAA'ZIEL (יַעֲזִיאֵל [whom God consoles]: Ὀζιήλ [Vat. FA. -ζει-]; Alex. Ιηουλ: Jaziel), one of the Levites of the second order who were appointed by David to perform the musical service before the ark (1 Chr. xv. 18). If AZIEL in ver. 20 is a contracted form of the same name — and there is no reason to doubt it (comp. Jesharelah and Asharelah, 1 Chr. xxv. 2, 14) — his business was to "sound the psaltery on Alamoth."

* In the A. V. ed. 1611 the name is written Jaziel, as in the Bishops' Bible and the Vulgate. A.

JA'BAL (יָבָל [a stream]: Ἰωβήλ; [Alex. Ιωβελ:] Jabel), the son of Lamech and Adah (Gen. iv. 20) and brother of Jubal. Though descended from a dweller in a city (ver. 17), he is described as the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle. Bochart (Hieroz. i. ii. c. 44, near the end) points out the difference between his mode of life and Abel's. Jabal's was a migratory life, and his possessions probably included other animals besides sheep. The shepherds who were before him may have found the land on which they dwelt sufficiently productive for the constant sustenance of their flocks in the neighborhood of their fixed abodes. W. T. B.

JAB'BOK (יַבֹּק [streaming forth, flowing, Sim. Ges.]: [Ἰαβόκ; in Gen. xxxii. 22, Rom.] Ἰαβόχ: Jaboc, [Jeboc]), a stream which intersects the mountain range of Gilead (comp. Josh. xii. 2, and 5), and falls into the Jordan about midway between the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. There is some difficulty in interpreting two or three passages of Scripture in which the Jabbok is spoken of as "the border of the children of Ammon." The following facts may perhaps throw some light upon them: — The Ammonites at one time possessed the whole country between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, from the Jordan on the west to the wilderness on the east. They were driven out of it by Sihon king of the Amorites; and he was in turn expelled by the Israelites. Yet long subsequent to these events, the country was popularly called "the

and of the Ammonites," and was even claimed by them (Judg. xi. 12–22). For this reason the Jabbok is still called "the border of the children of Ammon" in Deut. iii. 16, and Josh. xii. 2. Again, when the Ammonites were driven out by Sihon from their ancient territory, they took possession of the eastern plain, and of a considerable section of the eastern defiles of Gilead, around the sources and upper branches of the Jabbok. Rabbath-Ammon, their capital city (2 Sam. xi.), stood within the mountains of Gilead, and on the banks of a tributary to the Jabbok. This explains the statement in Num. xxi. 24 — "Israel possessed his (Sihon's) land from Arnon unto Jabbok, unto the children of Ammon (עַד־בְּנֵי עַמּוֹן), for the border of the children of Ammon was strong" — the border among the defiles of the upper Jabbok was strong. This also illustrates Deut. ii. 37, "Only unto the land of the children of Ammon thou camest not, unto every place of the torrent Jabbok (כָּל־יַד נַחַל יַבֹּק), and unto the cities in the mountains, and every place which the Lord our God forbad."

It was on the south bank of the Jabbok the interview took place between Jacob and Esau (Gen. xxxii. 22); and this river afterwards became, towards its western part, the boundary between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Josh. xii. 2, 5). Eusebius rightly places it between Gerasa and Philadelphia (Onom. s. v.); and at the present day it separates the province of Belka from Jebel Ajlûn. Its modern name is Wady Zurka. It rises in the plateau east of Gilead, and receives many tributaries from both north and south in the eastern declivities of the mountain-range — one of these comes from Gerasa, another from Rabbath-Ammon; but all of them are mere winter streams. The Zurka cuts through Gilead in a deep, narrow defile. Throughout the lower part of its course it is fringed with thickets of cane and oleander, and the banks above are clothed with oak-forests. Towards its mouth the stream is perennial, and in winter often impassable. J. L. P.

* For other notices of the Jabbok, its history and scenery, the reader may see Robinson's Phys. Geogr. pp. 57, 156 f.; Tristram's Land of Israel, pp. 476, 563 (2d ed.); Stanley's S. & P. p. 290 (Amer. ed.); Porter's Handbook of Syria, p. 310 f.; and Lynch's Expedition to the Dead Sea, p. 253. The ford of Jabbok which Jacob crossed with his family on his return from Mesopotamia (Gen. xxxii. 13 ff.) is pointed out at Kubiat Serka, on the great Damascus road through Gilead. A legend which contradicts the Biblical account assigns the passage to the Jordan, north of the Sea of Galilee. See Ritter's Geogr. of Palestine, Gage's transl. ii. 228. The depression which marks the valley of the Zerka (Jabbok) can be seen from the heights near Bethel (Rob. Res. i. 444, 2d ed.). H.

JA'BESH (יָבֵשׁ) [dry, parched]: Ἰαβίς; [Vat. Ἰαβεις;] Alex. Αβεις, Ἰαβεις; Joseph. Ἰαβῆσος: Jabes). 1. Father of SHALLUM, the 15th king of Israel (2 K. xv. 10, 13, 14).

2. [Vat. Ἰαβεις; Alex. in 1 Sam., Ειαβεις: in 1 Chr., Ἰαβεις.] The short form of the name JABESH-GILEAD (1 Chr. x. 12 only). [The short form also occurs in 1 Sam. xi. 1, 3, 5, 9, 10, xxxi. 12, 13. — A.]

JA'BESH-GIL'EAD (יָבֵשׁ גִּלְעָד), also יָבִישׁ, 1 Sam. xi. 1, 9, &c., dry, from יָבֵשׁ, to be dry; [1 Sam. xi. 1, 2 Sam. xxi. 12,] Ἰαβίς [Vat. Alex. -βεις] Γαλαάδ; [1 Sam. xi. 9, Ἰαβις (Vat -βεις); Alex. Ειαβεις Γαλααδ; 1 Sam. xxxi. 11 2 Sam. ii. 4, 5, Ἰαβις (Vat. -βεις, Alex. Ειαβεις τῆς Γαλααδίτιδος (Vat. -δει-); 1 Chr. x. 11 Γαλαάδ:] Jabes Galaad), or Jabesh in the territory of Gilead. [GILEAD.] In its widest sense Gilead included the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr xxvii. 21) as well as the tribes of Gad and Reuben (Num. xxxii. 1–42) east of the Jordan — and of the cities of Gilead, Jabesh was the chief. It is first mentioned in connection with the cruel vengeance taken upon its inhabitants for not coming up to Mizpeh on the occasion of the fierce war between the children of Israel and the tribe of Benjamin. Every male of the city was put to the sword, and all virgins — to the number of 400 — seized to be given in marriage to the 600 men of Benjamin that remained (Judg. xxi. 8–14). Nevertheless the city survived the loss of its males; and being attacked subsequently by Nahash the Ammonite, gave Saul an opportunity of displaying his prowess in its defense, and silencing all objections made by the children of Belial to his sovereignty (1 Sam. xi. 1–15). Neither were his exertions in behalf of this city unrequited; for when he and his three sons were slain by the Philistines in Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 8), the men of Jabesh-Gilead came by night and took down their corpses from the walls of Beth-shan where they had been exposed as trophies; then burnt the bodies, and buried the bones under a tree near the city — observing a strict funeral fast for seven days (ibid. 13). David does not forget to bless them for this act of piety towards his old master, and his more than brother (2 Sam. ii. 5); though he afterwards had their remains translated to the ancestral sepulchre in the tribe of Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 14). As to the site of the city, it is not defined in the O. T., but Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) places it beyond Jordan, 6 miles from Pella on the mountain-road to Gerasa; where its name is probably preserved in the Wady Yabes, which, flowing from the east, enters the Jordan below Beth-shan or Scythopolis. According to Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. iii. 319), the ruin ed-Deir, on the S. side of the Wady, still marks its site. E. S. Ff.

JA'BEZ (יַעְבֵּץ) [who causes sorrow, Ges.; possibly a high place, Fürst]: Ἰάβις; [Vat. Γαμεσαρ;] Alex. Γαβης: Jabes), apparently a place at which the families of the scribes (סֹפְרִים) resided, who belonged to the families of the Kenites (1 Chr. ii. 55). It occurs among the descendants of Salma, who was of Judah, and closely connected with Bethlehem (ver. 51), possibly the father of Boaz; and also — though how is not clear — with Joab. The Targum states some curious particulars, which, however, do not much elucidate the difficulty, and which are probably a mixture of trustworthy tradition and of mere invention based on philological grounds. Rechab is there identified with Rechabiah the son of Eliezer, Moses' younger son (1 Chr. xxvi. 25), and Jabez with Othniel the Kenezzite, who bore the name of Jabez "because he founded by his counsel (עֲיָצָה) a school (תַּרְגִּיסָא) of disciples called Tirathites, Shimeatnites, and Sucathites." See also the quotations from Tal nud, Temurah, in Buxtorf's Lex. col. 966, where a similar derivation is given.

2. [Ἰγαβήs; Alex. Ιαγβης, Γαβης.] The name occurs again in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 9, 10) in a passage of remarkable detail inserted in a genealogy again connected with Bethlehem (ver. 4). Here a different force is attached to the name. It is made to refer to the sorrow (יֶעֶצֶב, otzeb) with which his mother bore him, and also to his prayer that evil may not grieve (עָצַב) him. Jabez was "more honorable than his brethren," though who they were is not ascertainable. It is very doubtful whether any connection exists between this genealogy and that in ii. 50–55. Several names appear in both — Hur, Ephratah, Bethlehem, Zareathites (in A. V. iv. 2 inaccurately "Zorathites"), Joah, Caleb; and there is much similarity between others, as Rechab and Rechah, Eshton and Eshtaulites; but any positive connection seems undemonstrable. The Targum repeats its identification of Jabez and Othniel.

These passages in the Targums are worthy of remark, not only because they exemplify the same habit of playing on words and seeking for derivations which is found in the above and many other passages of the Bible, both early and late, but also because, as often as not, the puns do not now exist in the Rabbinical Hebrew in which these paraphrases are written, although they appear if that Rabbinical Hebrew is translated back into Biblical Hebrew. There are several cases of this in the Targum above quoted, namely, on 1 Chr. ii. 55 (see Tirathim, Socathim, etc.), and others in the Targum on Ruth, in the additions to the genealogy at the end of that book. One example will show what is intended. "Obed (עוֹבֵד) was he who served the Lord of the world with a perfect heart." "Served" in Biblical Hebrew is יעבד, from the same root as Obed, but in the dialect of the Targum it is דפלח, so that the allusion (like that in Coleridge's famous pun) exists, as it stands, neither for the eye nor the ear. G.

JA'BIN (יָבִין) [intelligent, Fürst; one whom God observes, Ges.]: Ἰαβίs; [Vat. Alex. Ιαβεις: Jabin]). 1. King of Hazor, a royal city in the north of Palestine, near the waters of Merom, who organized a confederacy of the northern princes against the Israelites (Josh. xi. 1–3). He assembled an army, which the Scripture narrative merely compares to the sands for multitude (ver. 4), but which Josephus reckons at 300,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 20,000 chariots. Joshua, encouraged by God, surprised this vast army of allied forces "by the waters of Merom" (ver. 7; near Kedesh, according to Josephus), utterly routed them, cut the hoof-sinews of their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire at a place which from that circumstance may have derived its name of MISREPHOTH-MAIM (Hervey, On the Genealogies, p. 228). [MISREPHOTH-MAIM.] It is probable that in consequence of this battle the confederate kings, and Jabin among them, were reduced to vassalage, for we find immediately afterwards that Jabin is safe in his capital. But during the ensuing wars which occupied some time, Josh. xi. 18), Joshua "turned back," and perhaps on some fresh rebellion of Jabin, inflicted on him a signal and summary vengeance, making Hazor an exception to the general rule of not burning the conquered cities of Canaan (xi. 1–14; Joseph. Ant. v. 1, § 18; Ewald, Gesch. ii. 328).

2. [In Judg., Ἰαβίν (Vat. -βειν); Alex. Ιαμειν, Ιαβειν; in Ps., Ἰαβείν.] A king of Hazor, whose general Sisera was defeated by Barak, whose army is described in much the same terms as that of his predecessor (Judg. iv. 3, 13), and who suffered precisely the same fate. We have already pointed out the minute similarity of the two narratives (Josh. xi.; Judg. iv., v.), and an attentive comparison of them with Josephus (who curiously omits the name of Jabin altogether in his mention of Joshua's victory, although his account is full of details) would easily supply further points of resemblance. [BARAK; DEBORAH.] It is indeed by no means impossible that in the course of 150 years Hazor should have risen from its ashes, and even reassumed its preëminence under sovereigns who still bore the old dynastic name. But entirely independent considerations show that the period between Joshua and Barak could not have been 150 years, and indeed tend to prove that those two chiefs were contemporaries (Hervey, Genesl. p. 228); and we are therefore led to regard the two accounts of the destruction of Hazor and Jabin as really applying to the same monarch, and the same event. What is to prevent us from supposing that Jabin and his confederate kings were defeated both by Joshua and by Barak, and that distinct accounts of both victories were preserved? The most casual reader of the narrative cannot but be struck by the remarkable resemblance between the two stories. There is no ground whatever to throw doubts on the historical veracity of the earlier narrative, as is done by Hasse (p. 129), Maurer (ad loc.), Studer (on Judges, p. 90), and De Wette (Einl. p. 231), according to Keil, on Josh. xi. 10–15; and by Rosenmüller (Schol. Jos. xi. 11); but when the chronological arguments are taken into consideration, we do not (in spite of the difficulties which still remain) consider Hävernick successful in removing the improbabilities which beset the common supposition that this Jabin lived long after the one which Joshua defeated. At any rate we cannot agree with Winer in denouncing any attempt to identify them with each other as the ne plus ultra of uncritical audacity. F. W. F.

JAB'NEËL (יַבְנְאֵל [God permits or causes to build]). The name of two towns in Palestine.

1. (In O. T. Λεβνά; [Vat. Λεμνα;] Alex. Ιαβνηλ; in Apocr. Ἰαμνεία: Jebneel, Jamnia.) One of the points on the northern boundary of Judah, not quite at the sea, though near it[a] (Josh. xv. 11). There is no sign, however, of its ever having been occupied by Judah. Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 22) attributes it to the Danites. There was a constant struggle going on between that tribe and the Philistines for the possession of all the places in the lowland plain [DAN], and it is not surprising that the next time we meet with Jabneel it should be in the hands of the latter (2 Chr. xxvi. 6). Uzziah dispossessed them of it, and demolished its fortifications. Here it is in the shorter form of [a] In Josh. xv. 46, after the words "from Ekron," the LXX. add Ἰαμνα', Jabneh, instead of "even unto the sea;" probably reading יַבְנֶה for the present word יָמָּה.

JABNEH. In its Greek garb, IAMNIA, it is frequently mentioned in the Maccabees (1 Macc. iv. 15, v. 58, x. 69, xv. 40), in whose time it was again a strong place. According to Josephus (Ant. xii. 8, § 6) Gorgias was governor of it; but the text of the Maccabees (2 Macc. xii. 32) has Idumæa. At this time there was a harbor on the coast, to which, and the vessels lying there, Judas set fire, and the conflagration was seen at Jerusalem, a distance of about 25 miles (2 Macc. xii. 9). The harbor is also mentioned by Pliny, who in consequence speaks of the town as double — duæ Jamnes (see the quotations in Reland, p. 823). Like Ascalon and Gaza, the harbor bore the title of Majumas, perhaps a Coptic word, meaning the "place on the sea" (Reland, p. 590, &c.; Raumer, p. 174, note, 184, note; Kenrick, Phœnicia, pp. 27, 29). At the time of the fall of Jerusalem, Jabneh was one of the most populous places of Judæa, and contained a Jewish school of great fame,[a] whose learned doctors are often mentioned in the Talmud. The great Sanhedrim was also held here. In this holy city, according to an early Jewish tradition, was buried the great Gamaliel. His tomb was visited by Parchi in the 14th century (Zunz, in Asher's Benj. of Tudela, ii. 439, 440; also 98). In the time of Eusebius, however, it had dwindled to a small place, πολίχνη, merely requiring casual mention (Onomasticon). In the 6th century, under Justinian, it became the seat of a Christian bishop (Epiphanius, adv. Hær. lib. ii. 730). Under the Crusaders it bore the corrupted name of Ibelin, and gave a title to a line of Counts, one of whom, Jean d'Ibelin, about 1250, restored to efficiency the famous code of the "Assises de Jérusalem" (Gibbon. ch. 58 ad fin.; also the citations in Raumer, Palästina, p. 185).

The modern village of Yebna, or more accurately Ibna (يبنا), stands about two miles from the sea, on a slight eminence just south of the Nahr Rubin. It is about 11 miles south of Jaffa, 7 from Ramleh, and 4 from Akir (Ekron). It probably occupies its ancient site, for some remains of old buildings are to be seen, possibly relics of the fortress which the Crusaders built there (Porter, Handbook, p. 274). G.

* Raumer (Palästina, p. 203, 4te Aufl.) regards Jabneel and Jabneh as probably the same. Fürst (Handw. i. 479) denies that they are the same, regarding Jabneh indeed as represented by Yebna, but the site of Jabneel as lost. The traveller going from Esdud (Ashdod) to Yâfa (Joppa) passes near Yebna, conspicuous on a hill to the right, at the foot of which is a well from which the water is raised by a large wheel. The women of the village may be seen here in picturesque groups, with their water-skins and jars, at almost any hour. A slab of antique marble forms the front-piece of the watering-trough, and other similar fragments lie scattered here and there. At a little distance further south occur a few remains of a Roman aqueduct. The Gamaliel whose tomb is shown at Yebna (see above) must be understood to be Gamaliel the younger, a grandson of the great Gamaliel who was Paul's teacher. (See Sepp's Jerus. und das heil. Land, ii. 501.) The origin, studies, and fame of the Jewish school established at Jamnia or Yebna after the destruction of Jerusalem form an important chapter in the history of rabbinical and Biblical literature. Lightfoot furnishes an outline of the subject (Opp. ii. pp. 141–144, Amsterd 1686). The best modern account of this seminary and its influence on the philosophy and religious ideas of the Jews is probably that of Dr. H. Graetz in the opening chapter of his Geschichte der Juden, vol. iv. (Berlin, 1853). The reader may see also Jost's Geschichte der Israeliten, iii. 185 ff.; and Dean Milman's History of the Jews, vol. ii. bk. xvii. (Amer. ed.). H.

2. (Ἰεφθαμαί; Alex. Ιαβνηλ; [Comp. Ἰαβνηήλ:] Jebnaël.) One of the landmarks on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33, only). It is named next after Adami-Nekeb, and had apparently Lakkum between it and the "outgoings" of the boundary at the Jordan. But little or no clew can be got from the passage to its situation. Doubtless it is the same place which, as Ἰαμνεία (Vita, § 37), and Ἰαμνίθ (B. J. ii. 20, § 6), is mentioned by Josephus among the villages in Upper Galilee, which, though strong in themselves (κατρώδεις οὔσας), were fortified by him in anticipation of the arrival of the Romans. The other villages named by him in the same connection are Meroth, Achabare, or the rock of the Achabari, and Seph. Schwarz (p. 181) mentions that the later name of Jabneel was Kefr Yamah,[b] the village by the sea. Taking this with the vague indications of Josephus, we should be disposed to look for its traces at the N. W. part of the Sea of Galilee, in the hill country. G.

JAB'NEH (יַבְנֶה [he lets or causes to build]: Ἰαβνήφ; [Vat. Αβεννηρ;] Alex. Ιαβεις: Jabnia), 2 Chr. xxvi. 6. [JABNEEL.]

JA'CHAN (יָכָן [affliction or afflicted]: Ἰωαχάν; [Vat. Χιμα:] Alex. Ιαχαν: Jachan), one of seven chief men of the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. v. 13).

JA'CHIN (יָכִין [he shall establish]: in Kings, Ἰαχούμ, Alex. Ιαχουν; but in Chr. Κατόρθωσις in both MSS.; Josephus, Ἰαχίν: Jachin, Jachim), one of the two pillars which were set up "in the porch" (1 K. vii. 21) or before the temple (2 Chr. iii. 17) of Solomon. It was the "right-hand" one of the two; by which is probably meant the south (comp. 1 K. vii. 39). However, both the position and the structure of these famous columns are full of difficulties, and they will be most suitably examined in describing the TEMPLE. Interpreted as a Hebrew word Jachin signifies firmness [See BOAZ 2.]

JA'CHIN (יָכִין [as above]: Ἀχείν, Ἰαχείν, Ἰαχίν; [in Num., Vat. Alex. Ιαχειν; in Gen. and Ex.,] Alex. Ιαχειμ: Jachin). 1. Fourth son of Simeon (Gen. xlvi. 10; Ex. vi. 15); founder of the family of the JACHINITES (Num. xxvi. 12).

2. [In 1 Chr. ix. and Neh., Ἰαχίν, Vat. Alex. Ιαχειν; in 1 Chr. xxiv., Ἀχίμ, Vat. Αχειμ, Alex. Ιαχειν.] Head of the 21st course of priests in the time of David. Some of the course returned from Babylon (1 Chr. ix. 10, xxiv. 17; Neh. xi.

[a] * Graetz (Geschichte der Juden, iv. 13) speaks of this idea of a renowned Jewish school at Jabneh before the fall of Jerusalem as unfounded. All its celebrity, if not its existence, was subsequent to that event. H.

[b] Can the name in the Vat. LXX. (given above) be a corruption of this? It can hardly be corrupted from Jamnia or Jabneel.

10). [JOIARIB.] Jacimus, the original name of Alcimus (1 Macc. vii. 5, &c.; Joseph. Ant. xii., ix. § 7), who was the first of his family that was high-priest, may possibly have been in Hebrew Jachin, though the κ more properly suggests Jakim.

Ἀχείμ, ACHIM (Matt. i. 14), seems also to be the same name. A. C. H.

JA'CHINITES, THE (הַיָּכִינִי [see above]: Ἰαχινί [Vat. -νει]; Alex. ὁ Ιαχειμι: familia Jachinitarum), the family founded by JACHIN, son of Simeon (Num. xxvi. 12).

JACINTH (ὑάκινθος: hyacinthus), a precious stone, forming one of the foundations of the walls of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20). It seems to be identical with the Hebrew leshem (לֶשֶׁם, A. V. "ligure"), which was employed in the formation of the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 19). The jacinth or hyacinth is a red variety of zircon, which is found in square prisms, of a white, gray, red, reddish-brown, yellow, or pale-green color. Ligurite is a crystallized mineral of a yellowish-green or apple-green hue, found in Liguria, and thence deriving its name. It was reputed to possess an attractive power similar to that of amber (Theophrast. Lapp. 28), and perhaps the Greek λιγύριον, which the LXX. gives, was suggested by an apparent reference to this quality (as if from λείχειν, "to lick"). The expression in Rev. ix. 17, "of jacinth," applied to the breastplate, is descriptive simply of a hyacinthine, i. e. dark-purple color, and has no reference to the stone. W. L. B.

JA'COB (יַעֲקֹב = supplanter: Ἰακώβ: Jacob), the second son of Isaac and Rebekah. He was born with Esau, when Isaac was 59 and Abraham 159 years old, probably at the well Lahai-roi. His history is related in the latter half of the book of Genesis. He grew up a quiet, domestic youth, the favorite son of his mother. He bought the birthright from his brother Esau; and afterwards, at his mother's instigation, acquired the blessing intended for Esau, by practicing a well-known deceit on Isaac. Hitherto the two sons shared the wanderings of Isaac in the South Country; but now Jacob, in his 78th year, was sent from the family home, to avoid his brother, and to seek a wife among his kindred in Padan-aram. As he passed through Bethel, God appeared to him. After the lapse of 21 years he returned from Padan-aram with two wives, two concubines, eleven sons, and a daughter, and large property. He escaped from the angry pursuit of Laban, from a rencontre with Esau, and from the vengeance of the Canaanites provoked by the murder of Shechem; and in each of those three emergencies he was aided and strengthened by the interposition of God, and in sign of the grace won by a night of wrestling with God his name was changed at Jabbok into Israel ("soldier of God"). Deborah and Rachel died before he reached Hebron; and it was at Hebron, in the 122d year of his age, that he and Esau buried their father Isaac. Joseph, the favorite son of Jacob, was sold into Egypt eleven years before the death of Isaac; and Jacob had probably exceeded his 130th year when he went thither, being encouraged in a divine vision as he passed for the last time through Beer-sheba. He was presented to Pharaoh, and dwelt for seventeen years in Ramses and Goshen. After giving his solemn blessing to Ephraim and Manasseh, and his own sons one by one, and charging the ten to complete their reconciliation with Joseph, he died in his 147th year. His body was embalmed, carried with great care and pomp into the land of Canaan, and deposited with his fathers, and his wife Leah, in the cave of Machpelah.

The example of Jacob is quoted by the first and the last of the minor prophets. Hosea, in the latter days of the kingdom, seeks (xii. 3, 4, 12) to convert the descendants of Jacob from their state of alienation from God, by recalling to their memory the repeated acts of God's favor shown to their ancestor. And Malachi (i. 2) strengthens the desponding hearts of the returned exiles by assuring them that the love which God bestowed upon Jacob was not withheld from them. Besides the frequent mention of his name in conjunction with those of the other two Patriarchs, there are distinct references to events in the life of Jacob in four books of the N. T. In Rom. ix. 11–13, St. Paul adduces the history of Jacob's birth to prove that the favor of God is independent of the order of natural descent. In Heb. xii. 16, and xi. 21, the transfer of the birthright and Jacob's dying benediction are referred to. His vision at Bethel, and his possession of land at Shechem are cited in St. John i. 51, and iv. 5, 12. And St. Stephen, in his speech (Acts vii. 12–16), mentions the famine which was the means of restoring Jacob to his lost son in Egypt, and the burial of the patriach in Shechem.

Such are the events of Jacob's life recorded in Scripture. Some of them require additional notice.

1. For the sale of his birthright to Jacob, Esau is branded in the N. T. as a "profane person" (Heb. xii. 16). The following sacred and important privileges have been mentioned as connected with primogeniture in patriarchal times, and as constituting the object of Jacob's desire. (a.) Superior rank in the family: see Gen. xlix. 3, 4. (b.) A double portion of the father's property; so Aben Ezra: see Deut. xxi. 17, and Gen. xlviii. 22. (c.) The priestly office in the patriarchal church: see Num. viii. 17–19. In favor of this, see Jerome ad Evang. Ep. lxxiii. § 6; Jarchi in Gen. xxv.; Estius in Hebr. xii.; Shuckford's Connexion, bk. vii.; Blunt, Undes. Coincid. pt. i. 1, §§ 2, 3; and against it, Vitringa, Obs. Sac., and J. D. Michaelis, Mosaisch. Recht, ii. § 64, cited by Rosenmüller in Gen. xxv. (d.) A conditional promise or adumbration of the heavenly inheritance: see Cartwright in the Crit. Sacr. on Gen. xxv. (e.) The promise of the Seed in which all nations should be blessed, though not included in the birthright, may have been so regarded by the patriarchs, as it was by their descendants, Rom. ix. 8, and Shuckford, viii.

The whole subject has been treated in separate essays by Vitringa in his Obs. Sac. pt. i. 11, § 2; also by J. H. Hottinger, and by J. J. Schröder, cited by Winer.

2. With regard to Jacob's acquisition of his father's blessing, ch. xxvii., few persons will accept the excuse offered by Augustine, Serm. iv. § 22, 23, for the deceit which he practiced — that it was merely a figurative action, and that his personation of Esau was justified by his previous purchase of Esau's birthright. It is not however necessary, with the view of cherishing a Christian hatred of sin, to heap opprobrious epithets upon a fallible man whom the choice of God has rendered venerable in the eyes of believers. Waterland (iv. 208) speaks of the conduct of Jacob in language which neither wanting in reverence nor likely to encourage the extenuation of guilt. "I do not know whether it be justifiable in every particular: I suspect that it is not. There were several very good and laudable circumstances in what Jacob and Rebekah did; but I do not take upon me to acquit them of all blame." And Blunt (Undes. Coinc.) observes that none "of the patriarchs can be set up as a model of Christian morals. They lived under a code of laws that were not absolutely good, perhaps not so good as the Levitical: for as this was but a preparation for the more perfect law of Christ, so possibly was the patriarchal but a preparation for the Law of Moses." The circumstances which led to this unhappy transaction, and the retribution which fell upon all parties concerned in it, have been carefully discussed by Benson, Hulsean Lectures (1822) on Scripture Difficulties, xvi. and xvii. See also Woodgate's Historical Sermons, ix.; and Maurice, Patriarchs and Lawgivers, v. On the fulfillment of the prophecies concerning Esau and Jacob, and on Jacob's dying blessing, see Bp. Newton, Dissertations on the Prophecies, §§ iii. and iv.

3. Jacob's vision at Bethel is considered by Miegius in a treatise, De Scalâ Jacobi, in the Thesaurus novus Theologico-Philologicus, i. 195. See also Augustine, Serm. cxxii. His stratagem with Laban's cattle is commented on by Jerome, Quæst. in Gen. Opp. iii. 352, and by Nitschmann, De coryla Jacobi in Thes. nov. Theol.-Phil. i. 201.

4. Jacob's polygamy is an instance of a patriarchal practice quite repugnant to Christian morality, but to be accounted for on the ground that the time had not then come for a full expression of the will of God on this subject. The mutual rights of husband and wife were recognized in the history of the Creation; but instances of polygamy are frequent among persons mentioned in the sacred records from Lamech (Gen. iv. 19) to Herod (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 2). In times when frequent wars increased the number of captives and orphans, and reduced nearly all service to slavery, there may have been some reason for extending the recognition and protection of the law to concubines or half-wives as Bilhah and Zilpah. And in the case of Jacob, it is right to bear in mind that it was not his original intention to marry both the daughters of Laban. (See on this subject Augustine, Contra Faustum, xxii. 47–54.)

5. Jacob's wrestling with the angel at Jabbok is the subject of Augustine's Sermo v.; compare with it De Civitate Dei, xvi. 39.

In Jacob may be traced a combination of the quiet patience of his father with the acquisitiveness which seems to have marked his mother's family; and in Esau, as in Ishmael, the migratory and independent character of Abraham was developed into the enterprising habits of a warlike hunter-chief. Jacob, whose history occupies a larger space, leaves on the reader's mind a less favorable impression than either of the other patriarchs with whom he is joined in equal honor in the N. T. (Matt. viii. 11). But in considering his character we must bear in mind that we know not what limits were set in those days to the knowledge of God and the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit. A timid, thoughtful boy would acquire no self-reliance in a secluded home. There was little scope for the exercise of intelligence, wide sympathy, generosity, frankness. Growing up a stranger to the great joys and great sorrows of natural life — deaths, and wedlock, and births; inured to caution and restraint in the presence of a more vigorous brother; secretly stimulated by a belief that God designed for him some superior blessing, Jacob was perhaps in a fair way to become a narrow, selfish, deceitful, disappointed man. But, after dwelling for more than half a life-time in solitude, he is driven from home by the provoked hostility of his more powerful brother. Then in deep and bitter sorrow the outcast begins life afresh long after youth has passed, and finds himself brought first of all unexpectedly into that close personal communion with God which elevates the soul, and then into that enlarged intercourse with men which is capable of drawing out all the better feelings of human nature. An unseen world was opened. God revived and renewed to him that slumbering promise over which he had brooded for threescore years, since he learned it in childhood from his mother. Angels conversed with him. Gradually he felt more and more the watchful care of an ever present spiritual Father. Face to face he wrestled with the Representative of the Almighty. And so, even though the moral consequences of his early transgressions hung about him, and saddened him with a deep knowledge of all the evil of treachery and domestic envy, and partial judgment, and filial disobedience, yet the increasing revelations of God enlightened the old age of the patriarch; and at last the timid "supplanter," the man of subtle devices, waiting for the salvation of Jehovah, dies the "soldier of God" uttering the messages of God to his remote posterity.

For reflections on various incidents in Jacob's life, see Bp. Hall's Contemplations, bk. iii. Many rabbinical legends concerning him may be found in Eisenmenger's Entd. Judenthum, and in the Jerusalem Targum. In the Koran he is often mentioned in conjunction with the other two patriarchs (ch. 2, and elsewhere). W. T. B.

The portions of Genesis relating to Jacob are fully and ably treated here in opposition to critics of the Colenso school. See HARAN (Amer. ed.) for supposed difficulties connected with Jacob's flight from Mesopotamia.

Dean Stanley takes decided ground against those who entertain a disparaging view of Jacob's character as compared with that of Esau. We quote a part of his reply to that adverse opinion: "Taking the two from first to last, how entirely is the judgment of Scripture and the judgment of posterity confirmed by the result of the whole. The were impulsive hunter vanishes away, light as air: he did eat and drink, and rose up and went his way. Thus Esau despised his birthright.' The substance, the strength of the chosen family, the true inheritance of the promise of Abraham, was interwoven with the very essence of the character of the 'plain man, dwelling in tents,' steady, persevering, moving onward with deliberate settled purpose, through years of suffering and of prosperity, of exile and return, of bereavement and recovery. The birthright is always before him. Rachel is won from Laban by hard services, 'and the seven years seemed unto him but a few days for the love he had to her.' Isaac and Rebekah, and Rebekah's nurse, are remembered with a faithful, filial remembrance; Joseph and Benjamin are long and passionately loved with a more than parental affection, — bringing down his gray hairs for their sakes 'in sorrow to the grave.' This is no character to be contemned or scoffed at; if it was encompassed with much infirmity, yet its very complexity demands our reverent attention; in it are bound up, as his double name expresses, not one man, but two; by toil and struggle, Jacob, the Supplanter, is gradually transformed into Israel, the Prince of God; the harsher and baser features are softened and purified away; he looks back over his long career with the fullness of experience and humility. 'I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies and of all the truth which thou hast shown unto thy servant' (Gen. xxxii. 10). Alone of the patriarchal family, his end is recorded as invested with the solemnity of warning and of prophetic song, 'Gather yourselves together, ye sons of Jacob; and hearken unto Israel your father.' We need not fear to acknowledge that the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac was also the God of Jacob." (Jewish Church, p. 59 f.) H.

JACU'BUS ('Ιάκουβος; [Vat. Ιαρσουβοος:] Accubus), 1 Esdr. ix. 48. [AKKUB, 4.]

JA'DA (יָדָע [known, skillful]: 'Ιαδαέ, and at ver. 32, Δαδαί, [Vat. Ιδουδα,] Alex. Ιεδδαε: [Jada]), son of Onam, and brother of Shammai, in the genealogy of the sons of Jerahmeel by his wife Atarah (1 Chr. ii. 28, 32). This genealogy is very corrupt in the LXX., especially in the Vatican Codex. A. C. H.

JA'DAU [2 syl.] (יַדָּו, but the Keri has יַדּוּי, i. e. Yaddai [favorite, friend, Fürst]: 'Ιαδαί; [Vat. Αδια:] Jeddu), one of the Bene-Nebo who had taken a foreign wife, and was compelled by Ezra to relinquish her [Ezr. x. 43).

JADDU'A (יַדּוּעַ [known]: 'Ιαδού, 'Ιδούα; [in Neh. xii. 22, Vat. Ιαδου, FA.[1] Αδου:] Jeddua), son, and successor in the high-priesthood, of Jonathan or Johanan. He is the last of the high-priests mentioned in the O. T., and probably altogether the latest name in the canon (Neh. xii. 11, 22), at least if 1 Chr. iii. 22–24 is admitted to be corrupt (see Geneal. of our Lord, pp. 101, 107). His name marks distinctly the time when the latest additions were made to the book of Nehemiah and the canon of Scripture, and perhaps affords a clew to the age of Malachi the prophet. All that we learn concerning him in Scripture is the fact of his being the son of Jonathan, and high-priest. We gather also pretty certainly that he was priest in the reign of the last Persian king Darius, and that he was still high-priest after the Persian dynasty was overthrown, i. e. in the reign of Alexander the Great. For the expression "Darius the Persian" must have been used after the accession of the Grecian dynasty; and had another high-priest succeeded, his name would most likely have been mentioned. Thus far then the book of Nehemiah bears out the truth of Josephus's history, which makes Jaddua high-priest when Alexander invaded Judæa. But the story of his interview with Alexander [HIGH-PRIEST, vol. ii. p. 1072 b] does not on that account deserve credit, nor his account of the building of the temple on Mount Gerizim during Jaddua's pontificate, at the instigation of Sanballat, both of which, as well as the accompanying circumstances, are probably derived from some apocryphal book of Alexandrian growth, since lost, in which chronology and history gave way to romance and Jewish vanity. Josephus seems to place the death of Jaddua after that of Alexander (A. J. xi. 8, § 7). Eusebius assigns 20 years to Jaddua's pontificate (Geneal. of our Lord, 323 ff.; Selden, de Succ.; Prideaux, etc.). A. C. H.

JADDU'A (יַדּוּעַ [as above]: 'Ιεδδούα [Vat. FA.[1] omit;] Alex. Ιεδδουκ: Jeddua), one of the chief of the people, i. e. of the laymen, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 21).

JA'DON (יָדוֹן [judge]: Εὐάρων in both MSS. [rather, in the Roman ed.; Vat. Alex. FA.[1] omit]: Jadon), a man, who in company with the Gibeonites and the men of Mizpah assisted to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 7). His title, "the Meronothite" (comp. 1 Chr. xxvii. 30), and the mention of Gibeonites, would seem to point to a place Meronoth, and that in the neighborhood of Gibeon; but no such place has yet been traced.

Jadon ('Ιαδών) is the name attributed by Josephus (Ant. viii. 8, § 5) to the man of God from Judah, who withstood Jeroboam at the altar at Bethel — probably intending IDDO the seer. By Jerome (Qu. Hebr. on 2 Chr. ix. 29) the name is given as Juddo.

JA'EL (יָעֵל [climber, Fürst, and hence wild goat]: Hex. Syr. Anael: 'Ιαήλ; Joseph. 'Ιάη: Jahel), the wife of Heber the Kenite. Heber was the chief of a nomadic Arab clan, who had separated from the rest of his tribe, and had pitched his tent under the oaks, which had in consequence received the name of "oaks of the wanderers" (A. V. plain of Zaanaim, Judg. iv. 11), in the neighborhood of Kedesh-Naphthali. [HEBER; KENITES.] The tribe of Heber had secured the quiet enjoyment of their pastures by adopting a neutral position in a troublous period. Their descent from Jethro secured them the favorable regard of the Israelites, and they were sufficiently important to conclude a formal peace with Jabin king of Hazor.

In the headlong rout which followed the defeat of the Canaanites by Barak, Sisera, abandoning his chariot the more easily to avoid notice (comp. Hom. Il. v. 20), fled unattended, and in an opposite direction from that taken by his army, to the tent of the Kenite chieftainess. "The tent of Jael" is expressly mentioned either because the harem of Heber was in a separate tent (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii. 22), or because the Kenite himself was absent at the time. In the sacred seclusion of this almost inviolable sanctuary, Sisera might well have felt himself absolutely secure from the incursions of the enemy (Calmet, Fragm. xxv.)

and although he intended to take refuge among the Kenites, he would not have ventured so openly to violate all idea of oriental propriety by entering a woman's apartments (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. "Haram"), had he not received Jael's express, earnest, and respectful entreaty to do so. He accepted the invitation, and she flung a mantle[a] over him as he lay wearily on the floor. When thirst prevented sleep, and he asked for water, she brought him butter-milk in her choicest vessel, thus ratifying with the semblance of officious zeal the sacred bond of eastern hospitality. Wine would have been less suitable to quench his thirst, and may possibly have been eschewed by Heber's clan (Jer. xxxv. 2). Butter-milk, according to the quotations in Harmer, is still a favorite Arab beverage, and that this is the drink intended we infer from Judges v. 25, as well as from the direct statement of Josephus (γάλα διεφθορὸς ἤδη, Ant. v. 5, § 4), although there is no reason to suppose with Josephus and the Rabbis (D. Kimchi, Jarchi, etc.), that Jael purposely used it because of its soporific qualities (Bochart, Hieroz. i. 473). But anxiety still prevented Sisera from composing himself to rest, until he had exacted a promise from his protectress that she would faithfully preserve the secret of his concealment; till at last, with a feeling of perfect security, the weary and unfortunate general resigned himself to the deep sleep of misery and fatigue. Then it was that Jael took in her left hand one of the great wooden[b] pins (A. V. "nail") which fastened down the cords of the tent, and in her right hand the mallet (A. V. "a hammer") used to drive it into the ground, and creeping up to her sleeping and confiding guest, with one terrible blow dashed it through Sisera's temples deep into the earth. With one spasm of fruitless agony, with one contortion of sudden pain, "at her feet he bowed, he fell; where he bowed, there he fell down dead" (Judg. v. 27). She then waited to meet the pursuing Barak, and led him into her tent that she might in his presence claim the glory of the deed!

Many have supposed that by this act she fulfilled the saying of Deborah, that God would sell Sisera into the hand of a woman (Judg. iv. 9; Joseph. v. 5, § 4); and hence they have supposed that Jael was actuated by some divine and hidden influence. But the Bible gives no hint of such an inspiration, and it is at least equally probable that Deborah merely intended to intimate the share of the honor which would be assigned by posterity to her own exertions. If therefore we eliminate the still more monstrous supposition of the Rabbis that Sisera was slain by Jael because he attempted to offer her violence — the murder will appear in all its hideous atrocity. A fugitive had asked, and received dikheel (or protection) at her hands, — he was miserable, defeated, weary, — he was the ally of her husband, — he was her invited and honored guest, — he was in the sanctuary of the haram, — above all, he was confiding, defenseless, and asleep; yet she broke her pledged faith, violated her solemn hospitality, and murdered a trustful and unprotected slumberer. Surely we require the clearest and most positive statement that Jael was instigated to such a murder by divine suggestion.

But it may be asked, "Has not the deed of Jael been praised by an inspired authority?' "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be, blessed shall she be above women in the tent" (Judg. v. 24). Without stopping to ask when and where Deborah claims for herself any infallibility, or whether, in the passionate moment of patriotic triumph, she was likely to pause in such wild times to scrutinize the moral bearings of an act which had been so splendid a benefit to herself and her people, we may question whether any moral commendation is directly intended. What Deborah stated was a fact, namely, that the wives of the nomad Arabs would undoubtedly regard Jael as a public benefactress, and praise her as a popular heroine.

The suggestion of Gesenius (Thes. p. 608 b), Hollmann, and others, that the Jael alluded to in Judg. v. 6 is not the wife of Heber, but some unknown Israelitish judge, appears to us extremely unlikely, especially as the name Jael must almost certainly be the name of a woman (Prov. v. 19, A. V. "roe"). At the same time it must be admitted that the phrase "in the days of Jael" is one which we should hardly have expected. F. W. F.

* This view of Gesenius that Jael (Judg v. 6), is the name of a judge otherwise unknown, is also that of Fürst, Bertheau, Wordsworth, and others. The name is masculine, and very properly used of a man, though such names were often borne by women. Cassel (Richter und Ruth, p. 50) denies that the wife of Heber can be meant in this instance, since Deborah was contemporary with her, and would hardly designate her own days as those of Jael. But to suppose with him that Shamgar mentioned in the other line is called Jael (= "active," "chivalrous") merely as a complimentary epithet, seems far-fetched. From the order of the names, if this Jael was one of the judges, we should be led to place his time between Shamgar and Barak, and so have a more distinct enumeration of the long series of years during which the land was afflicted before the deliverance achieved by Deborah and her allies. H.

JA'GUR (יָגוּר [lodging-place]: Ἀσώρ; Alex. Ιαγουρ: Jagur), a town of Judah, one of those furthest to the south, on the frontier of Edom (Josh. xv. 21). Kabzeel, one of its companions in the list, recurs subsequently; but Jagur is not again met with, nor has the name been encountered in the imperfect explorations of that dreary region. The Jagur, quoted by Schwarz (p. 99) from the Talmud as one of the boundaries of the territory of Ashkelon, must have been further to the N. W. G.

JAH (יָהּ: Κύριος: Dominus). The abbreviated form of "Jehovah," used only in poetry It occurs frequently in the Hebrew, but with a single exception (Ps. lxviii. 4) is rendered "Lord" in the A. V. The identity of Jah and Jehovah is strongly marked in two passages of Isaiah (xii. 2. xxvi. 4), the force of which is greatly weakened by the English rendering "the Lord." The former of these should be translated "for my strength and song is JAH JEHOVAH" (comp. Ex. xv. 2); and the latter, "trust ye in Jehovah for ever, for in [a] "Mantle" is here inaccurate; the word is הַשְּׂמִיכָה — with the definite article. But as the term is not found elsewhere, it is not possible to recognize what the Semicah was. Probably some part of the regular furniture of the tent.

[b] Πάσσαλος, LXX.; but according to Josephus, σιδήρεον ἦλον.

JAH JEHOVAH is the rock of ages." "Praise ye the Lord," or Hallelujah, should be in all cases "praise ye Jah." In Ps. lxxxix. 8 [9] Jah stands in parallelism with "Jehovah the God of hosts" in a passage which is wrongly translated in our version. It should be "O Jehovah, God of hosts, who like thee is strong, O Jah!" W. A. W.

JA'HATH (יַחַת [oneness, union] : Ἰεέθ, [Ἰεέθ; Vat. Ιεεθ, Ηχα: Jahath]). 1. Son of Libni, the son of Gershom, the son of Levi (1 Chr. vi. 20, A. V.). He was ancestor to Asaph (ver. 43).

2. [Ἰέθ: Leheth.] Head of a later house in the family of Gershom, being the eldest son of Shimei, the son of Laadan. The house of Jahath existed in David's time (1 Chr. xxiii. 10, 11).

A. C. H.

3. (Ἰέθ; Alex. omits: [Jahath.]) A man in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 2), son of Reaiah ben-Shobal. His sons were Ahumai and Lahad, the families of the Zorathites. If Reaiah and Haroeh are identical, Jahath was a descendant of Caleb ben-Hur. [HAROEH.]

4. ([Ἰάθ; Vat.] Alex. Ιναθ.) A Levite, son of Shelomoth, the representative of the Kohathite family of IZHAR in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 22).

5. [Ἰέθ; Vat. ιε; Comp. Ἰαέθ.] A Merarite Levite in the reign of Josiah, one of the overseers of the repairs to the Temple (2 Chr. xxxiv. 12).

JA'HAZ, also JAHA'ZA, JAHA'ZAH, and JAH'ZAH. Under these four forms are given in the A. V. the name of a place which in the Hebrew appears as יַהַץ and יַהְצָה, the ה being in some cases — as Num. and Deut. — the particle of motion, but elsewhere an integral addition to the name. It has been uniformly so taken by the LXX., who have Ἰασσά, and twice Ἰασά [once, namely, Judg. xi. 20, where Alex. reads Ἰσραηλ]. JAHAZ is found Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judg. xi. 20; Is. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 34. In the two latter only is it יהץ, without the final ה. The Samaritan Cod. has יחצה: Vulg. Jasa.

At Jahaz the decisive battle was fought between the children of Israel and Sihon king of the Amorites, which ended in the overthrow of the latter and in the occupation by Israel of the whole pastoral country included between the Arnon and the Jabbok, the Belka of the modern Arabs (Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judg. xi. 20). It was in the allotment of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), though not mentioned in the catalogue of Num. xxxii.; and it was given with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites (1 Chr. vi. 78: and Josh. xxi. 36, though here omitted in the ordinary Hebrew text).

Jahazah occurs in the denunciations of Jeremiah and Isaiah on the inhabitants of the "plain country," i. e. the Mishor, the modern Belka (Jer. xlviii. 21, 34; Is. xv. 4); but beyond the fact that at this period it was in the hands of Moab we know nothing of its history.

From the terms of the narrative in Num. xxi. and Deut. ii., we should expect that Jahaz was in the extreme south part of the territory of Sihon, but yet north of the river Arnon (see Deut. ii. 24, 36; and the words in 31, "begin to possess"), and in exactly this position a site named Jazaza is mentioned by Schwarz (227), though by him only. But this does not agree with the statements of Eusebius (Onom. Ἰεσσά), who says it was existing in his day between Medeba and Δηβούς, by which he probably intends Dibon, which would place Jahaz considerably too far to the north. Like many others relating to the places east of the Dead Sea, this question must await further research. (See Ewald, Geschichte, ii. 266, 271.) G.

JAHA'ZA (יְהַצָה, i. e. Yahtzah [trodden down, threshing-floor] : Βασάν; Alex. Ιασσα: Jassa), Josh. xiii. 18. [JAHAZ.]

JAHA'ZAH (יַהֲצָה [as above]: in Jer. Ῥεφάς, in both MSS.; [FA.1 Ραφαθ, Comp. Ἰασσά:] Juser, Jasa), Josh. xxi. 36 (though omitted in the Rec. Hebrew Text, and not recognizable in the LXX. [perhaps represented by Ἰαζήρ]), Jer. xlviii. 21. [JAHAZ.]

JAHAZI'AH (יַחְזִיָה, i. e. Yach'zeyah [whom Jehovah beholds, Ges.]: Ἰαζίας; [Vat. FA.1 Λαζεια:] Jaasia), son of Tikvah, apparently a priest; commemorated as one of the four who originally sided with Ezra in the matter of the foreign wives (Ezr. x. 15). In Esdras the name becomes EZECHIAS.

JAHA'ZIEL (יַחֲזִיאֵל [whom God strengthens]). 1. (Ἰεζιήλ; [Vat. FA. Ιεζηλ:] Jeheziel.) One of the heroes of Benjamin who deserted the cause of Saul and joined David when he was at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 4).

2. (Ὀζιήλ [Vat. FA.2 Οζειηλ:] Jaziel.) A priest in the reign of David, whose office it was, in conjunction with Benaiah, to blow the trumpet at the ministrations before the ark, when David had brought it to Jerusalem (1 Cor. xvi. 6). [HIGH-PRIEST.]

3. (Ἰεζιήλ, Ἰαζιήλ; [Vat. Οζιηλ, Ιασηι;] Alex. Ιαζιηλ: [Jahaziel.]) A Kohathite Levite, third son of Hebron. His house is mentioned in the enumeration of the Levites in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiii. 19; xxiv. 23). A. C. H.

4. (Ὀζιήλ; [Vat. Οζειηλ; Comp. Ἰεζιήλ:] Jahaziel.) Son of Zechariah, a Levite of the Bene-Asaph, who was inspired by the Spirit of Jehovah to animate Jehoshaphat and the army of Judah in a moment of great danger, namely, when they were anticipating the invasion of an enormous horde of Moabites, Ammonites, Mehunims, and other barbarians (2 Chr. xx. 14). Ps. lxxxiii. is entitled a Psalm of Asaph, and this, coupled with the mention of Edom, Moab, Ammon, and others, in hostility to Israel, has led some to connect it with the above event. [GEDAL.] But, however desirable, this is very uncertain.

5. (Ἀζιήλ; [Vat. Alex. omit:] Ezechiel.) The "son of Jahaziel" was the chief of the Bene-Shecaniah [sons of S.] who returned from Babylon with Ezra, according to the present state of the Hebrew text (Ezr. viii. 5). But according to the LXX., and the parallel passage in 1 Esdr. (viii. 32), a name has escaped from the text, and it should read, "of the Bene-Zathoe (probably ZATTU), Shecaniah son of Jahaziel." In the latter place the name appears as JEZELUS.

JAH'DAI [2 syl.] (יַחְדַּי, i. e. Yehdai [whom Jehovah leads]: Ἀδδαΐ; [Vat. Ιησου:] Alex. Ιαδαΐ: Jahoddai), a man who appears to be thrust abruptly into the genealogy of Caleb, as the father of six sons (1 Chr. ii. 47). Various suggestions egarding the name have been made: as that Gatez, the name preceding, should be Jahdai; that Jahdai was a concubine of Caleb, etc.: but these are mere groundless suppositions (see Burrington, i. 216; Bertheau, ad loc.).

JAH'DIEL (יַחְדִּיאֵל [whom God makes joyful]: Ἰεδιήλ; [Vat. Ἰελειηλ:] Jediel), one of the heroes who were heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).

JAH'DO (יַחְדּוֹ [united, together]: Ἰεδδαΐ, as if the name had originally been יחדי; comp. JAASAU, JADAU; [Vat. Ιουρει; Comp. Ἰεδδώ:] Jeddo), a Gadite named in the genealogies of his tribe (1 Chr. v. 14) as the son of Buz and father of Jeshishai.

JAH'LEËL (יַחְלְאֵל [hoping in God]: Ἀχοήλ; Alex. Ααοηλ, Αλληλ: Jahelel, [Jalel]), the third of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. xlvi. 14; Num. xxvi. 26), founder of the family of the JAHLEELITES. Nothing is heard of him or of his descendants.

JAH'LEËLITES, THE (הַיַּחְלְאֵלִי: ὁ Ἀλληλί [Vat. -λει]: Jalelitæ). A branch of the tribe of Zebulon, descendants of Jahleel (Num. xxvi. 26). W. A. W.

JAH'MAI [2 syl.] (יַחְמַי [whom Jehovah guards]: Ἰαμαΐ: [Vat. Ειϊκαν; Alex. Ιεμου: Jemai), a man of Issachar, one of the heads of the house of Tola (1 Chr. vii. 2).

JAH'ZAH (יַהְצָה [a place stamped, threshing-floor]: Ἰασά; [Vat. omits:] Jassa), 1 Chr. vi. 78. [JAHAZ.]

JAH'ZEËL (יַחְצְאֵל [God apportions]: Ἀσιήλ; [Vat.[1] in Num., Σαηλ:] Jasiel), the first of the four sons of Naphtali (Gen. xlvi. 24), founder of the family of THE JAHZEELITES (הַיַּחְצְאֵלִי, Num. xxvi. 48). His name is once again mentioned (1 Chr. vii. 13) in the slightly different form of JAHZIEL.

JAH'ZEËLITES, THE (הַיַּחְצְאֵלִי: ὁ Ἀσιηλί; [Vat.[1] Σαηλει, 2. m. Ασηλει:] Jesielitæ). A branch of the Naphtalites, descended from Jahzeel (Num. xxvi. 48).

JAH'ZERAH (יַחְזְרָה [whom God leads back]: Ἐζιράς [or Ἐζιρά; Vat. Ιεδειας; Alex. Ιεζριας:] Jezra), a priest, of the house of Immer; ancestor of Maasiai (read Maaziah), one of the courses which returned (1 Chr. ix. 12). [JEHOIARIB.] In the duplicate passage in Neh. xi. 13 he is called אֲחַזַי, AHASAI, and all the other names are much varied. A. C. H.

* JAILOR. [PRISON; PUNISHMENTS.]

JAH'ZIEL (יַחְצִיאֵל [God allots or apportions]: Ἰασιήλ; [Vat. Ιεισεηλ:] Jasiel), the form in which the name of the first of Naphtali's sons, elsewhere given JAHZEEL, appears in 1 Chr. vii. 13 only.

JA'IR (יָאִיר [whom Jehovah enlightens]: Ἰαΐρ; [Vat. commonly Ιαειο; Alex. Ιαειρ, -ηρ, -ῖρ:] Jair). 1. A man who on his father's side was descended from Judah, and on his mother's from Manasseh. His father was Segub, son of Hezron the son of Pharez, by his third wife, the daughter of the great Machir, a man so great that his name is sometimes used as equivalent to that of Manasseh (1 Chr. ii. 21, 22). Thus on both sides he was a member of the most powerful family of each tribe. By Moses he is called the "son of Manasseh" (Num. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14), and according to the Chronicles (1 Chr. ii. 23), he was one of the "sons of Machir the father of Gilead." This designation from his mother rather than his father, perhaps arose from his having settled in the tribe of Manasseh, east of Jordan. During the conquest he performed one of the chief feats recorded. He took the whole of the tract of ARGOB (Deut. iii. 14 [comp. Josh. xiii. 30]), the naturally inaccessible Trachonitis, the modern Lejah — and in addition possessed himself of some nomad villages in Gilead, which he called after his own name, HAVVOTH-JAIR (Num. xxxii 41; 1 Chr. ii. 23).[a] None of his descendants are mentioned with certainty; but it is perhaps allowable to consider IRA THE JAIRITE as one of them. Possibly another was —

2. [Ἰαΐρ; Vat. Ιαειρ; Alex. Ιαειρ, Αειρ.] "JAIR THE GILEADITE," who judged Israel for two and twenty years (Judg. x. 3–5). He had thirty sons who rode thirty asses (עֲיָרִים), and possessed thirty "cities" (עָרִים) in the land of Gilead, which, like those of their namesake, were called Havvoth-Jair. Possibly the original twenty-three formed part of these. Josephus (Ant. v. 7, § 6) gives the name of Jair as Ἰαείρης; he declares him to have been of the tribe of Manasseh, and his burial place, CAMON, to have been in Gilead. [HAVOTH-JAIR.]

3. [Ἰάιρος; Vat. FA. Ιαειρος; Alex. Ιαηρος.] A Benjamite, son of Kish and father of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5). In the Apocrypha his name is given as JAIRUS.

4. (יָעִיר [whom God awakens]: a totally different name from the preceding; Ἰαΐρ; [Vat. Ιαειρ;] Alex. Αδειρ: Saltus.) The father of Elhanan, one of the heroes of David's army, who killed Lachmi the brother of Goliath (1 Chr. xx. 5). In the original Hebrew text (Cethib) the name is Jaor (יעור). In the parallel narrative of Samuel (2 Sam. xxi. 19) Jaare-Oregim is substituted for Jair. The arguments for each will be found under ELHANAN and JAARE-OREGIM.

In the N. Test., as in the Apocrypha, we encounter Jair under the Greek form of JAIRUS. G.

JA'IRITE, THE (הַיָּאִרִי [patronym.]: ὁ Ἰαρίν [Vat. -ειν]; Alex. ο Ιαειρει: Jairites). IRA the Jairite was a priest (כֹּהֵן, A. V. "chief ruler") to David (2 Sam. xx. 26). If "priest" is to be taken here in its sacerdotal sense, Ira must have been a descendant of Aaron, in whose line however no Jair is mentioned. But this is not imperative [see PRIEST], and he may therefore [a] This verse would seem not to refer to the original conquest of these villages by Jair, as the A. V represents, but rather to their recapture. The accurate rendering is said to be, "And Geshur and Aram took the Havvoth-Jair from them, with Kenath and her daughter-towns, sixty cities" (Bertheau, Chronik. p. 16).

have sprung from the great Jair of Manasseh, or some lesser person of the name.

JA'I'RUS [3 syl.]. 1. (Ἰάειρος: [Jairus]), a ruler of a synagogue, probably in some town near the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. He was the father of the maiden whom Jesus restored to life (Matt. ix. 18; Mark v. 22; Luke viii. 41). The name is probably the Grecized form of the Hebrew Jair.

* It has been questioned whether the daughter of Jairus was really dead and raised to life again by the power of Jesus, or lay only in a state of insensibility. Among others Olshausen (Bibl. Comm. i. 321 ff.) and Robinson (Lex. of the N. T., p. 362) entertain the latter view. The doubt has arisen chiefly from the fact that the Saviour said of the damsel, "She is not dead, but sleepeth" (see Matt. ix. 24). The usual verb for describing death as a sleep, it is true, is a different one (κοιμάω, see John xi. 11 f.); but the one which the Saviour employed in this instance (καθεύδει) is also used of the dead in 1 Thess. v. 10, where "whether we wake or sleep" is equivalent to "whether we are alive or dead." Hence we may attach the same figurative sense to the word as applied in the passage before us. It was a peculiarly expressive way of saying that in its relation to Christ's power death was merely a slumber: he had only to speak the word, and the lifeless rose at once to consciousness and activity. But there are positive reasons for understanding that Christ performed a miracle on this occasion. The damsel lay dying when the father went in pursuit of Jesus (Luke viii. 42); shortly after that she was reported as dead (Mark v. 35); and was bewailed at the house with the lamentation customary on the decease of a person (Mark v. 38 ff.). The idea that she was asleep merely was regarded as absurd (Matt. ix. 24), and Luke states expressly (viii. 55) that "her spirit came again" to her on being commanded to arise. The parents and the crowd "were astonished with a great astonishment" at what they beheld or heard related (Mark v. 42), and the Saviour permitted that impression to remain with them.

One other circumstance in this account deserves notice. Our Lord on arriving at the house of Jairus found the mourners already singing the death-dirge, and the "minstrels" (αὐληταί, "flute-players") performing their part in the service (Matt. ix. 23). On that custom, see De Wette's Hebr. Archäologie, § 263 (4te Aufl.).

Mr. Lane mentions that it is chiefly at the funerals of the rich among the modern Egyptians that musicians are employed as mourners. (Modern Egyptians, ii. 287, 297.) It is not within the ability of every family to employ them, as they are professional actors, and their presence involves some expense. The same thing, as a practical result, was true, no doubt, in ancient times.[a] Hence "the minstrels" very properly appear in this particular history. Jairus, the father of the damsel whom Christ restored to life, being a ruler of the synagogue, was a person of some rank among his countrymen. In such a family the most decent style of performing the last sad offices would be observed. Further, the narrative allows of hardly any interval between the daughter's death and the commencement of the wailing. This agrees with the present oriental custom; for when the death of a person is expected, preparations are often made so as to have the lament begin almost as soon as the last breath is drawn. H.

JA'KAN (יַעֲקָן [=עֲקָן, intelligent, sagacious]: Ἀκάν; [Vat. Ωνυν;] Alex. [Ιωακαν και] Ουκαμ: Jacan), son of Ezer the Horite (1 Chr. i. 42). The name is identical with that more commonly expressed in the A. V. as Jaakan. And see Akan.

JA'KEH (יָקֶה, and in some MSS. יָקֵא [see infra], which is followed by a MS. of the Targum in the Cambridge Univ. Libr., and was evidently the reading of the Vulgate, where the whole clause is rendered symbolically — "Verba congregantis filii vomentis"). The A. V. of Prov. xxx. 1, following the authority of the Targum and Syriac, has represented this as the proper name of the father of Agur, whose sayings are collected in Prov. xxx., and such is the natural interpretation. But beyond this we have no clew to the existence of either Agur or Jakeh. Of course if Agur be Solomon, it follows that Jakeh was a name of David of some mystical significance. But for this there is not a shadow of support. Jarchi, punning on the two names, explains the clause, "the words of Solomon, who gathered understanding and vomited it," evidently having before him the reading יקא, which he derived from קוא, "to vomit." This explanation, it needs scarcely be said, is equally characterized by elegance and truth. Others, adopting the form יָקֶה, and connecting it with יִקְּהָה (or as Fürst gives it, ְיִקְהָה), yikk'hâh, "obedience," apply it to Solomon in his late repentance. But these and the like are the merest conjectures. If Jakeh be the name of a person, as there is every reason to believe, we know nothing more about him; if not, there is no limit to the symbolical meanings which may be extracted from the clause in which it occurs, and which change with the ever-shifting ground of the critic's point of view. That the passage was early corrupted is clear from the rendering of the LXX., who insert ch. xxx. 1-14 in the middle of ch. xxiv. The first clause they translate τοὺς ἐμοὺς λόγους, υἱέ, φοβήθητι, καὶ δεξάμενος αὐτοὺς μετανόει — "My son, fear my words, and, having received them, repent:" a meaning which at first sight seems hard to extract from the Hebrew, and which has therefore been abandoned as hopelessly corrupt. But a slight alteration of one or two letters and the vowel-points will, if it do no more, at least show how the LXX. arrived at their extraordinary translation. They must have read דִּבְרֵי הַגֶּבֶר בְּנִי קְהֵה וְאָשֵׁם, in which the letters of the last word are slightly transposed, in order to account for μετανόει. In support of this alteration see Zech. xi. 5, where יֶאְשָׁמוּ is rendered μετεμέλοντο.[b] The Targum

[a] * Even if the rule was stricter, circumstances would control the practice. The poor must often withhold the prescribed tribute. The Talmud (Chethuboth, 47. 8) says, with reference to the death of a wife: "Etiam pauperrimus inter Israelitas præbebit ei non minus quam duas tibias et unam lamentatricem." H.

[b] This conjecture incidentally throws light on the LXX. of Prov. xiv. 15, ἔρχεται εἰς μετάνοιαν [illegible] and Syriac point to different readings also, though not where Jakeh is concerned.

Hitzig (die Sprüche Salomo's), unable to find any other explanation, has recourse to an alteration of the text as violent as it is unauthorized. He proposes to read בֶּן יְקֻדָּה מַשָּׂא, "the son of her whose obedience is Massa:" which, to say the least of it, is a very remarkable way of indicating "the queen of Massa." But in order to arrive at this reading he first adopts the rare word יְקֻדָּה (which only occurs in the const. state in two passages, Gen. xlix. 10, and Prov. xxx. 17), to which he attaches the unusual form of. the pronominal suffix, and ekes out his explanation by the help of an elliptical and highly poetical construction, which is strangely out of place in the bald prose heading of the chapter. Yet to this theory Bertheau yields a coy assent ("nicht ohne Zögern," die Spr. Sal. Einl. p. xviii.); and thus Agur and Lemuel are brothers, both sons of a queen of Massa, the former being the reigning monarch (Prov. xxxi. 1).

מַשָּׂא, massâ, "prophecy" or "burden," is considered as a proper name and identical with the region named Massa in Arabia, occupied by the descendants of a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chr. i. 30), and mentioned in connection with Dumah. This district, Hitzig conjectures, was the same which was conquered and occupied by the 500 Simeonites, whose predatory excursion in the reign of Hezekiah is narrated in 1 Chr. iv. 41–43. They are there said to have annihilated the Amalekites in Mount Seir, and to have seized their country. That this country was Massa, of which Lemuel was king, and that Agur was a descendant of the conquering Simeonites is the opinion of Hitzig, approved by Bunsen. But the latter, retaining the received text, and considering Jakeh as a proper name, takes הַמַּשָּׂא, hammassâ, as if it were הַמַּשָּׂאִי, hammassâî, a gentilic name, "the man of Massa," supporting this by a reference to Gen. xv. 2, where דַּמֶּשֶׂק, Dammesek, is apparently used in the same manner (Bibelwerk, i., clxxviii.). There is good reason, however, to suspect that the word in question in the latter passage is an interpolation, or that the verse is in some way corrupt, as the rendering of the Chaldee and Syriac is not supported by the ordinary usages of Hebrew, though it is adopted by the A. V., and by Gesenius, Knobel, and others. In any case the instances are not analogous. W. A. W.

JA'KIM (יָקִים [whom God lifts up]: Ἰακίμ; [Vat.] Ιακειμ: Jacim). 1. Head of the 12th course of priests in the reign of David (1 Chr xxiv. 12). The Alex. LXX. gives the name Eliakim (Ελιακειμ). (Jehoiarib; Jachin.)

2. [Alex. Ιακειμ.] A Benjamite, one of the Bene-Shimhi [sons of S.] (1 Chr. viii. 19).

A. C. H.

JA'LON (יָלוֹן [lodging, abiding]: Ἰαμών; [Vat. Αμων:] Alex. Ιαλων: Jalon), one of the sons of Ezrah, a person named in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 17).

JAM'BRES. [See Jannes and Jambres.]

JAM'BRI. Shortly after the death of Judas Maccabæus (B. C. 161), "the children of Jambri" are said to have made a predatory attack on a detachment of the Maccabæan forces and to have suffered reprisals (1 Macc. ix. 36–41). The name does not occur elsewhere, and the variety of readings is considerable: Ἰαμβρί, Cod. B; [a] [Ιαμβριν,] Ιαμβριειν, Cod. A; [Sin. Αμβρει, Ιαμβρι;] alii, Ἀμβροί, Ἀμβρί; Syr. Ambrei. Josephus (Ant. xiii. 1, § 2) reads οἱ Ἀμαραίου παῖδες, and it seems almost certain that the true reading is Ἀμρί (-εί), a form which occurs elsewhere (1 K. xvi. 22: Joseph. Ant. viii. 12, § 5, Ἄμαρῖνος; 1 Chr. xxvii. 18, Heb. עָמְרִי, Vulg. Amri; 1 Chr. ix. 4, Ἀμβραΐμ).

It has been conjectured (Drusius, Michaelis, Grimm, 1 Macc. ix. 36) that the original text was בְּנֵי אֱמֹרִי, "the sons of the Amorites," and that the reference is to a family of the Amorites who had in early times occupied the town Medeba (ver. 36) on the borders of Reuben (Num. xxi. 30, 31).

B. F. W.

JAMES (Ἰάκωβος: Jacobus),[b] the name of several persons mentioned in the N. T.

1. James the Son of Zebedee. This is the only one of the Apostles of whose life and death we can write with certainty. The little that we know of him we have on the authority of Scripture. All else that is reported is idle legend, with the possible exception of one tale, handed down by Clement of Alexandria to Eusebius, and by Eusebius to us. With this single exception the line of demarcation is drawn clear and sharp. There is

---

וָבִין לַאֲשֶׁרוּ, which they probably read בָּא לְאָשֵׁם, Valeat quantum.

[a] * Here, as generally in the English edition of this work, Cod. B, or the Vatican manuscript 1209, is confounded with the Roman edition of 1587. The Vatican manuscript (B) does not contain the books of Maccabees. A.

[b] The name itself will perhaps repay a few moments' consideration. As borne by the Apostles and their contemporaries in the N. T., it was of course Jacob, and it is somewhat remarkable that in them it reappears for the first time since the patriarch himself. In the unchangeable East St. James is still St. Jacob — Mar Yakoob; but no sooner had the name left the shores of Palestine than it underwent a series of curious and interesting changes probably unparalleled in any other case. To the Greeks it became Ἰάκωβος, with the accent on the first syllable; to the Latins, Jacobus, doubtless similarly accented, since in Italian it is Iacomo or Giacomo [also Jacopo]. In Spain it assumed two forms, apparently of different origins: Iago — in modern Spanish Diego, Portuguese, Tiago — and Xayme or Jayme, pronounced Hayme, with a strong initial guttural. In France it became Jacques; but another form was Jame, which appears in the metrical life of St. Thomas à Becket by Garnier (A. D 1170–74), quoted in Robertson's Becket, p. 139, note From this last the transition to our James is easy. When it first appeared in English, or through what channel, the writer has not been able to trace. Possibly it came from Scotland, where the name was a favorite one. It exists in Wycliffe's Bible (1381). In Russia, and in Germany and the countries more immediately related thereto, the name has retained its original form, and accordingly there alone there would seem to be no distinction between Jacob and James; which was the case even in mediæval Latin, where Jacob and Jacobus were always discriminated. Its modern dress, however, sits very lightly on the name; and we see in "Jacobite" and "Jacobin" how ready it is to throw it off, and, like a true Oriental, reveal its original form. G.

no fear of confounding the St. James of the New Testament with the hero of Compostella.

Of St. James's early life we know nothing. We first hear of him A. D. 27, when he was called to be our Lord's disciple; and he disappears from view A. D. 44, when he suffered martyrdom at the hands of Herod Agrippa I. We proceed to thread together the several pieces of information which the inspired writers have given us respecting him during these seventeen years.

I. His History. — In the spring or summer of the year 27, Zebedee,[a] a fisherman, but possessed at least of competence (Mark i. 20), was out on the Sea of Galilee, with his two sons, James and John, and some boatmen, whom either he had hired for the occasion, or who more probably were his usual attendants. He was engaged in his customary occupation of fishing, and near him was another boat belonging to Simon and Andrew, with whom he and his sons were in partnership. Finding themselves unsuccessful, the occupants of both boats came ashore, and began to wash their nets. At this time the new Teacher, who had now been ministering about six months, and with whom Simon and Andrew, and in all probability John, were already well acquainted (John i. 41), appeared upon the beach. He requested leave of Simon and Andrew to address the crowds that flocked around him from their boat, which was lying at a convenient distance from the shore. The discourse being completed, and the crowds dispersing, JESUS desired Simon to put out into the deeper water, and to try another cast for fish. Though reluctant, Simon did as he was desired, through the awe which he already entertained for One who, he thought, might possibly be the promised Messiah (John i. 41, 42), and whom even now he addressed as "Rabbi" (ἐπιστάτα, Luke v. 5, the word used by this Evangelist for Ῥαββί). Astonished at the success of his draught, he beckoned to his partners in the other boat to come and help him and his brother in landing the fish caught. The same amazement communicated itself to the sons of Zebedee, and flashed conviction on the souls of all the four fishermen. They had doubted and mused before; now they believed. At His call they left all, and became, once and for ever, His disciples, hereafter to catch men.

This is the call of St. James to the discipleship. It will be seen that we have regarded the events narrated by St. Matthew and St. Mark (Matt. iv. 18–22; Mark i. 16–20) as identical with those related by St. Luke (Luke v. 1–11), in accordance with the opinion of Hammond, Lightfoot, Maldonatus, Lardner, Trench, Wordsworth, etc.: not as distinct from them, as supposed by Alford, Greswell, etc.

For a full year we lose sight of St. James. He is then, in the spring of 28, called to the apostleship with his eleven brethren (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 14; Luke vi. 13; Acts i. 13). In the list of the Apostles given us by St. Mark, and in the book of Acts, his name occurs next to that of Simon Peter: in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke it comes third. It is clear that in these lists the names are not placed at random. In all four, the names of Peter, Andrew, James, and John are placed first; and it is plain that these four Apostles were at the head of the twelve throughout. Thus we see that Peter, James, and John, alone were admitted to the miracle of the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark v. 37; Luke viii. 51). The same three Apostles alone were permitted to be present at the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1; Mark ix. 2; Luke ix. 28). The same three alone were allowed to witness the Agony (Matt. xxvi. 37; Mark xiv. 33). And it is Peter, James, John, and Andrew who ask our Lord for an explanation of his dark sayings with regard to the end of the world and his second coming (Mark xiii. 3). It is worthy of notice that in all these places, with one exception (Luke ix. 28), the name of James is put before that of John, and that John is twice described as "the brother of James" (Mark v. 37; Matt. xvii. 1). This would appear to imply that at this time James, either from age or character, took a higher position than his brother. On the last occasion on which St. James is mentioned we find this position reversed. That the prominence of these three Apostles was founded on personal character (as out of every twelve persons there must be two or three to take the lead), and that it was not an office held by them "quos Dominus, ordinis servandi causâ, cœteris præposuit," as King James I. has said (Præfat. Mon. in Apol. pro Jur. Fid.), can scarcely be doubted (cf. Eusebius, ii. 14).

It would seem to have been at the time of the appointment of the twelve Apostles that the name of Boanerges [BOANERGES] was given to the sons of Zebedee. It might, however, like Simon's name of Peter, have been conferred before. This name plainly was not bestowed upon them because they heard the voice like thunder from the cloud (Jerome), nor because "divina eorum prædicatio magnum quendam et illustrem sonitum per terrarum orbem datura erat" (Vict. Antioch.), nor ὡς μεγαλοκήρυκας καὶ θεολογωτάτους (Theoph.), but it was, like the name given to Simon, at once descriptive and prophetic. The "Rockman" had a natural strength, which was described by his title, and he was to have a divine strength, predicted by the same title. In the same way the "Sons of Thunder" had a burning and impetuous spirit, which twice exhibits itself in its unchastened form (Luke ix. 54; Mark x. 37), and which, when moulded by the Spirit of God, taking different shapes, led St. James to be the first apostolic martyr, and St. John to become in an especial manner the Apostle of Love.

The first occasion on which this natural character manifests itself in St. James and his brother is at the commencement of our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem in the year 30. He was passing through Samaria; and now courting rather than avoiding publicity, he "sent messengers before his face" into a certain village, "to make ready for him" (Luke ix. 52), i. e. in all probability to announce him as the Messiah. The Samaritans, with their old jealousy strong upon them, refused to receive him, because he was going to Jerusalem instead of to Gerizim; and in exasperation James and John entreated their Master to follow the example of Elijah, and call down fire to consume them. The rebuke of their Lord is testified to by all the New Testament MSS. The words of the rebuke, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of," rest on the authority of the Codex Bezæ,

[a] An ecclesiastical tradition, of uncertain date, places the residence of Zebedee and the birth of St. James at Japhia, now Yáfa, near Nazareth. Hence that village is commonly known to the members of the Latin Church in that district as San Giacomo [JAPHIA.]

and a few MSS. of minor value. The rest of the verse, "For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them," is an insertion without authority of MSS. (see Alford, in loc.).[a]

At the end of the same journey a similar spirit appears again. As they went up to Jerusalem our Lord declared to his Apostles the circumstances of his coming Passion, and at the same time strengthened them by the promise that they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. These words seem to have made a great impression upon Salome, and she may have thought her two sons quite as fit as the sons of Jonas to be the chief ministers of their Lord in the mysterious kingdom which he was about to assume. She approached therefore, and besought, perhaps with a special reference in her mind to Peter and Andrew, that her two sons might sit on the right hand and on the left in his kingdom, i. e. according to a Jewish form of expression[b] (Joseph. Ant. vi. 11, § 9), that they might be next to the King in honor. The two brothers joined with her in the prayer (Mark x. 35). The Lord passed by their petition with a mild reproof, showing that the request had not arisen from an evil heart, but from a spirit which aimed too high. He told them that they should drink His cup and be baptized with His baptism of suffering, but turned their minds away at once from the thought of future preëminence: in His kingdom none of his Apostles were to be lords over the rest. The indignation felt by the ten would show that they regarded the petition of the two brothers as an attempt at infringing on their privileges as much as on those of Peter and Andrew.

From the time of the Agony in the Garden, A. D. 30, to the time of his martyrdom, A. D. 44, we know nothing of St. James, except that after the ascension he persevered in prayer with the other Apostles, and the women, and the Lord's brethren (Acts i. 13). In the year 44 Herod Agrippa I., son of Aristobulus, was ruler of all the dominions which at the death of his grandfather, Herod the Great, had been divided between Archelaus, Antipas, Philip, and Lysanias. He had received from Caligula, Trachonitis in the year 37, Galilee and Peræa in the year 40. On the accession of Claudius, in the year 41, he received from him Idumæa, Samaria, and Judæa. This sovereign was at once a supple statesman and a stern Jew (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, § 7, xix. 5–8): a king with not a few grand and kingly qualities, at the same time eaten up with Jewish pride — the type of a lay Pharisee. "He was very ambitious to oblige the people with donations," and "he was exactly careful in the observance of the laws of his country, keeping himself entirely pure, and not allowing one day to pass over his head without its appointed sacrifice" (Ant. xix. 7, § 3). Policy and inclination would alike lead such a monarch "to lay hands" (not "stretch forth his hands," A. V. Acts xii. 1) "on certain of the church;" and accordingly, when the passover of the year 44 had brought St. James and St. Peter to Jerusalem, he seized them both, considering doubtless that if he cut off the "Son of Thunder" and the "Rockman" the new sect would be more tractable or more weak under the presidency of James the Just, for whose character he probably had a lingering and sincere respect. James was apprehended first — his natural impetuosity of temper would seem to have urged him on even beyond Peter. And "Herod the king," the historian simply tells us, "killed James the brother of John with the sword" (Acts xii. 2). This is all that we know for certain of his death.[c] We may notice two things respecting it — first, that James is now described as the brother of John, whereas previously John had been described as the brother of James showing that the reputation of John had increased, and that of James diminished, by the time that St. Luke wrote: and secondly, that he perished not by stoning, but by the sword. The Jewish law laid down that if seducers to strange worship were few, they should be stoned; if many, that they should be beheaded. Either therefore Herod intended that James's death should be the beginning of a sanguinary persecution, or he merely followed the Roman custom of putting to death from preference (see Lightfoot, in loc.).

The death of so prominent a champion left a huge gap in the ranks of the infant society, which was filled partly by St. James, the brother of our Lord, who now steps forth into greater prominence in Jerusalem, and partly by St. Paul, who had now been seven years a convert, and who shortly afterwards set out on his first apostolic journey.

II. Chronological recapitulation. — In the spring or summer of the year 27 James was called to be a disciple of Christ. In the spring of 28 he was appointed one of the Twelve Apostles, and at that time probably received, with his brother, the title of Boanerges. In the autumn of the same year he was admitted to the miraculous raising of Jairus's daughter. In the spring of the year 29 he witnessed the Transfiguration. Very early in the year 30 he urged his Lord to call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritan village. About three months later in the same year, just before the final arrival in Jerusalem, he and his brother made their ambitious request through their mother Salome. On the night before the Crucifixion he was present at the Agony in the Garden. On the day of the Ascension he is mentioned as persevering with the rest of the Apostles and disciples in prayer. Shortly before the day of the Passover, in the year 44, he was put to death. Thus during fourteen out of the seventeen years that elapsed between his call and his death we do not even catch a glimpse of him.

III. Tradition respecting him. — Clement of Alexandria, in the seventh book of the Hypotyposeis, relates, concerning St. James's martyrdom, that the prosecutor was so moved by witnessing his bold confession that he declared himself a Christian on the spot: accused and accuser were therefore hurried off together, and on the road the latter begged St. James to grant him forgiveness; after a moment's hesitation. the Apostle kissed him, saying, "Peace be to thee!" and they were beheaded together. This tradition is preserved by Eusebius (H. E. ii. 6). There is no internal evidence against it, and the external evidence is sufficient to make it credible, for Clement flourished as early as A. D. 195, and he states expressly that the account was given him by those who went before him.

[c] The great Armenian convent at Jerusalem on the so-called Mount Zion is dedicated to "St. James the son of Zebedee." The church of the convent, or rather a small chapel on its northeast side, occupies the traditional site of his martyrdom. This, however, can hardly be the actual site (Williams, Holy City, ii. 558). Its most interesting possession is the chair of the Apostle, a venerable relic, the age of which is perhaps traceable as far back as the 4th century (Williams, 560). But as it would seem that it is believed to have belonged to "the first Bishop of Jerusalem," it is doubtful to which of the two Jameses the tradition would attach it.

For legends respecting his death and his connection with Spain, see the Roman Breviary (in Fest. S. Jac. Ap.), in which the healing of a paralytic and the conversion of Hermogenes are attributed to him, and where it is asserted that he preached the Gospel in Spain, and that his remains were translated to Compostella. As there is no shadow of foundation for any of the legends here referred to we pass them by without further notice. Even Baronius shows himself ashamed of them; Estius gives them up as hopeless; and Tillemont rejects them with as much contempt as his position would allow him to show. Epiphanius, without giving or probably having any authority for or against his statement, reports that St. James died unmarried (S. Epiph. Adv. Hær. ii. 4, p. 491, Paris, 1622), and that, like his namesake, he lived the life of a Nazarite (ibid. iii. 2, 13, p. 1045).

2. JAMES THE SON OF ALPHÆUS. Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13.

3. JAMES THE BROTHER OF THE LORD. Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Gal. i. 19.

4. JAMES THE SON OF MARY, Matt. xxvii. 56; Luke xxiv. 10. Also called THE LITTLE, Mark xv. 40.

5. JAMES THE BROTHER OF JUDE. Jude 1.

6. JAMES THE BROTHER (?) OF JUDE. Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13.

7. JAMES. Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 7; Gal. ii. 9, 12.

8. JAMES THE SERVANT OF GOD AND OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST. James i. 1.

We reserve the question of the authorship of the epistle for the present.

St. Paul identifies for us Nos. 3 and 7 (see Gal. ii. 9 and 12 compared with i. 19).

If we may translate Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου, Judas the brother, rather than the son of James, we may conclude that 5 and 6 are identical. And that we may so translate it, is proved, if proof were needed, by Winer (Grammar of the Idioms of the N. T., translated by Agnew and Ebbeke, New York, 1850, §§ lxvi. and xxx.), by Hänlein (Handb. der Einl. in die Schriften des Neuen Test., Erlangen, 1809), by Arnaud (Recherches critiques sur l'Epître de Jude, Strasbourg, 1851).

We may identify 5 and 6 with 3 because we know that James the Lord's brother had a brother named Jude.

We may identify 4 with 3 because we know James the son of Mary had a brother named Joses, and so also had James the Lord's brother.

Thus there remain two only, James the son of Alphæus (2.), and James the brother of the Lord (3.). Can we, or can we not, identify them? This requires a longer consideration.

I. By comparing Matt. xxvii. 56 and Mark xv. 40, with John xix. 25, we find that the Virgin Mary had a sister named like herself, Mary, who was the wife of Clopas, and who had two sons, James the Little, and Joses. It has been suggested that "Mary the wife of Clopas" in John xix. 25 need not be the same person as "his mother's sister" (Kitto, Lange, Davidson), but the Greek will not admit of this construction without the addition or the omission of a καί. By referring to Matt. xiii 55 and Mark vi. 3 we find that a James and a Joses, with two other brethren called Jude and Simon, and at least three (πᾶσαι) sisters, were living with the Virgin Mary at Nazareth. By referring to Luke vi. 16 and Acts i. 13 we find that there were two brethren named James and Jude among the Apostles. It would certainly be natural to think that we had here but one family of four brothers and three or more sisters, the children of Clopas and Mary, nephews and nieces of the Virgin Mary. There are difficulties, however, in the way of this conclusion. For, (1) the four brethren in Matt. xiii. 55 are described as the brothers (ἀδελφοί) of JESUS, not as His cousins; (2) they are found living as at their home with the Virgin Mary, which seems unnatural if she were their aunt, their mother being, as we know, still alive; (3) the James of Luke vi. 15 is described as the son not of Clopas, but of Alphæus; (4) the "brethren of the Lord" (who are plainly James, Joses, Jude, and Simon) appear to be excluded from the Apostolic band by their declared unbelief in his Messiahship (John vii. 3–5) and by being formally distinguished from the disciples by the Gospel-writers (Matt. xii. 48; Mark iii. 33; John ii. 12; Acts i. 14); (5) James and Jude are not designated as the Lord's brethren in the lists of the Apostles; (6) Mary is designated as mother of James and Joses, whereas she would have been called mother of James and Jude, had James and Jude been Apostles, and Joses not an Apostle (Matt. xxvii. 56).

These are the six chief objections which may be made to the hypothesis of there being but one family of brethren named James, Joses, Jude, and Simon. The following answers may be given:—

Objection 1.—"They are called brethren." It is a sound rule of criticism that words are to be understood in their most simple and literal acceptation; but there is a limit to this rule. When greater difficulties are caused by adhering to the literal meaning of a word, than by interpreting it more liberally, it is the part of the critic to interpret more liberally, rather than to cling to the ordinary and literal meaning of a word. Now it is clearly not necessary to understand ἀδελφοί as "brothers" in the nearest sense of brotherhood. It need not mean more than relative (comp. LXX. Gen. xiii. 8, xiv. 14, xx. 12, xxix. 12, xxxi. 23; Lev. xxv. 48; Deut. ii. 8; Job xix. 13, xlii. 11; Xen. Cyrop. i. 5, § 47; Isocr. Paneg. 20; Plat. Phæd. 57, Crit. 16; see also Cic. ad Att. 15; Tac. Ann. iii. 38; Quint. Curt. vi. 10, § 34; comp. Suicer and Schleusner, in voc.). But perhaps the circum stances of the case would lead us to translate it brethren? On the contrary, such a translation appears to produce very grave difficulties. For, first, it introduces two sets of four first-cousins, bearing the same names of James, Joses, Jude, and Simon, who appear upon the stage without anything to show which is the son of Clopas, and which his cousin; and secondly, it drives us to take our choice between three doubtful and improbable hypotheses as to the parentage of this second set of James, Joses, Jude, and Simon. There are three such hypotheses: (a.) The Eastern hypothesis, that they were the children of Joseph by a former wife. This notion originated in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (Orig. in Matt. xiii. 55, Op. tom. iii. p. 462, E. ed. Delarue), and was adopted by St. Epiphanius, St. Hilary, and St. Ambrose, and handed on to the later Greek Church (Epiph. Her. xxvii. 1, Op. tom. i. p. 115; Hil. in Matt. i., St. Ambr. Op. tom. ii. p. 260, Ed. Bened.). (b.) The Helvidian hypothesis, put forward at first by Bonosus, Helvidius, and Jovinian, and revived by Strauss and Herder in Germany, and by Davidson and Alford in England, that James, Joses, Jude, Simon, and the three sisters, were children of Joseph and Mary. This notion is opposed, whether rightly or wrongly, to the general sentiment of the Christian body in all ages of the Church; like the other two hypotheses, it creates two sets of cousins with the same name: it seems to be scarcely compatible with our Lord's recommending His mother to the care of St. John at His own death (see Jerome, Op. tom. ii. p. 10); for if, as has been suggested, though with great improbability, her sons might at that time have been unbelievers (Blom. Disp. Theol. p. 67, Lugd. Bat.; Neander, Planting, etc., iv. 1), JESUS would have known that that unbelief was only to continue for a few days. That the πρωτότοκος υἱός of Luke ii. 7, and the ἕως οὗ ἔτεκε of Matt. i. 25, imply the birth of after children, is not now often urged (see Pearson, On the Creed, i. 304, ii. 220). (c.) The Levirate hypothesis may be passed by. It was a mere attempt made in the eleventh century to reconcile the Greek and Latin traditions by supposing that Joseph and Clopas were brothers, and that Joseph raised up seed to his dead brother (Theoph. in Matt. xiii. 55; Op. tom. i. p. 71, E. ed. Venet. 1764).

Objection 2. — "The four brothers and their sisters are always found living and moving about with the Virgin Mary." If they were the children of Clopas, the Virgin Mary was their aunt. Her own husband would appear without doubt to have died at some time between A. D. 8 and A. D. 26. Nor have we any reason for believing Clopas to have been alive during our Lord's ministry. (We need not pause here to prove that the Cleophas of Luke xxiv. is an entirely different person and name from Clopas.) What difficulty is there in supposing that the two widowed sisters should have lived together, the more so as one of them had but one son, and he was often taken from her by his ministerial duties? And would it not be most natural that two families of first cousins thus living together should be popularly looked upon as one family, and spoken of as brothers and sisters instead of cousins? It is noticeable that St. Mary is nowhere called the mother of the four brothers.

Objection 3. — "James the Apostle is said to be the son of Alphæus, not of Clopas." But Alphæus and Clopas are the same name rendered into the Greek language in two different but ordinary and recognized ways, from the Aramaic חַלְפָּא or חַלְפַי. (See Mill, Accounts of our Lord's Brethren vindicated, etc. p. 236, who compares the two forms Clovis and Aloysius; Arnaud, Recherches etc.).

Objection 4. — Dean Alford considers John vii 5, compared with vi. 67–70, to decide that none of the brothers of the Lord were of the number of the Twelve (Proleg. to Ep. of James, Gr. Test. iv. 88, and Comm. in loc.). If this verse, as he states, makes "the crowning difficulty" to the hypothesis of the identity of James the son of Alphæus, the Apostle, with James the brother of the Lord, the difficulties are not too formidable to be overcome. Many of the disciples having left JESUS, St. Peter bursts out in the name of the Twelve with a warm expression of faith and love; and after that — very likely (see Greswell's Harmony) full six months afterwards — the Evangelist states that "neither did his brethren believe on Him." Does it follow from hence that all his brethren disbelieved? Let us compare other passages in Scripture. St. Matthew and St. Mark state that the thieves railed on our Lord upon the Cross. Are we therefore to disbelieve St. Luke, who says that one of the thieves was penitent, and did not rail? (Luke xxiii. 39, 40). St. Luke and St. John say that the soldiers offered vinegar. Are we to believe that all did so? or, as St. Matthew and St. Mark tell us, that only one did it? (Luke xxiii. 36; John xix. 29; Mark xv. 36; Matt. xxvii. 48). St. Matthew tells us that "his disciples" had indignation when Mary poured the ointment on the Lord's head. Are we to suppose this true of all? or of Judas Iscariot, and perhaps some others, according to John xii. 4 and Mark xiv. 4? It is not at all necessary to suppose that St. John is here speaking of all the brethren. If Joses, Simon, and the three sisters disbelieved, it would be quite sufficient ground for the statement of the Evangelist. The same may be said of Matt. xii. 47, Mark iii. 32, where it is reported to Him that his mother and his brethren, designated by St. Mark (iii. 21) as οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ, were standing without. Nor does it necessarily follow that the disbelief of the brethren was of such a nature that James and Jude, Apostles though they were, and vouched for half a year before by the warm-tempered Peter, could have had no share in it. It might have been similar to that feeling of unfaithful restlessness which perhaps moved St. John Baptist to send his disciples to make their inquiry of the Lord (see Grotius in loc., and Lardner, vi. p. 497, Lond. 1788). With regard to John, ii. 12, Acts i. 14, we may say that "his brethren" are no more excluded from the disciples in the first passage, and from the Apostles in the second, by being mentioned parallel with them, than "the other Apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas" (1 Cor. ix. 5), excludes Peter from the Apostolic band.

Objection 5. — "If the title of brethren of the Lord had belonged to James and Jude, they would have been designated by it in the list of the Apostles." The omission of a title is so slight a ground for an argument that we may pass this by.

Objection 6. — That Mary the wife of Clopas should be designated by the title of Mary the mother of James and Joses, to the exclusion of Jude, if James and Jude were Apostles, appears to Dr. Davidson (Introd. to N. T., iii. 295, London 1851) and to Dean Alford (Prol. to Ep. of James, G. T., iv. 90) extremely improbable. There is no improbability in it, if Joses was, as would seem likely, an elder brother of Jude, and next in order to James.

II. We have hitherto argued that the hypothesis which most naturally accounts for the facts of Holy Scripture is that of the identity of James the Little, the Apostle, with James the Lord's brother. We have also argued that the six main objections to this view are not valid, inasmuch as they may either be altogether met, or at best throw us back on other hypotheses which create greater difficulties than that under consideration. We proceed to point out some further confirmations of our original hypothesis.

1. It would be unnatural that St. Luke, in a list of twelve persons, in which the name of James twice occurred, with its distinguishing patronymic, should describe one of the last persons on his list as brother to "James," without any further designation to distinguish him, unless he meant the James whom he had just before named. The James whom he had just before named is the son of Alphæus; the person designated by his relationship to him is Jude. We have reason therefore for regarding Jude as the brother of the son of Alphæus; on other grounds (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3) we have reason for regarding him as the brother of the Lord: therefore we have reason for regarding the son of Alphæus as the brother of the Lord.

2. It would be unnatural that St. Luke, after having recognized only two Jameses throughout his Gospel and down to the twelfth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, and having in that chapter narrated the death of one of them (James the son of Zebedee), should go on in the same and following chapters to speak of "James," meaning thereby not the other James, with whom alone his readers are acquainted, but a different James not yet mentioned by him. Alford's example of Philip the Evangelist (Prolog. to the Ep. of James, p. 89) is in no manner of way to the point, except as a contrast. St. Luke introduces Philip the Evangelist, Acts vi. 5, and after recounting the death of Stephen his colleague, continues the history of the same Philip.

3. James is represented throughout the Acts as exercising great authority among, or even over, Apostles (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18); and in St. Paul's Epistles he is placed before even Cephas and John, and declared to be a pillar of the Church with them (Gal. ii. 9–12). It is more likely that an Apostle would hold such a position, than one who had not been a believer till after the Resurrection.

4. St. Paul says (Gal. i. 19), "Other of the Apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother" (ἕτερον δὲ τῶν ἀποστόλων οὐκ εἶδον εἰ μὴ Ἰάκωβον τὸν ἀδελφὸν τοῦ Κυρίου). This passage, though seeming to assert distinctly that James the Lord's brother was an Apostle, and therefore identical with the son of Alphæus, cannot be taken as a direct statement to that effect, for it is possible that ἀποστόλων may be used in the looser sense, though this is not agreeable with the line of defense which St. Paul is here maintaining, namely, that he had received his commission from God, and not from the Twelve (see Thorndike, i. p. 5, Oxf. 1844). And again, εἰ μή may qualify the whole sentence, and not only the word ἀποστόλων (Mayerhoff, Hist. krit. Einleit. in die Petrin. Schr. p. 52, Hamb. 1833; Neander, Michaelis, Winer, Alford). Still this is not often, if ever, the case, when εἰ μή follows ἕτερον (Schneckenburger, Adnot. ad Epist. Jac. perpet. p. 144, Stuttg. 1832: see also Winer Gramm. 5th ed., p. 647, and Meyer, Komm. in loc.); and if St. Paul had not intended to include St. James among the Apostles, we should rather have expected the singular ἀπόστολον than the plural τῶν ἀποστόλων (Arnaud, Recherches, etc.). The more natural interpretation of the verse would appear to be that which includes James among the Twelve, identifying him with the son of Alphæus. But, as we have said, such a conclusion does not necessarily follow. Compare, however, this verse with Acts ix. 27, and the probability is increased by several degrees. St. Luke there asserts that Barnabas brought Paul to the Apostles, πρὸς τοὺς ἀποστόλους. St. Paul, as we have seen, asserts that during that visit to Jerusalem he saw Peter, and none other of the Apostles, save James the Lord's brother. Peter and James, then, were the two Apostles to whom Barnabas brought Paul. Of course, it may be said here also that ἀπόστολοι is used in its lax sense; but it appears to be a more natural conclusion that James the Lord's brother was one of the Twelve Apostles, being identical with James the son of Alphæus, or James the Little.

III. We must now turn for a short time from Scripture to the early testimony of uninspired writers. Here, as among modern writers, we find the same three hypotheses which we have already mentioned: —

For the identity of James the Lord's brother with James the Apostle, the son of Alphæus, we find Papias of Hierapolis, a contemporary of the Apostles[a] (see Routh, Reliq. Sacr. i. 16, 43, 230, Oxon, 1846), St. Clement of Alexandria (Hypotyposeis, bk. vii. apud Euseb. H. E. ii. 1), St. Chrysostom (in Gal. i. 19).

Parallel with this opinion there existed another in favor of the hypothesis that James was the son of Joseph by a former marriage, and therefore not identical with the son of Alphæus. This is first found in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (see Origen, in Matt. xiii. 55), in the Protevangelium of James, and the Pseudo-Apostolical Constitutions of the third century (Thilo, Cod. Apocr. i. 228; Const. Apost. vi. 12). It is adopted by Eusebius (Comm. in Esai. xvii. 6; H. E. i. 12, ii. 1). Perhaps it is Origen's opinion (see Comm. in Joh. ii. 12). St. Epiphanius, St. Hilary, and St. Ambrose, we have already mentioned as being on the same side. So are Victorinus (Vict. Phil. in Gal. apud Maii Script. vet. nov. Coll. [tom. iii. pars ii.] Romæ, 1828) and Gregory Nyssen (Opp. tom. ii. p. 844, D, ed. Par. 1618), and it became the recognized belief of the Greek Church.

Meantime the hypothesis maintaining the identity of the two was maintained; and being warmly defended by St. Jerome (in Matt. xii. 49), and supported by St. Augustine (Contra Faust. xxii 35, &c.), it became the recognized belief of the Western Church.

The third hypothesis was unknown until it was put forward by Bonosus in Macedonia, and by Helvidius and Jovinian in Italy, as an opinion which seemed to them conformable with Scripture. Their followers were called Antidicomarianites. The fact of their having a name given them shows that their numbers must have been considerable; they date from the latter part of the fourth century.

English theological writers have been divided between the first and second of these views, with, however, a preference on the whole for the first hypothesis. See, for example, Lardner, vi. 495, Lond. 1788; Pearson, Minor Works, i. 350, Oxf. 1844, and On the Creed, i. 308, ii. 224, Oxf. 1833; Thorndike, i. 5, Oxf. 1844; Horne's Introd. to H. S. iv. 427, Lond. 1834, &c. On the same side are Lightfoot, Witsius, Lampe, Baumgarten, Semler, Gabler, Eichhorn, Hug, Bertholdt, Guericke, Schneckenburger, Meier, Steiger, Gieseler, Theile, Lange. Taylor (Opp. tom. v. p. 20, Lond. 1849), Wilson (Opp. tom. vi. p. 673, Oxf. 1859), Cave (Life of St. James) maintain the second hypothesis, with Vossius, Basnage, Valesius, etc. The third is held by Dr. Davidson (Intr. N. T. vol. iii.) and by Dean Alford (Greek Test. iv. 87).[a]

The chief treatises on the subject are Dr. Mill's Accounts of our Lord's brethren vindicated, Cambridge, 1843; Alford, as above referred to; Lange's Article in Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, Stuttgart, 1856; Neander's Pflanzung und Leitung; Schneckenburger's Annotatio ad Epist. Jac. perpetua, Stuttgart, 1832; Arnaud's Recherches critiques sur l'Épitre de Jude, Strasbourg, 1851; Schaff's Das Verhältniss des Jacobus Bruders des Herrn und Jacobus Alphäi, Berlin, 1842; Gabler's De Jacobo, Epistolæ eidem ascriptæ Auctori, Altorf, 1787.

Had we not identified James the son of Alphæus with the brother of the Lord we should have but little to write of him. When we had said that his name appears twice in the catalogue of the Twelve Apostles, our history of him would be complete. In like manner the early history of the Lord's brother would be confined to the fact that he lived and moved from place to place with his brothers and sisters, and with the Virgin Mary; and, except the appearance of the risen Lord to him, we should have nothing more to recount of him until after the death of James the son of Zebedee, in the year 44, or at least, till St. Paul's first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion, in the year 40. Of James the Little, who would probably be distinct from each of the above (for an argument against the identity of the Jameses is the doubt of the identity of Alphæus and Clopas), we should know nothing, except that he had a mother named Mary, who was the sister of the Virgin Mary and the wife of Clopas.

JAMES THE LITTLE, THE SON OF ALPHÆUS, THE BROTHER OF THE LORD. — Of James' father חַלְפָא, rendered by St. Matthew and St. Mark Alphæus (Ἁλφαῖος), and by St. John Clopas (Κλωπᾶς), we know nothing, except that he married Mary, the sister of the Virgin Mary, and had by her four sons and three or more daughters.[b] He appears to have died before the commencement of our Lord's ministry, and after his death it would seem that his wife and her sister, a widow like herself, and in poor circumstances, lived together in one house, generally at Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 55), but sometimes also at Capernaum (John ii. 12) and Jerusalem (Acts i. 14). It is probable that these cousins, or, as they were usually called, brothers and sisters, of the Lord were older than himself; as on one occasion we find them, with his mother, indignantly declaring that He was beside himself, and going out to "lay hold on Him" and compel Him to moderate his zeal in preaching, at least sufficiently "to eat bread" (Mark iii. 20, 21, 31). This looks like the conduct of elders towards one younger than themselves.

Of James individually we know nothing till the spring of the year 28, when we find him, together with his younger brother Jude, called to the Apostolate. It has been noticed that in all the four lists of the Apostles James holds the same place, heading perhaps the third class, consisting of himself, Jude, Simon, and Iscariot; as Philip heads the second class, consisting of himself, Bartholomew, Thomas, and Matthew; and Simon Peter the first, consisting of himself, Andrew, James, and John (Alford, in Matt. x. 2). The fact of Jude being described by reference to James (Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου) shows the name and reputation which he had, either at the time of the calling of the Apostles or at the time when St. Luke wrote.

It is not likely (though far from impossible) that James and Jude took part with their brothers and sisters, and the Virgin Mary, in trying "to lay hold on" JESUS in the autumn of the same year (Mark iii. 21); and it is likely, though not certain, that it is of the other brothers and sisters, without these two, that St. John says, "Neither did his brethren believe on Him" (John vii. 5), in the autumn of A. D. 29.

We hear no more of James till after the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. At some time in the forty days that intervened between the Resurrection and the Ascension the Lord appeared to him. This is not related by the Evangelists, but it is mentioned by St. Paul (1 Cor. xv. 7); and there never has been any doubt that it was to this James rather than to the son of Zebedee that the manifestation was vouchsafed. We may conjecture that it was for the purpose of strengthening him for the high position which he was soon to assume in Jerusalem, and of giving him the instructions on "the things pertaining to the kingdom of GOD" (Acts i. 3) which were necessary for his guidance, that the Lord thus showed himself to James. We cannot fix the date of this appearance. It was probably only a few days before the Ascension; after which we find James, Jude, and the rest of the Apostles, together with the Virgin Mary, Simon, and Joses, in Jerusalem, awaiting in faith and prayer the outpouring of the Pentecostal gift.

Again we lose sight of James for ten years, and when he appears once more it is in a far higher position than any that he has yet held. In the year 37 occurred the conversion of Saul. Three years after his conversion he paid his first visit to Jerusalem, but the Christians recollected what they had suffered at his hands, and feared to have anything to do with him. Barnabas, at this time of far higher reputation than himself, took him by the nand, and introduced him to Peter and James (Acts ix. 27; Gal. i. 18, 19), and by their authority he was admitted into the society of the Christians, and allowed to associate freely with them during the fifteen days of his stay. Here we find James on a level with Peter, and with him deciding on the admission of St. Paul into fellowship with the Church at Jerusalem; and from henceforth we always find him equal, or in his own department superior, to the very chiefest Apostles—Peter, John, and Paul. For by this time he had been appointed (at what exact date we know not) to preside over the infant Church in its most important centre, in a position equivalent to that of Bishop. This pre-eminence is evident throughout the after history of the Apostles, whether we read it in the Acts, in the Epistles, or in ecclesiastical writers. Thus in the year 44, when Peter is released from prison, he desires that information of his escape may be given to "James, and to the brethren" (Acts xii. 17). In the year 49 he presides at the Apostolic Council, and delivers the judgment of the Assembly, with the expression διὸ ἐγὼ κρίνω (Acts xv. 13, 19; see St. Chrys. in loc.). In the same year (or perhaps in the year 51, on his fourth visit to Jerusalem) St. Paul recognizes James as one of the pillars of the Church, together with Cephas and John (Gal. ii. 9), and places his name before them both. Shortly afterwards it is "certain who came from James," that is, from the mother church of Jerusalem, designated by the name of its Bishop, who lead Peter into tergiversation at Antioch. And in the year 57 Paul pays a formal visit to James in the presence of all his presbyters, after having been previously welcomed with joy the day before by the brethren in an unofficial manner (Acts xxi. 18).

Entirely accordant with these notices of Scripture is the universal testimony of Christian antiquity to the high office held by James in the Church of Jerusalem. That he was formally appointed Bishop of Jerusalem by the Lord himself, as reported by Epiphanius (Hæres. lxxviii.); Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in 1 Cor. vii.); Proclus of Constantinople (De Trad. Div. Liturg.); and Photius (Ep. 157), is not likely. Eusebius follows this account in a passage of his history, but says elsewhere that he was appointed by the Apostles (H. E. ii. 23). Clement of Alexandria is the first author who speaks of his Episcopate (Hypotypposeis, bk. vi. ap. Euseb. H. E. ii. 1), and he alludes to it as a thing of which the chief Apostles, Peter, James, and John, might well have been ambitious. The same Clement reports that the Lord, after his resurrection, delivered the gift of knowledge to James the Just, to John, and Peter, who delivered it to the rest of the Apostles, and they to the Seventy. This at least shows the estimation in which James was held. But the author to whom we are chiefly indebted for an account of the life and death of James is Hegesippus (i. e. Joseph), a Christian of Jewish origin, who lived in the middle of the second century. His narrative gives us such an insight into the position of St. James in the Church of Jerusalem that it is best to let him relate it in his own words: —

Tradition respecting James, as given by Hegesippus. — "With the Apostles James, the brother of the Lord, succeeds to the charge of the Church — that James, who has been called Just from the time of the Lord to our own days, for there were many of the name of James. He was holy from his mother's womb, he drank not wine or strong drink, nor did he eat animal food; a razor came not upon his head; he did not anoint himself with oil; he did not use the bath. He alone might go into the holy place; for he wore no woollen clothes, but linen. And alone he used to go into the Temple, and there he was commonly found upon his knees, praying for forgiveness for the people, so that his knees grew dry and thin [generally translated hard] like a camel's, from his constantly bending them in prayer, and entreating forgiveness for the people. On account therefore of his exceeding righteousness he was called 'Just,' and 'Oblias,' which means in Greek 'the bulwark of the people,' and 'righteousness,' as the prophets declare of him. Some of the seven sects then that I have mentioned inquired of him, 'What is the door of Jesus?' And he said that this man was the Saviour, wherefore some believed that Jesus is the Christ. Now the forementioned sects did not believe in the Resurrection, nor in the coming of one who shall recompense every man according to his works; but all who became believers believed through James. When many therefore of the rulers believed, there was a disturbance among the Jews, and Scribes, and Pharisees, saying, 'There is a risk that the whole people will expect Jesus to be the Christ.' They came together therefore to James, and said, 'We pray thee, stop the people, for they have gone astray after Jesus as though he were the Christ. We pray thee to persuade all that come to the Passover concerning Jesus: for we all give heed to thee, for we and all the people testify to thee that thou art just, and acceptest not the person of man. Persuade the people therefore not to go astray about Jesus, for the whole people and all of us give heed to thee. Stand therefore on the gable of the Temple, that thou mayest be visible, and that thy words may be heard by all the people; for all the tribes and even the Gentiles are come together for the Passover.' Therefore the forementioned Scribes and Pharisees placed James upon the gable of the Temple, and cried out to him, and said, 'O Just one, to whom we ought all to give heed, seeing that the people are going astray after Jesus who was crucified, tell us what is the door of Jesus?' And he answered with a loud voice, 'Why ask ye me about Jesus the Son of Man? He sits in heaven on the right hand of great power, and will come on the clouds of heaven.' And many were convinced and gave glory on the testimony of James, crying Hosannah to the Son of David. Whereupon the same Scribes and Pharisees said to each other, 'We have done ill in bringing forward such a witness to Jesus; but let us go up, and throw him down, that they may be terrified, and not believe on him.' And they cried out, saying, 'Oh! oh! even the Just is gone astray.' And they fulfilled that which is written in Isaiah, 'Let us take away the just man, for he is displeasing to us; therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their deeds.' They went up therefore, and threw down the Just one, and said to one another, 'Let us stone James the Just.' And they began to stone him, for he was not killed by the fall; but he turned round, and knelt down, and cried, 'I beseech thee, Lord God Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' And whilst they were stoning him, one of the priests, of the sons of Rechab, a son of the Rechabites to whom Jeremiah the prophet bears testimony, cried out and said, 'Stop! What are you about? The Just one is praying for you!' Then one of them, who was a fuller, took the club with which he pressed the clothes, and brought it down on the head of the

Just one. And so he bore his witness. And they buried him on the spot by the Temple, and the column still remains by the Temple. This man was a true witness to Jews and Greeks that JESUS is the Christ. And immediately Vespasian commenced the siege" (Euseb. ii. 23, and Routh, Rel. Sacr. p. 208, Oxf. 1846).

For the difficulties which occur in this extract, reference may be made to Routh's Reliquiæ Sacræ (vol. i. p. 228), and to Canon Stanley's Apostolical Age (p. 319, Oxf. 1847). It represents St. James to us in his life and in his death more vividly than any modern words could picture him. We see him, a married man perhaps (1 Cor. ix. 5), but in all other respects a rigid and ascetic follower after righteousness, keeping the Nazarite rule, like Anna the prophetess (Luke ii. 37), serving the Lord in the Temple "with fastings and prayers night and day," regarded by the Jews themselves as one who had attained to the sanctity of the priesthood, though not of the priestly family or tribe (unless indeed we argue from this that Clopas did belong to the tribe of Levi, and draw thence another argument for the identity of James the son of Clopas and James the Lord's brother), and as the very type of what a righteous or just man ought to be. If any man could have converted the Jews as a nation to Christianity, it would have been James.

Josephus' narrative of his death is apparently somewhat different. He says that in the interval between the death of Festus and the coming of Albinus, Ananus the high-priest assembled the Sanhedrim, and "brought before it James the brother of him who is called Christ, and some others, and having charged them with breaking the laws, delivered them over to be stoned." But if we are to reconcile this statement with that of Hegesippus, we must suppose that they were not actually stoned on this occasion. The historian adds that the better part of the citizens disliked what was done. and complained of Ananus to Agrippa and Albinus, whereupon Albinus threatened to punish him for having assembled the Sanhedrim without his consent, and Agrippa deprived him of the high-priesthood (Ant. xx. 9). The words "brother of him who is called Christ," are judged by Le Clerc, Lardner, etc., to be spurious.

Epiphanius gives the same account that Hegesippus does in somewhat different words, having evidently copied it for the most part from him. He adds a few particulars which are probably mere assertions or conclusions of his own (Hæres. xxix. 4, and lxxviii. 13). He considers James to have been the son of Joseph by a former wife, and calculates that he must have been 96 years old at the time of his death; and adds, on the authority, as he says, of Eusebius, Clement, and others, that he wore the πέταλον on his forehead, in which he probably confounds him with St. John (Polycr. apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24. But see Cotta, De lam pont. App. Joan. Jac. et Marci, Tub. 1755).

Gregory of Tours reports that he was buried not where he fell, but on the Mount of Olives,[a] in a tomb in which he had already buried Zacharias and Simeon (De glor. Mart. i. 27). Eusebius tells us that his chair was preserved down to his time; on which see Heinichen's Excursus (Exc. xi. ad Euseb. H. E. vii. 19, vol. iv. p. 957, ed. Burton).

We must add a strange Talmudic legend, which appears to relate to James. It is found in the Midrash Koheleth, or Commentary on Ecclesiastes, and also in the Tract Abodah Zarah of the Jerusalem Talmud. It is as follows: "R. Eliezer, the son of Dama, was bitten by a serpent; and there came to him Jacob, a man of Caphar Secama, to heal him by the name of Jesu the son of Pandera; but R. Ismael suffered him not, saying, 'That is not allowed thee, son of Dama.' He answered, 'Suffer me, and I will produce an authority against thee that it is lawful;' but he could not produce the authority before he expired. And what was the authority? — This: 'Which if a man do, he shall live in them' (Lev. xviii. 5). But it is not said that he shall die in them." The son of Pandera is the name that the Jews have always given to our Lord, when representing him as a magician. The same name is given in Epiphanius (Hæres. lxxviii.) to the grandfather of Joseph, and by John Damascene (De Fide Orth. iv. 15) to the grandfather of Joachim, the supposed father of the Virgin Mary. For the identification of James of Secama (a place in Upper Galilee) with James the Just, see Mill (Historic. Criticism of the Gospel, p. 318, Camb. 1840). The passage quoted by Origen and Eusebius from Josephus, in which the latter speaks of the death of James as being one of the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem, seems to be spurious (Orig. in Matt. xiii. 55; Euseb. H. E. ii. 23).

It is possible that there may be a reference to James in Heb. xiii. 7 (see Theodoret in loc.), which would fix his death at some time previous to the writing of that epistle. His apprehension by Ananus was probably about the year 62 or 63 (Lardner, Pearson, Mill, Whitby, Le Clerc, Tillemont). There is nothing to fix the date of his martyrdom as narrated by Hegesippus, except that it must have been shortly before the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem. We may conjecture that he was between 70 and 80 years old.[b] F. M.

JAMES, THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF. I. Its Genuineness and Canonicity. — In the third book of his Ecclesiastical History, Eusebius makes his well-known division of the books, or pretended books, of the New Testament into four classes. Under the head of ὁμολογούμενα he places the Gospels, the Acts, the Pauline Epistles, the First Epistle of St. John, and the First Epistle

[a] The monument — part excavation, part edifice — which is now commonly known as the "Tomb of St. James," is on the east side of the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat, and therefore at a considerable distance from the spot on which the Apostle was killed, which the narrative of Hegesippus would seem to fix as somewhere under the southeast corner of the wall of the Haram, or perhaps further down the slope nearer the 'Fountain of the Virgin." [EN-ROGEL.] It cannot at any rate be said to stand "by the Temple." The tradition about the monument in question is that St. James took refuge there after the capture of Christ, and remained, eating and drinking nothing, until our Lord appeared to him on the day of his resurrection (See Quaresmius, etc., quoted in Tobler, Siloah, etc 299.) The legend of his death there seems to be first mentioned by Maundeville (A. D. 1320: see Early Trav. 176). By the old travellers it is often called the "Church of St. James."

[b] It is almost unnecessary to say that the Jacobite churches of the East — consisting of the Armenians, the Copts, and other Monophysite or Eutychian bodies — do not derive their title from St. James, but from a later person of the same name. Jacob Bara Iæus who died Bishop of Edessa in 788.
